THE HASHIMITE KINGDOM OF JORDAN

(Al-Mamlakah al-Urduniyah al-Hashimiyah)

SYNOPSIS AND ECONOMIC SURVEY

SYNOPSIS: INTERNAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

The internal calm which Jordan enjoyed by the end of 1960 was enhanced in 1961 by both internal and external factors. The government benefited from the truce established by King Hussein with President Abdel Nasser and, in the last quarter of the year, by the breakup of the UAR. This, for the time being, greatly reduced the possibility of establishing an alternative regime in Jordan. At the same time the government was aided by a considerable improvement in the economic situation (on which see below: Economic and Social Survey).

The Baghdad conference of Arab foreign ministers in January, largely an endeavour by the protagonists of "Arab solidarity"—King Hussein among them—to bring the UAR into cooperation with them on their own terms, was followed by Jordanian initiative to improve relations with that country. (See pp 140 ff.) However, though the correspondence which King Hussein started with President Abdel Nasser was couched in friendly terms, it revealed anew their basic differences. As against the President's policies of "cooperative democratic socialism," a comprehensive Arab union, "anti-imperialism," and non-alignment, Hussein insisted on his own: a non-socialist development and reform policy, Arab solidarity rather than union, and an anti-Communist foreign policy. Hussein presented himself in his letters as an Arab leader equal to Abdel Nasser in stature and in status.

Inside Jordan this development was accompanied by the release of pro-Nasser officers and civilians who had been imprisoned for subversive activities. There was an outburst of pro-Nasser—though not anti-government—sentiments in Jordan, and the government intervened to control matters. Foreign observers thought that a rapprochement with Abdel Nasser might endanger the throne as it had in 1956-7, and that on the other hand the King might encounter difficulties with the Bedouin and other supporters of the regime who were suspicious of such a policy.

Facts, however, proved these apprehensions unfounded. There was no sign of any organization among pro-UAR elements. As to the Bedouin, the King took it upon himself personally to extend to them drought-assistance. Within the ruling group he decided a dispute between rival Bedouin clans and personalities in favour of his army chief Habis al-Majali, and against Akil al-Fa'iz of the Bani Sakhr tribe and some senior officers. Fa'iz resigned and the officers were retired.

On May 1 the engagement of King Hussein to Miss Antoinette Gardiner, an English girl, was announced. The wedding took place on May 25; the King's wife was given no title or political position. Strong opposition to the marriage was reported on the part of the King's family, the government and his closest associates, while Gen. Majali and senior officers were said to favour the match; regarding the Bedouin there were conflicting reports. Foreign observers thought that national feeling had been deeply hurt by the King's marriage to an "imperialist foreigner" and that the King's position had been seriously weakened. The King replied that his marriage was a private affair and advised his "hypocritical" critics "to return to their senses."

During May, between the engagement and the wedding, more political and non-political prisoners were released. During this period also Jordan published the second round of letters between the King and President Abdel Nasser in which the latter accepted in principle a suggestion that they meet. A cabinet reshuffle in June in which three ultra-conservative ministers and the Foreign Minister Mosa Nasir were relieved of their posts seemed to be related to the improved relations with the UAR; similarly, the release from house arrest in August of Sulayman an-Nahuli, who had headed the nationalist pro-Egyptian government in 1956-57.

Jordan's inter-Arab standing further improved with the Kuwait crisis (from June onwards) when Hussein succeeded in maintaining relatively good terms with Iraq while attaching a contingent to the Arab Force in Kuwait and opening a perspective for Kuwaiti financial aid to his country.

Upon the breakup of the UAR King Hussein made a complete volte face in his relations with Abdel Nasser. Jordan was the first state to recognize independent Syria on September 29, the day after the coup. King Hussein was the only Arab leader who almost immediately praised the coup as a "blessed upsurge," while vilifying Abdel Nasser (though not by name). Cairo retaliated by severing relations with Jordan. King Hussein said his policy had not been fortuitous and—making clear his estimate that his situation had improved—he said that his self-confidence was growing.

The general elections, which had been postponed from 1960 following the assassination of Majali, took place in October on a personal basis; parties had been dissolved in 1957. Two thirds of the seats were not contested because of what was described as machinations by the government, and even usually sympathetic observers remarked that the elections had been rigged. The majority of the 60 deputies was reported to be right-wing and supporting cooperation with Iraq and Syria. The elections were followed by new appointments to and a reshuffle of the cabinet, but there were no significant changes; Bahjat at-Talhuni retained the premiership.

While Jordan's basic political issue—namely the nature of the regime—obviously could not be raised in parliament, some matters ailing the country could. Deputies complained inter alia of inefficiency and corruption in the administration; exploitation by officers of army resources for private benefit; failure of industrial development projects; unemployment in general and of secondary school graduates in particular; the high cost of living; lack or insufficiency of public and especially social services in certain districts; and last but not least, Jordan's dependence on foreign aid. The deputies demanded an economic development policy aimed at making Jordan economically viable. For his part, King Hussein also laid stress on an economic and social development policy, and the development of an effective administration.

Jordan's foreign policy continued on the established markedly pro-Western and anti-Communist lines. The country continued to be dependent on Western financial aid which covered 57.4% of the total budget expenditure, the bulk coming from the US and the remainder from the UK. The US made it clear that she regarded Jordan's continued political and economic stability as of "key importance," and that consequently large scale assistance would have to continue. At the UN General Assembly, Jordan's voting record was more pro-Western than that of any other Arab country, in spite of her voting approximately twice as much with the Communist countries as with the US.

Jordan showed increased interest in African countries, following King Hussein's tour the previous year. Contacts were established mainly in the Islamic sphere.

The situation on Jordan's long border with Israel continued much as usual. (See also Synopsis on Arab-Israel Conflict, pp 179-80.)

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL SURVEY

A Favourable Year. 1961 was a favourable year for the economy of Jordan. The national product rose by 23%. The gross national product per capita grew from JD58 in 1960 to JD70 in 1961. The growth was principally due to the increase in the value of net agricultural output, which amounted to 77%; industrial output grew by 24.8%. In 1961 28% of the resources at the disposal of the national economy had to be imported, as against 32% in 1960. Resources apportioned to gross investment and exports stood at 21% in 1961, as against 19% in 1960; the absolute figures were JD33.5m. against JD26.4m. There was a considerable increase in private consumption, while the increase in that of the state was negligible; government expenditure remained nearly frozen. The deficit in the current balance of payments decreased. The general price index went down from 101 in 1960 to 88 in 1961, according to Jordanian figures.

Population. A general census was held in Jordan in November. The Kingdom's population had reached 1,690,000 as against 1,329,000 in 1952, an increase of 27%. As a consequence of internal movement the population in the East Bank now constituted 52% of the total as against only 44% in 1952, having risen by 51%. The number of nomads (tent-dwellers) was estimated at 96,000.

A 1960 survey estimated the labour force at 400,000 (excluding women working in agriculture). There were, however, only 280,000 gainfully employed, their distribution among branches being: Agriculture—150,000; Public Administration and Defence—75,000; Industry—22,000; Building and Construction—18,000; Commerce and Services—15,000. The number of gainfully employed probably grew in 1961 because of the improved economic situation, but unemployment no doubt remained high.

Education—especially at the secondary level—continued to expand. The overall number of pupils in 1961/2 (in round figures) was 300,000 (including 104,000 girls) as against 284,000 in 1960/1 and 254,000 in 1956/7. The number of students in secondary schools was 20,000 as against 15,000 in 1960/1 and 9,000 in 1956/7. 4,300 students matriculated as against 1,770 in 1956/7. This rapid growth of secondary school graduates constituted a serious political liability as the economy was unable to absorb them at the level they aspired to and as there were no local institutions for higher studies apart from a small university institute of arts. Though the expansion of vocational schools was rapid, absolute figures remained low; there were 3,242 students in 1961/2 as against 2,466 in 1960/1 and 1,770 in 1959/60.

While the relative increase in the number of doctors and hospital beds exceeded that of population growth, absolute figures remained very low. There was one doctor for 5,300 persons (as against 760 in the US and 2,600 in the UAR).

National Accounts. According to Jordanian official figures the gross national product amounted in 1961 to JD118m. an increase of 23.4% over 1960, compared with an increase of 8.7% from 1959 to 1960. The largest increases were in agriculture, industry and trade.

At the same time domestic output grew in proportion to imported resources:

In 1961, as in 1960, there was an increase of investments and exports in the use of resources, against a relative decrease of government consumption. Private consumption remained static in relative figures while increasing considerably in actual figures.

Gross investment was financed as follows: JD11.4m. by private savings, JD3.8m. by government savings, and JD1.8m. by a deficit in current accounts. Gross investments were apportioned to building (JD9.1m.), equipment (JD5.5m.) and build-up of stocks (JD2.4m.)

Agriculture, 1961 was a good year for Jordanian agriculture, though the late rains of May damaged the crops. The value of the gross agricultural product was JD23.1m., compared with JD13m. in 1960 and JD11.4m. in 1959.

Output in 1961 increased considerably in all branches over that in 1959 and 1960, though the cereal and legumes crops fell below those of the bumper years 1956/7.

Legumes	335	146	66	222
Vegetables	240	351	399	533
Fruit	97	112	104	262

The outstanding increase in vegetable and fruit crops was due to several factors: plentiful rains; expansion of cultivated areas (vegetables from 43,200 hectares in 1957 to 58,300 hectares in 1961; fruit, during the same period, from 9,700 hectares to 26,200 hectares); maturing of young plantations; improved cultivation methods (e.g. the tomato harvest per hectare rose from 5.8 tons in 1957 to 11.2 tons in 1961). On the other hand, the area under legumes decreased from 45,600 hectares in 1957 to 41,400 hectares in 1961.

The East Ghor project made progress. Its purpose was to provide irrigation for about 12,000 hectares in the eastern Jordan Valley by diverting water from the Yarmuk river through a main canal of 69 km length and a system of subsidiary canals. In October 1961 the first stage was completed with the opening of a 22 km stretch of the main canal, intended to irrigate about 3,700 hectares. In January an agreement was signed for U.S. participation in the second stage to the extent of $2m. out of a total of $3.1m. In this stage, due for completion in 1962, the main canal was to be extended a further 24 km, thus providing for the irrigation of another 3,300 hectares. The third and last stage of the project was due for completion by 1964. (See also p 219.)

Manufacturing and Mining. Industrial output showed a considerable increase.

ECONOMIC SURVEY

The main branches in manufacturing and mining were foodstuffs, beverages and tobacco—JD2.88m. (26%); mining and quarrying—JD2.20m. (21%); non-metallic mineral products—JD1.45m. (14%); textiles, clothing and footwear—JD1.12m. (10%); oil refining—JD0.99m. (9%).

The following developments took place in industry and mining: the oil refinery at Khaw, near Zarqa (MER 1960, p 317) was opened in February; it was assumed that it would annually save the country JD1.75m, and increase the national product by JD1.5m. In June the Iraq Petroleum Company announced that it would transfer to Jordan the section of the Kirkuk-Haifa pipeline which passed through her territory and which had been unused since 1948; the government intended to utilize the line for piping water from the Azraq springs westwards. In June a tannery was opened at Zarqa. Phosphates production far exceeded the marketing possibilities, as a consequence of the enlargement of the Ruseifa mining plant and the high transport costs hampering exports. Mining of phosphates reached 423,000 tons and exports 383,000 tons compared with 362,000 tons and 319,000 tons respectively in 1960. In September a US firm was commissioned to undertake a preliminary survey for the erection of a potash plant on the southern shore of the Dead Sea—with an annual capacity of 250,000 tons following the completion of trials at the pilot plant on the northern shore (MER 1960, p 317). Geologists of the West German technical aid team discovered copper ore deposits in the Khusseiba region in the Wadi Araba, estimated at 22.5m. tons. In December the Jordan Sulphur Company was licensed to exploit the sulphur deposits in the vicinity of the Dead Sea.

The completion in 1960 of the Amman-Aqaba highway was followed up with further efforts to overcome a major obstacle in the development of the economy, namely the inadequate communication facilities. In October West Germany agreed to participate with JD1.35m. in an expansion project for Aqaba port. The volume of goods passing through the port was 733,000 tons in 1961, compared with 685,000 tons in 1960 and 147,000 tons in 1957. In November the mixed Syrian-Jordanian-Saudi Arabian commission for the reconstruction of the 840 km Ma'an-Medina section of the Hijaz railway (the Damascus-Ma'an section was in use) awarded the contract to a Japanese-Saudi Arabian partnership; the cost, estimated at JD8m., was to be borne by the three countries in equal shares and work was to start at the beginning of 1962. The government published a five-year plan for the development of air communications, mainly the expansion of the airports of Amman and Qalendiya (north of Jerusalem) and the construction of an international airport on the shores of the Dead Sea. In September the concessions of Air Jordan and National Jordanian Airways were cancelled and a new company was formed under the name of Jordania (Jordan Airlines). Its capital of JD1m. was subscribed by the Lebanese Middle East Airlines (35%), the Jordanian government (25%), the dissolved companies, and the public.

Finance. Bank credit continued to expand, but at a slower rate, and reached JD18.6m. as against JD16.6m. in 1960 and JD13.2m. in 1959. This expansion was mainly the result of an increasing demand for instalment purchases, building and real estate investing, and credits to industry; government indebtedness, on the other hand, decreased. The slowing down was caused by declining imports and decreasing stocks.

Means of payment amounted at the end of 1961 to JD28.9m., as against JD26.1m. in 1960 and JD24.2m. in 1959. Private deposits constituted 42% of the total in 1961, as against 40% in 1960 and 37% in 1959, a proof of the public's growing readiness to use banking facilities.

According to provisional figures prices went down considerably in 1961—in agriculture mainly, due to the year's bumper crops.

Foreign Trade and Balance of Payments. Imports amounted to JD41.9m. with re-exports at JD1m.—a decrease of 2.4% from 1960. The main import items were foodstuffs (JD13.4m.—32%), raw materials and semi-manufactured products (JD8.9m.—21%), machinery and equipment (JD6.2m.—15%), textiles (JD6m.—14%), petroleum products (JD2.4m.—6%).

Exports amounted to JD4.25m. as against JD3.48m. in 1960, an increase of 22%. The main export items were again foodstuffs (54%) and phosphates (37%).

JORDAN: INTERNAL AFFAIRS

Changes in the direction of trade were insignificant. The countries of Western Europe, headed by the UK, the Middle East countries, and the USA, remained chief suppliers. Imports from the USA increased from JD5.1m. in 1960 to JD7m. in 1961 as Jordan agreed to import US goods to the value of half the US aid to Jordan. Imports from Italy, the GFR, Syria, Lebanon and Saudi Arabia decreased. The main increases in exports were to Middle East markets, from JD2.1m. in 1960 to JD2.7m. in 1961. (For details, see tables, pp 82-5.)

The percentage of outlay for imports covered by exports grew considerably over 1960 though only insignificantly over 1958. The figures were as follows: 1958: 30.8%; 1959: 20.4%; 1960: 22.0%; 1961: 31.5%.

Foreign Aid continued to be vital to Jordan's economy. While the percentage of foreign aid as part of the gross national product and the budget decreased, it generally remained very high.

Jordan endeavoured to mobilize additional sources, in particular from Kuwait. (See pp 136, 139a)

The Budget. The budget resembled that of previous years. Foreign aid continued as the foremost source of revenue, though its percentage decreased slightly, from 60% in 1959/60 to 57% in 1960/61 and 56% in 1961/2. Security constituted 63% of total expenditure, as in 1960/61.

Development Plan. Preparations were announced for the publication of a five-year development plan involving an outlay of JD120m. The development authority was authorized by the government to negotiate in Jordan and abroad for the necessary capital.

SUBVERSION: AFTERMATH OF MAJALI MURDER CASE; RELEASE OF SUBVERSIVE ELEMENTS

(January)

[On Dec 31 four persons who had been found guilty of participation in the assassination of PM Majali on Aug 29, 1960 were executed. Immediately following this, many political prisoners—including army officers—were released. The announcement of the King's engagement to Miss Toni Gardiner was followed by another wave of such releases.]

Executions. On Dec 31, 1960, four Jordanians convicted of complicity in the murder of the late PM Hazza' al-Majali were executed in Amman (Jihad; Falastin, Jan 1; for details see MER 1960, p 329-30). This was only the second time King Hussein had confirmed death sentences since he assumed constitutional power in 1953. (In 1958 he sanctioned the execution of three men found guilty of spying for Israel.) No reactions appeared in the Jordanian press.

In Damascus the Palestinian National Union organized a protest march by 5,000 people and, in a statement, condemned Hussein whose very "existence they consider to be a crime and a disgrace to the nation." Demonstrations took place also in Hama and Homs. (Mid. Mir., Jan 7)

On Jan 25 it was announced that Zakariya Yusuf at-Tahir's property had been confiscated. Tahir had been condemned to capital punishment in absentia for his part in Majali's assassination (See MER 1960, p 327, 329.) (Jihad, Jan 25; Hayat, Jan 26). In Feb the property was sold by public auction. (R. Amman, Feb 11 [14])

In Aug Ibrahim Yusuf at-Tahir, Zakariya's brother, was murdered in Amman (in an act of blood vengeance). The murderer, who was reported to be a relative of the former PM, was arrested by the police. (Jihad, Aug 7)

On Sept 21 King Hussein visited Karak to hush a tribal truce between the Majali and Masawah clans on the one side and the Dabbas, Tahir, Shamdat, Hindawi and other clans on the other. This truce ended the vendetta which started with the murder of PM Majali. King Hussein was accompanied by PM Talhuni, ministers, diplomatic envoys, army officers, government officials, religious leaders and other notables. In a short speech the King spoke of the need for unity and peace within the "large Jordanian family." (Jihad, Difa, Falastin, Sept 22)

Death Penalty for Terrorists. On Jan 7 the government approved a bill to be submitted to Parliament imposing the death penalty on persons using or carrying explosives without prior permission from the authorities. An introductory paragraph to the bill said it was necessary in the public interest to impose severe penalties after it had been proven that explosives entered the country for the sole purpose of undermining its stability. (Jihad, Jer. Times, Jan 8)

Amnesties and Releases of Political Prisoners. On Jan 1 it was announced that King Hussein had commuted the death sentences of Major-Gen. Sadiq ash-Shar' and Rifat Awdah to imprisonment for life. They were condemned to death in 1959, having been found guilty of taking part in a military conspiracy in cooperation with the UAR. (MER 1960, p 325-7) (Jihad, Jan 1)

Publication followed of many letters and cables received by the King in which the detainees, their families and others thanked the King for his generosity. (Jihad, Falastin, Jan 5)

On Jan 1 the release was announced of Mahmud al-Mu'ayyid, ex-Colonel in the Jordanian army, who had been sentenced to 15 years imprisonment in 1957 on charges of plotting to assassinate King Hussein. He belonged to the group which included the former Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Ali Abu Nuwar and Ali Hayyari, and former Foreign Minister Abdallah ar-Rimawi, the exiled leader of the Jordanian Ba'ath Party. (Jihad, Jan 2; ANA, Jan 2 [4])

On Jan 2 it was reported that a number of officers sentenced on political charges were to be released "soon." The total number of political detainees in Jordan was reported as 146. The next day it was announced that 31 detainees would be freed according to the decision of the State Security Council. (Jihad, Jan 2, 4)

On Feb 14 the release was announced of 15 detainees, most of them from the Nahlus region, who had been arrested a year previously on security grounds. (Falastin, Feb 15)

On March 13 it was announced that the King had ordered the release on Id al-Fitr of 44 detainees whose cases had been reviewed. (R. Amman, March 13 [15])

For further releases see below: The King's Marriage.

Trial of Would-be Saboteurs. In Feb the State Security Court tried two men charged with attempting to blow up the Amman radio station in Sept 1960. The defendants, Taysir Darwish Ahmad and Shawqi Ku'aybani, were former employees of the radio station. The prosecutor alleged that they had agreed to destroy the station after a meeting with the acting UAR consul. On Feb 28 they were found guilty and sentenced to terms of six and three years imprisonment respectively, with hard labour. (Jihad; Falastin, Feb 15, March 1)

IMPROVING RELATIONS WITH UAR AND

CHANGES IN GOVERNMENT, ARMY

(March-April)

Improved Relations With UAR; Public Expression of Pro-UAR Sentiments. The correspondence between King Hussein and President Abdel Nasser, the first part of which was published on March 31, as well as other signs of improving relations between Jordan and the UAR, brought forth an outburst of pro-UAR sentiments in the Kingdom. There were spontaneous demonstrations in which pictures of Abdel Nasser as well as of Hussein were borne aloft; pictures of the President were reported to have appeared "in every shop window in Jerusalem." The King issued a statement thanking the people for their loyalty and calling on them to stop the demonstrations.

Some foreign observers thought the move might endanger the throne; on the other hand, it was remarked that many Jordanians were suspicious of a policy of rapprochement and the King might run into difficulties. (For more details see p 145.)

Resignation of Akif al-Fā'iz; Rivalry Between Bani Sakhr and Majāli Tribes Seen. On March 27 it was announced that the King had accepted the resignation of Akif al-Fā'iz, the Minister of Defence. Wasfi al-Mirza, the Minister of Communications and Social Affairs, was appointed Acting Minister of Defence. (R. Amman, March 27 [29]; Falastin, March 28)

On the same day the cabinet, in an emergency session, approved the compulsory retirement of five senior army officers, foremost among them being Maj-Gen. Akkash az-Zabin, commander of the armoured corps.

Akif al-Fā'iz refused to comment on his resignation. He affirmed that his loyalty to the King was as great now as it had been before he left the government.

The New York Times attributed these changes to the personal rivalry between Hābis al-Majāli, the C-in-C, and Akif al-Fā'iz, as well as to the ancient rivalry between the Majāli clan and the tribe of Akif al-Fā'iz, the Bani Sakhr. Akif was the son of the paramount shaykh of the Bani Sakhr. Thus, while Gen. Majāli had been abroad during the two previous months, Akif al-Fā'iz promoted the cause of Maj-Gen. Akkash az-Zabin, his brother-in-law, then commander of an armoured brigade, whose ambition had been to become Chief of Staff. King Hussein, the paper wrote, was now moving to strengthen the discipline of the army. (Falastin, March 28, 29; NTT, March 29, April 1)

In Beirut there were also attempts to connect this affair with the improvement of relations with the UAR, to which those involved were said to be opposed (Hawadith, March 31; Mid. Mir., April 1). Al-Hayāt, however, discounted this interpretation. (Hayat, March 30)

Some days later Maj-Gen. fzzat Hasan Qandūr, [Circassian] assistant C-in-C of the Jordanian armed forces, "retired at his own request." He met the King on the occasion of his retirement. (ANA, April 3 [6]; Jihad, April 3)

Unfounded Reports of Sharif Nāsir's Arrest; Changes in Government. Following the resignation of Akif al-Fā'iz, foreign reports appeared to the effect that King Hussein had ordered the arrest of his uncle, Sharif Nāsir Ibn Jamil, commander of the royal guard, following a dispute between them on the new policy of improving relations with the UAR, which Sharif Nāsir was said to oppose. (R. Moscow, March 29 [SU April 4]; MENA, March 31 [April 4]; Akhbar, March 29; Jaridah, April 2). [The reports seem to have been unfounded; in fact Sharif Nāsir was appointed commander of the armoured corps in addition to his other duties.]

There were more reports from UAR and pro-UAR sources on forthcoming changes in the government on the issue of relations with the UAR. Fawzi al-Mulqi, Sulaymān an-Nābulsi and Abd al-Halim Nimr were mentioned as possible candidates to head a new government. [The last two were leaders of the dissolved National Socialist party.] Nābulsi, head of the pro-UAR government in 1956-7 was still under house arrest. (Hawadith, March 31, April 2; R. Cairo, March 30 [4])

PM Tāhūni denied all such reports. (Manar, April 16)

THE BUDGET DEBATE

(April)

The budget for the financial year 1961/2 which started on April 1 was debated in the House of Representatives and approved on April 23. (For details of the budget, see above: Economic Survey.)

Deputies Demand Policy To Make Jordan Self-sufficient.

The deputies participating in the debate were unanimous in requesting the government to draw up an economic policy aimed at making Jordan self-sufficient, so that she could dispense with foreign aid. They mentioned industrialization, land reclamation, the Dead Sea Potash works, tourism and oil prospecting. Most of them approved a resolution passed by the parliamentary finance committee calling upon the cabinet to encourage local industry, restrict the import of cars and other luxury goods, encourage foreign investment and grant loans to farmers.

A number of deputies praised the improved relations with the UAR, made proposals for strengthening relations with Africa, and expressed support for the cause of the Algerian insurgents.

The government was asked to find work for the unemployed in general and the unemployed among secondary school graduates in particular; one deputy held the civil service commission responsible for unemployment among the latter. (For sources see below)

Army Officers, Civil Servants Blamed For Waste of Public Funds.

Deputy Qāsim al-Hindāwi called on the PM to prevent army officers from using cars for their private purposes and for employing soldiers in their homes. He said he had called attention to this issue at an earlier opportunity but nothing had been done. The army officers, he said, should take as an example the savings made by the King in his expenditures. He complained that the army budget was not being discussed in parliament; he said the deputies were trustworthy and if it was necessary to keep this budget secret they could debate in closed sessions. Deputy Abd al-Bāqī Jamu, who repeated these charges against army officers, maintained high-ranking civil servants were doing the same. He also asked why the roads were in so bad a state of repair, although so much money had been invested in their construction. Speaking of the "failure" of the potash plant and the sugar factory, he claimed that Israel was behind the failure of the first. He also charged that the oil companies had not discovered oil in Jordan because they wished to keep her reserves for the future.

Local issues were also introduced: requests to improve communications, medical services or education facilities in several districts.

In his reply to the deputies, PM Tāhūni promised to continue work on development and the improvement of the social services. (Difa, April 24; Falastin, April 25)

Final Approval. The Senate unanimously approved the budget on April 30, and on May 1 the budget was published as a royal decree which also dissolved the current sessions of both houses. (Jihad, May 1, 2)

THE KING AND THE PEOPLE THE ROYAL MARRIAGE

(May)

[In 1961, as in previous years, King Hussein made many public appearances all over Jordan in order to gain public support. He devoted special attention to Army camps, refugee centres, Bedouin encampments and towns of the Eastern bank. At the same time, representatives of the public were invited to the palace and expressed their support for the King and his policy. During May the King's visits and invitations were more intensive, a fact which was attributed by some observers to the need for gaining public support in connection with his marriage.

The King gave a series of speeches under the title "Let Us Build This Country And Serve This Nation," in which he emphasized the need for uniting forces for the development and progress of Jordan, and stressed his personal devotion to this task.]

The King's Engagement. On May 1 the royal court announced the engagement of King Hussein to Muna al-Hussein, formerly Miss Antoinette (Toni) Arvil Gardiner, daughter of Colonel W.P. Gardiner, an advisory expert in the Jordanian Royal Engineering Force (Jordanian newspapers, May 2). [The King first married in 1955. His first wife was Dinah Abd al-Hamid, a descendant of the Hashimite family living in Egypt by whom he had a daughter—Princess Aiyah. The marriage ended in divorce in 1957.]

The same evening the King spoke over the radio on the anniversary of his inauguration (May 2, 1953). After recounting the struggle and achievements of his nine years as King, his devotion to the country and the improved relations with Iraq and with President Abdel Nasser, he mentioned his engagement. He spoke of his "loneliness and isolation" and said: "Many times have I craved for sympathy and love, for the thrill and comfort of family life... Time has brought into my path a small ordinary family and a friendship has developed between it and me. Although this family are strangers, they are bound by love to this country... It is God's will that I shall have found in this family's daughter the girl of my dreams..." The King said that his fiancée shared his love for the people of Jordan and inspired him to more of it. "She is a faithful Muslim though not an Arab [Miss Gardiner converted to Islam a month before] and I do not believe that anyone is better than anyone else in life except on the basis of piety." The King added: "When God wills it our wedding will take place without fanfare." He concluded by saying "I know the extent of happiness that will prevail upon you as you see me build myself a peaceful happy family and I know it is your right to see me derive from this peace and happiness the strength to continue in my responsibilities..." (R. Amman, May 1 [3]; Jihad, Falastin, May 2; a description of the King's courtship and proposal may be found in his autobiography: Unearly Lies: the Head, Heinemann, London, 1962, pp 220 ff.)

In a press conference, Miss Muna disclosed that she had embraced the faith of Islam a month previously, having studied under Shaykh Muhammad Amin ash-Shanqiti, the Minister of Education, and that she had been learning Arabic for two months. She added that she had many plans for the progress and development of the Jordanian people and would cooperate with the King in order to improve the social conditions of the population, especially the refugees. (Di'a, May 3)

Festivities in Jordan. [The heavily censored] Jordanian newspapers warmly welcomed the royal engagement. There were reports of public celebrations and enthusiasm: Firework displays were organized, military bands played in the streets and people danced to them. When the King and his fiancée drove through the city, their car was mobbed by delighted onlookers—according to both Jordanian papers and Western correspondents. Parties and celebrations took place in the towns of both banks. Congratulatory messages were received from many Jordanian ministers, religious scholars and other notables. (Di'a, May 3; Falastin, May 3, 4; Daily Herald; Glasgow Herald; Daily Express, May 3)

Adverse Reactions; Weakening of King's Position Seen. Both Arab and Western observers reported strong opposition to Hussein's marriage to an English girl on the part of his family, the government and his closest associates. Queen-Mother Zayn, Sharif Násir, the King's brothers, Premier Talhúni, Wasfi at-Tal, one of the King's closest advisers, and others. (Nahar, Beirut, May 7; Hawadith, Beirut, May 5, 12; Sunday Times, May 28)

The Chief of Staff, Hábis al-Majálí, and senior army officers were said to back the King (Nahar, May 9). A later report said the army had been "deeply disturbed" and Majálí at the head of a group of officers had tried to convince Hussein to change his mind. Sharif Násir, the Commander of the Royal Guard, however, had convinced his officers of the futility of opposition and the officers corps then pledged support for the King. (Daily Telegraph, May 26)

Regarding the Bedouin tribes there were also conflicting reports. The majority of the Shaykhs were said to have opposed the marriage (Hawadith, May 5, 12). A Western observer however found that the Bedouin had "loudly approved" the step of their "leader who so long put the demands of State before his personal happiness." (Sunday Telegraph, May 7)

The national feeling in Jordan had been deeply affected by the King's marriage to an "imperialist foreigner," according to British sources, and the opposition was particularly strong amongst the refugees and Eastern Bank population. The attempt to "slur over Miss Gardiner's British origin by describing her as a Muslim" was reportedly regarded as particularly futile and clumsy. The only Jordanians feeling happiness, it was said, were the opposition who wanted to destroy the Jordanian monarchy. The marriage was described as "at best politically unwise and at worst downright disastrous." The general view among British observers was that the King had placed himself in a dangerously weakened position, by giving the UAR and the Communists a perfect weapon against himself and the west. The Observer summed up: "The ghost of Glubb will be made to walk again the battlements of the citadel at Amman" (Daily Express, May 2, 8; Observer, May 7; Daily Telegraph, May 26; Scotsman, May 24; Sunday Times, May 28)

Hussein Attacks His Critics. At a press conference, King Hussein said that his marriage was a private matter, having no connection with Jordan's relations with her sister Arab countries. "I expected that some people would exploit my engagement," he added, "and pretend to be anxious about the fate of Hussein and the Hashimites... But I know that the majority of the people are well-mannered and would realize that I have chosen the course of honesty and truth. My country and I have enemies in this world, I expected them to say that the golden opportunity has now arisen to give Hussein a death-blow." In conclusion, the King said: "My final advice to those who hypocritically profess pity and render advice is to return to their senses." (Jer. Times, May 13; Mid. Mir., May 13)

King's Campaign for Public Support. [During May, efforts made by the King and the government to gain public support, were considered by observers a preliminary to the announcement of the marriage.]

On May 10 Jordan made public an exchange of letters between the King and President Abdel Nasser in which the latter accepted the suggestion of the King for a meeting between them. (For details see p 142 b)

On May 7, in celebration of the royal engagement, an amnesty was announced for prisoners sentenced for non-political crimes between Jan 1960 and May 2, 1962. (Jihad, May 8)

On May 13 the release of 24 political prisoners was announced: six ex-officers of the armed forces, convicted at different times for plotting against the state, and 18 Communists serving jail terms ranging from three to fifteen years. Among those freed were Brigadier Adib al-Qasim who was sentenced to death on Oct 17, 1959, and Lieutenant-Col. Qasim Nasir (whose citizen's rights were restored in June). (See MER 1960, p 328; Jihad, May 14, June 22.) On May 22 another 25 military detainees were released from jail. (Falastin, May 23)

Twelve people from Nablus who had been banished were allowed to return to their home town (Jihad, May 31). Further releases from enforced exile were announced in June. (Manar, June 14; Jihad, June 28)

The Royal Wedding. The wedding of King Hussein and Muna al-Hussein took place on May 25, the country's independence day, at Zahrán palace, in the presence of the Crown Prince, the Prime Minister, the bride's father and a number of Jordanian notables.

After the ceremony, the King received the congratulations of ministers and other visitors at his palace. It was announced that he had received a large number of presents, including presents from President Kennedy, Queen Elizabeth, the Shah of Iran, General Chiang Kai-shek. Congratulatory messages were received from President Shehab, of Lebanon, SG Hassanah of the Arab League, President Gursel of Turkey, King Paul of Greece, President Tito of Yugoslavia, Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia, General Najib ar-Rubayi, the President of the Iraqi State Council, and others. The King officially announced that his wife would have no title, decoration, or official position; he added that she shared his own indifference to positions and titles and the superficial passing show of life (R. Amman, May 28, 31; Jihad, Difa, May 25, 26; Mid. Mir., May 27). The fact that Muna al-Hussein was not proclaimed Queen was attributed by a Lebanese source to the influence of the Queen Mother. (Hawadith, June 2)

The King said that he would spend his honeymoon in Jordan, in order to be able to continue supervising the country's affairs for the coming elections. (Jihad, May 29)

Hussein: Suffering From Fatigue. In Dec King Hussein went to London for a private visit which, it was announced, would include a medical checkup. The King was accompanied by Sharif Hussein Ibn Nasir and his personal physician.

Crown Prince Muhammad was appointed deputy monarch (Jihad; Falastin, Dec 18). The King met with PM Macmillan, and lunched with Queen Elizabeth at Buckingham Palace. (See also below: The UK.)

At a press conference in London the King said: "The years of struggle have left some scars on me. The doctors have found me suffering from strain and fatigue and ordered three days a week off work... I am not allowed to do any acrobatics either." The King said that "things are going well in Jordan at the moment but in the Arab world anything can happen at any time." (Jihad, Dec 20)

CABINET RESHUFFLE

(June)

On June 28 PM Bahjat al-Talhuni submitted the resignation of his government, which was accepted by the King. No official reason was given. The cabinet had been formed on Aug 29, 1960, the day of the assassination of PM Hazza' al-Majali. The King asked Talhuni to form a new cabinet at once and on the same day it was named by royal decree.

Four members of the outgoing government were not included in the new one. They were Musa Nasir (Foreign Affairs), Falah al-Madid-hah (Interior), Muhammad Amin ash-Shanqiti (Education) and Muhammad Ali al-Jabari (Justice). (The last three were known as "ultra-conservatives".)

Talhuni himself became Foreign Minister as well as PM. There were four newcomers: Hasan al-Katib (Interior and Justice), Abd al-Majid Murtada (Communication), Jalil Harb (Economy) and Bashir as-Sabbagh (Social Affairs). (Jihad, June 29; see also table of government)

Sulayman an-Nabulsi Released from House Arrest. On Aug 13 the former Premier Sulayman an-Nabulsi was released from house arrest "according to the wish of King Hussein" (Jihad, Aug 14). Nabulsi visited the King and thanked him for his release. (R. Amman, Aug 15 [17])

Sulayman an-Nabulsi, leader of Jordan's National Socialist Party, had been placed under house arrest in April 1957. He had become PM in Oct 1956 (and conducted a pro-Egyptian policy) but was dismissed by the King on April 10 when he insisted on establishing diplomatic relations with Russia and Communist China. Five days later the King announced that an attempt to stage a [pro-Egyptian] military coup had failed. Nabulsi was reported to be under arrest then but was made PM in the government formed the next day. He was again arrested on April 25, 1957. (Mid. Mir., Aug 19)

ELECTIONS TO CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES

For background, see MER 1960, pp 223-4

Elections Announced. A royal decree of Aug 27 ordered elections for the Chamber of Deputies, and accordingly the Cabinet appointed Oct 19 as election day (R. Amman, Aug 27 [29]). [This was to be the sixth Chamber; the fifth was elected in 1955 for four years but its term was extended for one year following the assassination of PM Majali.]

An electoral law had already been promulgated on June 11, 1960, and administrative preparations for elections had also been made during the summer of 1960. The electoral law increased the number of deputies from 50 to 60, 30 from each Bank: 48 Muslims, 10 Christians as well as 2 Circassians or Chechens in Amman district. Christian deputies were to be elected in the following districts: Amman, Jerusalem, Bethlehem—2 each; Salt, Irbid, Karak, Ramallah—1 each; the Bedouin would be represented by 3 deputies, 1 each for the northern, southern and central regions. (MER 1960, p 324; Difa, Aug 28; Falastin, Aug 29)

Resignation of Ministers, Officials. Following the appointment of election day the resignations were announced of Ya'qub Mu'mar, Minister of Public Works, Wasfi Mirza, Minister of Defence, and high-ranking officials in accordance with a provision in the electoral law requiring the resignation of ministers or high officials who put up their candidacy in the elections within ten days of the announcement of the elections. (Manar, Aug 28; Difa, Sept 4; Falastin, Aug 30)

Two Thirds of Candidates Elected Unopposed. The nomination of candidates took place from Sept 24-29. It now became clear that two thirds of the candidates were unopposed. Seats would be contested only in Hebron, Bethlehem and Ramallah in the West Bank, and Tafilah and Irbid in the East Bank. In Salt only the seat of the Christian community was contested. (Jihad, Sept 25, Oct 6; Falastin, Sept 29)

The election campaign was very quiet and the elections took place without disturbances (Falastin, Oct 20). This was attributed to the fact that no political parties were contesting the seats (as parties had been dissolved in 1957) (Times, Oct 21), to the recent Syrian secession from the UAR and to the desire to maintain stability. (Jer. Times, Oct 19)

The majority of the deputies elected were reported to be of the right wing and supporting cooperation with Iraq and Syria; 23 of them were members of the previous parliament. (Jer. Post; Jihad; Times, Oct 21)

"Rigged Elections." [The fact that two thirds of the deputies were elected unopposed was criticized not only by the regime's foes (e.g. the pro-UAR Lebanese paper Hasadith Oct 21; V of A, Oct 20 [23] but also by neutral and friendly observers.) The Beirut Al-Jaridah remarked (Oct 21) that this was certainly not democratic procedure. The Scotman said that the government had "rigged the election, even by Middle-East standards," by refusing to give the unfavoured candidates the necessary certificates showing that they had not been convicted of any criminal offence. As a result there was no need for bribery at the polls, or to falsify the results. (Scotman, Dec 26)

Appointments to Senate. On Oct 22 five new members were appointed to the Senate by royal decree: Ya'qub Mu'mar [Christian, formerly member of Nâbulusi's National Socialist Party, now Minister of Public Works; Fu'ad abd al-Hâdi; Sâlih ad-Din Tuqân (formerly member of the National Socialist Party and member of Nâbulusi's cabinet in 1957); Mahmûd ad-Dajânî; Mahmûd Kurayshân [of Ma'an] (Difa; Jihad, Oct 23). A sixth member, Ahmad ad-Tarâwnah, was appointed on Nov 5. (Jihad, Nov 6)

On Oct 28 Samir ar-Rifâ'i, President of the Senate, submitted his resignation from the Senate. On the same day Sa'id al-Mufti was appointed by royal decree President of the Senate as of Nov 1. (Jihad, Oct 30; R. Amman, Oct 28 [31])

Speech from the Throne. On Nov 1, at the opening of the sixth session of Parliament, King Hussein delivered the speech from the throne. He stressed that despite international and regional crises the country enjoyed political and economic stability to which the release of [political] prisoners had contributed. Of the armed forces, the King said that they were "the hope for the restoration of the usurped homeland" and contributed to the security of all Arab countries, he mentioned in this respect the Jordanian contingent in Kuwait. He advocated "comprehensive Arab unity based on equality and sincerity" and not on "domination, ambitions and egotism." He expressed support for the Syrian revolution, the "Palestine cause" and the Algerian insurgents. The King reviewed the achievements of the government in economics, communications, health, education, public works and social affairs, with emphasis on development projects. (R. Amman, Nov 1 [4]; Falastin, Nov 2)

CHANGES IN THE GOVERNMENT

(October-November)

New Appointments. Following the elections, on Oct 31 Wasfi Mirza was appointed Minister of Public Works; Ya'qub Mu'mar, Minister of Justice and of Premier's Office Affairs, and Hasan al-Kâtib, Minister of Interior and Defence. (Wasfi Mirza had resigned before the elections.) (R. Amman, Oct 31 [Nov 2]; Jihad, Nov 1)

Cabinet Reshuffle. On Nov 5 the Cabinet was reshuffled as follows: Ahmad ad-Tarâwnah, formerly Chief of the Royal Court, was appointed Minister of Justice and Defence; Ya'qub Mu'mar, formerly Minister of Justice and Premier's Office Affairs, retained the second portfolio only; Rafiq al-Husseini, formerly Minister of Education and Culture, became Minister of State for Foreign Affairs; Hasan al-Katib, Minister of Interior and Defence, was relieved of the Defence portfolio but made acting Religious Chief Justice; Bashir as-Sabbagh, Minister of Social Affairs, received the portfolio of Culture and Education in addition. (ANA, Nov 5 [7]; Jihad, Nov 6)

Chief of Royal Court. Sharif Hussein Ibn Nasir, Ambassador of Jordan to Spain, was appointed Chief of the Royal Court. (Difa; Jihad, Nov 6)

Government Wins Vote of Confidence; Topics in General Debate. On Nov 21 the government won the confidence of the House by a majority of 49 to 2 (Dayfallah al-Hamud and Idris at-Tal (Irbid)) with two abstentions (Riyad al-Muflih (Salt) and Dr Qasim ar-Rimawi (Ramallah)) and seven absent.

In the course of the debate many internal and external questions were raised by the deputies. Some spoke about the religious situation in the country and asked for care for the old, care of the holy places and tombs, the sending of missions for study at Al-Azhar in order to improve Islamic learning and administration in the country, and the banning of immoral films. Foreign affairs were discussed especially in connection with inter-Arab relations and Palestine. Kamil Urayqat (Jerusalem) requested the government to work for the establishment of a united Arab front at the UN during the discussions of the Palestine problem and to give practical effect to the proclamation of Jerusalem (the Old City) as the country's second capital. (See MER 1960, p 322.) Ahmad al-Lawzi (Amman) praised the government's attitude towards the Palestine issue and the Syrian revolt. Dr Qasim ar-Rimawi (Ramallah) advocated the establishment of an Arab economic union and an Arab common market. Regarding interior issues, some deputies complained of corruption and inefficiency in the administration. Nicola Qattan (Bethlehem) stressed that employment in the government offices must be based on qualifications, not favouritism, and demanded the reorganization of the government machinery. Shakhir az-Zahir and Abdallah Jawdah complained of the high cost of living and the low incomes, and stressed the economic importance of the potash plant. Some deputies complained of unwarranted arrests and asked for the elimination of obstacles encountered by the citizens at the passport and security departments. Deputies from the north of the East Bank complained of the poor economic and social conditions in their districts. In his reply PM Talhuni assured the House that his government would take into consideration the suggestions for the development of the country and the reorganization of the government machinery. Referring to foreign policy, he said that Jordan's policy was founded on a national basis. (Jihad; Difa, Nov 22)

PARTIES, THE BEDOUIN, STATE AND ISLAM

THE COMMUNIST PARTY

Arrests and Trials. On Feb 16 a fugitive Communist was arrested in Nablus. (Falastin; Manar, Feb 17)

On March 13 the State Security Court sentenced two persons from Salfit and one from Beit Furik to 15 years' imprisonment for membership in the CP. (Falastin, March 14)

On March 28 it was reported that a military court in Lebanon had sentenced to imprisonment three Jordanians accused of espionage for the Jordanian CP and conspiracy against the regime in Jordan. (Hayat, March 28; Falastin, March 29)

On Oct 18 the State Security Court sentenced a person from Taiyiba (near Ramallah) to 15 years' imprisonment with hard labour for membership in the CP. The defendant refused to denounce Communism and announced that he would not leave the party. (Falastin, Oct 19)

Party Protest Against Persecution. In March the Lebanon [Communist] newspaper Al-Akhbar published a statement by the Jordan CP condemning the Jordanian authorities for "persecuting patriots." It called on the Jordanian people to fight for the release of political prisoners and for the realization of democracy and freedom. The statement said that the "black Jordanian clique" was continuing its "barbarous terrorism" against the people, with the help of specialists from the US, Britain and West Germany who controlled Jordan's army and police. They had been greatly shocked, however, by the fact that hundreds of patriots, Communists and democrats, did not submit. (Akhhbar, March 5; NCNA, March 19 [FE 22])

Khrushchov Letter to Jordanian CP Secretary. In Aug

Moscow Radio reported that the Soviet PM had sent a letter to Fu'ad Nasir, Secretary-General of the Central Committee of the Jordanian CP, in which he thanked the latter for his congratulations on Titov's successful flight in space. [Nasir's address was not mentioned.] (R. Moscow, Aug 30-IMB, Aug 31)

Fu'ad Nasir participated in the 22nd Congress of the CPSU in Moscow in Oct. In his speech at the Congress he said: "For many years now, the Jordanian nation has lived under a regime of stark terrorism, which has sold the national interest and sovereignty to American, English and West German imperialists. The living standard of the people is very low [and] the economy is in decline. The land is ruled by oppression and terror directed against all our people and especially against the CP..." (Pravda, Oct 28)

Soviet Claims: Party Continues Struggle Despite Terror and Torture. An article in a Soviet journal in Nov said the Jordanian CP was continuing its struggle in spite of rampant "police terror" and the fact that "hundreds of Communists and patriots have been thrown into prison where they are being tortured." The party continued as before to urge the masses "to struggle against reaction and unmask the aggressive plans of US imperialists and their internal agents..." The call of the CP for "national unity against the forces of reaction and obscurantism" finds ever wider support among the broad layers of the workers and the national bourgeoisie who are dissatisfied with the pro-American policy of King Hussein. (Narodny Azii i Afriki, Nov)

Protests by organizations of Jordanian students in Communist countries, charging the Jordanian authorities with "brutal torture" of political detainees, were reported in Nov from the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia and Communist China. (R. Moscow, Nov 14 [SU 16]; NCNA, Nov 14 [FE 18]; R. Prague, Nov 26 [FE 29])

THE ISLAMIC LIBERATION PARTY

(hizb at-tahrir al-islami)

In March five persons were found guilty by the State Security Court in Amman of being members of the party. Two of them, originating from Ein Karin [Israel] were sentenced to one year's imprisonment; the other three—inhabitants of Qalqilya, Nablus and Hebron respectively—were sentenced to two years' imprisonment. (Jihad, March 7)

In Aug Ahmad ad-Da'ir, the leading personality of the party in Jordan, was released from house arrest imposed in 1959 (Falastin, Aug 17). Two other party members, Harith Kaitab and Salih Abd as-Salam al-Mubtasib were released from detention. (Manar, Aug 18)

THE MUSLIM BRETHERN

[The King and the Muslim Brethren continued to support each other.]

Participation in Islamic Congress. Abd ar-Rahman Khalifah, the Controller General (al-murāqib al-amm) of the Muslim Brethren in Jordan, participated in the Conference of the Islamic Congress in [the Old City of] Jerusalem in Jan. In his speech he said that as "Assistant President of the Executive Secretariat of the Muslim Brethren in the Arab Countries" he represented the Muslim Brethren not only in Jordan but in all the Arab countries. Khalifah denounced those Muslims who went on the "evil path" by following the western capitalist bloc or the eastern Communist bloc, and urged the creation of an Islamic bloc. He called on the Congress to assist the Muslims in "Palestine," Algeria, Mauritania, Southern Arabia, Kashmir and in Africa. (Manar, Jan 16)

Khalifah was later received by the King. (R. Amman, Jan 22-IMB, Jan 24)

Various Activities. The movement held a number of religious gatherings and ceremonies on the occasion of Islamic religious and historical events, especially in Nablus and Hebron. Political issues like the Arab-Israeli conflict, the Algerian question and the boycott of French goods were also raised in speeches at these gatherings. (Manar, March 8, Aug 5; Falastin, June 22)

In an assembly of merchants at Zarqa organized by the Muslim Brethren's local branch on July 28, the public was requested to boycott French-made goods as a mark of solidarity with the cause of the Algerian insurgents. (Falastin, July 29)

In Dec it was reported that the movement in Jordan had sent PM Dawālibi of Syria a message of congratulation on his formation of a government. (Falastin, Manar, Dec 27)

THE BEDOUIN

[The Bedouin of Jordan, some 150 thousand strong and politically the most loyal to the King, were suffering from the third consecutive year of drought. Especially hard-hit was the Ma'an district in the South of the East Bank. The government had dealt with this matter the previous year, but during 1961 the Bedouin plight grew even worse.]

Starvation. A parliamentary delegation which had visited the district at the beginning of Jan, reported to parliament on poverty, disease and starvation. (Jihad, Jan 18)

A Lebanese correspondent who visited the district wrote of thousands of starving and tubercular children. (Hayat, Feb 15)

Government Aid. The King visited the district in person and on his return discussed with the government immediate relief measures. The government immediately granted 10,000 dinars and the Army 5,000 dinars for first aid and set up a committee which included the Chief of the Royal Cabinet, several ministers and high army officers to collect donations. The King ordered the collection of 17,000 dinars for immediate relief. Later, the government set up another committee under the supervision of the Chief of Staff, Habis al-Majali, to supervise the distribution of relief. (Manar, Jan 10, 15; Difa, Jan 11)

The issue was raised several times in Parliament, where PM Talhuni announced the following decisions taken by the government: (1) The establishment of a special committee to collect donations and contributions and to supervise the relief programme; (2) to put aside JD 100,000 for loans and rehabilitation projects; (3) to construct a highway between Wadi Musa and Petra in order to provide work for the unemployed; (4) to ask the US for immediate help; (5) to allot 5% of a monthly salary (Feb) of all military and security personnel, and government employees as contributions for relief; (6) to draft plans for cultivation projects; (7) to provide the affected with a permanent water supply; (8) to establish mobile clinics in key villages and to build hospitals; (9) to request charitable societies to participate in the relief measures; (10) to distribute clothing to the needy.

Talhuni concluded that most of these decisions had already been implemented. (Jer. Times; Jihad, Jan 25)

Amman Radio announced on March 31 that so far 42,000 needy persons in the afflicted area had received food, clothing and money. Donations totalling over JD100,000 were to be invested to aid the destitute. (R. Amman, March 31, [W April 6])

Private companies, businessmen and organizations also made contributions which by the end of April had exceeded JD120,000. [During the first quarter of the year, the newspapers published the names of hundreds of such donors.] (Difa, April 30)

Settlement Projects. During the year the Minister of Agriculture several times announced details of a programme for settlement of nomads. In certain locations in the south wells would be dug and villages built which the government would provide with public services, clinics, schools and mosques. The government would give the Bedouin land, and loans for its cultivation. The programme was to be first implemented in the Hasah region. (Manar, March 15; Hayat, May 15; Falastin, Sept 13, 17; Jihad, Oct 30)

A model tribal village was also to be built in the Hebron district for the Ramadan tribe who requested help for this purpose. (Jihad, Feb 6; Falastin, May 4; Difa, May 18)

In May the American benevolent society Kerr announced its intention to build a model tribal village for the southern Bedouin at Hasah (Jihad, May 9). Later, the society said that work on the village near Jerbah, 300 km south of Amman, would start at the beginning of 1962 in cooperation with the public works office. Work would progress in three stages over three years, at the end of which the village economy would be based on agriculture and village crafts (Falastin, Nov 8). The Minister of Health said that a clinic, school and a mosque would be built in this village. The pupils of Amman secondary schools would take part in the work. (Jihad, Dec 19; Falastin, Dec 29)

The Bedouin and the King. In Jan a letter from the Shaykhs of the Karak district tribes to the King was published, in which the Shaykhs thanked the King for his economic aid and expressed their loyalty to the King and his family. (Jihad, Jan 23)

In the course of his journeys round the country, the King devoted special attention to the Bedouin tribes. In the course of a week in May, the King welcomed to his palace the leaders of the Banu Khālid, Ghazāwiyah and Azāmah tribes, visited the Huwaytāt tribe in Rashadiyah district who demonstrated their loyalty to the King and his family, and invited to his palace the Shaykhs of Tarāwnah, Hasawnah, An-Nasr, Banu Hasan, Banu Hamidah and other tribes. (Falastin, Difa', May 9; Jihad, May 15, 16)

On June 1, it was announced that the King had given money gifts to hundreds of needy Bedouin families on the occasion of his marriage. (Manar, June 1)

The qabilah comprised the tribes of Irah, Yaraqah, Jabrah, Zuyūh, Shuraydah, Ghanānim, Ziyadāt and others. (Jihad, Feb 4, 8; Falastin, Feb 13)

Hussein's speech from the throne, Nov 1: "Our Armed Forces as well as our Jordanian Community keep in heart and spirit the Holy Places in our country as an eternal sign of the faith in God and a lively symbol of the fraternity between believers in the mission of Heaven and a shining picture depicting the firm stand of the religious idealism in the face of misgivings, materialism and immorality as well as the victory of sincere beliefs in God over the power of atheism." (Jer. Times, Nov 2)

PM Talhūni, in a statement to a correspondent on Jordan's foreign relations, said: "Jordan defends its idealism and traditions against atheism and is anxious to preserve its heavenly teachings against materialism." (Jihad, July 27)

The Islamic Educational Council (al-hay'ah al-islamiyah al-isalmiyah). (The council was not a governmental institution but its members were appointed by royal decree from among eminent religious scholars in the country. The council, which held regular sessions, supervised worship and religious education, and in this capacity also advised the public on secular affairs in accordance with official policy. The council's president was Shaykh Abdallah Ghoshah).

In Jan the council issued a statement to the religious functionaries saying that the Muslims had deviated from the true path, had fallen under foreign influences and had become materialists; some had even conspired against the nation and the state, and had planned assassinations and terror. The council called on all preachers in the mosques, and other religious functionaries, to decry these foreign influences. (Manar, Jan 8)

In June the council decided to thank the Jordanian government for its "wise decision" banning alcoholic drinks at official parties. (Difa'; Manar, June 4)

In Aug the council resolved to call on the preachers in the mosques to invite all Muslims to cooperate fully in the general census (conducted in Oct-Nov); and to request them to give truthful declarations. The census was described by the council as most beneficial for the people. (Jihad, Aug 6)

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

NATO AND WESTERN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

THE UNITED STATES

US Policy; Financial Aid; Trade. In a statement to the US Senate Committee on Appropriations, on Aug 5, a representative of the Administration said: "The location of Jordan in the centre of the ME makes its continued political and economic stability of key importance. If Jordan were unable to maintain its independence, conflict among its neighbours over its absorption or partition would be a serious threat to peace and stability in the area. However, Jordan has never had a viable economy and has very few prospects of eventual self-sufficiency..." Therefore Jordan would continue to require "large-scale supporting assistance" "for the foreseeable future or until an overall political settlement within the area permits its association with some larger economic entity."

[US aid amounted to over 50% of the total Jordanian budget.] According to US official figures US aid appropriations for Jordan were as follows: (in $000's)

Military Aid	5,066	3,753
Economic Aid	47,718	47,401
Total Military Security Appropriations	52,784	51,154

AFRICAN COUNTRIES

AFRICA IN GENERAL

The Islamic Congress in [the Old City of] Jerusalem. [On the Congress see also p 114. The permanent office of the Congress in the Old City of Jerusalem was perhaps the most active Jordanian agency in African affairs, in keeping with the official emphasis on the Islamic aspect of Jordan's relations with Africa. See also below, under individual African countries.]

In the resolutions published at the end of the Conference of the Islamic Congress (Old City of Jerusalem, Jan 15-17) a special chapter dealt with Africa. The Conference called for an Arab-Islamic plan for the strengthening of relations with African nations; it called on Arab and Muslim banks and firms to open branches in Africa; and requested the Congress secretariat to invite African Muslim organizations to future meetings of the Congress. A separate resolution called for self-determination for the inhabitants of Eritrea. The Congress received messages from the President of the Somali Republic, from the PM of Nigeria and from Guinea. (Difa', Hayat, Jan 19)

The consultative committee of the Congress prepared a plan for action in Africa to be forwarded to the Arab and Islamic states, based upon the information brought by the royal Jordanian delegation which had returned from Africa. (See below.) (Manar, Aug 2)

Royal Court, Muhammad Ali al-Jabari, Minister of Justice, Deputy Tharwat al-Tahuni, Deputy Isma'il Hijazi, Kamil ash-Sharif, Deputy Secretary-General of the World Islamic Congress and Ibrahim Uthman, Commander of the Jordanian Air Force. (Jer. Times, Feb 20; Difa, March 15; ANA, March 19 [21]; R. Amman, April 11-12MB, April 12)

Preliminary reports said the delegation would carry personal messages, including an invitation to visit Jordan, from King Hussein to African Muslim heads of state (Jihad, Feb 23). It was to distribute 300 volumes of the Qur'an to counteract the dissemination in Africa of a "forged Israeli Qur'an" (Difa, March 7) and to offer scholarships to African students for military and other training. The office of the Islamic Congress asked Islamic institutions in Africa to contact the delegation for the purpose of strengthening Arab-African relations and repulsing "Zionist penetration." (Hayat, March 22)

The delegation visited Ghana, Nigeria, Sierra-Leone, Cameroun, Guinea, Mali, Senegal, Liberia, Chad, Ethiopia, Sudan and Somalia. (For details see below, under individual countries.) On its return, its leader declared that Jordan would probably be called upon to send teachers of Arabic and Islamic culture to Africa and especially to Nigeria, Chad and Somalia. The delegation had discussed the enrolment of African students at the Jordanian military academy and other institutions. Several heads of African states would visit Jordan in response to King Hussein's invitation (R. Amman, April 12-13MB, April 13; Falastin, April 13). In its report to the cabinet, the delegation recommended setting up two new embassies in Africa and strengthening the embassy in Khartoum, so that it could serve also Somalia, Ethiopia, and Chad. (ANA, April 13 [15])

In Nov King Hussein awarded 20 scholarships to East African students. A committee was set up in Nairobi to select the students. Ten scholarships were to go to Kenya, 5 to Tanganyika, 3 to Uganda and 2 to Zanzibar. (Difa, Nov 13; Manar, Nov 19)

Attacks on USSR Policy in Africa. In Feb an Amman Radio commentator charged that the visit of the President of the Supreme Soviet to some African countries was designed to further the USSR's "expansionist aims in Africa." He also charged that the Soviet Union's policy in the Congo had contributed to creating the disturbances there. (R. Amman, Feb 12-13MB, Feb 13)

AFRICAN COUNTRIES

Chad. The Jordanian royal mission, touring African countries (see above: Africa in General) visited Chad from March 25-27. (Manar, April 4)

In March Musa Nasser, the Jordanian FM, received Joseph Amo Asmah, a senior Ghanaian Foreign Ministry official who was touring the Arab countries. Asmah was reported to have said that in all problems Ghana adhered to the policy of the Afro-Asian bloc "even if this displeases Israel." A main plank in Ghana's policy was support for all African states in their struggle for freedom; consequently she had strong ties at least with the Arab states located in Africa, and there could be no good relations with countries which opposed this policy. (Manar, March 31; ANA, March 30 [April 5])

Guinea. Sharif Yusuf Nabhani, head of the Guinean Union of Islamic Culture and member of the political bureau of President Sekou Touré, visited Jordan in Jan upon the invitation of the Islamic Congress in Jerusalem (*R. He added that the Africans were aware of "the Israeli policy of infiltration in Africa." He called for an end to divisions among the Arab states and requested their help in the dissemination of Islamic culture in Africa (Falastin, Jan 26). Nabhani was received by the King. Later he said the King had ordered the despatch of 2,000 copies of the Qur'an to the Islamic association in Guinea and Mali, as well as the recording of Qur'an verses and religious talks to be broadcast by Conakry Radio during Ramadan. The King had told him that Jordan wished to help African countries and establish friendly relations with them without any political motive and without intervention in their political affairs. (R. Amman, Jan 28-12MB, Jan 29; Manar, Feb 6)

The Jordanian royal mission touring African countries (see above: Africa in General) visited Guinea at the beginning of April. A member of the delegation, the Minister of Justice, stated on his return that he had explained the Palestine question to his Guinean counterpart who had been so much impressed by the tragedy that he had afterwards requested the holding of a cabinet meeting which immediately passed a resolution on the termination of the contracts of the Israeli experts who were immediately expelled from the country (Manar, April 13). [This statement received no support from any other source.]

Bello was visited by King Hussein; he returned this visit and was also the King's guest at a banquet; the King bestowed on him a high decoration. During the receptions held in his honour, in Jerusalem, Bethlehem and Hebron, Sir Ahmadu's hosts dwelt at length on the Palestine question; he, however, omitted to mention it in his replies. Nor was any mention made of the issue in the joint communiqué by the King and the PM which was issued in Amman on July 20. The communiqué said that the two sides had reviewed their brotherly relations and it was agreed to expand their cultural cooperation. King Hussein "discovered" that Sir Ahmadu shared his opinion concerning Islamic unity and cooperation and that a meeting of heads of Islamic states would serve a good purpose. The communiqué also denounced racial discrimination. (Jihad, July 19; Falastin, July 16-20; R. Amman, July 20 [22]; Difa', July 21)

During Bello's visit and after it, there appeared a number of reports on requests and preparations for technical assistance to Nigeria, such as the despatch of teachers, agricultural experts and engineers (Falastin, July 21; R. Amman, July 23 [25]; Manar, July 24; Difa', Aug 3); and the establishment of a cigarette factory. (Falastin, Dec 4)

Haji Ibrahim Imam, described as [Northern] Nigeria's

"leader of the opposition," visited Jordan in Oct. He visited the holy places, the Israel-Jordan frontier and refugee camps. In a reception held in his honour by the office of the Islamic Congress in Jerusalem he attacked Israel and "the powers behind her." (Falastin, Oct 14; Manar, Oct 13, 16)

On Dec 22 the Federal PM of Nigeria stated in Lagos that preparations were being made to invite King Hussein to visit Nigeria. (Falastin, Dec 23)

Shaykh Ibrahim Niyase, "Shaykh al-Islam" of Senegal, visited Jordan in April on a tour of Islamic and Arab countries. He was accompanied, among others, by a representative of the UAR Foreign Ministry. He visited the holy places of Islam. On seeing the "occupied section" of Jerusalem he remarked that "it would undoubtedly revert to its rightful owners." (Falastin; Manar, April 6)

On May 30 PM Mamadou Dia of Senegal arrived in [the Old City of] Jerusalem on a one-day unofficial visit on his way home from Saudi Arabia. He visited the holy places of Islam and expressed his wish to return for an official visit to Jordan and meet King Hussein. (Manar; Falastin, May 30-31)

Sharif Makki Haydar, described as "leader of Islam (khafiat al-Islam) in Black Africa," visited Jordan in Oct as guest of the government, on a tour of Arab states. He visited the holy places of Islam and was received by King Hussein who bestowed on him a medal. The Islamic Cultural Union at Amman and the Islamic Congress in [the Old City of] Jerusalem held receptions in his honour. At the latter reception he said he had not known that the Arab-Jewish dispute was actually "a blatant act of aggression which had uprooted hundreds of thousands from their homeland" and swore he would do his best to arouse the conscience of Africa to the issue since, being Muslims, "your problem—is our problem." South Africa. In a commentary on apartheid, Ammao Radio quoting Ad-Difa' said Afro-Asian peoples "demanded the destruction" of every state based on the principles of apartheid. Israel too was such a state. (R. Amman, March 15 [17])

Upper Volta. In Feb it was reported that the office of the Islamic Congress in Jerusalem had received a letter from the Islamic Cultural Association in Upper Volta saying that it wished to establish ties with the Congress, to send a representative to voice the wishes of the local Muslims, and to open a branch of the Congress in the country. NON-ARAB ME COUNTRIES

Ethiopia—The Dayr as-Sultao Affair. [During the first half of 1961 the Jordanian government, the Ethiopian Coptic Church and the Egyptian Coptic Church were disputing the ownership of the Dayr as-Sultan monastery on the premises of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in the Old City of Jerusalem. The importance of the monastery lay in a stairway that led from it into the courtyard of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The keys to the door of the stairway had for a century been held by the Egyptian Copts, though the Ethiopians had never ceased to press their claims to them, maintaining that they had previously belonged to them. In Feb, the Jordanian government transferred the keys to the Ethiopian Church. The Coptic Church of Egypt, backed by the UAR government, exerted heavy pressure on Jordan to cancel the transfer, and the decision was reversed. Jordan's changing attitude was presumably influenced at first by the impending visit to Jordan of Ethiopia's Emperor—which eventually did not take place, and later by the improvement in UAR-Jordanian relations.]

The Coptic Patriarchate decided to cancel the pilgrimage to Jerusalem in protest over Jordan's decision to transfer the ownership of Dayr as-Sultan "which belongs to the Copts of the Southern Region of the UAR since the fourth century A.D." to the Ethiopian monks who were "staying there as guests." (Ahram, March 7)

The Holy Synod of the Coptic Church, in a meeting in Cairo on March 7, discussed the developments in Jerusalem on the basis of a message received from Basilios, Archbishop of Jerusalem. The message said that the Copts had been forcibly removed by the Jordanian authorities, and had been barred from passage through the monastery to the church. The Ethiopians who had replaced the Copts were taking down all decorations and symbols in the monastery and replacing them with their own for the forthcoming visit of the Emperor of Ethiopia, due on April 9. The UAR Ambassador to Jordan had contacted the Jordanian government regarding the affair (Ahram, March 8). The Copts, it was reported, had refused to leave the monastery, and were ultimately ejected by the police (Mid. Mir., March 23). The Synod also prepared a memorandum to be forwarded to King Hussein, which included documents said to prove the Coptic ownership of Dayr as-Sultan. (Akhbar, March 10)

The Synod thanked Abdel Nasser for his intervention on its behalf with Jordan. Kyrillos VI, the Coptic Pope, cabled the Ethiopian Emperor, asking him to bring about the return of the status quo ante at Dayr as-Sultan; he said there was no justification for the Ethiopians taking possession as long as the Coptic Pope was head of both the Ethiopian and the Egyptian churches (Ahram, March 12). The Emperor informed Kyrillos it was Ethiopia's intention to retain possession of Dayr as-Sultan. (Ahram, March 18)

On March 21 a delegation from Egypt, carrying a message from the Coptic Pope, was received by King Hussein (Falastin, March 22, 26). [Meanwhile, on March 31 a correspondence between King Hussein and President Abdel Nasser was published in Cairo, introducing a period of improved relations between the two countries.] Some days later the Jordanian Government revoked the decision of Feb regarding ownership of Dayr as-Sultan. On April 2 the Jordanian authorities handed the keys of the monastery to the Egyptian Coptic delegation (Jihad, April 4). [Like the Egyptian Copts in Feb] the Ethiopians now refused to leave the monastery, it was reported, and were forcibly ejected (Ahram, April 3, 6). A Coptic delegation was received by the Jordanian PM; they expressed the community's gratitude to King Hussein. The Coptic Church issued instructions to resume the Eastern pilgrimage and festivities which it had earlier cancelled in protest. (Falastin, April 5)

The Jordanian volte-face was thought to contribute to the improvement of relations with Cairo, though it could scarcely be well-received in Addis Ababa. Emperor Haile Selassie was believed to be taking a close personal interest in the dispute and the new development was considered likely to cause his projected visit to Jordan to be postponed indefinitely (Times, April 4). In response to an invitation by King Hussein who had visited

Ethiopia in 1960 (MER 1960, pp 336-7), the Emperor had informed him in Jan that he would shortly set the date for his visit (Manar, Jan 18). Following the new development, the Emperor discussed the affair with the Ethiopian Archbishop of Jerusalem who had been urgently called to Addis Ababa. At the same time an Ethiopian goodwill mission was preparing to go to Jordan, carrying a message from the Emperor to King Hussein (Ethiopian Herald, April 6). The delegation was received by Hussein on April 10. (Hayat, April 11)

Two weeks later the governor of Jerusalem requested the Coptic Church to furnish more proof of its ownership of Dayr as-Sultan. Demonstrations calling for Ethiopian ownership of the monastery took place in Addis Ababa, and the Ethiopian Patriarch wrote to the Coptic Pope in Egypt that the division between the two churches might deepen if the monastery were not returned to the Ethiopian Church. (Ahram, April 24)

Following his return to Jerusalem the Ethiopian Archbishop published a detailed statement supporting the Ethiopian claim for custody of the monastery. He stressed the great importance attached by the Ethiopian people and Church to the question and voiced his hope for a just decision by the Jordanian authorities. On May 9 the Coptic Church in Jerusalem published a detailed reply. (Falastin, May 9, 10)

On July 28 the Archbishop of Harar in Ethiopia arrived at Jerusalem to inquire into the state of the Ethiopian Church and the Holy Places in Jordan. (Falastin, July 29, 30)

Iran. An Iranian military delegation headed by the Iranian C-in-C of the Armed Forces arrived in Jordan on April 29, at the invitation of the Jordanian C-in-C. They met the King and others and visited the holy places of Islam, and the western frontier. (Manar, May 2; Jihad, April 29, May 3)

In Dec, a Jordanian military delegation visited Tehran at the invitation of the Iranian army to take part in the celebrations of the Iranian Army Day. (Manar, Dec 31)

Somalia. The royal Jordanian delegation touring African countries (see above: Africa in General) visited Somalia from March 21-22. At a reception the Somali Foreign Minister thanked King Hussein for his offer to aid in education and other fields. (R. Mogadishu, March 22 [24])

King Hussein sent a telegram of congratulations to President Adan Abdullah Osman of Somalia on his election as President of the Somali Republic. (Jihad, July 31)

The King made a financial donation to aid flood victims in Somalia. (Falastin, Dec 7, 24)

Turkey. On Oct 27 it was announced that King Hussein had sent a congratulatory message to General Gursel on the occasion of his election to the Presidency. (Falastin, Oct 28)

Nationalist China. In Oct Nationalist China and Jordan signed a cultural agreement in Amman providing for the encouragement of the study of each other's language; literature, science etc. (Jihad, Oct 28)

India. In Feb it was reported that the government had decided to allow the import of tea from all exporting countries provided a half share of the total was reserved for import from India. (Falastin, Feb 16)

A commercial agreement was signed in Amman between India and Jordan on April 19. Jordan would export to India potash, phosphate, bromine and olive oil and would import from India tea, jute and clinical equipment (Jihad, April 20). India's phosphate purchases in 1960 were to reach 15,000 tons, to the value of JD0.5m. (Falastin, April 21)

Pakistan. According to an agreement signed in April, Jordan would export 15% of its total phosphates to Pakistan. (Manar, April 17)

A Pakistani journalists' delegation arrived in Amman in April for a three-day visit at the invitation of the government. (Jihad, April 30)

On July 4 the Minister of Education was empowered to sign the cultural agreement with Pakistan. (Jihad, July 5)

COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

Hostile Communist Views on Jordan. [Jordan received relatively scanty attention in the press and radio of Communist bloc countries during 1961. Hostile comments continued as before, denouncing the Jordanian government for alleged subservience to imperialism, a reign of terror, and the persecution of patriots and especially Communists. (For details see: Internal Affairs, The Communist Party.)]

Hostile Jordanian Attitude. [The extreme hostility of Jordan to Communism continued as before. Jordan remained without diplomatic relations with Communist countries.]

In an address to the Islamic conference in the Old City of Jerusalem in Jan King Hussein termed international Communism one of the "two dangerous enemies" facing the Arabs, the other being world Zionism. He said "Communism had gained somebody from amongst us [meaning Abdel Nasser] and used him to divide our ranks for its own purposes..." (Manar, Jan 15)

Later, in his correspondence with Abdel Nasser, Hussein took exception to the President's statement that there were two camps competing for the domination of the world. The "Communist threat," "red imperialism," Hussein wrote, was the more dangerous, especially to the national movements. Therefore "we here make no peace with Communism... and try to differentiate between real... imperialist danger... and propaganda..." (R. Amman, May 10 [12]; Jihad, May 11)

Russian Clergy Denied Entry to Jordan. For the third successive year Jordan refused permission to Russian clergy in Israel to cross into the Old City to celebrate the Russian Orthodox Christmas. (Jer. Times, Jan 4)

Phosphate Trade With Czechoslovakia and Poland. An agreement for the sale of 80,000 tons of phosphates to Czechoslovakia during 1962 was concluded in Nov. (R. Amman, Nov 9 [W 23])

A Polish delegation was expected to arrive in Jordan in Dec for negotiations concerning purchases of phosphates for 1962. (Jihad, Dec 10)

SYNOPSIS AND ECONOMIC SURVEY

SYNOPSIS

1961 was the first full year of what might be termed Lebanese routine politics after the 1958 insurrection and the period of reconstruction under President Sbehab, which culminated in the parliamentary elections of June-July 1960 (see MER 1960, p 348 ff).

The main event took place on the last day of the year, namely the attempted coup d'etat by the Nationalist Social Party (formerly PPS) and several junior army officers. The NSP's central aim, according to the indictment, was to further the eventual establishment of a Greater Syrian or Fertile Crescent union, an aim which was anathema to both the Christian and the Muslim pan-Arab sectors of the Lebanese public. The attempt was almost unanimously condemned and at least for a short while national unity seemed to prevail. There was even talk of a new inter-communal settlement on the basis of this new-found unity. Though nothing came of this, it was thought that the reaction to the coup had demonstrated that the public, which had vivid memories of 1958, was inimical to extremism of any kind and that the regime was essentially stable. (For a fuller synopsis, see below: The Attempted NSP Coup)

The 18-man government of PM Sa'ib Slâm, established after the elections in 1960, continued in office until May 15, when Slâm resigned. Opposition moves which preceded the resignation included a charge that Slâm had exploited his official position for financial gain. Two days later Slâm formed a government of 8 ministers only. It was observed that the new cabinet was just a condensed version of its predecessor, and in particular that the two major antagonists, the Phalanges, and the Progressive Socialist Party, respectively represented by Pierre Jumayil and Kamâl Junblât, were again included.

The new cabinet remained in office for six months, and on Oct 23 Slâm resigned. The reduced size and smaller regional representation of the new cabinet weakened it in the Chamber. Opposition to the government began to crystallize in August, when in the wake of a bloody clash between the police and the Najjâdah, in Beirut, Muslim leaders there joined in opposition to Slâm and his Minister of the Interior, Mashnûq. The breakup of the UAR and other issues (on which see more below) aggravated the government's difficulties. The annual elections to the Presidency of the Chamber (October 17) provided an opportunity for the rallying of opposition groups which now commanded a majority in the Chamber. At this juncture the government was weakened from within when Junblât announced his resignation and published a long list of accusations against Slâm. Slâm made a last attempt to broaden his government but, when this failed, he resigned.

On Oct 31 a government was formed by Rashid Karâmî, the Muslim leader of Tripoli who had resigned from the premiership in May 1960 to make way for a caretaker government before the general elections. The 14-minister cabinet had a much broader basis than the outgoing one. It again included Junblât and Jumayil as well as the Constitutional Union (Taqla) but most parliamentary blocs—including the anti-Slâm Beirut front—and geographical regions were also represented this time. The government received an overwhelming vote of confidence of 63 to 18. The opposition now comprised the National Liberals and sympathizers (al-shirâr) led by ex-President Camille Sham'un and Albert Mukhaybar (the party had been in opposition since after the 1958 insurrection); the National Bloc (kutleh), led by Raymond Eddeb; the Constitutional Union (though Taqla participated in the government); the Ba'albek-Hermil-Bsherri and Akkar blocs and, last but not least, Sa'ib Slâm who endeavoured to form a new party together with Mashnûq his former Minister of Interior and other politicians—mainly Muslims—who had been left out of the government.

As usual, a great many political issues during the year stemmed from the basic division in the Lebanese political community: the Christian sector, determined to preserve an independent "Lebanese Lebanon", and the Muslim-Druze sector with pan-Arab inclinations. The majority of these issues were in some way connected with the UAR.

At the extremes of the political spectrum stood the Muslim Najjâdah and Popular Resistance groups on the one hand, and the Nationalist Social Party comprising mainly Christian (especially Greek-Orthodox) and other minorities on the other. The Najjâdah was represented in the Chamber by its leader but like the other two movements engaged mainly in agitation and politics of violence. An even more extreme Muslim fringe group was the clandestine Islamic Liberation Party which originated on the West Bank of Jordan; its extremism centred on religion and it was not pro-UAR. Another pro-UAR group was the Movement of Arab Nationalists (harakat al-qawmiyyin al-arab); its following came mainly from among the intelligentsia and students; (pro-UAR movements also appeared under this name in other Arab countries). The Communist Party, illegal in theory but tolerated in fact, continued its policy of both opposing the UAR and Lebanon's Western ties. The Ba'ath Party, a small group concentrated mostly in the Muslim North, was both pan-Arab and anti-UAR; its influence on Lebanese politics was negligible. Foreign Arabs, mainly Jordanians, Syrians and Arab refugees, constituted a not insignificant element among the extremists: they were especially prominent in the ranks of the NSP, the Islamic Liberation Party and the qawmiyyin al-arab.

Inside the Chamber and the government the extremist attitudes were represented by the Phalanges led by the Maronite Pierre Jumayil, and the Progressive Socialist Party led by the Druze Kamāl Junblāt. Some of the Christian deputies in opposition, especially Camille Shāmūn and Albert Mukhaybar, could also be classified as extremists, and so could Muslim deputies like Ma'rūf Sa'ad.

The majority of deputies, however, belonged to the centre where the Christian-Muslim-pan-Arab division was still alive but where regional, local, family and personal interests predominated. These deputies, mostly of the wealthy class, were in the main content to leave the Muslim-Christian issue alone, and pursued their interests independently or in the framework of inter-communal and mostly regional parliamentary blocs.

The balancing of the opposing forces fell on the President, the Maronite Fu'ād Shēhāb, aided by the Muslim Premiers, Sa'ib Sīlām and later Rashid Karāmi (who had been rebel leaders in 1958). Behind the President was the army. As far as published reports went, the army did not overtly intervene in politics during the year apart from a few junior officers who participated in the NSP coup with the aim, according to their indictment, of reforming the army which they claimed was permeated with favouritism. The army repeatedly restored public order when the police found itself unable to cope with outbreaks of violence. The policy adopted by both President and Premier was the safeguarding of Lebanon's independence and regime combined with a deferential attitude towards the UAR.

There were several major issues which divided Christians and Muslims-pan-Arabists during the year.

In January Jumayil and Junblāt engaged in a dispute over the issue of private versus state education. Independent Christian private institutions provided more education facilities than state schools. The Muslim sector in general was interested in the speedy development of the latter, while the Christians were concerned lest the scope of private education be limited. Junblāt made the point, among others, that national unity could only be achieved through a uniform study of history and geography while Jumayil argued that educational orientation must not be divorced from the continuing "ideological dilemma" of a Lebanese Lebanon versus an Arab Lebanon.

In February, President Abdel Nassar, in speeches made in Syria, attacked the NSP and the Phalanges as enemies of Arab nationalism and servants of Western imperialism. Disputes and violence ensued between partisans of the UAR and their opponents. Junblāt was as usual prominent among the former.

In April, the Beirut Lawyers' Union (mainly Christian) embarked on a strike in protest against the opening of a faculty of law at the new Arab University in Beirut—established in 1960 as a branch of the University of Alexandria—on the grounds that the profession was already overcrowded. The dispute, however, immediately acquired political overtones, though most of those concerned endeavoured to play them down. The Christian opposition, and initially also Jumayil, supported the union while Junblāt, Adnān al-Hakīm and other Muslim leaders opposed it. The government, while making some concessions to the lawyers, approved the establishment of the faculty, with Jumayil's consent (apparently because the closing of the faculty would have been regarded as a slap in the face of the UAR), and the strike continued until after the NSP coup in Jan 1961 when it was terminated "in order to contribute to the relaxation of tension."

At the end of May the Lebanese Communist Party announced that their Secretary General, Farajallah al-Hilu, had been murdered by the UAR authorities after having been abducted in Damascus, two years earlier. Many Christians and also some Muslim opposition leaders demonstrated their solidarity with Hili's family and argued that Lebanon's national honour and the state's duty to protect its citizens were involved. The government, however, refused to be drawn into a conflict with the UAR over the issue.

The break-up of the UAR caused pro-UAR demonstrations on a large scale, the establishment of a pro-UAR front by Kamāl Junblāt and bomb attacks on pro-UAR newspapers. The government delayed recognition of the Syrian Republic but also banned demonstrations of solidarity with any other state. The Christian opposition also supported a cautious and moderate policy. Nevertheless, this issue was thought to have contributed to the fall of the Sīlām government as both anti- and pro-UAR deputies had been dissatisfied with the government's indecisive attitude. In November, the Karāmi government recognized Syria, and this act was again followed by pro- and anti-UAR violence.

Lebanese politics continued to be accompanied by violence of which the following were major instances: in January, the confirmation of a death sentence on a Shi'ī found guilty of murder in pursuit of a blood feud led to large-scale demonstrations and rioting as well as strikes in the Muslim quarter of Beirut, and disturbances in other—mainly Shi'ī—areas. In March and again in August vehicles carrying Lebanese citizens to Damascus to express their support for the UAR were attacked in the village of Kahale; in the first incident ten people were injured. In March an attempt was discovered to assassinate PM Sīlām; a number of Muslims were found guilty of the attempt; both personal motives and the wish to foment strife between Muslims and Christians were ascribed to them. In April and again in July armed clashes occurred between the rival extremist Christian parties, the Phalanges and the NSP. In August, Najjādah members clashed with the police in Beirut and a demonstrator was killed; rioting by the Najjādah followed and the army had to intervene to restore peace. The break-up of the UAR (September 28) evoked violent outbreaks, as already described. In November and December there were additional instances of pro- and anti-UAR violence, e.g. an explosion at the house of a Cabinet Minister who had headed a friendship mission to Damascus, and an attempt to blow up the premises of a pro-UAR newspaper.

There was scant progress as regards the general national interest. Among the achievements of his government, Sīlām claimed the strengthening of internal security, public works, the fostering of education, the establishment of the Permanent National Exhibition in Tripoli, and the improvement of workers' conditions as a result of the wage law (enacted in May) and the social security bill, which however had not been introduced in the Chamber by the end of the year. In the economic sphere, Lebanon continued to enjoy prosperity thanks to a considerable capital inflow, and private industry continued to expand. There was however, little advance towards a solution of Lebanon's fundamental economic problem, namely the lack of a reasonable productive basis; the government appointed a foreign association to advise on planning and education; and the Chamber appointed a committee on development with an independent fund at its disposal. In his policy statement in November, PM Karāmi said the government would further education, making elementary education general; it would also seek, in the framework of a free economy, to foster social justice by narrowing the gaps in development and growth between the various regions and groups; planning, monetary affairs and taxation should be reorganized to this end. (See also Economic Survey, below)

Criticism of the government in the Chamber concerned such issues as the neglect of the country's backward districts, which lacked fundamental social services and public utilities; the lack of progress towards a more productive economy; poor handling of relations with state concessionaries; high prices; "anarchy" and "stagnation" in the administration; faulty execution of development projects; and the shaky internal security situation.

Labour unrest continued and there were a number of strikes. The workers however, were still too weak to press their claims effectively in regard to the government. Organized labour was still relatively small in numbers and the trade union movement suffered from internal divisions, much as the Lebanese body politic at large.

ECONOMIC SURVEY

1961 was a year of relatively slow expansion for the Lebanese economy, as compared with the quick recovery that characterized the previous two years following the crisis and stagnation of 1958. There was progress in agriculture, trade, tourism and the money market; industrial development and building slowed down somewhat.

Agriculture. Agricultural production increased considerably after the preceding three years of drought; in 1961 its value was estimated at about £1300m. (49% of the population earned their livelihood in agriculture.)

MAIN CROPS (IN THOUSAND TONS)

Wheat	65	48	58	40	68
Barley	24	18	24	11	12
Citrus	116	131	160	155	190
Potatoes	40	32	36	28	50
Apples	37	42	60	53	85
Olives	13	48	18	30	65
Sugar beet			10	14	25
Tobacco	3.0	3.0	3.0	3.5	4.0

The Ministry of Agriculture claimed that agriculture received insufficient state subsidies, in view of the drought in recent years and the lack of manpower. (80% of farmers were over 50 years old since the young men emigrated to the towns; 300,000 Syrians and Palestinians were employed in Lebanese agriculture.) The government decided in principle to buy up wheat at prices above market level because land under wheat had contracted as a result of low prices. In Aug, the Ministry of Finance allocated £110m. as credits to farmers to mitigate drought damage and in an attempt to stop the flight from the land. However, no actual payments or purchases of wheat were known to have been made by the end of the year.

Industry. Industry developed steadily, though at a somewhat slower rate than in 1960. The average size of new undertakings was smaller in 1961: £145,500 invested capital and less than 8 workers, as against £115,000 and 9 workers in 1960.

New investments amounted to £131m. in the food industry, £113m. in the chemical industry, £17.5m. in textiles, £15.2m. in wood products and £12m. in clothing and shoes. Reliable statistics on industrial production were not available. Cotton textiles continued to suffer from lack of markets, although the 15% protective tariff remained in force. (See MER 1960, p 342)

Building. Building activity decreased in relation to 1960 but remained much higher than during the preceding years: in 1961 licences were given for 665,000 sq.m. compared to 704,000 sq.m. in 1960 and 590,000 in 1959. Correspondingly there was a small decrease in real estate business, a turnover of £114.4m. in 1960 as against £112.6m. in 1961.

Finance. Expansion in the means of payment slowed down. Total means of payment reached £11,195m. in 1961, an increase of 7.1% over the previous year, as against increases of 11.8% in 1960 and over 20% in 1959. Currency in circulation continued to decrease in relation to total means of payment; from 45.9% in 1955 to 35.7% in 1960 and 33.6% in 1961; bank accounts increased correspondingly. The declining annual rate of increase acted as a brake on the inflationary tendencies of recent years. Credit conditions moved in the same direction. Thus bank credits to the government remained at the 1960 level of about £1104m. The expansion of credit to the private sector declined from 42% in 1960, to 11% in 1961; credits reached £11,108m. The flow of foreign capital into Lebanon continued, though here too the rate decreased; foreign currency accounts in Lebanese banks amounted to £1452m. in 1961, as against £1369m. in 1960 and £1165m. in 1959. This influx helped the Lebanese pound to rise from 318 to 303 piastres to the dollar during 1961. The turnover in shares and debentures on the Beirut stock exchange grew to £177m. in 1961, as against £169m. in 1960 and £139m. in 1959.

Prices. Despite the monetary expansion, the rise in the c.o.i. index ceased. According to IMF figures it remained constant at the 1960 figure of 122, (1952=100). The food price index fell 4 points, thanks to the bumper harvest, Wages. According to the Ministry of Labour, average annual wages were (excluding agricultural workers):

Budget. The fast economic growth in past years produced unbroken budgetary expansion.

The decrease in estimated total revenue by £L3.1 was due to a decline in oil royalties from £L42.5m. in 1960 to £L12.6m. in 1961, since the IPC had by then paid its arrears; otherwise estimated revenue increased by £L26.8m. over 1960, a result of general economic expansion and a more energetic collection of dues and taxes.

The increase in expenditure was comparatively small; there was a considerable increase in expenditure on wages and salaries, due to the general rise in wages (see p 406 a); the share of development expenditure fell somewhat.

Actual expenditure in 1961 was £L282.4m, as against £L227.7m in 1960; the £L31m surplus in the ordinary

In its efforts to put the country's economy on a more productive basis, the government appointed IRFED, a private French association, adviser on planning and education for three years. The Chamber of Deputies formed a "Commission des grands travaux" to initiate, coordinate and execute development projects. The commission was to have an autonomous fund at its disposal into which the budgetary development allocation would be paid. In mid-year work on the Litani project was renewed by an Italian and a Yugoslav firm under the supervision of a French firm; Lebanon also asked the World Bank for additional loans as $13m. of the original $27m. loan, received in August 1955, had been spent by the end of 1961.

Foreign Trade; Balance of Payments. (For the direction of trade see pp 82-5. In 1961 exports totalled £L159m. and imports £L954m., leaving a trade deficit of £L795m. From 1960, Lebanese trade statistics also included trade in securities and currency. The figures for 1961 show an "export" of money bills, travellers cheques, obligations and miscellaneous securities amounting to £L238.3m., and an "import" of £L107.3m.)

The export of citrus fruit, raw wool, cement and beans decreased; the export of apples, bananas and raw cotton grew.

Transit of goods rose slightly.

The tourist industry continued to expand; the number of tourists (excluding visitors from Syria) reached 296,000, compared with 233,000 in 1960. The income from tourism was estimated at £L110m., as compared with £L94m. in 1960 and 79m. in 1959.

The balance of payments continued to be favourable. There were increases in the gold and foreign currency reserves ($159.8m. as against $137.0 in 1960) and the considerable improvement in the external value of the Lebanese pound. In contrast to 1960 there was only the slightest rise in imports; the tendency towards greater trade deficits was thus halted. Revenues remained static as compared with 1960, in contrast to the large increase in services that took place between 1959 and 1960. Private donations remained at the level of former years; official donations shrank as USA aid, extended after the 1958 disturbances, was being exhausted. The current account deficit showed almost no change from 1960. The balancing item ("other") reflects in the main the favourable net capital movement to Lebanon, which expanded in comparison with 1960.

National Income. The national income in 1961 was unofficially estimated at £L1,700m. Taking the official figure of population, 2,150,326 on December 31, 1961, average income per head came to £L790. (L'Orient, April 12, 1961)

The above figures show the preponderance of unproductive branches in the economy, which constituted Lebanon's basic economic problem.

(Sources: For the 1961 figures, L'Orient, Oct 26, 1962; Le Liban en Chiffres, CDL, Beirut, Sept, 1962);

After a period of rapid expansion the Lebanese economy entered a recession in the last quarter of 1961. Symptoms of this reversal were the slow-down in building, a reduced influx of capital from abroad, shrinking credits to the private sector and an increase in bankruptcies. These developments, however, were moderated by a considerable increase in government expenditure.

COMMUNITIES AND ALIENS

INTER-COMMUNITY RELATIONS IN GENERAL

Proposal for Improving Inter-Community Relations. In Feb a number of deputies and the representatives of several communities suggested the formation of delegations representing all communities to tour the country in order to deepen intercommunal understanding and strengthen national unity. Opponents of the proposal argued that so long as the present government, divided against itself, remained in power, there was no sense in approaching the people at large (Hayat, Feb 15; Revue du Liban, Feb 18). [Apparently the subject was not raised again during the year.]

Proposal to Sign the National Charter. In March a proposal was put forward that the National Charter of 1943 should be formally signed. [This unwritten charter established the relative representation of the communities in the Chamber and key executive positions, thus in fact becoming the basic constitution of the country.] The aim was to invest the Charter with formal authority and thus put an end to recurring differences over it.

The proposal was made on March 23 by a group of deputies, headed by the Independent Bloc, at a meeting with the President. Raymond Eddé, leader of the National Bloc, expressed his support and so, reportedly, did a "considerable number" of independents. On March 29 the issue was discussed in the Chamber, where [unspecified] opponents of the proposal claimed that the signing was liable to reawaken intercommunal strife. It was assumed that it was in the power of the President to bring the issue to a conclusion either way (Hayat, Jaridah, March 24, 30). [It would seem that the issue did not come up again at this level during the year.]

ARMENIANS

Number. In 1961 the number of Armenians holding Lebanese citizenship was estimated at 100,000 (Al-Yawm, July 20). According to [unreliable] 1960 Lebanese statistics, over 71,000 Armenians were eligible to vote at the general elections (MER 1960, p 350). A number of Armenians were granted citizenship at the end of Dec 1960. (Nahar, Dec 17, 1960)

Communist Activity. A number of Syrian Armenian Communists were arrested in Beirut in July; one was found in possession of documents proving that he had been in contact with Communist states and received aid from them. (Antwar, July 9). (See also under The Communists, below.)

The Tashnaq Party. According to a detailed account of a "research" on the Tashnaq party, published in Aug in the [pro-UAR] weekly Kul-Shay, the party was led by an international executive of twelve: five in the U.S., two in Egypt, three in Lebanon and two in France. The Lebanese branch was headed by [Deputy] Mosis Dirkahtsyan (leader), Gharo Saouni and Aram Sahakyan. The party had no official head but its most influential member was Khatahtsyan [of whom no further details were given]. The party had also a military organization called Takim Yasi.

The Tashnaq ("Revolution") party was founded in Ottoman days in 1890, three years after the founding of the Hamshaq party, the paper said. It operated in Armenia as a nationalist movement.

In 1908, however, some members joined the Young Turks, the paper continued, and since then the party had always cooperated with whoever was in power or seemed dominant. From 1922 to 1940 it cooperated with the French (the mandatory power in Syria and Lebanon); Dirkahtsyan served as an officer in the French Army and was head of the party branch in Paris.

During World War II the party collaborated with Germany and had its headquarters in Berlin. True to its policy of always collaborating with whoever seemed the most powerful, Kul-Shay continued, it had worked hand in hand with the Americans against Soviet Russia and Communism since the end of the war; its members were favoured in the granting of visas, etc., and enormous funds were collected in the U.S. The security services in the Arab countries were concerned as to whether it was not a body of conspirators against Arab interests. (Kul-Shay, Aug 19)

Repercussions in Lebanon of Tashnaq Espionage Trial in Syria. At the end of July many Tashnaq members were arrested in Syria, especially in Aleppo, on charges of espionage and sabotage. The Syrian authorities accused the party in Lebanon of collaboration in these acts (Jaridah, Aug 2). The arrests created a furore in the Lebanese party. One of its leaders stated that, though the branches of the party in the various countries were unconnected, they nevertheless had a common basis, namely the fight against Communism. (Amal, July 28)

The trial began in Damascus in Nov, some of the accused being tried in absentia as they had absconded to Lebanon. The Syrian court requested the extradition of Mosis Dirkahtsyan, but the Lebanese government refused to comply. (See also p 397.) (Jaridah, Nov 9; Kul-Shay, Dec 23)

Mashyakhat al-Aql Dispute Settled. [Further to the dispute over Druze community affairs (see MER 1960, p 345), an interim settlement was reached in regard to the spiritual leadership (mashyakhat al-aql), pending legislation.]

On Jan 31 a meeting of community leaders, with the two [rival] leaders, Kamal Junblat and Majid Arslan, as well as the Druze ministers and deputies present, agreed on Shaykh Abu Yusuf Abd al-Latif as a third Shaykh lil-aql. It was further agreed that if a position of a Shaykh fell vacant, the marhya Khat would continue with two Shaykhs only, one of the Yazbakliyah and the other of the Junblatiyah. [The two Shaykhs who continued in office were: Muhammad Abu Shaqra, known for pro-UAR tendencies and supported by Junblat; and Rashid Hamadah, of the Yazbakliyah, known for anti-UAR tendencies and supported by Arslan. The sources did not indicate to which faction—if any—the new Shaykh adhered.] The Druze ministers were to inform the President of the agreement [and it would seem that the matter was not again raised in the Chamber]. (Hayat, Jaridah, Feb 1)

Amendment of Personal Statute Law Opposed. On Jan 27 the Druze ministers and deputies discussed with the President proposals to amend the Druze law of personal statute (qanun al-ahwal al-shakhsiyah), which had met with the disapproval of several religious leaders. [Since the enactment of the law in May 1948, many amendments had been requested, all of them opposed by the religious leaders. It was reported that Arslan and Junblat, the Druze ministers, displayed mutual understanding on many points during this meeting (Hayat, Jan 28). [The report quoted gave no particulars of the points at issue.]

Community Divided on Breakup of U.A.R. In Dec the [pro-Ar] As-Siyasah reported that Shaykh Muhammad Abu Shaqra had refused to receive an official Syrian delegation on the grounds that he opposed the isolationist regime in Syria, like any other isolationist trend in the Arab world. The Syrian revolution, he said, had caused the utmost disillusion to millions of Arabs by injuring Arab unity. Though he did not know President Abdel Nasser personally, he had no doubts that he was a hero who had raised the Arabs to eminence and every Arab owed him respect. (The Mufti of Lebanon, the head of the Sunni Muslims, Muhammad Alaya, also refused to receive the delegation.) (Siyasah, Dec 6) The delegation, headed by the director-general of the Syrian Ministry for Foreign Affairs, was, however, received by Rashid Hamdani, the Yazbaki Shaykh al-Aql who had previously visited Syria to congratulate the government on "the new era" (al-ahd al-jadid). (Amal, Nov 30)

KURDS

Citizenship. In Sept President Shehab, PM Slim and Mashnugh, the Minister of the Interior, agreed on the granting of citizenship to stateless Kurds. As a result thousands of Kurds were expected to receive Lebanese citizenship shortly. (Kul-Shay', Sept 16)

Political Activity. [Intensive political activity among the Kurds, mostly Communist-inspired, was reported during the second half of the year, apparently in connection with the Kurdish uprising in Iraq, which started in June (pp 279 ff).]

In July the discovery of a Kurdish party, working under Communist guidance for an independent Kurdish state, was reported; a Communist leader of Kurdish descent had been arrested and an operational plan for this purpose had been found in his house. (Anwar, July 15)

During the same period a number of Kurds were arrested who had reportedly infiltrated from Syria and Turkey to set up in Lebanon a Kurdish party to work for the establishment of a Kurdish state on Iraqi territory. (Kul-Shay', July 5; Amal, July 19, Aug 18)

At the beginning of Aug, Muhammad Uthman al-Lawli, described as "the leader of the Kurdish Democratic Party," was detained in Lebanon for suspicious activities. It was reported that he had arrived from Syria some time previously. The security authorities claimed to have proof of his connections with "a Lebanese party known for its socialist leanings." Following the intervention of an official political personage belonging to this party, he was released, on condition that he leave the country. (Jaridah, Aug 2)

In Oct the arrest was reported of about 20 Persian, Turkish and Iraqi Kurds, who had entered the country illegally and admitted participation in the Kurdish revolt in Iraq. The authorities decided to deport those holding Iranian and Turkish citizenship, but to hold the Iraqi Kurds for further investigation. (Hayat, Oct 25)

ALIENS

[During the year the problem of aliens, in both political and economic aspects, came ever more to the fore.

The growing concentration of political refugees from the Arab countries gave great concern to the authorities and the activities of some of them led to no little political tension between Lebanon and other Arab states, as well as, in some instances, aggravating internal tension. The steady influx of aliens also aggravated the unemployment problem.] (For the problems of Arab refugees see p 240 b.)

Granting of Citizenship Slowed Down. In a detailed article, Al-Yawm said that under the previous regime citizenship had been granted at the request of deputies. Thus, for instance, 11,000 applications had been granted in 1957—1,700 in Aley district alone, in deference to the wishes of Deputy Munir Abu Fadil, so that the villages in the area were now populated by widely differing groups. During 1956-58 citizenship was granted to about 30,000 foreigners, including Syrians, Englishmen, Poles, Hungarians, and persons from the Eastern Mediterranean area.

The granting of citizenship had now been slowed down, however; it now depended on the fulfilment of most difficult conditions and "on something resembling general agreement, to guard against any interference by the communities which might disturb the country." (Al-Yawm, July 20)

The government had stopped the issue of citizenship papers, as well as the filing of citizenship applications abroad without special government permission, at the end of 1960. In the past, Lebanese missions abroad had been authorized to grant citizenship. (Hayat, Dec 17, 1960)

There was also a stream of applications, it was reported, from Lebanese emigrants, mostly living in African countries, who now wished to return because of economic restrictions there. (Hayat, Dec 17, 1960—see also p 413 b.)

Pressure of Aliens on Labour Market. The Minister of Labour stated in Jan that 35,000 aliens, most of them employed in trade and industry, held Lebanese work permits (Anwar, Jan 8). A similar figure was given by other sources (Hayat, May 26; Jaridah, Oct 31). [The total number of the alien work force was, however, several times larger.] Official sources said that 300,000 Syrians and Palestinians were employed in Lebanese agriculture (Nahar, March 24). Another government source estimated the number of Syrian labourers permanently employed in all economic sectors alone as 75,000, rising to 140,000 during agricultural peak seasons (Siyasah, Oct 24). According to another source, the number of foreign Arab workers in Lebanon was 160,000. (Jaridah, Sept 10)

In Jan Joseph Skaf, the Minister for Work and Social Affairs, announced preparations for a census of all foreign labourers and said he would limit the number of work permits (Anwar, Jan 8, 20). On Oct 17 the ministry issued a decree barring the employment of aliens without a special permit, "to enable the control of the work of aliens and to protect the Lebanese working man" (Jaridah, Oct 18; Hayat, Oct 20). The decree did not distinguish between citizens of Arab countries and others, but the Ministry of Labour instituted a temporary arrangement under which Syrians and Palestinians would not need permits, since the Palestinians had international status and the Syrians were mainly unskilled agricultural and building labourers, who did not compete with Lebanese. (Jaridah, Nov 24)

Political Activity of Aliens, Arrests and Deportations. In Jan the deportation of six political refugees from Arab countries, suspected of subversive activity for the realization of the Fertile Crescent plan, was reported. (Kul-Shay', Jan 14; see also under the National Social Party.)

On March 1 a special meeting was called at the President's palace to discuss the shaky state of internal security. It was decided to deport about a hundred foreign nationals suspected of illegal activity that was undermining Lebanon's relations with other Arab states. The President requested the security authorities strictly to repress unruly foreign elements stirring up unrest. (Anwar, March 5)

Over 300 Syrians and Iraqis, described as Communists, were deported in June. (Nahar, June 27; Kul-Shay', July 1)

In Oct 350 aliens were deported, most of them Kurds and Khawranis (Syrians from the Khawran district) suspected of subversive activity. (Hayat, Oct 15)

News of further impending deportations was published from time to time. In Dec a government source said that over 500 foreigners suspected of illegal political activity had been deported in 1960 (Anwar, Oct 21, Dec 30). (On the deportation of Kurds, see p 377a.)

(For the part played by foreigners in the abortive revolution at the end of Dec, see the relevant chapter, below.)

In Dec the Ministry of Social Affairs requested that all the foreign jugglers and magicians who filled the streets of Beirut be expelled. A survey had shown that they came mostly from India and Pakistan, and that their numbers doubled every year. (Kifak, Dec 24)

POLITICAL PARTIES AND PARLIAMENTARY BLOCS

THE BA'ATH PARTY

(hizb al-ba'ath al-arabi al-ihtiraki)

[The Ba'ath party in Lebanon, as in other Arab countries, was rent by dissension in 1961, as became especially evident with the breakup of the UAR (for details see p 394 a). It took virtually no part in political activities.]

Dissension on Attitude to UAR. In Feb a pamphlet over the imprint of the "Revolutionary Ba'ath Party" (Rimawi's UAR-sponsored rival Ba'ath party—see MER 1960, pp 497-8) was distributed in Tripoli accusing Michel Aflaq [the Syrian ideological leader of the party] and his supporters, "the Aflaqites," of deviation from the party's principles. (For sources, see below.)

Rivalry with Karāmi's Tripoli Bloc. At the same time Rashid Karāmi's [parliamentary] bloc (also known locally as the Arab Liberation party) accused the Ba'ath of half-hearted participation in the UAR anniversary celebrations, and a pamphlet campaign developed between the two bodies. An-Nahar thought Communists were among those behind the campaign against the Ba'ath party. (Nahar, Feb 28; Jaridah, March 1)

In April Ba'ath pamphlets counter-attacked the Tripoli bloc deputies for not doing their duty to the city; the latter retorted by charging the Ba'ath party with abandoning Abdel Nasser and his policies. The authorities confiscated the pamphlets. (Jaridah, April 22)

On July 17 in Tripoli a group of Rimawi supporters opened fire on Ba'ath members; there were no casualties. (Nahar, July 18)

THE COMMUNISTS

Activity and Policy. [As in 1960, the propaganda of the illegal Lebanese Communist party—in its pamphlets and its unofficial organ, An-Nida'—was directed mainly against the UAR and against American activity in Lebanon, particularly the former. As on former occasions the visits to Beirut of the American Sixth Fleet aroused vigorous opposition by the Communists and Peace Partisans. (See pp 407 a, 409 b.) Armenians and Kurds stood out among its active members, but villagers from the south were also prominent.]

Struggle with UAR. On Dec 31, 1960, shots were fired at the car of Artin Madyan, the Lebanese-Armenian Communist leader; he and his driver were slightly wounded. Madyan blamed the Egyptian and Syrian intelligence, and during the following weeks An-Nida' reported many demonstrations of sympathy with Madyan, including articles in Lebanese Armenian papers. Beirut Armenian and other delegations went to the PM, demanding an investigation. (Nida', Jan 1-14, 22)

[The outstanding issue between the Lebanese Communists and the UAR during the year broke at the end of May with the reported murder in Damascus of the party's SG, Farajallah al-Hilu, which aroused a certain amount of solidarity in Lebanon, at least on the part of some opposition leaders. (See p 391b.)]

On June 3 the authorities closed down An-Nida' because of its attacks on the UAR (Hayat, June 4). The paper and its editor, Suhayl Yammūt, were charged with publishing articles damaging to national unity and UAR-Lebanese relations. On June 13 it was closed for ten days and Yammūt fined £L500. (Hayat, Jaridah, June 9, 14; R. Cairo, June 13 [15])

The Syrian revolution was welcomed by An-Nida' as "a historic victory of the Syrian people over Egyptian tyranny." (Nida', Sept 29, 30, Oct 1, 2, 3)

Participation in International Communist Conferences. Nicolas Shāwī [the Lebanese Communist leader] attended the 22nd Communist Party Congress in Moscow (Oct 17-31). (BBC in Arabic, Nov 5; IMB, Nov 6)

Two members of the Printers' Union who took part in the Communist Workers' Conference in Leipzig, East Germany, were arrested on their return on charges of leaving Lebanon without exit permits and participation in an undesirable conference. They pleaded guilty. (Jaridah, Dec 22; Siyasah, Dec 23; Anwar, Dec 31)

Communist Activities; Arrests and Deportations. Two persons arrested in 1960 (see MER 1960, p 348) for espionage were sentenced in March 1961 to three years' imprisonment for Communist activity but were found not guilty of espionage. One of them, Dr Jamil Badir, had been detained at Beirut airport on his way from West Germany with $7,000 in his possession destined for the Jordanian Communist party. (Jaridah, March 27)

Over 300 Syrian and Iraqi citizens described as Communists were deported during the last week of June. Most of them preferred to go to non-Arab states. (Nahar, June 27; Kul-Shay', July 1)

district in the south, many arrests were reported in the area. Searches revealed Communist documents and propaganda material. (Jaridah, Aug 29)

In Sept the authorities announced the discovery of several Communist cells in Beirut which had been engaged in propaganda and espionage. Among those arrested were government employees and foreigners. Some of the propaganda material confiscated originated in Eastern Europe. Locally prepared pamphlets against a visit of the American Sixth Fleet were also found. (Jaridah, Sept 15, 19, 20; Siyasah, Sept 20)

In Oct the discovery of a Communist ring, headed by Michel Badirah, a lecturer at the Lebanese University, was reported. (Jaridah, Oct 7, 8)

In Nov it was reported that Lebanon had denied entry to Khālid Bakdāsh. (Siyasah, Nov 23)

A Cairo source stated in Dec that Communist party headquarters for the ME would be transferred to Beirut from Bulgaria after Abdel Nasser had revealed their location. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Dec 11)

In Dec it was reported that the security forces would redouble their efforts to repress the Communists (and the NSP) as a result of their increased activity after the dissolution of the UAR. (Jaridah, Dec 8)

Later it was reported that the authorities had confiscated propaganda material containing an account of the Communist platform in Lebanon for 1962. (Anwar, Dec 31)

ISLAMIC LIBERATION PARTY

(hizb al-tahrir al-islāmī)

Membership. According to As'ad al-Mālīki, head of the party branch in the Syrian Region, who was arrested in March (Jaridah, March 21), it numbered 3,000 in Lebanon, concentrated mostly in Beirut and including many students (Anwar, March 28). Among Lebanese members arrested were engineers, doctors and teachers (Nahar, Jan 13). There were also Jordanian nationals, Arab refugees (Nahar, Jan 5, 12), as well as at least one Saudi Arabian. (See below; see also following item for names of party leaders.)

Arrests and Charges. The 1960 campaign to repress the party continued into 1961. It was disclosed in Feb that 90 members were awaiting trial. (Jaridah, Feb 21)

It was first reported that the party leader, Shaykh Muhammad Taqi ad-Din an-Nabbāni, was among the prisoners, and details of his interrogation were published (MER 1960, p 347), but from the beginning of Feb frequent mention was made of efforts to arrest him. (Anwar, Feb 15; Nahar, April 28, Oct 19; Jaridah, Nov 19)

Among the detainees were several of the party's leaders: Ali Fakhr ad-Din, its head in Lebanon, Ibrahim Hussein Yūsuf, head of the Beirut branch, and Muhammad Tawfiq Abu Khalaf, treasurer. (Nahar, Jan 13, Feb 12; Jaridah, Jan 17)

Most of the detainees denied having played any part in the party's political activities and disclaimed all knowledge of its alleged connections with a foreign power; they said they had joined because they believed that the party was trying to strengthen Islamic consciousness. (Siyasah, Jan 18; Nahar, Feb 12)

In April, further arrests were reported including two leading members in Beirut: a Saudi Arabian engineer and a Jordanian student. The latter, Khālid Kamāl Zayd, had been arrested previously for party activities in Jordan and Syria. The engineer, Nazār Sa'īd al-Kardālī al-Manlā, was reputedly the son of the head of the Saudi Arabian intelligence [or information?] services (Istikhbarāt). (Jaridah, April 26)

The indictment against 91 party members, headed by Nabbāni (tried in absentia), was published on April 21. [Among the accused were several whose names bore witness to their origin on the West Bank of Jordan.] The charges included the distribution of pamphlets calling for a change in the Lebanese constitution by illegal means, incitement to inter-communal strife, disparagement of religious ritual, and slander of Lebanese leaders (Amal, Jaridah of April 22 contain a full list of the accused.) There were no charges of espionage, sabotage and contacts with foreign countries, including Israel, which had been mentioned previously in connection with the interrogation of the prisoners. (See, e.g., Siyasah, Jan 8; Nahar, Feb 13.)

Party Organization; Charges of Anti-Christian Propaganda. The charge sheet included some details of the organization and operation of the party. Activities were coordinated with the help of Muhammad Tawfiq Abu Khalaf, a Beirut bookseller who collected contributions in [unspecified] Arab countries in the course of his commercial activities. Part of this income he distributed to active members and part was used to produce propaganda material. Meetings were held in secret in private houses or in a public library. The mosques were utilized for the dissemination of the party's ideas. The party's pamphlets condemned Muslim-Christian cooperation and denounced the [Muslim] PM and President of the Chamber as infidels for attending Christmas ceremonies.

The Muslim leaders were accused of being traitors to their faith because they were partners in the Lebanese regime, which enabled Christians to rule over Muslims, although a Muslim is forbidden voluntarily to place himself under the rule of infidels. (Jaridah, April 22)

At the trial (May 3-15) all the accused denied the charges and pleaded that the pamphlets were meant to restore people to religion and the path of righteousness (al-sirat al-mustaqīm) (Nahar, Jaridah, May 11). Each of the Lebanese members, including Ali Fakhr ad-Din, head of the Lebanese branch, was sent to prison for six months and fined £L50; foreign nationals were imprisoned for eight months and fined £L100. (Jaridah, May 16)

Party Activities Continue; Further Arrests. The party's activities continued after the trials. During July and Sept pamphlets were distributed condemning the participation of Muslim states in the Belgrade Conference (Amal, July 10; Kul-Shay, Sept 29). [The party was opposed on principle to cooperation between Muslim and non-Muslim states.]

In Oct party members were arrested in the Beirut suburb of Burj Hammūd (Nahar, Oct 19). A new trial, on charges of distributing pamphlets attacking the regime of "one of the Arab countries" began on Nov 8. (Siyasah, Nov 9)

On Dec 29, 20 members were arrested in al-Umari Mosque, Beirut, while distributing pamphlets attacking Muslim dignitaries and politicians attending the Christmas celebrations (Jaridah, Jan 3, 1962). [In 1960 members of the party had been arrested for the same offence (Siyasah, Jan 8, 1961.)]

HIZB AN-NAJJADAH

Opposition to Sīām's Government. [In the Chamber this party made its presence felt by the frequent intervention of its leader and only deputy, Adnān al-Hakīm. Its main activity, however, was street demonstrations in its stronghold, the western quarters of Beirut.]

[In Aug., following clashes between Najjādah demonstrators and the police, the Beirut Front was set up in the Chamber, with Hakīm as one of its members, opposed to PM Sīām and Mashnūq, the Minister of Interior, both Beirut Muslim leaders. See pp 392 a-393.]

Sawt al-Urūbah, the party organ, was closed down twice, in March and Aug., on charges of damaging national unity and provocation to inter-community riots. (Hayat, March 8, Aug 10)

Partisan of the UAR. [The party persisted in its all-out support of Abdel Nasser and the UAR.] Hakīm was received by President Abdel Nasser in March in Damascus and again, after the breakup of the UAR, in Cairo in Dec. (R. Cairo, March 6 [8]; Hayat, Dec 29)

THE NATIONAL BLOC

(al-kutlah al-wataniyah)

[This party, led by Raymond Eddeh, stood out as one of the most active and dynamic parties in the Chamber, where it was represented by six members, and consistently opposed the Cabinets of both Sīām and Karāmī—except for one day, when Edouard Hunayn, a party member, served as a minister in Karāmī's newly formed cabinet.]

[Its home policy was based on strict adherence to the National Charter; it even advocated the signing of this unwritten agreement. (See under: Inter-Community Relations, above.) Its external policy was based on the safeguarding of Lebanon's independence and determined opposition to any interference in her internal affairs. These principles found expression in the party's attitude to issues involving UAR-Lebanese relations, e.g., President Abdel Nasser's denunciation of Lebanese parties (p 388 a), and the alleged murder in Damascus of Farajallah al-Hilu, the Lebanese Communist leader (p 391 b).]

THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE

(al-hay'ah al-wataniyah)

[The activity of this small Beirut group was limited to the publication of manifestoes on current affairs, which generally expressed moderate support of pan-Arabism and the UAR. (See, e.g., open letters to King Hussein in Hayat, April 4, and to the governments of the UAR and Syria in Hayat, Oct 25.) Rafiq Naja, leader of the party, was a deputy and became Minister of the Economy in Karāmī's Cabinet.]

In Nov a bomb exploded in Naja's home. (See p 397 b.)

(al-wataniyyūn al-ahḥrār)

[The National Liberal party, headed by Camille Sham'un, continued to pursue its opposition policy on a limited scale. It continued to have close relations with the NSP, while opposing both the Phalanges and the pro-UAR groups. (On its alleged connection with the abortive NSP coup d'état, see the latter.)]

In Feb., explosives planted in the garden of Sham'un's home near Beirut were discovered in time. (Hayat, Feb 7)

At the beginning of July, a Syrian youth was arrested on a charge of having planned to assassinate Sham'un on the orders of a foreign intelligence service. (Nahar, July 2)

On April 11 members of the National Liberals and the NSP clashed with members of the Phalanges in a village in the Biqa' area. The police detained 15 persons. (Hayat, April 12)

At the end of June the party started a daily, Ash-Shams (Nahar, June 27), which was closed by order of the government for ten days in Sept for an attack on Pierre Jumayil. (Hayat, Sept 22)

THE NATIONALIST SOCIAL PARTY (NSP)

(al-hizb al-qawmi al-ijtimā'i)

[The NSP was responsible for numerous acts of violence in 1961 against both pro-UAR Muslim bodies and pro-Western Christian organizations, especially the Phalanges, culminating in its abortive coup d'état, in collaboration with army officers, on the last day of the year. (On the coup see p 398; the trial brought to light points of interest concerning the party's organization, general activities and membership.)]

[Before the coup it was active primarily in the Biqa, Mt. Lebanon and Beirut areas, among the refugees and other foreign Arabs.]

Ideology Reformulated. At a press conference on Nov 15 Dr Abdallah Sa'adah, the head of the party, redefined its basic principles "in view of recent developments in the Arab world."

1. Lebanon is an independent and sovereign state tied by deep-rooted (aril) ties to her sisters, the Arab countries, and cooperates with them in order to erect a structure that will strengthen them all.

2. Lebanon is tied by bonds of fate and nature to the countries of her natural surroundings (al-mukhit al-tahḥī), which call for the coordination of economic, social, defence and cultural relations for the sake of the genuine interests of Lebanon and the neighbouring countries.

3. The Lebanese people is one social unit without distinction of class, religion, rights or duties.

4. Lebanon should strive to implement the principles of social and economic justice through the development of her social and economic system in the direction of "social socialism" (al-ihtirakiyah al-ijtima'iyyah), which will secure justice and safeguard the producers' right to enjoy the benefit of their labours without permitting exploitation.

5. Reliance on genuine democracy, in substance rather than in form, and the safeguarding—in practice, not in words—of the general liberties. (Jaridah, Nov 16)

Activities, Arrests. In Jan [as reported by a pro-UAR source] six Arab political refugees were deported on suspicion of working for the forcible realization of the Fertile Crescent project in accordance with a British plan. It was stated that they had established liaison with a certain Lebanese party, but its involvement had been prevented by their deportation, and that machineguns and bombs had been found in their possession. (Kul-Shay, Jan 14)

In March a man described as an NSP member was arrested for distributing pamphlets liable to injure relations between Lebanon and one of the Arab states (Jaridah, March 19). According to another source, the man was George Abd al-Masih [who had left the NSP in 1958] and set up the rival Nationalist Syrian Party]. (Nahar, March 24)

On March 22 a bomb was planted in a branch office of the party in Zghorta, in the North; there was much damage to property. (Hayat, March 23)

The annual ceremony marking the 12th anniversary of the execution of Antun Sa'adah, the NSP's (then PPS) founder, at his birthplace, Dhur ash-Shuwer village, on July 9 was attended by 2,000 members.

Dr Abdallah Sa'adah condemned the government for refusing to permit ceremonies on a larger scale. On the same day clashes broke out in several villages between NSP members and supporters of Abd al-Masih. (Jaridah, July 11)

In Oct several members were arrested on suspicion of participation in bombing attacks on pro-UAR newspapers. (See p 394 h.)

In Nov two members, one a Palestinian, were arrested when dangerous pamphlets were discovered in their homes. (Siyasah, Nov 25)

Struggle With the Phalanges. See under the Phalanges, below.

Party Backs Syrian Federation Plan. On Oct 11, after the break-up of the UAR, the party officially endorsed the Syrian proposal for a decentralized Arab federation and called on the Lebanese people to support it. (Hayat, Oct 12)

In Nov Sa'adah said that Syria should assume the leadership of the Arab world. (Hayat, Nov 16)

LES PHALANGES LIBANAIS

(al-katā'ib al-lubnaniyah)

Political Developments. [The Phalanges, under the leadership of Pierre Jumayil, stood out in 1961 as one of the most stable and active political bodies in the country. It had six members in the Chamber and was supported by an organized Maronite membership, with the main concentrations in the Mt. Lebanon area and Beirut. Jumayil continued to represent it in the Cabinet, where he claimed to be the spokesman of the Maronite community (p 390 a) and often clashed with Kamāl Jumhāt, who represented Arab nationalist, pro-UAR tendencies. At the end of Feb, Abdel Nasser launched a severe attack on the party and its leader (pp 387-9), and violent clashes broke out later between it and the PSP. Another attack on the party was launched by Cairo in Dec (p 150 b).]

It was reported that other predominantly Maronite parties—Raymond Eddhe's National Bloc, Sham'un's National Liberals and the Constitutional Union—had become uneasy about the Phalanges' strength in Mt. Lebanon, fearing that Jumayil intended to capture the presidency at the next elections. These parties, which had never cooperated, were now contemplating joint preventive action, together with Gen. (ret.) Jamil Lahūd. (Kul-Shay', June 3)

Struggle With Nationalist Social Party. [The traditional rivalry between the Phalanges, which strove for the preservation of independence, and the NSP, which advocated Lebanon's inclusion in a Greater Syria, resulted in several armed clashes. There was one in April in the small town of Al-Qa' in the Biqa' (Jaridah, Hayat, April 12), and another on July 16 in Qartaba village, Mt. Lebanon (see p 392 a). The Phalanges headquarters were one of the targets of the NSP's abortive coup d'état in Dec, which the Phalanges apparently helped to frustrate. (See chapter on the coup, below.)]

Membership. An [unsympathetic] source estimated party membership in 1961 at 60,000 (Hanadith, Nov 17). [In 1959 the figure of 50,000 was given, including 30,000-40,000 active members, organized in 200 branches, in addition to forty branches among emigrants abroad. (Les Parties Libanaises en 1959—Edition L'Orient, Al-Jaridah, Beirut)]

Party Platform. The following were the main points of the platform adopted in Sept at the party's fourth annual convention:

In foreign policy: "the unity of the Lebanese" and Lebanese independence; wider cooperation among the Arab states; Lebanon should help smooth out inter-Arab differences, while maintaining strict neutrality; support for the Arab League and measures to assure the neutrality of its administrative staff; support for the UN and the right of every people to self-determination; support for the resolutions of the 1960 Lebanese Emigrants' Congress, especially for the establishment of a League of the Lebanese in the World (jami'iet al-Lubnaniyin fi al-dalam) (see MER 1960, pp 365-6).

In the economic field the convention advocated: "a liberal economy and the protection of the national industry on the basis of consumer's interest," cooperation between the government and the unions, the implementation of the social insurance law [which was not passed during 1960] and the amendment of the wage law [see under Labour] to suit the changing conditions.

In the cultural field the party was in favour of: "the principle of free [private] education side by side with official [state] education," free universal primary education at the earliest possible date, and more intensive study of Arabic together with the encouragement of foreign language study. (See also on the Education Dispute pp 384b-386.)

The convention demanded the introduction of agricultural instruction in village primary schools, more agricultural colleges, the setting up of one or more agricultural colleges to train agronomists, encouragement for agricultural cooperatives, and the founding of centres for the study of village arts and crafts. (Amal, Hayat, Oct 3)

On the 25th anniversary of the founding of the party (on Nov 21, 1936), a great celebration took place in Beirut, with the slogan "Twenty-five Years of Service to Lebanon" as its focal point. (Revue du Liban, Nov 25)

THE POPULAR RESISTANCE

(al-muqāwamah ash-sha'abiyyah)

[The Popular Resistance organization pursued its pro-UAR policy on a limited scale.]

In Jan, Rashid Shihāb ad-Din, the organization's leader, vehemently denied rumours of a rapprochement with PM Slām [who gained the upper hand in the struggle for power in the Beirut Muslim sector at the end of the 1958 insurrection]. He said it was a conflict of principle that separated him from Slām, a conflict "between an idealist, progressive, uncompromising youth and a traditional, deceitful power-seeker who strives for power regardless of anything and who has exploited the revolution [the 1958 insurrection], which had other aims, to this end." (Jaridah, Jan 14)

In June the organization announced that as a result of contacts with the authorities the discharged soldiers who had taken part in the 1958 insurrection would be given work by the government and the Beirut municipality. (Hayat, June 16)

Io Sept Mashnūq, the Minister of Interior, denied persecution of the organization for its attacks on the PM and himself. (Hayat, Sept 2)

THE PROGRESSIVE SOCIALIST PARTY (PSP) THE ARAB PROGRESSIVE FRONT

(al-hizb al-taqaddumi al-ishi'raki)

[This party, despite its relatively small membership (appr. 10,000—see MER 1960, p 346), was in the forefront of political activity thanks to the dynamic leadership of Kamāl Junblāt, who was a member of all the three Cabinets in office during the year. In each of them he played the part of the enfant terrible, as the chief advocate of a pan-Arab and pro-UAR attitude, repeatedly clashing with Pierre Jumayil, the Phalangist leader and spokesman for Christian and pro-Western views. The PSP had six representatives in the Chamber.]

Internal Rifts; Resignation of Majdalāni. Rumours of a rift between Junblāt and Nassim Majdalāni, his second-in-command, were first reported in Feb, but categorically denied by party sources. [Majdalāni had been SG of the party since its inception. He had been a member of Sām's government but was left out of his reduced Cabinet of eight in May, as well as Karāmi's Cabinet, which followed.]

Majdalāni resigned in Nov [it was not quite clear whether only from his post or from his membership in the party—probably the latter]. Party members accused him of supporting the oeu [opposition] bloc led by Sā'ib Slām in the Chamber.

Later, Majdalāni denied rumours that he had reconsidered his resignation. (Hayat, Feb 18, Nov 27, 30; Orient, Dec 10)

On Nov 30 it was reported that seven members of the party presidium had resigned in protest against Junblāt's policy. They had demanded new elections to the presidium and threatened to leave the party if their request was not met. Fadla Abu Haydar, the PSP secretary, declared that only Majdalāni had resigned, and that the presidium had authorized Junblāt's policy. (Hayat, Nov 30)

In Dec a [pro-UAR] source reported that the number of PSP branches had declined to 15 from 186 during the "peak period" because of personal friction in the leadership owing to Junblāt's egocentric attitude. (Kul-Shay', Dec 9; during this period Kul-Shay' repeatedly attacked Junblāt; see e.g., issue of Dec 23.)

Founding of Arab Progressive Front. [In Oct, after the breakup of the UAR, Junblāt founded the pro-UAR Arab Progressive Front (al-jabha al-arabiyyah al-taqaddumiyyah), which corresponded to the parliamentary Front for National Struggle (jabhat an-nidal al-watani). As a result, Sām Hajjā joined the six PSP deputies—including Majdalāni—in the Chamber.] (See p 393 h.)

The Front's platform, which was completed by the end of Nov, declared that Arab nationalism was a progressive fighting movement of socialist content; the Front strove for the building of a homeland where the nation would be able to realize its full personality and the individual to preserve his self-confidence and faith in his future.

The Front set itself the following aims:

To deepen the national consciousness and to manifest the connection between the nationalist movement and the socialist progressive struggle;

To work for the development of state and society in a scientific, progressive socialist direction;

To safeguard human rights (al-hurriyyat al-amnah), establish a true democracy, and fight reaction and imperialism in Lebanon and the other parts of the Arab homeland;

To emphasize that Palestine constitutes the foremost Arab issue and that Israel is a forgery and an imperialist crime;

To extend material and moral support to the struggle of the Algerian people, the people in the south of the Arabian peninsula, and all Arab liberation movements, and to fight all imperialist pacts and military bases;

To call for world peace and the prohibition of the employment of nuclear weapons;

To foster socialist consciousness among all the Arabs and to work for cooperation among all Arab socialist organizations;

To work for the joining of the Front by all groups and individuals believing in the above principles. (Sayyad, Nov 30)

NEW PARTIES

The National Progress Movement (harakat al-taqaddum al-watani). In April the constituent assembly of a party to be called by the above name met in Beirut. The founders were Dr Manu'ul [Manuel] Yūnis and Sulaymān az-Zayn. The party platform stated that it would be based on the spiritual and cultural values that gave Lebanon her specific character, and that it was a national organization whose members were the pioneers of the liberation movement, coming from all strata of the population. Its aims included: the defence of democracy; the acceptance of law and science as a working basis for the life of the community and the individual; the fight against communalism; the reorganization of the administration; legislative reforms in accordance with contemporary needs; the formulation of a general plan for all public activity; guarantees for public freedoms; the transfer of political leadership to the politically responsible youth; and cooperation with all Arab states. (Jaridah, April 15)

At the end of Aug Yūnis was appointed SG, and committee and branch officers were also appointed. [The majority of the 56 functionaries bore Christian names.] (For the full list, see Hayat, Sept 2)

Sā'ib Slām Forms a Party. It was reported at the end of Nov that Sā'ib Slām [who in Oct had resigned the premiership] was formulating the platform for a new party, which would advocate devotion to independence, struggle against communalism, the preservation of national unity and the defence of democracy (Sayyad, Nov 30). [This step may have been connected with the formation of the Beirut Front by his opponents. See below, under Parliamentary Blocs.]

In Dec it was reported that Slām had completed his negotiations for the establishment of his party and that he would be joined by 12 deputies. Among the names mentioned were Nassim Majdalāni (who had left the PSP), Muhammad Safi ad-Din, Ma'arūf Sa'ad, Sulaymān Faranjīyah and Abdallah Mashnūq. Another 12 deputies also reportedly intended to join the party. The party would not limit its activity to the Chamber but would also be active among the Beirut youth groups associated with Slām. The official founding of the party was scheduled for the beginning of 1962. (Anwar, Dec 19)

MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS

(harakat al-qawmiyyūn al-arab)

This pan-Arab group, known generally as al-qawmiyyūn al-arab, formed in the forties. Its centre was a club named al-urwah al-wuthqa ("the firm hold") at the American University of Beirut. Similar groups sprang up in other ME Arab and in the North African countries where their activities centred in clubs named the Arab Cultural Club (an-nadi ath-thaqafi al-arabi).

The Beirut club intensified its activities after the Arab-Israel war in 1948 when many former Palestinian Arab youths entered the American University. To "inflict revenge for Arab Palestine on international Zionism" became at that time their main theme and their slogan was: "unity, liberty, revenge." Up to 1955 the qawmiyyūn al-arab advocated immediate unification of Iraq, Jordan and Syria. But as Iraq joined the Baghdad pact they became partisans of the Egyptian-Syrian camp and, when it was founded, of the UAR which they regarded as the only legitimate centre of Arab nationalism. They adopted the UAR doctrine of Arab union, positive neutralism and Arab socialism and called for the immediate unification of all Arab states with the UAR. While they regarded Lebanon as an indivisible part of "the one Arab community" (or society—al-mujtama' al-arabi al-wahid), one of their leaders stated, they recognized Lebanon's special circumstances and instead of calling for immediate union, they endeavoured to spread the principles of Arab nationalism in the country until union could be achieved by democratic process.

The qawmiyyūn al-arab were not a party but rather a loosely-organized movement. Their followers mainly came from among the intelligentsia and students. They had a secret leadership but from time to time some of the leaders emerged in public; in 1959, those last known were Dr. Georges Habbas, Dr. Wadi Haddad and Ali Menko (or Renko), all of them Palestinians "and either imprisoned or fugitive after the events in Jordan"; a prominent personality in Lebanon was Muhsin Ibrahim. (Les Partis Libanais en 1959; Edition L'Orient—Al-Jaridah, Beirut)

In 1961 the qawmiyyūn al-arab denounced the Syrian coup d'état, distributed pamphlets in Beirut and Tripoli expressing their readiness to put volunteers at the disposal of the UAR, and organized a large demonstration in Tripoli. (Hayat, Sept 29, 30, Oct 3, 4)

PARLIAMENTARY BLOCS

[In addition to the political parties, there was continued activity by regional pressure groups and by loose groupings of deputies who confined themselves to the parliamentary sphere. They lacked any defined political platform and their activities were limited mainly to the protection of local interests and the furtherance of personal political interests. Their influence in the Chamber was often decisive, however, because of the relatively large number of votes they could marshal.] In Oct the blocs were reported to have the following membership: Zahle-Biqā—six members; Ba'albek-Hermil-Basherri—seven; Independent Bloc—nine; Southern Bloc—six; Akkar—six; Beirut Front—three; Tripoli—four. (Jaridah, Oct 15)

[Following are particulars of some of these blocs which were active during the year:]

[The Tripoli Bloc conducted a consistent opposition policy until its head, Rashid Karāmi, became PM in Oct.]

[The Southern Bloc (kūlat al-janūb) was made up primarily of Shi'i deputies. It was headed by Kāmil al-As'ad, who in April was elected to the Chamber after the death in March of his father, Ahmad al-As'ad, the veteran traditional leader. It was frequently torn by internal dissensions generally arising out of family quarrels. As'ad became Minister for Education and Fine Arts in Karāmi's Cabinet.]

[The Ba'albek-Hermil-Basherri Bloc, also known as the Parliamentary Union Bloc (kūlat al-ittihād an-niyabi), was formed on July 19 by seven deputies (Hayat, July 20), and headed by the Shi'i deputy Fadlallah Dandash. The three districts represented were all backward, and their deputies often voiced their grievances in the Chamber, demanding aid and development.]

[The Beirut Front (al-jabha al-beirutiyah) was established at the end of Aug, in the wake of clashes between Najjādah demonstrators and the police in Beirut, by Adnān al-Hakim and Uthmān Dana (Sunis) and Muhsin Slim (Shi'i). It represented the Beirut Muslim opposition to the Beirut Muslim leaders then in power, PM Slim and Mashnūq, the Minister of the Interior. (For details see p 393 a.)]

[The Independent Bloc (al-kutlah al-mustaqillah), formed in 1960 by representatives from four different communities and regions (MER 1960, p 348), was mostly neutral as between government and opposition, some of its members tending one way and some the other. Fu'ad Butrus, the Bloc's secretary, became Minister of Justice in Karāmi's government.]

[The Front For National Struggle (jabhat an-nidal al-watani) was established by Kamāl Junblāt's PSP and apparently included only one member in addition to the PSP's deputies. (See also above: The Progressive Socialist Party.)]

THE BUDGET DEBATE

Government Self-Criticism: Outdated Taxation System. The 1961 Budget Bill was presented on Jan 3 by Maurice Jumayil, the Minister of Development, who said that owing to shortage of time the government had prepared a "routine" budget, which did not meet Lebanon's real economic and political needs. He promised, however, that the 1962 budget would be based on "dynamic factors." Jumayil criticized the taxation system, which, he said, had remained unchanged since Ottoman days. He claimed, however, that the government had paid special attention to the development of water resources, transportation and the raising of the workers' living standards. Jumayil warned employers that if they would not agree to the government's demand for a wage increase, there was an imminent danger of a general strike (Hayat, Jan 4). (See also: Workers and Labour, below.)

Internal Affairs Raised. During the month the Chamber approved all the items in the budget, which came to £1,273.8 million, compared with £1,222 million in 1960. Increased allocations went to the Ministries of Defence, Education, Foreign Affairs, and Public Works. (Hayat, Jan 31)

During the debate many deputies severely criticized the government's policy and the state of the country. The main critics were deputies from peripheral areas, especially the southern region, Ba'albek and Batrun, who complained of poverty, ignorance and disease, the absence of industrial and other development projects, and the lack of water and electricity. (See MER 1960, p 361.)

There was much criticism of economic policy, in particular: the slow pace of development; the failure to attract foreign investment; taxation policy which discouraged investment; the neglect of industry, particularly cement, caused by credit shortage and the pressure of monopolistic groups; and unsound government deals with companies.

Several deputies criticized internal security deficiencies, recalling cases where the army had had to be called in to establish order. Other topics raised were the failure to fight illiteracy and the shortage of agricultural schools and hospitals. [For details of the debate see Hayat, Jan 4, 11, 18, 20, 21, 24, 25, 27, 28 31.]

Struggle Over "Emergency Powers" Clause. A major issue was Article 7 of the Budget Bill, also referred to as the "Emergency Powers" clause, which empowered the government to spend £L13 million as it saw fit on the appointment and replacement of civil servants, salary modifications and pension schemes. [For text see Hayat, Jan 22; Jaridah, Jan 29.] Slim said that its purpose was to effect administrative reforms and raise the standard of living in the civil service (Jaridah, Jan 5). Among those who opposed the measure were Raymond Eddeh [leader of the National Bloc], Albert Mukhaybar [National Liberals], Adnan al-Hakim [leader of the Najjidadh], Rashid Karimi, and Muhsin Slim. They argued that these powers would be used by the government to dispose of civil servants at will and would enable it "to distribute the spoils" that the article violated the law on civil service grading, and that it had no connection with the budget.

The government spokesmen denied these arguments, and said the article was essential for the implementation of civil service reforms, which all agreed were vital. President Shehab announced his support of the article for this reason.

Slim announced that after consultations with the President the government was ready to submit to a vote of confidence. According to "authoritative Government sources" quoted in the press, the government was ready to dissolve parliament unless Article 7 was passed.

On Jan 30, Article 7 was approved by the Chamber as part of the Budget Bill. Opposition leaders continued their attacks on the government after the voting. (Jaridah, Jan 7, 8, 17, 18, 21, 22, 29, 31, Feb 1)

DEMONSTRATIONS AGAINST DEATH SENTENCE (January)

On Jan 3, a military Court of Cassation upheld the death sentence on a Shi'i called Hasan ash-Shimayyini, a former policeman, on a charge of murder in pursuit of a blood-feud at the beginning of 1960. (Hayat, Jan 4)

The next day there were demonstrations and disturbances in the western [Muslim] section of Beirut (Al-Basta), which later spread to other parts of the country. The demonstrators demanded pardon for the murderer and the abolition of the death penalty. In one Beirut quarter, demonstrators started looting and were dispersed by police fire over their heads. Other demonstrators proceeded to the Chamber, where Shi'i deputies tried to calm them down and promised to support their demands. Bombs were exploded in several parts of Beirut, streets were barricaded, and several policemen and demonstrators were injured. Violence ceased, however, when the army took up positions in the city.

Commercial activities were suspended in a large part of the city and there were strikes in several industrial plants on that and the following day, which spread also to other regions, including Sidon, Tyre, Ba'albek, Nahatiye and Hermil [all of which had large Shi'i communities]. (Hayat, Jaridah, Jan 5, 6)

Shaykh Muhammad Alaya, the Mufti of Lebanon, approached Bulus Ma'ushi, the Maronite Patriarch, for joint action to obtain a pardon for the condemned man and keep the issue clear of communal affairs. The two decided to approach President Shehab with this end in view. (Hayat, Jan 5)

Seventeen deputies petitioned the President to commute the sentence to life imprisonment. (Hayat, Jan 6)

While ministers such as Nasim Majdalani and Pierre Jumayil, as well as Raymond Eddeh, the leader of the National Bloc, ascribed the demonstrations to ignorance and backwardness, opposition leaders like Rashid Karimi and Abdallah al-Yafi regarded them as an expression of the public's lack of confidence in the government. (Jaridah, Jan 5)

It was reported that tribesmen in the Hermil area had been firing for two days on a gendarmerie camp until the condemned man's family asked them to desist. The shaykhs of the Hermil and Ba'albek tribes wired President Shehab threatening violence unless the verdict was quashed. (Hayat, Jan 8)

[The condemned man was not executed during the year.]

Resignation of Security Chief. It was reported that following the disturbances, Slim had demanded the resignation of the Director of Security Forces, Nur ad-Din ar-Rifa'i, whom he regarded as responsible for the situation, but the demand was opposed by several ministers.

On Jan 10 Slim met Rifa'i and Yusuf Shmayyit, Chief of the General Staff. It was reported that Rifa'i promised his cooperation in trying to avoid the recurrence of such incidents. (Jaridah, Jan 8, 10, 11)

[By the end of the year Rifa'i had not resigned.]

JUMAYIL-JUNBLAT DISPUTE ON EDUCATION POLICY (January)

[Education policy was a political issue in Lebanon. Independent Christian foreign and Lebanese private institutions provided more educational facilities than state schools. The Muslim sector in general was interested in the speedy development of state education, and Kamal Junblat made this his policy as Minister of Education. Free primary schooling was introduced in 1960 but was not universally applied. (See also the question of the UAR-sponsored university in Beirut, under: The Lawyers' Strike, below.)]

Junblat's Plan for Free Primary State Education. On Jan 5 Junblat told a press conference that the principal aim of his ministry's newly formulated five-year plan for educational advancement was the "universalization" (ta'mim) of primary education within a free state education system.

Of 241,800 children of primary school age (6-10 years old), Junblat said, only 134,000, or 55% were enrolled in state and private primary schools, while 108,800 (45%) did not receive any formal education. There were some 95,000 pupils in primary schools over the age of ten, bringing total attendance to 229,000, of whom only 105,922 attended the 1,920 state schools.

Junblät pointed out that the state of primary education was steadily deteriorating because of the progressive increase in the number of each new age-group. The five-year plan envisaged free primary state education for 144,000 additional children, which would require 4,813 more teachers at the rate of one per 30 pupils. In the meantime, Junblät said, the shortage of teachers was a grave handicap to the development of education. (Ha-yai, Jan 6)

Jumayil Opposes Junblät's Policy in Cabinet. On Jan 18 Junblät and Pierre Jumayil, Minister of Finance and formerly of Education, renewed their dispute over education at a Cabinet meeting. (They had clashed over the same issue in Oct 1960: MER 1960, pp 359-360.)

Junblät asked for an allocation of £L150,000 for the appointment of 300 new teachers in state primary schools, as his ministry was planning a considerable extension of the state school system. Jumayil opposed this demand, although he agreed that additional teachers were needed, on the ground that Junblät had not presented a comprehensive plan but intended to force upon the government an "isolationist" (isfrādi) policy. He declared that the government alone had the authority to determine education policy. The other ministers supported Jumayil, and a Cabinet committee, composed of Junblät, Jumayil and Abdallah Mashnūg, was appointed to draft a plan for Cabinet approval. (Jaridah, Jan 19)

In the meantime, a new conflict broke out when Junblät announced a plan for the dismissal, transfer and appointment of teachers, mainly in the Kura district [predominantly Christian]. He announced that teachers who had used their position for harmful political propaganda would be dismissed. There was an uproar among Kura teachers, the district's parliamentary deputies, and others; as a result, the plan was shelved after intervention from "supreme quarters." (Jaridah, Jan 20, 21)

Dispute over Private Versus State Schools. On Jan 19 the question of state versus private schools was discussed in the Chamber. In the Education Committee Junblät was supported by the Muslim members and opposed by the Christian chairman. In the plenary, during the budget debate (see above), Rashid Karāmi supported the expansion of state education. At the same time he said that private schools were desirable and beneficial, and that the Ministry of Education was entitled to supervise their curricula and teaching. (Jaridah, Jan 20)

[The points at issue between Junblät and Jumayil, as expressed in the Chamber and the press, are summarized below.]

State Schools Versus Carte Scolaire System for "Universalization" of Primary Education; Junblät Attacks Private Foreign Schools. While Jumayil said he was not opposed to the expansion and improvement of the state school system, Junblät usually maintained that he was not opposed to the continued existence of private schools, and did not intend to nationalize them.

Junblät argued (as detailed below) that private schools were harmful to the general interest and must be subjected to close government supervision. They must not constitute "a state within a state"; in their education policy they should follow the 1943 National Charter and teach their pupils civic responsibility and Lebanese patriotism.

He said he was determined that education should become universal through the state schools. Otherwise, he was reported to have stated (in the parliamentary education committee on Jan 19), "a new and ideological revolution (thawrah jadidah wa-mazhabiyah) among the communities will be forced upon us." Junblät was especially vehement in his attack on private foreign schools. By allocating £L25 for each pupil at foreign schools, he said, the government was helping to perpetuate the poisoning of the spirit of the young generation. (Later on March 1, during the crisis caused by President Abdel Nasser's attack on Pierre Jumayil and his party [see below], Junblät demanded in a speech in Damascus that his government close down all foreign schools; Jaridah, March 3)

In Jumayil's view, Junblät's policy amounted to the nationalization of primary education, to which he strenuously objected. Private education must remain free, he maintained; this was a right specifically safeguarded in the Constitution. [Chapter II, Article 10 of the Constitution provided: "There shall be no interference with public instruction as long as it is not contrary to public order and morals and does not affect the dignity of the various creeds. The communities shall be entitled to maintain their own schools, provided that they conform to the general requirements relating to public instruction laid down by the State."]

Jumayil recalled that as Minister of Education in the Karāmi Cabinet, he had proposed a system of students cards, in order to "universalize" free primary education. [The carte scolaire system (al-biḍāqah al-madrasīyah), proposed in 1959, was aimed at extending primary education by granting each child the opportunity to obtain free education in any school, governmental or private, according to choice.] Faced with the opposition of the Muslim community, which believed that the plan was to their disadvantage, he had not persisted, he said, but tried to convince them that this system benefited them as well as the Christians. Junblät had opposed this plan, saying it was intended to perpetuate communal divisions.

Jumayil said he was prepared to support Junblät's policy of increasing the number of state primary schools, provided he left the private schools alone. (For sources see below.)

Question of National Orientation. Junblät emphasized the importance of state schools as a consolidating factor in a country with such deep community divisions as Lebanon. He thought national unity could be achieved only through a uniform and modernized study of history and geography, and said that his ministry was preparing plans with this end in view. The private schools were lacking in national orientation, he said; they perpetuated existing divisions, he maintained, and this was what his ministry intended to rectify.

Jumayil, on the other hand, argued that the question of educational orientation must not be divorced from the "Lebanese problem" or ideological dilemma, namely that of a Lebanese Lebanon versus an Arab Lebanon. As neither of these attitudes should and could be forcibly imposed, the solution must be left to peaceful discussion, and if that failed it must be hoped that an equilibrium could be ultimately attained by evolution. (For sources see below.)

Place of Religion. Jumayil claimed that, under the pretext of secularizing the state, "God was forgotten" in the state schools. This must not be allowed in view of the results of immoral secular education in certain European countries.

Junblät replied that the state school curriculum did not separate the study of science and culture from that of religion and morality, but they believed in the separation of religion from the state. He said he even proposed that religious instruction in state schools should be obligatory, but not subject to examination. (For sources see below.)

Question of Quality and Expense. Jumayil claimed that the standards of private schools far exceeded those of state schools, while their maintenance cost the government much less—only £L25 a year per head, compared with £L165 at a government school. Jumayil said that the greater part of the Lebanese cultural heritage was to be found within free private education, which had produced the country's foremost citizens of all communities and fostered the love of independence and freedom. Junblät countered that not only was the level of state schools not lower than that of the private schools but it was the latter that were unfit to provide sound learning. Of these schools, 85-90 per cent were incapable of preparing their pupils for the certificate, he declared. He maintained that those who were trying to perpetuate private education and communal divisions had prevented the publication of school examination results, which proved these claims. THE BEIRUT LAWYERS' STRIKE

[The Beirut Lawyers' strike, which lasted for nine months (until the beginning of 1962), was one of the issues in inter-community tension and posed difficulties for the government.]

Beirut Lawyers Demand Closing of Law Faculty at Arab (UAR) University. On Jan 6 the Council of the Beirut Lawyers' Union [majlis niqabat al-muhamin] (which numbered some 650 members) adopted the following resolutions:

(a) Protesting against the government's endorsement of the opening of a law faculty at the new Arab University in Beirut [established in 1960 as a branch of the University of Alexandria] and demanding the implementation of a 1959 act authorizing the teaching of law only at the Lebanese University. [The oldest Lebanese law faculty was that of the (Jesuit) University of Saint Joseph. Law was not taught at the American University.]

(b) Dissociating itself from the Arab Lawyers' Federation [ittihad al-muhamin al-arab] (a pro-UAR organization with headquarters in Cairo). The Union cited various formal points to explain its attitude and alleged that the constitution of the Federation had political connotations. The Union decided, however, to take part in the Federation's forthcoming conference in Cairo, for the discussion of purely professional questions. (Jaridah, Jan 7, 8)

Later the Union explained that the profession was overcrowded and had to be safeguarded against an unwarranted increase in membership. In 1959, it stated, the government had forbidden the establishment of new law faculties. (Jaridah, Jan 8, 9, 12, March 26)

lawyers' demands. He said that the establishment of the new faculty was illegal and it should be closed. There was no need for it, he declared, as owing to the French staff the standard of law instruction in Lebanon was high: in fact, Lebanon's cultural and scientific standards were much higher than Egypt's. He added that if Egypt sincerely wanted to help Lebanon's scientific development, she could do so better by opening faculties of chemistry and engineering there. (Jaridah, Jan 15)

Kamal Junblät, the Minister of Education, announced on March 28, in answer to a memorandum from the Lawyers' Union, that the faculty would not be closed.

PM Slâm said he hoped the Union would refrain from steps liable to cause unnecessary conflicts. (Jaridah, March 29)

It was reported that many Muslim delegations had called on Junblät to express their satisfaction at his stand on this issue. (Jaridah, April 1)

The Lawyers Strike. On April 15, at a general meeting of the Beirut Lawyers' Union, a majority demanded the closing of the new faculty on the ground of the excessive number of lawyers. It was also argued that the faculty was supported and financed by the UAR. Pro-UAR lawyers argued, on the other hand, that the Jesuit University was supported by the French government. By a majority vote the meeting ratified the Council's demand of Jan 6 and resolved to strike until the government accepted it. A proposal to demand the closing of the Jesuit University was defeated. A number of pro-UAR lawyers left the meeting in protest, declaring that they would not strike. According to the chairman, there were some 500 lawyers present, but the opposition said there were only 200, of whom 50 left in protest. (Jaridah, Siyasah, April 16)

Cabinet Divided. In the Cabinet, Pierre Jumayil reiterated his support for the Union, saying that this was "a purely professional issue in which no political or communal aspects should be involved." Other ministers, Majdalani, Mashnûq and Faranjyiah, condemned the strike and opposed the closing of the faculty. (Jaridah, April 18, 21)

The Lawyers' Union of Tripoli [predominantly Muslim] condemned the strike.

The editor of Al-Jaridah, Rushdi Ma'alûf, who supported the strike, said it had nothing to do with communal affairs and pointed out that there were many Muslims among the strikers. (Jaridah, April 16, 17). On the other hand the editor of Al-Siyasah, Abdallah al-Yâsi, who opposed it, said that the real causes were political. (Siyasah, April 18)

The issue was raised at a Cabinet meeting on April 19, at which President Shehab called for tolerance. In view of the division in the Cabinet, it was decided to leave the matter in the hands of Shehab and PM Slâm. [Junblät and Slâm were absent.] (Jaridah, April 20)

PM Slâm, who declared that the faculty would not be closed, had two abortive meetings with Jumayil in an effort to settle the issue. (Jaridah, April 21, 23)

Pierre and Maurice Jumayil went so far as to threaten to resign from the Cabinet if no solution was found soon. President Shehab's efforts to persuade the Chairman of the Union, Philippe Sa'adah, to call off the strike also failed. (Jaridah, April 25)

Parliamentary Repercussions. [The strike issue was utilized by the opposition in the Chamber to harass the government during most of the year.]

In May the issue was raised in the Chamber during the debate preceding a vote of confidence (see below). Adnan al-Hakim, the leader of the Najjādah, warned that the closure of the faculty would immediately lead to civil strife (fitnah) while Edouard Hunayin (National Bloc) supported the strike on the grounds of the 1959 act; both attacked the government's handling of the matter. Junblat declared that the faculty would not be closed, and PM Slām said that the issue was a delicate one. (Jaridah, May 5, 6)

Government Approves Faculty; Union Rejects Decision. At a Cabinet meeting on May 10, a committee consisting of Pierre Jumayil, Mashnūq and Majdalāni was set up, at Jumayil's suggestion, to tackle the crisis. [After the Cabinet reshuffle at the end of May Majdalāni was replaced by Muhammad Safi ad-Din.] (Jaridah, May 11)

On July 19, after studying the committee's conclusions, the Cabinet adopted a series of decisions on strict government supervision of higher education, providing that, inter alia: (1) The establishment of institutions of higher education would be permitted only with the approval of a special authority and in conformity with detailed preliminary conditions; (2) A supreme council for higher education, headed by the President of the State, would be established; (3) All state legal employees would be required to possess law certificates of the Lebanese University; (4) The government recognized the legality of the new faculty and approved its establishment (Jaridah, July 20). [Resolution (3) was obviously intended to balance, at least to some extent, resolution (4).]

Jumayil commented that "there had been no possibility of reaching a better solution." Mashnūq agreed. On the other hand, [Christian] opposition leaders, such as Raymond Eddeh, were critical, and Mukhayyar said that the issue would remain open until the faculty was closed.

The Council of the Lawyers' Union immediately rejected the decisions. (Jaridah, July 20, 21)

Strike Continues; the Higher Education Act. A general meeting of the Beirut Lawyers' Union resolved on Aug 10, by 110 votes to 29 and 3 abstentions, to continue the strike. [There were 650 members, as already mentioned.]

It was reported that a proposal by a Phalangist lawyer, [in conformity with the views of Jumayil, the Phalangist leader] to call off the strike temporarily to give the government a few months to reach a better solution, was indignantly rejected. (Jaridah, Aug 21)

On Oct 18 the government approved the Higher Education Bill, which was designed to solve the crisis. It stipulated that no law school was to be established in the next 12 years, and that the study of law would be restricted to graduates of Lebanese secondary schools. (Jaridah, Oct 19, 21)

A month later, after the change in the government, PM Karāni affirmed his support for the bill. (Jaridah, Nov 18)

The Lawyers' Union announced, however, that it did not regard the bill as a solution and would not end the strike. (Jaridah, Dec 8, 9)

The Chamber approved the bill on Dec 22, by a majority of 50 to 7. (Jaridah, Dec 23)

End of Strike After NSP Coup. The strike was officially called off only on Jan 18, 1962, after the abortive NSP coup d'état, without the lawyers having attained their aims. The Union announced that it had decided to terminate the strike in order to contribute to the relaxation of tension after the attempted coup. (Jaridah, Jan 19, 1962)

During the trial of the insurgents in June 1962, some of the accused mentioned the lawyers' strike as one of the causes of their action. (Jaridah, June 17, 1962)

ABDEL NASSER ATTACKS LEBANESE PARTIES

(February-March)

Abdel Nasser Attacks NSP and Phalanges. In a series of speeches in the Syrian Region on Feb 20, 23 and 24, President Abdel Nasser attacked the Lebanese Nationalist Social party and the Phalanges, as opponents of the UAR and enemies of Arab nationalism. [In a similar attack in 1960 the UAR President had denounced only the NSP (MER 1960, p 346).] Abdel Nasser started by denouncing certain Beirut Arab papers for distorted reporting on Syrian affairs, with the aim of destroying the union, in the service of American, British and French imperialism. In his first speech, on Feb 20, he said that these were probably NSP papers (Ahram, Feb 21). (A number of Lebanese papers published extensive reports on the mounting internal difficulties in the Syrian Region, q.v.)

On Feb 23 and 24, however, he attacked both parties. He said the NSP were simply a gang that carried out killings [of Arab nationalists] for imperialism, and accused them of collaborating for this purpose with Nūri Sa'īd, late PM of Iraq, and accepting funds from the US. The Phalanges, Abdel Nasser said, cherished "black bitter hatred" against Arab nationalism and the UAR; "they have interfered in our affairs and opposed our unity since its first day," he said. In 1956 he claimed, their paper, Al-Amal, had desired the destruction of Egypt and called for the death of Arab nationalism and victory for "the beloved motherland, France." "We are friends to friends and foes to foes; we shall not in the future overlook matters," he said. "Die in your rage!" he exclaimed, addressing "these fronts." The UAR would always remain the bastion of Arab nationalism. The Phalanges, Abdel Nasser added, participated in the Lebanese Cabinet, and "we cannot forget this." (R. Damascus, Feb 23 [25]; Ahram, Feb 24)

Lebanese Comment. This attack on the Phalanges came as a surprise to Lebanese political observers, since the party had adopted a moderate attitude towards the UAR, for which it had been criticized by extreme anti-UAR opinion.

Lebanese [anti-UAR] papers suggested that the aim of the attack was to cover up internal difficulties in the Syrian sector, that Abdel Nasser had taken offence at the Phalanges' indifference towards the celebration of the UAR's third anniversary in Lebanon, and that it was intended to "bring Abdel Nasser back into the headlines," since Arab attention now centred on the efforts of President Bourguiba of Tunisia to mediate between the Algerian Provisional Government and France. (Nahar, Feb 24, 26; Jaridah, March 3, 4)

Lebanese Parties Clash. The speech had an unsettling effect in Lebanon and led to a flare-up of inter-party friction.

The NSP and the Phalanges immediately launched counter-charges. Pierre Jumayil, the leader of the latter, stated that his party had striven for good relations with the UAR, but she was interested in satellites, not in allies. He attacked Abdel Nasser for subversion in the Arab states and aiming to dominate them; Lebanon would never consent to become a satellite of the UAR, he declared.

The reaction of the NSP was much more vehement. Its leader, Abdallah Sa'adah, violently attacked the UAR regime as a dictatorship. He emphasized that the UAR President's attack was an open intervention in Lebanese internal affairs and an encouragement to sedition. He demanded that the government protest officially to the UAR and that the matter be taken up by the Arab League.

The National Bloc demanded immediate government action to put a stop to the UAR propaganda broadcasts. It stigmatized Abdel Nasser's attacks on the Phalanges members of the Cabinet as overt pressure on the government and intervention in Lebanon's parliamentary processes. The party's deputies in the Chamber asked the government what steps it contemplated taking. (Orient, Hayat, Jaridah, Feb 25)

The UAR's supporters, on the other hand, followed up Abdel Nasser's attack and demanded the cessation of anti-UAR propaganda.

Kamal Junblat demanded on Feb 26 restrictions on the activities of the NSP, the Phalanges, and Camille Sham'un's National Liberals (who had not been attacked), on the ground that they were working for foreign interests. Junblat denied that the speech had injured relations between the two countries and said that Abdel Nasser was referring only to the elements actually mentioned in his speech.

Three other ministers, Abdallah Maashuq, Nassim Majdalaani and Uthman ad-Dana, supported Junblat. (R. Cairo, Feb 26 [28]; Jaridah, Feb 26, 27; Siyash, Feb 27)

UAR supporters also included the Najjadah and Popular Resistance parties, who issued statements condemning the parties in question, particularly the Phalanges. (Hayat, Jaridah, Feb 25, 26; Siyash, Feb 26)

Riots broke out at the American University in Beirut between supporters and antagonists of the UAR. (Hayat, Jaridah, Feb 24, 25)

In Beirut, Tripoli and Sidon unsigned pamphlets were distributed, violently attacking the UAR and Abdel Nasser. The security authorities immediately stopped distribution of these pamphlets and some of the distributors were arrested. (Jaridah, Feb 25)

UAR Attacks Continue. On Feb 24 Abdel Nasser reiterated his attack on the two parties, especially the Phalanges, in a speech in Damascus in answer to Pierre Jumayil. (Ahram, Feb 25)

During the next few days the UAR radio stations continuously attacked the two Lebanese parties. The leader of the Phalanges was accused of collaborating with Israel and the party was attacked for its attitude to the Arab boycott against Israel. [In 1960 its newspaper, Al-Amal, had attacked the UAR's conduct of the Arab boycott, which, it thought, was injuring Lebanese economic interests. (See MER 1960, p 188).]

The NSP was accused of having aided the Israel Defence Forces in taking Galilee in 1948, in exchange for an Israeli undertaking to help it seize power in Lebanon. (R. Cairo, V of A, R. Damascus, Feb 24-March 3 [Feb 25-March 4]. Akhbar Sa'ah, Cairo, March 1)

In reaction, Jumayil threatened to resign from the Cabinet if the government did not take immediate action to put an end to this propaganda, which, he claimed, injured the country's prestige. On March 1 he met President Shalhah and PM Slâm, who prevailed upon him neither to resign nor to react to the UAR's attacks. (Jaridah, March 1, 3; Amal, March 2, 4)

Slâm Praises Abdel Nasser and Criticizes Anti-UAR Press. At first it was reported that PM Slâm was trying to smooth matters over by avoiding a definite stand. Cairo Radio therefore accused him of conciliating the Phalanges, while Phalanges circles criticized him for surrendering to UAR policy. (R. Cairo, Feb 26 [28]; Jaridah, Amal, Nahar, Feb 26, 28)

However, in a press conference on Feb 28 Slâm adopted an attitude that Ahmad Sa'id, chief commentator of the Voice of the Arabs, Cairo, immediately termed "encouraging, extremely encouraging." (V of A, Feb 28 [March 2])

Slâm opened by stating that "Lebanon was established on love, and love will continue to be her way of life in her relationship with her Arab sisters, particularly with the UAR, her elder sister and closest neighbour." He declared that President Abdel Nasser "held only love for Lebanon" and was anxious to "preserve national unity." The UAR was a "protecting shield for a free and independent Arab Lebanon." Lebanon must also be "anxious to preserve the national unity of our great sister, the UAR." The present crisis had come about, he said, when the Lebanese press had abused its freedom and made some "dangerous slips," and some journalists had injured fraternal unity. He had been lenient until the [anti-UAR] conspiracies of Shishakli and Muhammad al-Fadi were discovered (see MER, 1960, pp 504-6); "then we struck with an iron fist," he declared. Slâm added that he preferred the conflicting trends and currents to be represented in the government at his expense, rather than abroad at Lebanon's expense. (R. Beirut, Feb 28 [March 2]; Hayat, March 1)

Slâm's attack on the press was received with indignation by anti-UAR and independent papers. An-Nahar (Christian, anti-UAR) published a cartoon representing Slâm as the servant of the UAR; the paper was closed down for 20 days and its editor fined. (Jaridah, March 4, 6; Nahar, March 5)

It was reported that the government was trying through diplomatic channels to put an end to the UAR radio attacks, and that Abd al-Hamid Ghâlib, the UAR Ambassador in Lebanon, undertook that they would stop (Jaridah, March 2), but they continued up to March 4. (BBCM)

Junblat Criticizes Lebanese Regime and NSP. On March 1, while in Damascus, Kamal Junblat congratulated Abdel Nasser on the anniversary of the UAR and issued a list of demands on his government. These included the immediate prohibition of the NSP, which he described as an espionage agency, the closing down of the British Middle East Centre for Arab Studies (see p 409 a) and of all foreign schools, and the reorganization of political life to prevent the formation of political parties on a community basis.

Junblat's speech caused a renewed outbreak of political feeling in Lebanon. The NSP violently attacked him and his party, while Jumayil described him as a man in need of medical care. (Hayat, Jaridah, Amal, March 2, 4)

Controversy Over Parliamentary Delegation to Damascus. At the same time a controversy arose over a Lebanese parliamentary delegation to congratulate Abdel Nasser on the UAR anniversary. A number of deputies nominated, including Fu'ad Butrus, head of the independent group, refused on the ground that the UAR President's attack on the parties was actually an attack on Lebanon as a whole. Finally, a delegation headed by Sabri Hamâdah, President of the Chamber, went to Damascus. Abdel Nasser told them (on Feb 28) that he advocated the union of all the Arabs, provided that this should be accomplished by mutual desire and general agreement. (Hayat, Feb 28, March 1)

Slām Meets Abdel Nasser. PM Slām met President Abdel Nasser in Damascus on March 4. Before leaving Beirut he said his purpose was to clear up any difficulties in the relations between the two countries; President Shehab and Pierre Jumayl wished him success in his mission.

On his return, Slām stated that his meeting with Abdel Nasser had convinced him that the latter was sincerely friendly to Lebanon and her President, and that there was absolutely no danger that the UAR would intervene in Lebanese internal affairs. (Hayat, Jaridah, March 5, 6; ANA, March 5 [7])

DISTURBANCES AND VIOLENCE

(March)

Anti-UAR Demonstration. On March 5 a convoy of trucks was attacked near Kahale village (about 10 kms. east of Beirut), while carrying Lebanese to Damascus to celebrate the UAR anniversary.

Inhabitants of the village opened fire on a truck bearing a picture of Abdel Nasser, injuring ten people, while trucks bearing pictures of President Shehab passed unmolested. Thirty people were arrested. (R. Beirut, ANA March 5 [7]; Hayat, March 6, 7; Jaridah, March 7)

(Similar incidents occurred in Lebanon in Feb 1960 on the occasion of the UAR's second anniversary; see MER 1960 pp 155-6. Another such incident occurred in the same village in Aug; see below.)

At the Cabinet meeting of March 7, Kamāl Junhlāt condemned those involved, who, he claimed, had been incited by "an important political personage," and accused the security forces of collusion with the villagers. Jumayl retorted that, although the incident should of course be condemned, recent provocations by the UAR had to be taken into account. The Cabinet resolved to refer the matter to the Judicial Council for early consideration and, "in principle," to compensate those injured, "materially and morally." (Hayat, March 8)

[The pro-UAR press reacted sharply to the incident.] Sa'at al-Urubbah, the Najjādah organ, which wrote of "the dogs of Kahale," was closed for ten days and its owner fined for "damaging national unity." (Jaridah, March 13; Times, March 15)

The detainees were gradually released, until on May 16 the last six were let out on bail. (By the end of the year none had as yet stood trial.) (Hayat, Jaridah, May 17)

Attempt on Life of PM Slām. On March 7 an attempt was made on the life of PM Sā'ih Slām, when 12 kg of explosives were placed at a petrol station, 25-30m. from his Beirut home. The charge was discovered by a passer-by who, it was reported, removed the fuse "15 seconds before explosion." Severe security measures were adopted throughout Beirut and there were many arrests. The authorities decided to cancel all civilian permits for possession of firearms. [It would seem that this decision was not implemented, because later on the problem recurred in connection with similar incidents.] (R. Beirut, March 7 [9]; Hayat, Jaridah, March 8, 9)

All parties immediately condemned the attempt and congratulated the PM on his escape. The press placed special emphasis on the condemnation issued by Abdallah Sa'adah, leader of the NSP, who said that the outrage was intended to stir up communal friction. (Hayat, March 8, 10)

British and NSP Blamed: Muslim Sources Charge of Fake. UAR sources and pro-UAR Lebanese newspapers claimed that British circles, in collaboration with the NSP, were responsible for the attempted assassination. (R. Damascus, March 10-11B, March 10; Kifāh, March 10; Mutaawwar, Cairo, March 17)

In view of the many rumours, the press was forbidden to publish any unauthorized news about the investigation. (Hayat, March 17)

A week later Slām announced that the investigations had shown that no foreign element had been involved (Jaridah, March 25). Foreign pressure or intervention in the investigation was also officially denied.

Lebanese Muslim opposition sources claimed that the explosives had not been armed and alleged that the incident had been purposely staged to increase Slām's popularity and strengthen the position of his Cabinet in the light of recent difficulties. (Hawadith, March 17; Siyārah, Anwar, April 1)

Assassins not Connected with any Political Group. A group led by 78-year old Darwish Baydūn, a former supporter of Sāmi as-Sulh (PM under then President Shām'ūn) and the old order, was charged with the attempt. The group consisted of members of his family and some "ruffians," including a former army sergeant who had deserted during the 1958 rising and joined the revolutionaries. [All those arrested were Muslims.] (Jaridah, March 11, 17, 24)

On March 30 eight of the group were charged with complicity in the attempted assassination. It was stated that Baydūn had personal motives, stemming from a financial disagreement. The former sergeant, Mahmūd Ayāsh, was accused of having intended to foment clashes between Christians and Muslims. The prosecution said that the assassination had been planned to appear as if carried out by Christians and the NSP. (Hayat, Jaridah, March 31)

The trial began on June 28, after several postponements caused by the lawyers' strike (see above). Ayāsh alone admitted his guilt. Five of the accused, including Ayāsh and Baydūn, received 7-year sentences; three were acquitted (Hayat, June 29, 30, July 1). Baydūn died in prison two weeks later. (Jaridah, July 15)

CABINET DIFFICULTIES AND A GENERAL DEBATE

(March-May)

During the second half of March the Cabinet was repeatedly shaken by dissension.

On March 16 Sulaymān al-ʿAlī, Minister of National Economic Affairs, tendered his resignation because the Cabinet decided, over his opposition, to import flour from the US instead of grinding the wheat in Lebanon. Slām persuaded al-ʿAlī to remain in the Cabinet, however.

At the same time the PM and Fuād Ghusn, the Minister of Information, disagreed on policy towards press law violations; Slām [who two weeks earlier had sharply criticized the anti-UAR press] advocated harsh measures. Finally, a Cabinet meeting attended by President Shehab adopted a compromise. (Hayat, March 16)

Disagreement Between Slām and Junhlāt. At the end of March there was a more serious rift between Slām and Junhlāt, the Minister of Education. It had started, it was reported, with the trips to Damascus of Junblât and Nassim Majdalâni, the Minister of Justice, and a member of his party. Junblât also made it known that unless intervention in the affairs of the Ministry was stopped, he would not hesitate to resign; especially as he had already carried out most of his plans for the development of state education [as against private schools]. (Hayat, March 28)

Opposition Moves to Overthrow the Government. During the second half of March, Raymond Eddeh, leader of the National Bloc, and Albert Mukhayyar of the National Liberals, started a campaign to overthrow the government. Apart from general criticism of Cabinet efficiency, Eddeh also demanded an official statement by PM Sîm in the Chamber on the government's attitude to possible union of Lebanon with another Arab state.

The PM and Cabinet members, including Jumayil and Junblât, said they had no intention to resign and there was no need to change the composition of the Cabinet, which had many achievements to its credit. The opposition had no plans, Jumayil charged, beyond overthrowing the government.

The opposition demanded a general debate at an early date. The government made it known that it was prepared for such a debate and a vote of confidence at any time. (Jaridah, March 19, 21, 23; Hayat, April 2)

Cabinet Debate on Civil Service Appointments on Communal Basis. It was reported that on April 5, in the presence of President Shehab, the Cabinet debated the question of appointments to the civil service on a communal basis. Shehab opened by saying that in all appointments the ministers must observe the communal equilibrium on a "6 to 6 basis." [The seats in the Chamber of Deputies, however, were apportioned on the basis of 6 Christians to 5 Muslims and Druzes.] It was understood that the President referred to certain appointments in the Ministry of Public Works [headed by Uthmân Dana, a Sunni Muslim].

PM Sîm said that he supported the equilibrium, but the Muslims were discriminated against. Majid Arslân and Kamâl Junblât [the rival Druze leaders] said that this was especially true in regard to the Druzes.

Jumayil also supported the principle of equilibrium, but declared that administrative efficiency should also be respected. In reply to a remark by Sîm on Christian predominance in the administration, Jumayil said that not only rights but duties should be taken into account; the Christians were the source of 83% of the country's revenue. PM Sîm took exception to this statement. (For source see below.)

"Too Much Talk on National Unity Impedes Cabinet's Work." Jumayil went on to declare: "We defend and reinforce the entity (kiyân) of Lebanon." PM Sîm interrupted: "We defend the entity [of Lebanon] with our blood," adding that the talk on the "entity" at every Cabinet session was unnecessary. When Jumayil retorted: "We sacrifice ourselves for the sake of the entity," Sulaymân Faranjijah [Maronite] interrupted him and asked: "Who said you are the defender of the entity and is the entity really in need of your defence?" Faranjijah also demanded an end to talk of the "entity" and said it was in no danger. Jumayil, in reply, claimed to represent the opinion of the largest community [the Maronites]. (Jaridah, April 7)

to PM Sîm] wrote to the President of the Chamber accusing PM Sîm of exploiting his status for financial gain. He charged that the government had paid an exorbitant price for lands belonging to the Sîm family appropriated for the development of Beirut airport, though there was no need to acquire these lands in particular. (Siyasah, April 6)

On April 11 Sîm claimed in the Chamber that the transaction had been necessary for the airport. Besides, the lands belonged not to him but to his family, which numbered 84. He added that far from making profits in his post, he had entered it wealthy and was now a poor man who depended on his wife to pay his debts.

The issue was shelved after a short discussion. (Jaridah, April 12)

General Debate on Internal Affairs: Vote of Confidence.

The general debate in the Chamber, for which the opposition had asked a month earlier, opened on April 27 and ended on May 5 with a vote of confidence in the government by 56 to 26. It was concerned mainly with internal affairs. [The issues raised were essentially the same as those in the last quarter of 1960—see MER 1960, p 361—and in the budget debate in Jan—see above.] Many representatives severely criticized "anarchy" and "stagnation" in the administration. They claimed that the government's poor handling of relations with state concessionaries, such as the Beirut Harbour Company, and La Régie des Tabacs, had caused losses to the state economy. Adil Usayrân, former President of the Chamber of Deputies (Shi'i), criticized the work of the French experts in the administration (IRFED, see p 408 b) and asked why no American, Russian or British experts had been invited; Raymond Eddeh took up their defence. There was also criticism of faulty execution of development projects, particularly the Litani scheme.

A central topic was the lawyers' strike (see above). The shaky internal security position came also in for special criticism and it was claimed that no progress had been made in collecting the arms in private hands (since the 1958 rising).

The hardships of the population in the undeveloped district of Ba'albeck and Hermil, "where humans drink water fit only for animal consumption and famine is rife," were also raised again. Other topics were: complaints about high prices, especially of basic articles such as sugar, rice and cement; the import of apples, which Lebanon produces [and exports]; and the alleged exploitation of the radio for government purposes.

Rashid Karâmi directed attention to rifts in the Cabinet, which interfered with its work, and urged a vote of non-confidence.

Only one deputy, Raymond Eddeh, raised a question about foreign affairs, when he asked about the deterioration of relations with the UAR.

The debate was stormy. PM Sîm retorted to vehement attacks by Muhsin Sîm [a Muslim deputy from Beirut, who later in the year became co-founder of an anti-Sîm Beirut Muslim group]: "Shut up; you asked me for £125,000 and I did not give it to you. You have soiled your position as deputy." Sîm retorted: "Lies, lies, you are the thieves."

Sîm, in a major speech, accused the opposition of deliberately resorting to distortion and defamation. He said that to deride the government was to deride the Chamber and parliamentary rule in general. "And if there is one person who has sacrificed his blood for this rule—it is I," he declared. Sîm claimed that internal security had recently been strengthened, and promised that workers' conditions would be improved as a result of projected laws on social insurance and wage increases (see p. 406). He also claimed that his government had fostered education, instituted public works, and set up the Permanent National Exhibition in Tripoli. On relations with the UAR he said: "I offer thanks to God that I was in power and could avoid a holocaust." Siām concluded: "I promise to myself, to God and to my people, that I will shed my last drop of blood for the cause of national unity."

In the reports on the voting in the papers of May 6 (see below) the names of deputies appear without party affiliations. According to known affiliations the following appears to have been the result: The government was supported by the Phalanges, the PSP, the Southern Group and the Constitutional Union. The National Bloc, the National Liberals, the Tripoli Group and the Najjādhāh voted non-confidence. The Independent Group was divided. (Hayat, April 28, May 3, 6; Amal, Siyasah, May 6)

CABINET RESHUFFLE AND NEW DIFFICULTIES

(May-July)

The defeat of the non-confidence motion was closely followed by the resignation of six ministers and, on May 15, of PM Siām himself. On May 17 Siām accepted an invitation to form a new government.

Resignations from Cabinet. Majid Arslān, Minister of Defence, announced his resignation on May 9. He said that he wanted to serve the people and had been unable to do so as a Cabinet minister; furthermore, his resignation would enable Siām to make certain changes in his government. (Hayat, May 10; Jaridah, Mid. Mir., May 11)

On May 10 five additional ministers tendered their resignations: Nassim Majdalāni, Deputy PM and Minister of Justice; Muhammad Safi ad-Din, Agriculture; Abdallah Mashnūq, Municipal Affairs; Rafiq Shahin, Planning; and Sulaymān al-Alī, Economy. (Hayat, May 11)

Shahin and Mashnūq said that their resignations were provoked by internal dissension, which had to be stopped at any cost. The resignations were received with no particular surprise. Raymond Eddeh described them as a political manoeuvre aimed at confusing the people and strengthening the position of the government. (Hayat, May 12)

Siām Resigns, Forms New Government. On May 15 Siām tendered the resignation of his government to the President, who asked him to continue in office until the formation of a new Cabinet.

On May 17 the President, following consultation with the parties and blocs, asked Siām to form a new government, which he did within three days. There were eight ministers:

Sa'ib Siām (PM, Defence); Philippe Bölus (Vice-PM, Justice, Economy and Tourism); Philippe Taqla (Foreign Affairs, remaining also Ambassador to Brazil); Kamāl Junblāt (Public Works and Communications); Muhammad Safi ad-Din (Education, Social Affairs and Labour); Pierre Jumayil (Finance, Health); Sulaymān Faranjīyah (Posts, Agriculture); Abdallah Mashnūq (Interior, Information). (Hayat, May 17, 18, 21; Mid. Mir., May 20, 27; Jaridah, May 21; see also table pp. 373-4)

Same Differences Inside Smaller Cabinet; Policy Unchanged. [The outstanding feature of the new Cabinet was the reduction in its size from 18 members to eight.

However, the same three parties were represented: the PSP (Junblāt), the Phalanges (Jumayil) and the Constitutional Union (Taqla). The only new member was Philippe Bölus. Four ministers retained the same portfolios: Mashnūq, Faranjīyah, Taqla and Jumayil. Beirut was represented by three ministers, Siām, Jumayil and Mashnūq, the north by two, Bölus and Faranjīyah, the south by Safi ad-Din, and Ash-Shuf by Junblāt; the Biqā' and certain mountain regions were unrepresented.]

Commenting on the chances for stability, observers pointed out that the new Cabinet was only a condensed version of its predecessor and, in particular, that the two major antagonists, the PSP and the Phalanges, were still represented. The drastic reduction in size would appreciably weaken the Cabinet's position in the Chamber. (Jaridah, Hayat, May 21)

On May 20 Siām stated: "It will be the duty of the new government to continue the policies of its predecessors, with no change whatsoever." (Jaridah, May 21; Mid. Mir., May 27)

At their first meeting, on May 22, the ministers solemnly undertook to strive through mutual understanding to serve the best interests of the state and, it was reported, the President and the PM appealed to Junblāt and Jumayil to surmount their differences. (Jaridah, May 23)

The weakness of the new government was apparent on its first appearance in parliament, on May 30, when it won a vote of confidence by only two votes; 46 to 44, with one abstention. (Hayat, Jaridah, May 31)

Reported Murder in Damascus of Lebanese Communist Leader Becomes National Issue. In mid-May the Lebanese Communists renewed their campaign for the release by the UAR authorities of Farajallah al-Hilu, the SG of the Lebanese Communist party (Nida', May 18, 21, 28). For two years Communist sources had been claiming that Hilu had been imprisoned and tortured in Damascus, which the UAR authorities denied. (World Marxist Review, July; MER 1960, pp. 81, 348) (On non-Lebanese aspects of this issue, see p. 654 b.)

On May 29, Hasan Qraytim and Nicolas Shāwī, the two Lebanese Communist leaders, declared that Hilu had been murdered by the UAR authorities (no date was given). Their statement included an extremely sharp attack on the "Nasserist dictatorship" and an appeal in the "Lebanese people and all the Arab peoples" to demand an inquiry into the circumstances of Hilu's death and the delivery of the body to the family. (Nida', May 30)

Cairo Radio again denied that Hilu had been abducted in Damascus. (R. Cairo, May 31 [June 2])

Demonstrations took place in front of the UAR embassy in Beirut. The demonstrators were described as Communists. The police confiscated leaflets attacking the UAR and made a number of arrests. (Nida', May 31; Jaridah, Amal, June 1)

Beirut Radio broadcast a warning against illegal demonstrations and the publication of statements by prohibited parties. The Communist paper An-Nida' was closed for 10 days for attacking the UAR. (ANA, June 3 [6, 7]; Hayat, June 6, 14)

It was reported that the Hilu family had received many cables of condolence, from Patriarch Ma'āshi, Maurice Jumayil of the Phalanges, Raymond Eddeh, the leader of the National Bloc, and all its deputies, Albert Mukhayyar of the National Liberals, Fu'ād Butrus, deputies of the Constitutional Union, and many others. Nassim Majdalāni [of Junblāt's pro-UAR PSP, who had been left out of the new Cabinet a month before and later broke with his party) came to express his condolences in person. An-Nida' claimed that 100 delegations, comprising 3,000 persons, had visited the family. (Nida', June 2, 17)

One argument often voiced by opposition deputies and the anti-UAR papers was that the Hilu affair was primarily a Lebanese national issue, as it was the state's duty to ensure the safety of its citizens; it was also a question of Lebanon's honour. (Nahar, June 1; Nida', June 2, 17)

The Chamber dealt with the question both in the Foreign Affairs Committee (on June 6) and in the plenary session (on June 15). In the committee Taqla stated that the government had twice inquired about Hilu of the UAR authorities, who had denied any knowledge of him (Jaridah, June 7). In the plenary the question was raised by Ya'qub as-Sarrāf [Greek-Orthodox, same as Hilu] and Sulaymān al-Alī [Independent, who had been left out of the new Cabinet], who accused the government of ignoring a national issue and described Taqla's statement as "criminal." In reply, PM Sīlām reiterated Taqla's statement and said that the government would drop the question; it would "not permit relations between the Lebanon and the UAR to be tainted because of an affair which I consider to be wholly imaginary." (Hayat, June 16)

In Oct, after the breakup of the UAR, Lebanese Communist circles requested the Syrian government to determine the cause of Hilu's death and punish those responsible. Damascus did not reply [and the matter did not reappear in the press up to the end of the year]. (Hayat, Nov 8)

Armed Clash between Phalanges and NSP. In July the strained relations between these two parties, which had caused several violent clashes between them during the year (see section on parties), reached a new height with an armed clash in Qartaba village, Mt. Lebanon. Both sides employed firearms and suffered casualties. Several persons were arrested.

The NSP alleged that the clash resulted from an attempt on the life of Abdallah Sa'adah, the party's leader, who was visiting the village. (Hayat, July 18). The Phalanges claimed that it started with NSP members shouting "anti-Lebanese" slogans, such as "Long live Syria," and that the NSP members opened fire when people "reacted with Lebanese slogans." (Amal, July 18)

Second Anti-UAR Incident in Kahale. On Aug 21 a convoy of vehicles on its way from Beirut to Damascus was attacked in Kahale village (see above, p 389). The travellers had intended to "congratulate Abd al-Hakim Amer, the UAR Vice-President, on the occasion of his stay in Damascus." The security forces acted quickly and there were no casualties. (Hayat, Aug 22)

Compensation to Sīmi as-Sulh Causes Temporary Resignation of the PM. In July the question of compensation to Sīmi as-Sulh, PM during the 1958 insurrection, for damage sustained to his home at the time, was brought up in the Chamber. Rashid Karāmi asked PM Sīlām [both were leaders of the insurrection] about the accuracy of reports that £1300,000 ($=£12.19 official rate) had been paid to As-Sulh. Sīlām denied the allegation. (Hayat, July 18)

Two months later, when the Cabinet was dealing with the question in the presence of the President, Sīlām announced his resignation in protest against the payment of

£1,500,000 compensation to As-Sulh. [The sources do not specify the date of this payment.]

Jumayl [who in 1958 fought the insurgents at the head of the Phalanges] explained that the compensation had been paid on the decision of the government of 1958, which had been held up repeatedly by legal institutions. Sīlām answered that this decision was not legally binding, since As-Sulh himself was the head of the government at the time. Jumayl pointed out that the decision had never been annulled and declared that he would resign if the payment order already issued was cancelled. The President persuaded Sīlām, as well as Abdallah Mashnūq, who wanted to join him, not to resign.

L'Orient thought that Sīlām's resignation was a manoeuvre to spike the guns of his fellow-insurgents—now his political opponents, in particular Abdallah al-Yāfi [of Beirut], editor of As-Siyāḥ, who had often attacked him on this issue. (Hayat, Jaridah, Amal, Orient, Sept 14)

POLARIZATION INSIDE THE MUSLIM SECTOR (August–September)

The Najjādah Incident in Beirut. On Aug 23 during the celebrations of Muhammad's birthday (al-mawlid an-nabawi), there was an armed clash in Beirut between police and some 400 demonstrators headed by the Najjādah leader, Deputy Adnān al-Hakim. (Hayat, Siyasah, Aug 24)

It was officially stated that after prayers at the Great Mosque an unlawful demonstration, headed by Hakim, disobeyed repeated police orders to disperse. A demonstrator opened fire on the police, and in the exchange of fire that followed one demonstrator was killed and another injured. (Hayat, Jaridah, Beirut al-Masa', Aug 24)

According to As-Siyāḥ [pro-UAR and Najjādah, owned by Abdallah al-Yāfi, Beirut Muslim leader, PM Sīlām's political opponent], however, the disturbances started during prayers, when supporters of Sīlām, who was present, incessantly provoked Najjādah supporters and religious functionaries. After the ceremony Hakim was carried home in triumph by his supporters, whereupon, by orders of Sīlām and Abdallah Mashnūq, the Minister of Interior, the police attempted to forcibly disperse this peaceful demonstration by opening fire, killing one demonstrator and injuring ten. The paper alleged that the police deliberately aimed at Hakim, whose car was hit by bullets. (Siyasah, Aug 24)

After the clash, tension mounted in Beirut, especially in the western part, where barricades were erected; in the Basta quarter [a Najjādah bastion] several buses were set on fire. The demonstrators called for a general strike and the closing of shops, and clashed with the police, who tried to clear the barricades. Army units took up positions to prevent further disturbances. (Hayat, Siyasah, Aug 24)

As-Siyāḥ claimed that the police, who were aided by armed groups of "Sīlām's partisans," failed to clear the barricades and prevent the strike. (Siyasah, Aug 24, 25)

Beirut al-Masa' [the Minister of Interior's paper] reported, however, that the strike had failed and that the majority of the population supported the government. Nine people were arrested. A government announcement denied rumours that the number of injured exceeded the official reports. (Beirut al-Masa', Aug 24, 25, 26)

After a meeting with the President, PM Sīlām said that Shehab approved of the government's handling of the affair. At an urgent Cabinet meeting, Sīlām and Mashnūq stated that those responsible for the disturbances and anyone attempting to undermine national unity would be severely punished. (Hayat, Beirut al-Masa', Aug 25)

Campaign for Popular Support in the Muslim Sector. [The Najjādah incident marked the beginning of the consolidation of the conflicting Muslim camps: (a) that of Sīām and Mashnūq, and (b) various groups, mainly Beirut Muslims, united by opposition to Sīām. The two camps competed for popular support in Beirut.]

Soon after the incidents, Muhsin Sīām and Uthmān ad-Dana, two Beirut opposition Muslims, denounced the government for the "criminal conduct" of the police in attacking a peaceful demonstration on the occasion of a religious event. Similar statements were also made by Rashid Karāmi, the Popular Resistance Organization, the Supreme Islamic Council, and, reportedly, Kamāl Junblāt. (Hayat, Siyash, Aug 25, 26; Siyash, Aug 24, 27)

As-Siyāsh claimed that Sīām had sent armed groups of his supporters to Tripoli to prevent clashes among Muslims there. (Siyash, Aug 25)

There was great tension on Aug 25 at the funeral of the demonstrator who had been killed. As-Siyāsh reported that thousands shouted anti-Sīām slogans. (Hayat, Siyash, Aug 26, 27)

On Aug 25 Sīām said at a press conference that the demonstration and the events following it had been designed to create inter-communal hostility. He called for the preservation of Lebanese unity and asked the Muslims not to be led astray by "satans and evil spirits." He said that he was a devout Muslim, but believed that his religion enjoined him to befriend the Christians. Mashnūq said that the government had started an investigation of the Kahale incident (p 392 a). Both expressed regret that a former judge [Dana] and a lawyer [Sīām] had issued a statement (see above) containing misrepresentation and biased opinions. (Beirut al-Masa', Aug 26)

As-Siyāsh claimed that in his efforts to create a counter-front among Beirut Muslims, Sīām had asked for the support of Rafiq Naja, head of the National Committee, an insubstantial Beirut party, lacking any support in the community, but that Naja had refused, for fear of losing prestige in western Beirut. Sīām was also reported to have made an unsuccessful bid for the support of the Beirut League of Families and Quarters (rābiāt al-a'ilāt wa-al-ahyā). (Siyash, Aug 28)

By invitation of Sulaymān Faranjīyah, Sīām toured the north and, according to Beirut al-Masa', received support in the villages he passed through. In his speeches he emphasized his closeness to the people and their support for him.

It was also reported that three ministers, Jumayl, Faranjīyah and Safi ad-Din, as well as Sabri Hamādah, the President of the Chamber, held a reception for Sīām to express their support. (Beirut al-Masa', Aug 28)

In reply to Sīām, Adnān al-Hakīm retorted that the incidents had nothing to do with communal strife but were mainly an effort by Sīām to liquidate the Najjādah. He accused him of impiety for violating a religious occasion; the people despised him, Hakīm declared, and his memory would "be held in abomination in the history of Lebanon." (Siyash, Aug 29)

Anti-Sīām "Beirut Front" Established. At the end of Aug a "Beirut Front," aimed against Sīām and Mashnūq, was established by five Beirut Muslims: Adnān al-Hakīm, Uthmān ad-Dana and Muhsin Sīām, (all deputies) Abdallah al-Yafi (a former PM), and Rashid as-Sulh. They said they would include in the group members from other communities and other parts of the country. (Hayat, Siyash, Aug 30)

Two Beirut Muslim leaders, Hussein al-Awayni and Ahmad Da'ūq, denied that they had joined the Front. Sīām claimed Rashid Karāmi as a supporter. (Jaridah, Aug 27)

Other Muslim leaders, Rafiq Naja of Beirut and Deputy Ma'arūf Sa'ad from Sidon, also dissociated themselves from the Front, and denounced it as likely to arouse inter-communal strife (Jaridah, Aug 28, Sept 2). Mashnūq said he regarded the Front as just "empty and meaningless talk." (Hayat, Beirut al-Masa', Aug 30)

On Sept 1, representatives of the Front met President Shehab and demanded the resignation of Sīām and Mashnūq for what they termed their recent manifestations of tyranny and persecution, which had lost them the faith of the public. The President said that he never intervened in disputes between government and opposition, and that the representatives should keep to the rules of the game and accept the decisions of the parliamentary majority (Hayat, Jaridah, Sept 2). After the meeting, members announced that the Front constituted a nucleus for a wider parliamentary association, which would develop into a national front to achieve national unity and oppose the rule of tyranny and injustice exercised by Sīām and Mashnūq (Siyash, Jaridah, Sept 2). [Up to the end of the year, however, the Front had not succeeded in enlarging its membership.]

REPERCUSSIONS OF THE BREAK-UP OF THE UAR

(September-October)

Demonstrations and Violence. Immediately on the outbreak of the revolution in Syria on the morning of Sept 28, the atmosphere throughout Lebanon became highly charged. Tumultuous demonstrations by thousands of people took place in Tripoli, Tyre, Beirut and Ba'albek on the following days, protesting against the Syrian coup and isolationism in the Arab world. [No anti-UAR demonstrations were reported.] (Hayat, Jaridah, Orient, Anwar, Siyash, Sept 29-30-Oct 3)

Junblāt Organizes Pro-UAR Front. Kamāl Junblāt was most active in organizing mass meetings, together with others who supported President Abdel Nasser and the unity of the UAR. On Oct 2 he called for the creation of a national front to protect the UAR, support Abdel Nasser and defend national unity, and on Oct 3 such a body, called "The Arab Progressive Front," was established. (R. Cairo, Oct 1 [3]; Jaridah, Oct 3, 5, 6; Hayat, Oct 4)

The Front included the PSP, one additional [pro-UAR] deputy Ismā'īl Hajjār, and the Movement of Arab Nationalists (see below). It deplored isolationism in Syria, expressed its support of the UAR under Abdel Nasser's leadership and praised the achievements of socialism in Syria during the union. (R. Cairo, Oct 4 [6]; Orient, Siyash, Hayat, Oct 6)

Other Support for Abdel Nasser. Statements in support of the UAR and Abdel Nasser were also published by the Najjādah and the Popular Resistance.

The Movement of Arab Nationalists [harakat al-qawmiyyūn al-ʿarab, an organization of Abdel Nasser's supporters, mainly among the students] repeatedly denounced the coup. It distributed pamphlets in Beirut and Tripoli expressing readiness to put volunteers at the disposal of the UAR and on Oct 2 organized a large demonstration in Tripoli. (Hayat, Sept 29, 30, Oct 3, 4)

The Mufti of Lebanon, Shaykh Muhammad Alāya, sent a cable of support to Abdel Nasser. (Hayat, Oct 3)

Of the independent deputies, Ma'rūf Sa'ad [Sunni Muslim from Sidon] and Adil Usayrān [Shi'i Muslim from the south] expressed their support for the UAR. (Hayat, Oct 6)

Ba'ath in a Quandary. [The various statements of the Ba'ath party reflected differing attitudes.] On Sept 29 a press statement in the name of the regional [Lebanese] headquarters (al-qiyyādh al-qutriyah) of the Ba'ath party vehemently denounced the coup.

On the same day, however, a spokesman of the national [inter-Arab] headquarters (al-qiyyādh al-qawmiyah) [also located in Lebanon] said the party had not yet announced its attitude but would soon do so. The following day Sāmī Rifā'i, Secretary of the regional [Lebanese] headquarters, issued a new statement saying only: "In the light of present circumstances we request that the Arab public in Lebanon and all the Arab countries augment and deepen its faith in Arab Nationalism." (Hayat, Sept 29, 30, Oct 1)

NSP Supports Syria's Independence, Phalanges Cautious. The NSP [was the only party that] openly announced its support of the Syrian revolution, which, it said, expressed the will of the Syrian people, to whom it had restored their freedom. It welcomed the coup as a victory of "true Arabism over false Arabism." (Hayat, Jaridah, Sept 30)

[The Phalanges refrained from openly adopting a definite attitude, but their paper, Al-Amal, made it clear that it welcomed recent developments in Syria.]

It wrote: "The Syrians alone can determine the fate of their nation." (Amal, Oct 1)

United Government Attitude; Jumayil's Moderation. It was reported on Oct 2 that following a meeting between President Shehab and Pierre Jumayil, full agreement had been reached in the Cabinet to delay recognition of Syria (Jaridah, Oct 1, 3). An official announcement denied Lebanese press reports that Slām had said he was anxiously following the Syrian revolution. On Oct 2 it was officially denied that there were differences in the Cabinet regarding events in Syria. (R. Beirut, Oct 1, 2 [3, 4])

It was thought that, by not demanding the immediate recognition of Syria, the opposition, especially the National Bloc (whose leader Raymond Eddeh was one of the first to call for a moderate and cautious policy), had incidentally foiled a political manoeuvre contemplated by PM Slām. It was believed that Slām hoped to gain renewed support among the Beirut Muslims if he had been given the opportunity to refuse an opposition demand to recognize Syria. (Jaridah, Oct 6)

On the other hand, it was reported that the widespread pro-UAR demonstrations might lead to a Cabinet crisis. Jumayil had been asked by many delegations to stop them or to organize counter-demonstrations. While he prevailed upon them to desist, he warned Slām and Mashūq, the Minister of the Interior, that the demonstrations were harmful to Lebanon's neutrality and must be stopped. (Jaridah, Oct 3-5)

On Oct 5 the Cabinet reaffirmed its moderate policy and, on Jumayil's proposal, decided to ban demonstrations of solidarity with any other state. On the same day a Presidential announcement forbade demonstrations and the display of pictures or pamphlets of any kind, as well as the carrying of firearms, until further notice. (Jaridah, Oct 6)

Premises of Pro-UAR Papers Blown Up. On Oct 1 an explosion occurred in the building of Al-Hawddith, [a pro-UAR paper]. On Oct 6 [on the morrow of the President's announcement], there were explosions in buildings of the [pro-UAR] papers: Beirut al-Masā; Sawt al-Urūbah, Al-Sayyād and Kul-Shay', as well as in the Najjādh building, and another the next day in the building of Al-Siyāh. An investigation was launched (Hayat, Oct 3, 7, 8; Jaridah, Orient, Oct 7, 9), [but up to the end of the month the guilty parties were not found and all suspects were released].

Country Quiets Down, Abdel Nasser's Attitude Praised. Meanwhile, however, the country had begun to quiet down, in the wake of the ban on demonstrations and President Abdel Nasser's speech on Oct 5, in which he recognized the breakup of the UAR as a fait accompli for the time being (see p 162).

[Abdel Nasser's speech was warmly welcomed in Lebanon by friends and opponents alike.] Among those who publicly praised him for a statesmanlike attitude were Raymond Eddeh, Pierre Jumayil, Slām and Adnān al-Hakim. (Jaridah, Oct 7)

Recognition of Syria Delayed. [Lebanon granted recognition to the government of independent Syria only on Nov 8, after the downfall of Slām's government and the formation of Karāmi's Cabinet—see pp 166-7.]

OPPOSITION UNITES—GOVERNMENT RESIGNS (October)

Manoeuvring for Elections to Presidency of Chamber. [The annual elections for the presidency of the Chamber, reserved for a Shi'i Muslim and known as "The Second Presidency," were held on Oct 17. Even more than usual, they served as a focus for increased party and parliamentary activity. The rallying of opposition groups for these elections led directly to the downfall of the Slām government.] (On the 1960 elections see MER 1960, pp 356-7.)

The first moves took place as early as July. Fu'ād Butrus, of the Independent Group, announced that his group would support Ali Bizzi, a member of the Bloc [who represented Marj Ayun in the south and was Minister of Information in the Karāmi Cabinet, which resigned in May 1960].

The remaining groups had not yet taken a definite stand, but it was known that the National Bloc would oppose Sabri Hamādāh, the incumbent, whose relations with Eddeh, leader of the Bloc, had been rather strained for an extended period (Hayat, July 22). [This bloc had voted for Adil Usayrān in 1960.]

Later a third candidate emerged: Muhammad Safi ad-Din, the Minister of Interior, of the Southern Bloc, which supported him.

In mid-Oct, however, Safi ad-Din withdrew, and the Southern Bloc shifted its support to Hamādāh [brother-in-law of Kāmil al-As'ad, leader of the Bloc] after he had undertaken to support Safi ad-Din for the post in the coming year. Hamādāh was supported by the Constitutional Union and by the Front for National Struggle (identical with the Arab Progressive Front, the seven-member Parliamentary Bloc headed by Kamāl Junblāt) because he had helped to have its candidates elected to the parliamentary committees.

Ali Bizzi, the Independent Group candidate, also enjoyed the support of two major opposition groups, the Tripoli Bloc and the National Bloc. The new Ba'albek-Hermil Group (see p 383 b) had not as yet decided on its attitude. (Hayat, Oct 1, 4, 12, 14, 15; Jaridah, Oct 12)

At this stage observers assumed that the elections would be decided between Hamadah as the government candidate and Bazzi as the candidate of the opposition. (Hayat, Oct 14)

Opposition Unites Against Government and Elects Hamadah. However, things started to take a turn against the government. On Oct 14 it was reported that the Southern Bloc, which had generally supported the government, would now vote against it [for reasons not explained by our sources]. The other opposition parties now joined it in support of Hamadah, who promised to maintain neutrality as President of the Chamber. (Hayat; Jaridah, Oct 15)

The newly united opposition issued a manifesto announcing support for Hamadah on the basis of this promise, but stating that their main objective was to concentrate their efforts to overthrow the government. The document was signed by representatives of: the Zahle, Biqa', Independent, Ba'albek-Hermil-Beherri, Akkar, Tripoli, National and Southern Blocs, the Constitutional Union, the National Liberals, and the Beirut Front. [Safi ad-Din who represented the Southern Bloc in the Cabinet, did not sign, however.]

Out of the 99 deputies in the Chamber, these groups comprised 58 according to Al-Jaridah, and 51 according to Al-Hayat. (Jaridah, Oct 15)

On Oct 17 Hamadah was elected President of the Chamber by 71 votes to five and two abstentions. Munir Abu Fadil was elected Vice-President (a post reserved for the Greek Orthodox community) and Hashim Husseini (Sunni) became Secretary.

Immediately after the elections Rashid Karami asked, in the name of 48 deputies, for a vote of non-confidence in the government and said he would marshal 60 votes. (Orient, Hayat, Jaridah, Oct 18)

Government Counter-moves Unsuccessful. PM Slâm and other ministers said, however, they were sure to win the vote and denied any intention of resigning. (Hayat, Oct 15, 17, 18)

The fate of the government was now seen to depend on the attitude of the Southern Bloc and the Constitutional Union. Slâm tried to win over the Southern Bloc with the aid of two of its members, Safi ad-Din, the Minister of Agriculture, and Deputy Sa'id Fawaz, but failed to overcome the opposition of Kamil al-As'ad and other members of the Bloc, who also demanded Safi ad-Din's resignation.

There was a rift in the Constitutional Union, represented in the government by Philippe Taqla, the Foreign Minister, over the signing of the opposition manifesto by its representative. Deputy Fu'ad Nafâ also openly opposed his party's new policy.

Government and opposition also competed for the vote of the Independents. (Jaridah, Oct 17)

Junblât Breaks With Slâm. On Oct 20 the position of the government further deteriorated when Junblât announced his resignation. He said he had had differences with the PM since the end of 1960 over, inter alia, the government's leniency towards opium smugglers, the non-recognition of Communist China which impaired Lebanon's policy of neutrality, Slâm's groundless attacks on Rashid Karami, the setting up and dissolution of municipalities for party reasons, the waste of public funds to enhance the PM's prestige, unpunished waste and corruption in the administration, and the lack of efficiency and discipline in the internal security forces owing to unwarranted interference by the PM and the Minister of the Interior. Junblât denied accusations that he had given employment in his ministry to many of his supporters. (Hayat, Jaridah, Oct 21)

On Oct 20 Slâm met President Shehab, who left him free to choose between resignation or facing the Chamber. On the same day it was officially stated that the ministers were prepared to continue to bear collective responsibility for the government's fate; Pierre Jumayil and Safi ad-Din made separate statements to this effect. (Hayat, Oct 21)

Slâm now endeavoured to strengthen his coalition with new partners, on the assumption that Junblât's departure had made this possible. It was reported that he contacted, among others, the [conservative anti-Junblât] Biqa' deputies and Majid Arslan [the Druze leader, Junblât's rival].

The opposition issued a statement, signed by 54 deputies, opposing any attempt to widen the basis of the government. (Hayat, Jaridah, Oct 21, 22, 24)

On Oct 24 it was revealed that Junblât had not actually resigned. The President refused to act on Slâm's request to accept Junblât's resignation as he had received no written notice of it. On Oct 23 Junblât asked the President to "freeze" his resignation. He told the press that he had intended it to trigger that of Slâm, but it now appeared that he had underestimated Slâm's attachment to his post, and as the Cabinet had decided to face a vote of confidence he had resolved to stand by it. Al-Jaridah attributed Junblât's volte-face to fears that Slâm might succeed in broadening the government and gaining a vote of confidence.

Further efforts by Slâm to persuade the President to regard Junblât as having resigned were fruitless. Slâm declared: "Junblât is not just a problem of the present government, he constitutes a chronic Lebanese problem." (Hayat, Jaridah, Oct 24)

Resignation of Government; Reasons for Fall. On the evening of Oct 23, however, the government's resignation was announced; it would continue in office, at the President's request, until the formation of a new government. (Hayat, Oct 24, 25; Jaridah, Oct 25; Mid. Mir., Oct 26)

One explanation given for the resignation was the government's hesitant attitude towards the Syrian revolution: it had lost popularity by failing to recognize Syria, while Abdel Nasser's supporters were critical of Slâm because he was unpopular with the UAR authorities owing to his evasive attitude in earlier instances. (Times, Oct 27; Guardian, Oct 28)

Al-Jaridah cited both the government's non-recognition of Syria and its handling of the lawyers' strike [also an issue connected with the UAR, see pp 386-7] as reasons why many independent deputies joined the opposition. Al-Siyasah [the anti-Slâm Beirut Muslim paper] ascribed the Government's fall to inefficiency in the administration and corruption involving Slâm himself. (Siyasah, Oct 24; Jaridah, Oct 25)

Jumayil's Criticism of Lebanese Regime. Pierre Jumayil declared that Lebanon was in the throes of a "crisis of government" (armat al-hukm) due to: "the corruption (fasad) of the parliamentary regime; the ministerial fever (humma al-istidar); and the unsuitable way in which Cabinets were formed." Participants in the "parliamentary game," he said, were mostly representatives of private or regional interests and not parties with principles and programmes; the Phalanges, in fact, had been the first such party in the Chamber. Consequently, the formation of the Cabinet was an opportunistic process, under the influence of unprincipled deputies greedy for power.

To rectify this situation, Jumayil proposed that as long as there was no change for the better in the formation of genuine parties, deputies should not become ministers, so as to overcome the "ministerial fever." (Jaridah, Oct 25)

THE KARAMI GOVERNMENT

(October–December)

Rashid Karāmi Prime Minister. [On Oct 25 President Shehab asked Rashid Karāmi to form a government and on Oct 31 Karāmi announced its formation.

Karāmi (b. 1921), a Sunni Muslim of Tripoli, formed his first government in 1955 at the age of 34. In 1958 he was the leader of the insurgents in the north and became after the insurrection the first PM under Shehab's presidency. He resigned in May 1960 to make place for a caretaker Cabinet before the general elections (MER 1960, p 344, 352). His late father, Abd al-Hamid Karāmi, was also a PM.]

Political Line-up Before Karāmi's Nomination; Slām, Sulh, Naja Considered. In the President's prior consultations the following line-up had emerged.

Supporters of Karāmi: National Bloc, Beirut Front, Constitutional Union (except Sabri Hamādah), Tripoli Bloc and Southern Bloc.

Supporters of Sa'ib Slām: Adil and Samih Usayrān; independents from the south; Zghorta Bloc and three independents of similar outlook—Majid Arslān, Qabalān Qabalān and Munir Abu Fādil.

Rafiq Naja was supported by the ten Independent Bloc deputies.

The following made no proposals to the President: The Ba'albek-Hermil, Baherri and Akkar Blocs; the Armenians; the Front for National Struggle (Junblāt); several independents; and the National Liberals, except for their leader, former President Sham'un.

Sham'un proposed Kazim as-Sulh, as did the Biqa' Bloc, to which as-Sulh belonged.

The attitude of the Phalanges was not disclosed. Karāmi received the largest support, followed by Slām, as-Sulh and Naja, in that order. The majority of deputies proposed a Cabinet of 14. (Hayat, Jaridah, Oct 26)

Manoeuvring for Formation of Cabinet. Karāmi's first step, on Oct 26, was a declaration saying that he would try to form a Cabinet of 14, that his government would strive to further national unity, and that Lebanon's foreign policy would remain unchanged.

The same day, the opposition deputies assembled and resolved that the new Cabinet must be composed of their representatives only, that no member of the outgoing Cabinet must be included, that all ministers must be deputies except for Philippe Taqla, the Foreign Minister (compare with Jumayil's opposition proposal above), and that there must be no Cabinet of [opposite] poles (wa'idat aqtāb).

Karāmi opened negotiations the same day and all opposition groups demanded representation in the Cabinet. The united front of the opposition crumbled, however, the next day when some groups agreed to join the new Cabinet with Jumayil and Junblāt.

Still Karāmi found himself unable to complete his task and he now announced that he intended to form his Cabinet of non-members of the Chamber; as such a Cabinet would cooperate better and function with greater efficiency. This was immediately and bitterly opposed by many deputies.

On Oct 30 the Cabinet was almost wholly formed, but Jumayil and Junblāt refused to accept the ministries offered them. Jumayil demanded Finance instead of Interior, while Junblāt, it was reported, had accepted the Planning portfolio but, when he heard of Jumayil's stand, demanded the Ministry of Public Works. [For the compromise achieved, see the list of ministers below.] (Jaridah, Oct 27, 28, 29, 31)

The Karāmi Cabinet. On Oct 31 Karāmi announced the formation of his Cabinet. He said that since it comprised the various parliamentary factions he hoped that it would succeed in fulfilling its duties and enhance the security of the state. (Hayat, Nov 2)

The new Cabinet was composed as follows: Rashid Karāmi, PM and Minister of Finance; Philippe Būlus, Deputy PM, Information and Tourism; Kamāl Junblāt, Minister of State, in charge of the Interior Ministry and the coordination of the activities of IRFED (see p 408 b); Pierre Jumayil, Minister of State, in charge of Public Works and Communications and aiding in studies of the organization of financial affairs; Joseph Skāf, Agriculture; Rafiq Naja, Economy; Ali Bizzi, Health; Fu'ad Butrus, Justice; Uthmān Dana, Planning; Edouard Hunayin, Labour and Social Affairs; René Mu'awwad, Posts; Majid Arslān, Defence; Philippe Taqla, Foreign Affairs; Kāmil As'ad, Education and Fine Arts. (Hayat, Jaridah, Nov 2; Mid. Mir., Nov 4)

The Cabinet contained four members of Slām's Cabinet: Būlus Jumayil, Junblāt and Taqla As'ad. Mu'awwad and Hunayin were ministers for the first time. The Independent Bloc was represented by two ministers, Butrus and Bizzi, and the following by one each: Phalanges (Jumayil), PSP (Junblāt), Southern Bloc (Kāmil As'ad), National Bloc (Hunayin), Constitutional Union (Taqla), Tripoli Bloc (Karāmi), Beirut Front (Dana). [Not included, and constituting the opposition, were: the National Liberals (Sham'un), and the Ba'albek-Hermil-Baherri and Akkar Blocs. The latter were the only geographical regions not represented.] (Compare also table, pp 373-4.) Political commentators observed that the special positions of Minister of State accorded to Jumayil and Junblāt were intended to forestall open friction between the two. (Mid. Mir., Nov 4)

National Bloc Joins Opposition. On the morrow of its formation, on Nov 2, the Cabinet was faced with an internal crisis when the National Bloc, led by Raymond Eddeh, said that Hunayin, its representative in the Cabinet, would resign if the government did not meet its demands: the closing of the Faculty of Law at the UAR-founded Arab University of Beirut [see Lawyers' Strike pp 386-7] and the abolition of the posts of Minister of State held by Jumayil and Junblāt. (Hayat, Nov 3; Mid. Mir., Nov 4)

Hunayin resigned on Nov 3; and the National Bloc thus joined the opposition.

The same day Hunayin's portfolio, Labour and Social Affairs, was given to Jean Aziz, an independent Maronite deputy from the Jezzin area. Earlier, Karāmi had proposed the ministry to the National Liberals and the Ba'albek-Hermil Bloc, the two major opposition groups, but both declined. (Jaridah, Nov 4)

The next day Uthmān Dana announced that he would resign if he was not given responsibility for IRFED.

This was followed by a joint letter from Junblāt and Jumayil to President Shehab, resigning from their posts as Ministers of State, as they now realized that their retention of these posts was not for the good of the country.

The President accepted their resignations and announced the appointment of Junblāt and Jumayil as Ministers of the Interior and of Public Works and Communications respectively. While Jumayil retained the additional assignment of aiding in studies for the reorganization of financial affairs, the responsibility for IRFED was transferred from Junblāt to Uthmān Dana. (Jaridah, Nov 5)

Recognition of Syria; Junblāt to Reassure Syria. The first major act of the new Cabinet was the recognition of Syria on Nov 8. The Cabinet discussed press reports that Lebanon was being utilized as a base for the subversion of Syria and asked Junblāt to inform his Syrian opposite number that Lebanon would not allow any anti-Syrian activity on her soil and was anxious to co-operate with the Syrian government for the settlement of any dispute that might arise.

The next day Junblāt stated that Lebanon would not be a centre for inter-Arab strife and the Cabinet decided to send a delegation to congratulate the Syrian government. [It left on Nov 26.] (On relations with Syria, see also pp 166-7.) (Jaridah, Nov 9, 10)

Policy Statement: Adherence to Arab League; Good Relations with Syria; Non-Alignment; Social Justice. On Nov 16 the government presented itself in the Chamber and PM Karāmi made a statement of policy, which contained the following major points:

The government's policy would be based on the unity and the independence of Lebanon. In Arab affairs Lebanon wished for friendship with all Arab states and cooperation through the Arab League on the basis of its charter, with special emphasis on good relations with Syria. In international affairs, the policy would be neutrality and non-alignment.

In internal affairs the general aim would be to foster social justice by narrowing the gaps in development and growth between the various areas and groups. To achieve this in the framework of a free economy, the Ministry of Planning should be reorganized and the Ministry of Finance should reorganize monetary affairs and taxation. In security affairs, the rule of law would be strengthened. A new press law would be introduced. Elementary education would be made general, and vocational and higher education would be furthered. The government also hoped to find a solution to the question of the teaching of law (see Lawyers' Strike). (R. Beirut, Nov 16 [18]; Hayat, Nov 17)

Opposition Says New Cabinet Like Old. Relations with Syria a Critical Issue. The main theme of the opposition was the question: How could the new Cabinet properly function if the old one, with largely the same composition, had failed. Karāmi was criticized for deserting his allies in the opposition. While the National Bloc, the National Liberals and Independents demanded better relations with Syria, Ma'arūf Sa'ad [Muslim from Sidon, a supporter of Abdel Nasser] and other [Muslim] Independents criticized the government's favourable attitude towards that country. Sa'ad denied that he had smuggled arms to Syria. Many deputies demanded the ending of the lawyers' strike.

Junblāt pointed to the understanding among the members of the new Cabinet, including himself and Pierre Jumayil, declaring: "Today the two barricades have become one."

In his defence Karāmi stated that opposition groups had rejected his offer to include their representatives in the Cabinet. He promised vigorous action in settling the lawyer's strike and stated that it would be senseless to ignore the existence of the new order in Syria: "We extend one hand to Damascus and the other to Cairo, for Lebanon strives for the strengthening of ties between all the Arab states." (Hayat, Jaridah, Nov 12, 18)

Large Vote of Confidence. The government received a vote of confidence by 63 to 18. The National Bloc, the Constitutional Union and the National Liberals voted against, and the Ba'albek-Hermil bloc in favour of the government [though it was not represented in the Cabinet].

The Najjādah representative abstained. Conspicuous by their absence were ex-PM Sīām, Mashnūq, his Minister of the Interior, and Ma'arūf Sa'ad. (Jaridah, Nov 18)

Renewed Pro- and Anti-UAR Violence. On Nov 26 an explosion occurred in the garden of the house of Rafiq Naja, the Minister of Economy, shortly after his return from Damascus, where he headed the government's delegation of friendship (see above). There were no casualties.

Naja's party, the National Committee (al-hay'ah al-wastaniyah), in a statement denouncing the attempt, said that the many delegations that had congratulated Naja on his escape had expressed their support for his policy in general and for the aims of the delegation to Damascus in particular. (Hayat, Nov 28, 30)

On Dec 2 it was reported that a number of politicians had received threatening letters signed by the "Arab Revolutionary Committee" (al-hay'ah al-arabiyyah athawriyyah). About 35 suspects were arrested, and several Arab refugees and foreigners were placed under surveillance. The authorities thought the senders of the letters were in league with the Islamic Liberation Party. (Nahar; Anwar, Dec 2)

On Dec 24 an unsuccessful attempt by one man to blow up the building of the [pro-UAR] weekly Al-Hawadith was reported. He was not caught. (Jaridah, Dec 24)

Candidates for Political Assassination? In Dec Kamāl Junblāt, the Minister of the Interior, issued a decree specifying the number of policemen and gendarmes responsible for guarding the lives of: Camille Sham'ūn, Sāmi as-Sulh [President and PM respectively during the 1958 insurrection] — two guards each; Sulaymān Faranjīyah [pro-UAR Maronite]; Abdallah Mashnūq [Interior Minister in Sīām's Cabinet who had lately clashed with the Najjādah—see above]; and Ma'arūf Sa'ad [prominent UAR supporter from Sidon]—one guard each. (Hayat, Dec 20)

Cabinet Disagreement on Economic Policy. On Dec 9 PM Karāmi announced a programme for strengthening the economy by lowering the cost of living, encouraging production and lowering imports and restrictions on imports. On Dec 13 the Cabinet resolved on a month's concentrated campaign under Karāmi's supervision from Dec 15, 1961, to Jan 15, 1962, to lower the cost of living.

Karāmi's initiative led to a rift with Rafiq Najja, the Minister of the Economy, who criticized the new programme as unrealistic (Hayat, Dec 10, 14, 19). On Dec 21 Najja left suddenly for Europe—officially for medical treatment, but according to some sources, on the advice of his colleagues in order to prevent an open clash with the PM. It was stated that he had intended to resign and had stayed away from the meetings of the special council set up by the PM to supervise his programme. (Nahar, Dec 22; Kul Shay, Dec 30)

THE ATTEMPTED NSP COUP

(December 30, 1961–March 1962)

SYNOPSIS

On the night of Dec 30/31 the Nationalist Social Party (formerly the Parti Populaire Syrien—PPS—or Syrian Nationalist Party) attempted a coup d'état with the central aim of furthering the eventual establishment of a Greater Syria, or Fertile Crescent union. The active participants in the coup were several junior army officers, an armoured company of 90 men, some of whom were misled by their commander as to the nature of the operation, and the NSP's own armed squads, which included Arab refugees, Syrians and Jordanians, besides Lebanese. In the early morning of Jan 1, 1962 it was already apparent that the coup had failed. The soldiers surrendered to loyal forces, who had them surrounded, and the NSP rebels fled to their village strongholds in the mountain area to the north-east of Beirut, which was occupied by the army during the next few days.

The attempted coup was almost unanimously condemned by politicians and press, and for a short while at least national unity seemed to prevail.

For two and a half months, however, the country was in a state of emergency. There were several thousand arrests, especially in Jan, and considerable quantities of arms were confiscated. The majority of the detainees were soon released, however, and in March only some 500 remained in custody. Owing to the large-scale participation of alien Arabs in the coup, the authorities took steps to ensure increased control over aliens and Arab refugees.

These and other security measures were conducive to a wave of rumours which started to flood the country on the day of the coup, causing serious concern, and were ascribed by the authorities to an NSP campaign to destroy national unity and morale in the army.

The rumour which was most widely circulated, especially by the UAR mass-media and pro-UAR elements in Lebanon, was that the coup was backed by the British, but there was no mention in the indictment of any British connection with the plot.

The charge sheet did not allege actual knowledge of the coup on the part of any Lebanese politician or political body save the NSP, though Camille Sham'un—whom the NSP had strongly backed in 1958 and who had licensed it at the time—and his party had been strongly suspected.

The indictment charged the NSP with having received financial aid from official Jordanian sources, though Jordan was not accused of having had foreknowledge of the coup. According to Lebanese sources, Jordan also harboured NSP fugitives.

The NSP in Lebanon suffered an extreme setback—if it was not actually destroyed (and there was even a rumour that the authorities had known of the plot but had let it ripen with the intention of destroying the party). Abroad, however, among the large communities of Lebanese emigrants, who were also influential in Lebanon itself, the NSP apparently increased its activities.

The indictment was published on May 9, 1962; the trial will be surveyed in MER 1962.

RECONSTRUCTION OF THE COUP

The following is a reconstruction of the conspiracy and the coup as set out in the indictment, published on May 9, 1962.

Extent of Conspiracy. The conspirators consisted of leaders of the NSP and "a tiny group of disgruntled army officers." [Note: The indictment referred to the NSP as the Syrian Nationalist Party.]

Named in the bill of indictment were: 4 officers, 2 retired officers, 90 soldiers, 12 policemen, 323 civilians including 20 Palestinians and 54 Syrians.

Of these, 38 military men and 262 civilians were charged and indicted. Of the rest, eleven had been killed and the others were granted a stay of trial.

They were charged with: organizing a plot and carrying out an aggression with intent to change the constitution by illegal means; instituting an armed mutiny against the established government; seizing civil and military powers; incitement to civil war and armed strife by arming Lebanese to fight other Lebanese; exhortation to murder and sabotage; kidnapping certain officers; the attempted kidnapping of certain statesmen and politicians; the carrying and transportation of arms without permit; and the forming of armed gangs with the above and related purposes.

Organization and Leaders of the NSP. According to the indictment, the following leaders of the NSP were responsible for the conspiracy [Lebanese where no other nationality is indicated]:

Party Leader: Abdallah Sa'adah.

Members of the Higher Council (al-majlis al-a'la): Muhammad al-Ba'albaki, Chairman, Emile Ra'd, "Confidant (aami) of the Council", Asad al-Ashqar, Kamil Abu Kamil, Munir Khuri, As'ad Rihail, Nadhir al-Azmah (Syrian), Abdallah al-Qubrusi, and Umar Abu Zlam (Syrian).

The Directors (or Chiefs al-umud): Bashir Ubayd (Defence), Ramiz al-Yaziji (Interior, Syria), Yusuf al-Ashqar (Culture), In'am Ra'd (Propaganda), Yusuf al-Mu'allim (Finance), Philippe Musallim (Bureau for Affairs Abroad (Overseas)—maktab abra al-hudud), Raja al-Yaziji (Confidant—namus—of the Party Leader, Syrian), Mustafa Izz ad-Din, Subhi Abu Ubayd (without portfolios), Mustafa Abd as-Satir (Legal Department), and Nicolas Trid (Deputy Director of Work—amal).

The Political Bureau (al-maktab al-siyasi): George Salibi (Chairman) Mubammad al-Ba'albaki, Nasri Abu Sulayman, Isa Salamah (Syrian) and Ali Ghandur.

Military Experts: Abdallah al-Jubayli and Mahmud Ni'mah (both Syrians).

NSP Aim: Fertile Crescent Union; Officers' Aim: to Abolish Favouritism in the Army. The NSP had a negative motive for the coup, namely the hostile attitude of the authorities towards it, and a positive one, based on its ideology. It believed that: (1) Social justice and reform in Lebanon could be achieved only by breaking sectarianism and establishing a lay regime; (2) Lebanon should become the active agent for the gradual union of countries of the Fertile Crescent or "Natural Syria" (surīyah al-tabi'iyah): Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria — which constituted her "natural surroundings" (muhitah al-tabi'i); she should also become the model for this future state, which should be nationalist, populist and lay, modern and progressive. [The above is a résumé of slightly differing versions by various party leaders quoted in the indictment.]

The army officers, Capt. Fu'ad Awad, Capt. Shawqi Khayrallah and Capt. Badi' Ghāzi, on the other hand, justified the conspiracy by alleging that the army command, especially the Deuxième Bureau, had adopted a policy of favouritism. They found no other way to realize their objective, which they termed "reform" in the army, than to stage a coup. A fourth officer, Lt. Ali al-Hajj Hasan, was a member of the NSP. The officers and the NSP used each other to further their respective aims.

How the Plan was Born. The idea of the coup was raised at a meeting between Khayrallah and Nahīb Nimah, confidant of Abdallah Sa'adah, the NSP leader. Subsequently, in Aug, the idea was discussed between Khayrallah and Sa'adah, without any specific agreement.

Following the breakup of the UAR [Sept 28], contacts were renewed between Khayrallah, Awad (a friend of his) and Sa'adah, and the idea of the coup began to take definite shape.

In mid-Oct Sa'adah brought the issue before the party's Council of Chiefs and Higher Council at a meeting held at Asad al-Ashqar's house. There was some opposition, but the Higher Council agreed to invest Sa'adah with extraordinary powers to resume the discussions with the officers.

Sa'adah's meetings with the officers continued, and they were now joined by Capt. Ghāzi and Abdallah al-Jubayli; Bashir Ubayd, Emile Ra'd and Mahmūd Nimah joined in later. On Dec 5, however, Khayrallah was detained by the authorities as an administrative measure. [No reason for his detention was mentioned in the indictment.]

A final meeting was held on Dec 29 at Sa'adah's residence; Awad, Ghāzi, Sa'adah, Ra'd, Ubayd and Nimah were present. Zero hour was fixed at 02.15 on Sunday, Dec 31, and Sa'adah immediately communicated the plan to the Higher Council, which approved it.

NSP Mobilizes Men, Arms and Funds; Jordanian Financial Aid. Bashir Ubayd, the Defence Chief, was charged with recruiting the armed squads, with the aid of 30 of the party's district executive officers (musaḥḥidh ammi) and training inspectors (nāẓir al-tadrīb).

The NSP had some 2,000 weapons stored in depots in Dik al-Mahdi, Asad al-Ashqar's village [on the outskirts of Beirut; it later served as the rebels' stronghold during the operations], and other villages. Shortly before zero hour, all the arms were moved to Dik al-Mahdi and deposited in caches under the supervision of Ashqar. They were then transported to houses in Beirut and its suburbs from which the insurgents were to act.

Funds were raised as follows: £1,100,000 were received as contributions from party members; £1,160,000 were personally secured by the party leader; £150,000 were given by Asad al-Ashqar, and £140,000 were given by an expatriate, Butrus Abu Shadid. In addition, Jordan granted JD20,000, which were delivered in two instalments through Ashqar and Muhammad al-Ba'alhaki, chairman of the Higher Council.

Contacts with Other Parties. The NSP contacted several politicians to sound them out on the possibility of cooperation and to win their support for the coup.

Sa'adah contacted Raymond Eddeh through an intermediary and made serious efforts to create an atmosphere of understanding, but no definite result was achieved.

About a month before the coup Sa'adah had been informed by a party member [the indictment does not clarify on what authority] that Sham'un would be prepared to support a coup with funds and his army connections. Sa'adah intended to follow up by a meeting with Sham'un but the latter was abroad and no contact was established.

Also approached were Fawzi al-Qawuqji, [a retired officer and commander of the Army of Salvation (jaysh al-inqādh) in the 1948 war against Israel], Jawād Būlus [an historian and a minister in 1941], and Sulaymān al-Ali, [deputy from Akkar and Minister of the Economy in Sām's last Cabinet]. This led party members to think, the indictment stated, that Būlus was the party's candidate for the presidency and al-Ali for the premiership.

The party expected the major centres of opposition to the coup to be Tripoli, Sidon, Ash-Shuf, the western areas of Beirut, and certain pro-Phalangist areas. It considered the appointment to its Cabinet of elements assumed to be capable of winning over western Beirut and intended to foment confusion in the other areas by kidnapping its leaders, such as Rashid Karāmi, Kamāl Junblāt, Pierre Jumayil and Ma'arūf Sa'd. The party also tried to win over the trade unions.

External Relations: Jordanian Aid, Iraq's Response Negative. Some party leaders visited Baghdad, "but their endeavours do not seem to have found any response."

On the other hand, a letter from Asad al-Ashqar to King Hussein of Jordan, and other contacts, brought Jordanian financial aid, as detailed above. After the breakup of the UAR, the party had also been counting on Jordanian intervention with the Syrian authorities to release the detained NSP members and to open the border to fugitive party members in general, but the Syrians did not agree. [The indictment did not allege direct Jordanian involvement in the coup.]

Towards the end of Dec the party sent some of its members abroad to make efforts, if the conspiracy succeeded, to persuade certain governments to recognize the new regime. George Salibi went to Amman on the understanding that Jordan would undertake to secure recognition from the British and their allies; Iaa Salāmah went to Washington to request Charles Malik to intercede with the U.S. government; Nicolas Trād went to Paris, and Ali Ghandūr had earlier left for Rome.

Preparations by Officers; Attempts to Widen Participation Fail. Captains Awad and Khayrallah informed Brig. Ghattās Labakī of their intention to take part in the coup and invited him to head the movement and assume command of the army if it succeeded, but he asked them to abandon the whole idea. Former Col. Fu'ad Lahūd, who was also approached, was against the participation of the NSP, and recommended that the army should stage the coup alone.

At Awad's suggestion, the night of Dec 30-31 was fixed for the coup, since half of the officers would be on leave.

On the eve of the coup Awad alerted his unit, the Second Independent Armoured Company (al-katibah al-musaffahah al-mustaqillah ath-thaniyah), stationed at Tyre, on the pretext that it had to quell a coup staged by Kamal Junblat and some officers. Some soldiers, however, collaborated knowingly.

Allocation of Operational Tasks. The following tasks were allocated to the NSP: to kidnap Brig. Shmayyit, Chief of Staff of the army, Col. Abd al-Qadir Shehab, Beirut Region Commander, Col. Antun Sa'ad, Chief of the Deuxième Bureau, and other officers in key positions, as well as the President of the Chamber and the PM, Pierre Jumayil and Kamal Junblat, Lt.-Col. Ahdab, the Chief of the Security Services, and Ma'ruf Sa'ad, the [pro-UAR] deputy from Sidon. In addition the party was to support Awad in occupying the Defence Ministry, to facilitate the escape of Khayrallah, who had been detained since Dec 5, and to secure the admission of the wounded to the American University Hospital.

The military were to occupy the Defence Ministry and kidnap Brig. Michel Nawfal and Lt.-Col. Louis Shehab.

The party and the military jointly were to kidnap President Shehab and to occupy the broadcasting station, the barracks of the 16th Emergency Police Squad (located at the government palace) and the Phalangist premises.

In the Event of Success. The President of the Republic was to be deported to France, the Cabinet dismissed and the Chamber dissolved. A new army command was to be formed. Four communiqués were prepared by Muhammad al-Ba'abaki and In'am Ra'd for immediate issue. They summarized the reasons for the coup as a rectification of military and political conditions, announced a curfew and the closing of the borders, accused the state of failing to deal with social and economic problems, and demanded the support of the military and the people.

The NSP was to have three members in the new Cabinet: Sa'adah, Ba'albaki and Nasri Abu Sulayman. It had also reviewed the names of Lebanese personalities with the view to asking them to participate in the regime if the coup succeeded.

The new regime was intended to declare the following policies: To abolish the sectarian political base and to establish a lay regime; to draw up social security legislation in cooperation with the trade unions; to introduce new election laws; to coordinate the commercial and industrial sections of the economy; to follow a policy of "genuine non-alignment" and to work for the cooperation of the countries of the Fertile Crescent in all fields with the view to a future union.

The Operation and Its Collapse. Zero hour was fixed for 02.15 hours, Sunday, Dec 31.

Twenty-two party members, nine of them Syrians, carried out the allotted task of occupying the post and telegraph buildings, sometime after 02.00.

Two party members cut the telephone lines between Tyre and Sidon.

Fu'ad Awad alerted his company at Tyre at 21.00 on Dec 30 to occupy the Defence Ministry. His force numbered 90 men in 13 armoured cars and nine jeeps. Together with 20 armed party members led by Bashir Ubayd (including five Palestinians and one Syrian), they took up positions in the square facing the Ministry. Meanwhile, with the aid of NSP members, Khayrallah had escaped from detention and at 02.45 joined Awad.

Awad and Khayrallah entered the building, where they sent out a forged order in a [vain] attempt to bring Khayrallah's unit to Beirut from Marj-Ayun, in the south. In the building they encountered a number of loyal officers, headed by Col. Iskandar Ghanim, the Deputy Chief of Staff, and Col. Antun Sa'ad, head of the Deuxième Bureau (some of the officers had gathered there on hearing of the rebel's moves before they arrived at the ministry). The loyal officers were in the upper storey and the rebels on the ground floor. When the loyal officers refused to surrender, the rebels opened fire, which was returned. The rebels retreated from the building and found that a loyal infantry force had arrived on the scene. They tried, without success, to persuade its commander to come over to their side; meanwhile, small loyal armoured detachments had arrived. Awad's men refused to open fire, on his orders, and having also been informed that the attempt to kidnap the President had failed, the rebel officers fled [some time after 04.00].

Earlier, the rebels had kidnapped a number of officers who had gone to the Defence Ministry, and transferred them to Dik al-Mahdi.

The attempt to kidnap the President was abandoned; a detachment of 25 armed party members under the command of Subhi Abu Ubayd, together with Lt. Ali al-Hajj Hasan, dispersed after their scout found army units on the road to the presidential palace.

A group of 17 NSP members succeeded, however, in kidnapping Brig. Shmayyit, the Chief of Staff, and Col. Abd al-Qadir Shehab from their Beirut residence, killing three soldiers and wounding two during the operation.

The PM and other politicians were to be kidnapped with the aid of party members in the police, but this had not been done by the time it became clear that the coup had failed.

In the course of the operation the barracks of the 16th Emergency Police Squad were temporarily occupied by two armoured cars of Awad's regiment.

The seizure of the broadcasting station was not attempted.

Last Stand of Rebels at Dik al-Mahdi. When the party leaders realized that the coup had failed, they conferred at Mar Sam'an Monastery but failed to agree on any particular plan. Sa'adah and Jubayli left for Dik al-Mahdi, leading a convoy of cars, taking Brig. Shmayyit and Col. Shehab with them.

While Sa'adah tried to contact the authorities, Jubayli organized armed resistance with the help of Jarjura Zuraqy. There were 55 men, including eight Syrians and six Palestinians, armed with automatic weapons and rifles.

At 14.00 army troops took up positions along the road opposite Asad al-Ashqar's house, began to cordon off the village, and called on the rebels to surrender. Sa'adah, Jubayli and some others left again, taking with them Brig. Shmayyit and Col. Shehab whom they eventually abandoned on the road. The rest of the armed men opened fire after they had left. Fire was exchanged for two hours, until 16.30; three soldiers and several rebels were killed and an officer wounded. The rebels then began to flee, but several remained in the house and surrendered only the next day, after it had been shelled. (R. Beirut, May 9 [1]; Hayat, Jaridah, May 10, 1962)

SECURITY MEASURES

Occupation of NSP Strongholds. Dik al-Mahdi and Bayt ash-Sha'ar, the two NSP strongholds near Beirut, were occupied by the army on Jan 1, 1962. There was armed resistance, and the villages were shelled by tank guns. In Dik al-Mahdi, Asad al-Ashqar's house and others were destroyed and two truck-loads of documents were seized; 120 armed men in all were taken prisoner.

Military operations against the NSP in the mountains to the east and north-east of Beirut continued on Jan 2 and 3, 1962 (R. Beirut, Jan 2 [4]; Hayat, Jan 3, 1962) and several non-Lebanese NSP members were killed. (See below: Casualties.)

Security Measures. Throughout Jan 1962 the army, air force and police rounded up NSP members and other suspects, and searched for arms.

The security forces were placed on a full emergency footing. Road blocks were set up all over the country and all persons were required to carry identity cards. Key points in the towns and elsewhere were heavily guarded and there were frequent armed patrols.

The security forces were authorized to fire at anybody disobeying orders. There were frequent exhortations to citizens to help the authorities to apprehend wanted persons, and warnings of the consequences of sheltering fugitives.

Security measures were even intensified with time. On Jan 11 all ministers were given bodyguards, and on Jan 13 all permits for private radio transmitters were cancelled. (Hayat, Jaridah, BBCM, Jan 1962)

Only at the beginning of Feb 1962, when the mass arrests had ceased, were some of the security measures cancelled. In the middle of the month army units were withdrawn from the approaches of Beirut, but road blocks, now manned by police, continued. The state of emergency was partially lifted only at the end of Feb, and was not cancelled in the security forces until March 26, 1962. (Jaridah, Feb 6, 14, 20, 23, March 27, 1962)

Mass Arrests. Immediately after the coup the number of arrests was especially heavy in the [predominantly Maronite] Matn district and the Nahr al-Kalb valley, Mt. Lebanon, to the east and north-east of Beirut, but large-scale arrests were reported later in all provinces. There were many arrests in the north, especially in Kura district [predominantly Greek-Orthodox].

On Jan 1, 1962, the number of detainees was reported as 400, and the next day as 1,195. Until the end of Jan there were almost daily announcements of up to 300 arrests, but during the last week of the month the number fell gradually from some fifty to twenty. [Sporadic arrests continued into Feb and even March 1962.] (Hayat, Jaridah, BBCM, Jan, Feb, 1962)

On Feb 6 the Minister of Justice announced that up to Feb 4, 6,435 persons had been interrogated and 2,437 of them detained. On March 10 he stated that only 525 remained under detention. (Hayat, Feb 7, March 11, 1962)

Sa'adah Arrested; Majority of NSP Leaders Still at Large. Of the leaders, Sa'adah was arrested on the day of the coup, Khayrallah on Jan 11, Awad on Jan 20, Asad al-Ashqar on Feb 2 and Ubayd on Feb 15. The latter was captured after a comb-out of an area east of Beirut by some thousand soldiers.

When the bill of indictment was published on May 5, 14 out of the 25 party leaders named in it were still at large. They were Emile Ra'd, Nadhir Azmah, Abdallah al-Qubrusi, Umar Abu Zlam, Rami al-Yaziji, Yusuf al-Ashqar, Yusuf al-Mu'allim, Philippe Musallim, Raja al-Yaziji, Narsi Abu Sulayman, George Salibi, Iza Salimiah, Nicolas Trad and Ali Ghandor. The last four had gone abroad before the coup to establish political contacts for the future NSP regime. (Compare with the full list of party leadership in the indictment above; see also below: The NSP after the coup.)

Of the two Syrian military experts, Al-Jubayli absconded and Nimah was killed while attempting to escape. (Hayat, Jaridah, BBCM, Jan-Feb 16, 1962; Bill of Indictment—see above.)

Casualties: 27 Killed. According to a statement by the Minister of Justice on Feb 6, 1962, casualties during and after the coup were as follows:

Six of the security forces were killed, in Beirut, and more than 20 wounded, most of them at Dik al-Mahdi.

The security forces killed 19 non-Lebanese NSP members, and two Lebanese were killed on the night of the coup. (Jaridah, Feb 7, 1962)

[The 19 non-Lebanese were killed during the mopping-up operations, e.g.:] It was announced on Jan 2, 1962, that six persons had been killed while attempting to escape during arrests and searches, and on Jan 5, 1962, three other deaths were reported. (Hayat, Jan 3, 6, 1962)

Arms Seizures. Together with the arrests, the seizure of considerable quantities of light arms, including Hotchkiss medium machine guns (formerly used by the Lebanese Army), ammunition and explosives were reported daily throughout Jan 1962. A number of wireless transmitters were also found. Other large caches were discovered; one contained seven Hotchkiss guns and other weapons. (Hayat, Jaridah, BBCM, Jan 1962)

Sporadic seizures continued in Feb 1962. On Feb 20 it was announced that an additional large cache of arms, including ten 12.7mm dual purpose antitank-antiaircraft machine guns, had been found in Dik al-Mahdi, following the interrogation of Bashir Ubayd (Hayat, Feb 20; Jaridah, Feb 21, 1962). Later, three bazookas, three anti-aircraft machineguns and ten Hotchkiss guns were found near a village in the northern Biqa'. (Hayat, Feb 25, 1962)

In the next few days, about ten wireless transmitters were found in Bayt ash-Sha'ar village (Matn) (Jaridah, Feb 25, 1962) and a complete wireless station, including a 1,000 kw. transmitter, was found in al-Ashqar's house in Dik al-Mahdi. (Hayat, Jaridah, March 7, 8, 1962)

Widespread Rumours; Arrests. Immediately after the coup the authorities warned the press against the publication of incorrect information. On Jan 3, 1962, the Newspaper Association set up, with the agreement of the government, a committee to censor news and comment (Hayat, Jan 3, 4; Jaridah, Jan 4, 5, 1962). Ash-Sham [organ of Sham'un's party] was closed in Jan 1962 and its editor later arrested. On Feb 3, 1962, he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment for publishing incorrect information (Jaridah, Jan 5, 21; Amal, Jan 23; Hayat, Feb 4, 1962). [There were frequent measures against other papers.]

With time the authorities became more and more concerned about the spread of rumours ascribing unlawful motives, favoritism, etc., to the security forces in carrying out arrests, releases and other measures. On Jan 16, 1962, the Defence Ministry spokesman warned that the rumours were part of an NSP campaign, which had been planned for the eventuality of the coup's failure and was intended to break up national unity, especially in the communal sphere, and to undermine the morale of the army. (Hayat, Jan 17, 1962; in Feb and March 1962 there were further statements and reports to the same effect. Jaridah, Feb 16, March 7, 1962.)

There were frequent denials of various rumours, such as that the state of emergency had damaged the tourist industry and the transit trade, or that a military government was to take over. (Hayat, Jan 25; Jihad, Jordan, Feb 25 1962)

In mid-March the spreading of rumours was apparently even intensified, and it was reported that the security authorities were to establish a special unit to combat them. The Phalanges also resolved on an anti-rumour campaign. On March 11 it was reported that 90 members of what was called the "fifth column" had been arrested for spreading rumours. The Liberation Party (hizb al-tahrir) was said to be collaborating with the NSP in this campaign. (Anwar, March 9, 11, 13; Jaridah, March 14, 1962)

Measures Against Arab Refugees and Alien Arabs. [As will be seen from the indictment above, many Arab refugees were involved in the coup. The authorities instituted closer surveillance of the refugees. According to UNRWA statistics there were 140,000 refugees in Lebanon.]

On Jan 7, 1962 the refugees were strictly confined to their camps and all those living outside were instructed to register. Later, arrests of refugees who had disobeyed these orders were reported. (ANA, Jan 7, 9 [11]; Jaridah, Jan 19, 25, 1962)

On Jan 19, 1962 all refugees were ordered to obtain special permits, and former refugees who had become citizens were obliged to register. (Jihad, Jordan, Jan 20; Hayat, Feb 4, 1962)

census of refugees to assist the security measures. (Amal, March 18; Jaridah, March 31, 1962)

The government prepared a bill for the regulation of political asylum. (Text in Hayat, Jan 10, 1962)

Syrian, Jordanian and Iraqi nationals and Arab refugees were subjected to special restrictions when entering or leaving the country, which were lifted in March in regard to Syrians and Iraqis. (Jaridah, Jan 10, March 7, 10, 1962)

In Jan-March there were frequent reports of the deportation of aliens for security reasons. (See e.g., Jaridah, Jan 6, Feb 28, March 3, 28, 1962)

POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS

Cabinet and Parliament Unanimous; Army Rewarded. During the first days after the coup, the Cabinet, sitting together with the President, occupied itself mainly with security measures, such as supervision of party funds and activities, regulation of entry and sojourn of aliens, regulation of Arab refugee affairs, organization of mass media, and control of the source of newspaper funds. Najib al-Kfuri was appointed to investigate the affair. The NSP was outlawed and the illegality of the Liberation Party (hizb al-tahrir) was reaffirmed. (Hayat, Jaridah, Jan 3, 4, 5, 1962)

Premier Karami reported on the coup at a special session of the Chamber on Jan 2, 1962, stressing the serious damage the coup might have done to Lebanon's security and her reputation abroad, had it not been crushed in a matter of hours. Karami and deputies of all parties praised the army for its prompt action and dwelt on the unity, brotherly love and democratic spirit which, they said, characterized the people of Lebanon. A unanimous decision expressed these sentiments and urged "the responsible authorities to strike speedily and firmly at the hands of criminals, whoever they may be." The Chamber also announced its complete support for "all measures that have been or will be adopted by the authorities in this regard."

The atmosphere of unity was disrupted, however, when Albert Mukhaybar of Sham'un's National Liberals compared the attempted coup with the 1958 rising. Sa'ib Slim demanded a retraction, and Sulayman Farajiyah slapped Mukhaybar twice in the face. Disorder broke out in the Chamber, but the deputies soon calmed down. (Jaridah, Jan 3; R. Beirut, Jan 2, 3 [4], 1962)

[The apparent unanimity of politicians and public in condemning the coup aroused some speculation on the possibility of a new intercommunal settlement.] It was reported that President Shehab was discussing the possibility of a "New Charter" as the political basis of a "New Lebanon." There was also talk of a people's convention to seek a solution for Lebanese problems. The reports stressed that the atmosphere created by the unanimous reaction to the plot was conducive to such attempts (Jaridah, Jan 10; Hayat, Jan 12, 1962). [Nothing came of these beginnings, however.]

On Jan 10 the Cabinet decided, in accordance with a law on compensation in cases of rebellion, to grant an extra month's salary to all members of the security forces in appreciation of their special efforts. (ANA, Jan 10 [12], 1962)

Allegations that Authorities Deliberately Allowed Plot to Ripen to Destroy NSP. According to The New York Times correspondent in Beirut, informants close to the government said on Dec 31 that "security forces had received advance notice of the attempted coup and had permitted the insurgents to strike in the hope of wiping out the movement." (NYT, Jan 1, 1962)

[The report does not specify whether this advance notice was received on the night of the coup, after the plotters had started to move but before their forces reached Beirut—for which verification is cited below—or at some previous time, as it seems to imply. The following items may have some relevance to the latter case: (1) It was reported that after the breakup of the UAR the security authorities had intensified their surveillance of the NSP (Jaridah, Dec 8). (2) Capt. Shawqi Khayrallah was detained some time before the coup (MENA, Jan 1 [2], 1962). (3) According to Telegraph, the Phalanges had prior knowledge of the coup and had warned a number of politicians not to remain at home during the night in question (Amal, Jan 3, 1962). (4) About two weeks before the coup a decree was published obliging all persons to carry identity cards, reportedly because information had been received, two weeks previously, of large-scale infiltration into Lebanon by persons who contacted the NSP. However, though the security authorities were on the alert, the coup came as a surprise. (Jaridah, Jan 4, 1962)

Phalanges Countermeasures. Al-Amal, the Phalanges paper which quoted the above item from Telegraph, did not confirm it, but said that it had been informed at 01.30 on Jan 31, 1962 and had in turn informed Pierre Jumayil, who "resolved on the necessary measures." These were [according to a pro-UAR source] the placing of armed squads at road intersections in eastern Beirut, while Jumayil himself went immediately to the President's residence at Sarbah. PM Karāmi was reported to have praised Jumayil warmly. (Amal, Jan 3; Hawadith, Jan 5, 1962)

Allegation of British, Jordanian Participation. [The UAR mass media and the pro-UAR Lebanese press alleged that the UK was behind the coup. In the extensive UAR reporting on the subject this was practically the main theme. British military moves in Dec, which were otherwise understood to be connected with the Kuwait affair (see p 138), were interpreted as moves in a British plot. Pro-UAR Lebanese politicians like Kamāl Junblāt and Ma'arūf Sa'ad joined in these allegations during the first days after the coup, though they did not persist later on. The indictment made no mention of any British connection with the NSP.

[On the other hand, the fact of Jordanian aid to the NSP was quickly established, though the Jordanians denied any knowledge of the coup. According to Lebanese sources, Jordan harboured a number of absconding NSP leaders, (see below).]

Camille Sham'un and Other Suspected Politicians. [Camille Sham'un, the former President, and members of the party, the National Liberals, were widely suspected of collaboration with the NSP. Immediately after the coup it was rumoured that Sham'un had been the candidate for the Presidency and Sāmi as-Sulh (PM under Sham'un) for the premiership in case of success. But Al-Hawadith [anti-Sham'un and pro-UAR], which claimed that the UK was behind the plot, thought this an unlikely choice, since Sham'un and as-Sulh were too unpopular. (Hawadith, Jan 5)

Edgar Lyān, secretary of the National Liberals, and some ten members of the party were arrested (Jaridah, Jan 6, 1962). It was reported that Lyān denied any knowledge of the coup but admitted having had contacts with the NSP with a view to uniting the two parties, Fu'ād Lahūd serving as middleman.

On Jan 14, 1962, it was reported that Sham'un, among some other politicians, was forbidden to leave the country.

Kāzīm Khalil, a former minister and Deputy President of the National Liberals, and his brother, Abd ar-Rahmān, were also arrested. They were said to have met Capt. Awad often, in Tyre and Beirut. [They were released on Jan 31, 1962.]

On Jan 18 Sham'un denied any knowledge of the coup. He said the Fertile Crescent plan had been buried long ago and that he himself had never believed in it. He reacted to further press reports purporting to show that the authorities suspected him by filing defamation charges against several papers. (Jaridah, Jan 6, 10, 14, 19, 31, Feb 6, 21; Anwar, Jan 7; Nahar, Feb 11, 1962)

Other politicians who were reportedly forbidden to leave the country were: Jawād Būlus, Sulaymān al-ʿAlī and Fawzi al-Qawūqji (who were mentioned in the indictment, see above). (Jaridah, Nahar, Jan 4; Hawadith, Jan 19; BBCM, Jan 16, 1962)

Western Comment Blames "Lunatic Fringe." Western comment in general attributed scant significance to the coup.

The Economist described the NSP as "a rightwing movement of a slightly dotty kind" and thought that "the lunatic fringe aspect was strongly in evidence." "The suppression of the NSP can hardly be anything but salutary for Lebanon," the paper summed up; "memories of 1958 are still vivid, and the public at large is nervous of extremism of any kind. The farcical nature of the coup has thoroughly discredited the movement." (Economist, Jan 6, 1962; for a similar judgement see Sunday Times, Jan 7, 1962.)

The New York Times commented that the uprising was such a fiasco that it went to show the essential stability of the regime. However, since the two religious communities could only coexist, not really merge, and in view of the country's history of instability, Lebanese internal strife should never be dismissed too lightly, the paper added. (NYT, Jan 2, 1962)

THE NSP AFTER THE COUP

On Jan 1, 1962 the government outlawed the NSP in Lebanon. (Hayat, Jan 3, 1962)

On Feb 6, 1962 all former members were instructed to register with the police, who would issue special identity cards. The order met with scant response. (Jaridah, Feb 7; Amal, Feb 14, 1962)

The NSP faction led by George Abd al-Masīh was found to have been unconnected with the plot, but the authorities resolved not to permit them to conduct any political activity. (Hawadith, Feb 9; Kul Shay', Feb 10, 1962)

NSP Intensifies Activities Abroad. [The authorities and the press showed much concern about the continuing activities of the NSP abroad, among the Lebanese communities in Africa, Europe and Latin America, and in Jordan.]

An NSP letter from London to the Lebanese press restated the party's Greater Syria concept (Jaridah, Jan 25, 28, 1962). Nicolas Trād was reported to be writing against the Lebanese regime in the French press (Kul Shay', Feb 3, 1962). A meeting of Lebanese diplomats in Paris at the beginning of Feb was reported to be concerned, among other things, with devising measures against the NSP campaign abroad (Hawadith, Feb 2, 1962). NSP propaganda against the Lebanese regime was reported from the Ivory Coast, Brazil and other Latin American countries (Hawadith, Feb 6; Answer, Feb 7; Sayyad, Feb 8, March 22; Jaridah, Feb 24, 1962). The government reportedly contemplated sending a mission, headed by Pierre Jumayil, to the Lebanese communities abroad to counter the NSP activities. (Kul Shay', Feb 10, 1962)

Abseeding NSP Members in Jordan. A number of NSP members who took part in the plot absconded to Jordan. In mid-March 1962 it was reported that shortly after the coup Lebanon had requested the Jordanian government to extradite a number of NSP members who had taken part in it; Jordan had not yet replied. The Jordanian Ambassador in Beirut denied that there had been such a request, but Lebanese papers said at the end of the month that four requests had been sent.

Among the NSP leaders who reportedly stayed in Amman under the Jordanian government's protection or active support were: George Salibi, Salim Abu Zayd, Nadhir al-Azmah, Rami al-Yaziji, Raja al-Yaziji, Isa Salim and Umar Abu Zlam. Salibi was said to have been elected leader of the group. (Answer, March 14, 16, 27, 29, 30; Jaridah, March 14, 16, 17, 21, 24, 1962)

WORKERS AND LABOUR

Labour unrest, which acquired serious proportions in 1960 (MER 1960, pp 362 ff), continued throughout 1961, in the form of strikes and demonstrations for higher wages and improved social benefits. Political repercussions included government-sponsored legislation on wages and social insurance.

Cabinet members stressed the importance of the problem. In March for instance, Maurice Jumayil, the Minister of Supply, said in the Chamber: "If we do not succeed in persuading employers to pay realistic wages, riots will certainly break out throughout the country." (Hayat, April 1)

LABOUR STATISTICS

Various figures on the size of the labour force were published during the year. In May PM Slim told the Chamber that there were 150,000 workers—together with their families more than one-third of the population. (Hayat, May 6)

In Nov a publication of the Ministry of Labour's Statistics Office gave the number of clerks and workers as 120,000, including 60,000 in Beirut. This figure covered industry, trade and services, but not "agricultural institutions," the building trade and the civil service. (Answer, Oct 21)

Figures on the industrial working force were given as follows: in 1960—30,400 employees in 4,559 enterprises (Hayat, July 16); in 1961—60,909 employees in 5,901 enterprises. (Hayat, Nov 11, 1962)

THE TRADE UNIONS

It was reported in March that according to a "responsible" statistical publication, 45,000 workers were organized in five major trade union federations (Answer, March 24). At the end of 1961 a sixth was added as a result of a rift in the Federation of United Trade Unions (see below). There were also a number of independent unions.

The Federation of United Trade Unions (ittihad an-niqabat al-mustahidah), headed by Gabriel Khuri, was the largest. It was reported to comprise eighteen unions in: railways, Beirut harbour, La Régie des Tabacs, banks, Mohiloil, Shell clerks, Shell workers, Esso workers, Lebanese Petroleum Company (LEPCO), Total (company), hotels and entertainments, electricity in the south, textile workers, the Tripoli refinery, IPC and the American University (employees). (Answer, Nov 25)

The total membership was given as 21,000. (Jaridah, Dec 2)

According to government statistics, 87,630 work-days were lost by strikes in 1960. Of these, 8,000 workers organized in the United Trade Unions were on strike for 75,270 work-days, while in all the other unions put together, 1,350 workers struck for a total of 12,100 work-days (Hayat, Jaridah, March 1). [Compare also the list of unions above with the list of strikes in 1960; MER 1960, pp 262-3.]

Rift in the Federation of United Trade Unions: On Dec 1 Gabriel Khuri, chairman of the Executive Council, announced that, in obedience to a majority decision, he had officially applied on behalf of the Federation for membership in the ICFU.

The unions of the tobacco monopoly (regie), the railways and Beirut port, which had shown leftist leanings in the past, opposed the decision on the grounds that the ICFU was anti-Communist and, together with a fourth union, that of electricity employees which had earlier broken away, formed a new federation, as described below. (For details of the dispute see Jaridah, Dec 2.)

Following the rift only twelve unions were represented at an executive meeting of the Federation on Dec 6 [see below]. (Answer, Dec 7)

The Federation of Labour Unions in Lebanon (ittihad an-niqabat al-ummadiyah fi lubnan). On Dec 6 representatives of the four unions referred to above met and appointed a constituent committee to establish a new federation. The meeting was also attended by representatives of the IPC and Tripoli refinery unions [making up the six unions whose representatives apparently stayed away from the meeting of the United Trade Unions on the same day—see above]. (Jaridah, Dec 2; Jaridah, Dec 3; Answer, Dec 7)

The League of Trade Unions of Workers and Employees (jam'iyat niqabat al-umm al-mustahidah), founded in 1947, was Lebanon's first trade union federation, according to As-Siyasah. In 1961 it consisted of 17 unions and was a member of the ICFU. It was headed by Hussein Ali Hussein and reportedly comprised unions of: bakers, upholsterers, pharmacists' assistants, cinema projector operators, taxi drivers, theatre and cinema actors, barbers and employees in groceries, commerce, cinemas, film studios, Shell, Mobilil [the two latter belonged, according to another version, to the Federation of United Unions—see above], printing, sewing, tourist agencies and greengroceries. (Siyasah, Dec 5)

Another source said the federation comprised 22 unions, but gave no details. (Answer, Nov 25)

The Federation of Independent Trade Unions (ittihād an-niqabāt al-mustaqillah), headed by Na'im Kraydi, was established in 1954. In 1961, it reportedly comprised 13 unions in: mechanical trades, kerosene retailing, tanning, tile manufacturing, port workers (the Beirut port employees belong to the United Trade Unions, see above and under Strikes), pharmaceuticals (clerks and shop assistants), dyeing, goldsmiths, groomers, clerks on ships, and customs clerks. (Siyasah, Dec 5)

The federation was said to be neutralist and a member of the [UAR-sponsored] International Federation of Arab Trade Unions (IFATU). (Answer, Nov 25)

The Federation of Unaffiliated Trade Union (ittihād an-niqabāt al-munfaridah), a small federation with pronounced leftist leanings, was a member of the IFATU (Answer, Nov 25). [Its activities were quite thoroughly covered in the unofficial organ of the Lebanese Communist party, An-Nida'.]

The Federation of Trade Unions in the North (ittihād niqabāt as-shimāl), headed by Mustafa Hamzah, included 13 unions in the Tripoli area. It was also a member of the IFATU. (Siyasah, Dec 5)

STRIKES

The wave of strikes in 1960 continued into 1961. Strikes against private companies were partially successful, but government employees proved powerless, because of a law that empowered the government to dismiss strikers.

Abortive Strikes of Government Employees. At the end of Dec 1960 the Physicians Union (niqabāt al-atibbā) demanded a salary rise and protection against the influx of Arab physicians, now numbering 125, who had come as political refugees. The union denied that its members had gone on strike, while the Minister of Health insisted that they had, but that the strike had failed. Fearing that the minister intended to have its council dissolved, the union went to Sabri Hamādah, the President of the Chamber, to explain their position. The minister stated, however, that the council could not be legally dissolved, and said he regarded the affair as closed. (Jaridah, Jan 1, 4, 7; Hayat, Jan 4, 6)

On Jan 23 about 500 court employees went on strike for higher wages, despite a government warning that any striker would be dismissed. On Jan 31 the government dismissed 54 ringleaders. Students of the Jesuit University and the University of Lebanon held a one-hour solidarity strike; a number of deputies and Patriarch Ma'ūshi asked that the dismissed employees be reinstated. The government, however, only reduced the number of those dismissed to 31 (Hayat, Jan 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, Feb 1, 2, 3, 4). Later it was reported that the dismissed clerks had declared their readiness to undergo a special examination in order to be allowed to return to work. (Hayat, Feb 12)

A strike of temporary employees in the government-owned telephone service broke out on Aug 29, after the failure of negotiations. The employees had demanded permanency after a year's work, sick pay, family allowances, paid annual vacations, paid maternity leave, reimbursement for travel to work, payment of cost-of-living allowances as from the beginning of 1961, and insurance against traffic accidents during working hours. The strikers numbered 800 according to the workers, but the government said they numbered only 120. Many of the temporary workers did not take part.

Sulaymān Faranjīyah, the Minister of Posts, said that all the strikers would be dismissed (Hayat, Aug 30). [After a similar warning in 1960 the strikers immediately returned to work—MER 1960, p. 363.] The strikers issued a pamphlet defending the right to strike. The unions tried to mediate, but the government refused to negotiate while the strike was in progress, and on Sept 5 the minister announced that he now considered all strikers as dismissed. (Hayat, Jaridah, Sept 6)

On Oct 13 the strikers and their families demonstrated and called on the government to allow them to return to work. On Oct 25 all except ten, who were considered the ringleaders, were reinstated. (Hayat, Oct 14, 26)

Strikes Against Private Employees Partly Successful. On May 19 workers in the Aridah Textile Plant in Tripoli struck for a 10% wage increase. When negotiations failed, all the textile workers in the United Trade Unions joined the strike on May 25; the number in Beirut and Tripoli was estimated at 3,300, out of 7,000 in the whole country. The workers demonstrated in Tripoli and several were arrested. The employees at the Aridah factory staged a sit-down strike and were removed by the police. (Hayat, May 20, 21, 23, 27; Orient, May 25, 26)

The strike ended on June 3 after a compromise on wages had been reached. There was agreement on the fixing of a minimum wage as provided in the wage law; payment of strike pay; and increases of 15% on monthly wages up to £L150, 8% from £L151 to £L300, and 5% for wages over £L300. [For details see Hayat, June 4.]

On Aug 14 a new strike broke out in the Aridah factory in protest against the discharge of three hundred workers owing to lack of work. The strike ended on Aug 16 after the Union of Textile Workers had undertaken to find employment for the discharged men. (Hayat, Aug 15, 18)

The United Trade Unions announced on May 26 that after June 2 it would call a strike in any factory that would not act upon the new wage—for which see below (Hayat, Orient, May 27). Accordingly, 1,200 workers in Beirut harbour [which belongs to the government, but is run by a private concern], struck on June 2, and the United Trade Unions announced a one-hour solidarity strike of all its members. On June 6 the strike ended with a temporary arrangement, but was renewed on Aug 4 when no permanent agreement was reached. It came to an end on Aug 11 after an agreement raising the monthly minimum wage from £L 125 to £L132.5 and providing for a general increase of 6%, strike pay, and improved conditions for temporary workers. (Hayat, June 3, 7, Aug 12; Orient, Aug 5, 12)

On Aug 11 employees of the Qadisha Electric Company in Tripoli struck in protest against the discharge of four workers. They were supported by the Federation of Trade Unions of the North, to which their union belonged. The strike ended the following day after the management had agreed to re-engage the discharged workmen. (Hayat, Aug 12, 13)

In Aug the independent Union of Hotel and Restaurant Employees, reportedly comprising 8,000 permanent and 6,000 seasonal workers, threatened to strike if their demands for wage increases and better working conditions were not met. The Union of Hotel Clerks and Workers, belonging to the United Trade Unions, announced its readiness to staff the hotels if the strike took place (Hayat, Aug 15). The threat to strike was quickly settled, owing to pressure and mediation by the government which feared injury to the tourist trade. The agreement provided for family allowances, the exclusion of aliens from the trade, payment for holidays, and supply of working clothes. (Hayat, Aug 17)

LABOUR LEGISLATION

The Wage Law (qanūn al-ujūr). The various labour unions disagreed on the recommendations of a Cabinet committee on wages, which had recommended on Dec 9, 1960 that from Jan 1, 1961, the minimum monthly wage should be raised from £L94 to £L125, and wages in general by 15% in view of the increase in the cost of living since 1955. (See MER 1960, pp 363-4.) [The index, however, had risen more; see MER 1960, p 362.] (See also Economic Survey, above, for actual wages.) At the beginning of Jan, several unions announced that they would strike if the Chamber would not approve the bill unamended. (Hayat, Jan 4)

The Cabinet approved a bill giving effect to the recommendations on Feb 1. (Hayat, Jaridah, Feb 2)

The Chamber passed the bill as detailed above on April 14, and the law was officially published on May 19. (Hayat, Jaridah, April 15, May 21; for complete text see CDL, June 1961.)

The Social Security Bill (qanūn ad-damūn al-ijtimā'ī). At the beginning of the year the government discussed a social security bill, the first of its kind to be introduced in Lebanon. It provided for: (1) health insurance (including maternity benefits); (2) work accident insurance; (3) family allowances for dependent children up to a maximum of five; (4) retirement pensions.

In the first stage, the scheme was to apply to all wage-earners, with the following exceptions: agricultural workers would enjoy work accident insurance only and only if the accident was caused by a machine powered by other than man or animal energy; domestic servants would enjoy health insurance only; state employees would enjoy work accident and health insurance only. In the second stage agricultural workers would be subject to all provisions of the law. According to Al-Hayat, the second stage was to comprise "the fellahin and the other popular classes." (Hayat, Feb 22; Mid. East Forum, April)

On Feb 21 the Cabinet decided that the scheme would be largely financed by the employers. The government would contribute in proportion to the number of civil servants, and only a very small contribution would be made by the employees. (Hayat, Jaridah, Feb 22)

On March 15 the Cabinet approved the bill in principle and set up a committee, composed of the Ministers of Finance, Planning and Labour, to consider its implementation. (Hayat, Jaridah, Orient, March 16)

The labour unions, particularly the Federation of United Trade Unions, seriously objected to the scheme, which the latter said was hastily drawn up and disregarded the absence of reliable labour statistics. They also argued that there were no guarantees that the bill would be implemented by the employers and demanded a government subsidy to assure implementation. Some unions maintained that the social benefits they had already gained were far superior to those proposed in the bill.

Objections also came from the employers, on the ground that the financial hazards involved were unforeseeable; they too demanded a government subsidy. (Hayat, Jaridah, Feb 22; Mid. East Forum, April; CDL, Jan, April; Orient, April 15)

Answering these criticisms, Pierre Jumayil [who throughout the year enthusiastically supported the plan] said that the government had already allocated £L1 million for the implementation of the scheme (Orient, Aug 1). On Aug 9, the government finally adopted the bill with several amendments. (Hayat; Jaridah, Aug 10)

[The bill had not been introduced in the Chamber by the end of the year.]

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Lebanon's foreign policy continued unchanged from the previous year; (see MER 1960, p 366). It was designed primarily to preserve the country's independence and internal unity in face of the division between the Muslim pan-Arab sector and the Christian sector which advocated a "Lebanese Lebanon" and was pro-Western. The government therefore sought to pursue a neutral course both in Arab affairs and the world at large.

In spite of its quest for neutrality, however, the government was repeatedly involved in inter-Arab conflicts by both internal and external political elements. (For details see above: Synopsis of Internal Affairs.) According to Syrian accusations, Lebanese territory was repeatedly utilized as a base for subversive activities against Syria: by Jordan before Syria's secession from the UAR, by Cairo after the union had broken up. When conflicts occurred, Lebanon sometimes sought to mediate between the parties.

Lebanon participated in the Belgrade Conference of Non-aligned Countries. She had, however, not been invited to the preparatory conference in Cairo; a Cairo paper explained that though she had declared herself non-aligned, she had in practice followed Western policies. The Lebanese Foreign Minister thereupon explained Lebanon's neutralism: she did not prefer one country to another, no foreign bases would be allowed on her territory and she regarded herself bound only by the Arab League Charter. In the end Lebanon was invited to the conference after the basis for participation had been widened. At the conference, PM Sīlām reiterated that Lebanon's non-alignment was "linked to its people's unity and to its independence"; he was non-committal on the world issues that occupied the conference.

At the UN General Assembly Lebanon's voting record, like that of all other Arab countries, showed a much higher rate of coincidence with that of Communist than with that of Western countries. Nevertheless, she was placed among those Arab countries which voted relatively more often with the West. At both the 15th and 16th sessions only Tunisia's, Jordan's and Libya's votes coincided more frequently with those of the US, while at the 15th session Lebanon's vote coincided less often with the Communist countries than that of any other Arab country.

Official relations with the Western countries continued to be friendly, whilst the Muslim pan-Arab sector often attacked them. A courtesy call of the 6th Fleet to Beirut provoked some internal opposition and attacks by the Communist press. USOM wound up its activities in Lebanon, after having spent some $64m. since the Point Four programme was inaugurated in 1951; on the other hand an agreement was signed for the supply of US surplus grain. The US also supplied ammunition, and arms were also reportedly shipped.

The UK was accused by Pan-Arab spokesmen of plotting against the country, especially in connection with the attempted NSP coup. The British Middle East Centre of Arab Studies in Shamlan was denounced as a spy training centre and its closure was demanded; this the government did not agree to. The opposition similarly complained about IRFED, a French private association, which had been appointed by the government to advise on development. A technical agreement was signed with Western Germany.

The USSR approved Lebanon's policy of neutrality but protested indirectly against the US 6th Fleet visit and directly against a clause in the Lebanese-West German agreement which, it said, illegally treated West Berlin as part of the GFR and thus violated Lebanon's neutrality. It was reported that Lebanon had rejected an offer of Soviet aid. Routine trade and other relations continued with the USSR and East European countries.

In Africa, Lebanon's policy was to strengthen her relations on the continent and "combat Israel activity"; her special concern, however, was the Lebanese emigrants, estimated at close to 130,000 (see MER 1960, p 364). Complaints mounted by emigrants, who claimed that their interests, which were mostly financial and mercantile, were being seriously endangered by the policy of the newly independent African states. The Lebanese government concerned itself more and more with their affairs, and intervened on their behalf. Towards the end of the year it was reported that large sums were reaching Lebanese banks from West African countries and that Lebanese merchants there intended to return to their home country. Many projects for the strengthening of relations with African countries in the political, economic and cultural spheres were given publicity but only a few were put into effect. The extension of diplomatic relations was apparently affected by the reluctance of Lebanese diplomats to assume African posts.

Lebanon's position as a laissez-faire Arab mercantile and financial centre also played a part in her foreign relations: a number of countries sought to establish marketing centres for the Arab and African markets in the free port of Beirut: Argentina for frozen meat, Brazil for coffee and Japan for general goods.

FOREIGN RELATIONS BY COUNTRIES

THE UNITED STATES

Eisenhower Doctrine "Dead and Buried." The Eisenhower Doctrine (see MER 1960, p 367) came up for discussion again in the Lebanese Chamber of Deputies at the beginning of 1961. On Jan 25, replying to Emile Bustani, PM Slâm stated that "as far as Lebanon is concerned the Eisenhower Doctrine is dead and buried and no power in the world can restore it to life." Raymond Eddé demanded that the government should officially announce its attitude and not confine itself to declarations in the Chamber. (Hayat, Jan 26, 27)

Question of Visits by US Sixth Fleet. On March 21 eight ships of the American Sixth Fleet called at Beirut harbour for a visit. Kamâl Junblât objected to the visit on the ground that it was of a political propaganda character. (Hayat, March 22)

PM Slâm stated, when the commander of the Fleet and the US Ambassador came to visit him, that there was a basic difference between the present call and that in 1958. Then, the Fleet had come to intervene in favour of certain elements, while now the visit was a courtesy call authorized by the government (Hayat; Jaridah; Anwar, March 23). (See MER 1960, p 367.)

On March 23, a time bomb was discovered near the American embassy in Beirut. (Orient, March 24)

In Sept, news of an additional impending visit of the Sixth Fleet provoked a wave of Communist press attacks. An official spokesman replied that Lebanon's harbours were not closed to ships of friendly nations.

The visit was postponed however [and had not taken place by the end of the year]. (Hayat, Oct 11; Amal, Oct 19)

Lebanon's Reply to Kennedy's Note on Arab-Israel Question. See p 200 a.

Economic Aid, Trade. For items of aid see table, p 75.

At the beginning of Feb PM Slâm announced that agreement had been reached in principle with the US for the supply to Lebanon under Public Law 480, of 225,000 tons of American surplus grain over the next three years. Payment would be made in local currency, most of which would be loaned to Lebanon to finance development projects (MEED, Feb 17). The loan was to be repayable within fifteen years at 3½%. (Jaridah, Feb 9)

It was reported that the Lebanese Planning Council (majlis al-tasimim) and the Economic Department of the Foreign Office objected that the terms of the loan did not suit Lebanese economic interests, and that PM Slâm and the Foreign Office had conducted secret negotiations with the US Ambassador to amend the terms. This was denied by Slâm and the director of the department concerned. (Anwar, March 2; Jaridah, March 5, April 2)

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

USOM Activities. After official Lebanese statements that the Point Four agency [this term continued to be used in the Lebanese press though it had officially ceased to exist] would discontinue its activities in the country, which were followed by counter-statements, it was agreed at the beginning of May that the agency would continue the projects it had started. These included the laying of about eight hundred kilometres of roads and the development of Beirut airport. (Jaridah, Feb 1, 8, May 4)

An American source in Lebanon stated in Sept that $64 million had been spent on the Point Four Program in Lebanon since 1951. He said the Agency was about to wind up its activities because African states were more in need of them than Lebanon, which had already achieved excellent economic conditions. (Jaridah, Sept 22)

Later it was reported that the director of the agency had formally announced to the government that its activities in Lebanon would be wound up on June 8, 1962. (Jaridah, Nov 8)

Military Aid. A shipment of American ammunition arrived in Beirut on Feb 15 in accordance with an agreement signed in June 1960. It comprised two hundred tons of light and heavy ammunition and spare parts for vehicles, tanks and cannon. (Hayat, Feb 16)

In June an Egyptian paper reported that the US had sent Lebanon a gift of jet planes, armoured cars, large quantities of arms and wireless equipment. (Akhbar, Cairo, June 28)

Aid in Atomic Research. In Feb the government authorized the US government to set up an atomic exhibition in Beirut. (Hayat; Amal, Feb 4)

It was announced on Sept 2 that a first shipment of American atomic equipment had reached Beirut. It would be used in a joint Lebanese-American research project, and also for the training of Lebanese scientists in the utilization of atomic energy. (See MER 1960, p 367.) (R. Beirut, Sept 2-IMB, Sept 3)

Mutual Facilities. In April it was reported that an ordinance had been prepared exempting US citizens from taxes imposed on foreign citizens holding local work permits. Lebanese citizens were to be similarly treated in the US. (Anwar, April 5)

In July it was reported that the US government had agreed to waive dues on Lebanese merchant ships in American harbours. American ships had enjoyed a similar exemption in Beirut harbour since 1959. (Jaridah, July 26)

An agreement was signed at the beginning of Jan for the Voice of America to broadcast the Lebanese program aimed at Lebanese emigrants all over the world. (Nahar, Jan 11)

American Missions. A US medical mission arrived in Lebanon in March to study the nutrition of the poor and the middle classes. (MENA, March 17 [W 23])

A mission including the American Deputy Secretary of the Treasury and Department of Justice officials arrived in Beirut on Nov 10. One of its aims was to coordinate the fight against the smuggling of drugs to the US through Lebanon. (Jaridah, Nov 11)

On Nov 25 a six-man American Congress mission arrived in Lebanon for an official visit. After meeting with the mission, PM Karāmi said they had discussed current questions, particularly "the Palestine problem." (Hayat, Nov 26, 27)

WESTERN EUROPE, YUGOSLAVIA, BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

Australia. In Jan an Australian commercial representative came to Beirut to discuss the extension of trade ties. (Hayat, Jan 11)

The first and only Australian diplomatic representative in Lebanon, a commercial attaché, took up his duties in Aug. (Amal, July 20; Hayat, Aug 6)

Austria. An Austrian economic mission arrived for an official visit on Feb 2. [It had also visited Jordan and Syria.] (Hayat, Feb 4; R. Amman, Feb 6-IMB, Feb 7)

In Oct negotiations were reported on a comprehensive aviation agreement. [No agreement had been signed by the end of the year.] (Jaridah, Oct 11)

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

Canada. In July it was reported that the Lebanese authorities had been asked to permit the extension of the plans for the Canadian grain silos to be built in Lebanon as a centre of Canada's wheat trade in the ME. (Jaridah, July 13)

On Nov 25 PM Karāmi discussed with Canadian experts, in the presence of the Canadian Ambassador, a project for an aerial survey of Lebanon. (Jaridah, Nov 26)

Denmark. The Lebanese and Danish legations were raised to the rank of embassy. (Jaridah, Nov 15)

France. There were several complaints about French experts operating in Lebanon. In the Chamber a deputy claimed that they were using obsolete methods of management, and they were accused of killing all personal initiative on the part of Lebanese workers. IRFED was even blamed for the closing down of Point Four activities (see under US). (Hayat, March 3, May 6)

IRFED—Institut international de recherche et de formation en vue de développement—was a private, independent association established in Paris and directed by Père Louis-Joseph Lebert. On the invitation of the Lebanese government in 1958, the association sent a mission of experts to prepare a report on the social and economic situation. (CDL, Nov 1960, April 1961)

On Jan 11 the Lebanese government signed a contract with the Electricité de France company for the building of a dam as part of the Litani project. (Hayat, Jan 12)

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

German Federal Republic. In Oct the GFR and Lebanon concluded an agreement on technical assistance.

Talks on economic and technical assistance from the GFR had already been held in 1960 (see MER 1960, pp 367-8). Lebanon had announced her intention of requesting technical aid from West Germany at the beginning of Jan, and talks began in Beirut later in the month. It was reported that the agreement was supported by the US, who had requested her allies to ease her financial burdens by assisting friendly nations. (Hayat, Jan 27, April 29; Nahar, Feb 8)

In June government sources denied rumours that German aid involved military or political obligations on Lebanon's part. (Hayat, June 8)

Agreement was reached on Oct 20. The GFR was to supply technical aid in the form of know-how and equipment; German experts would conduct surveys of agriculture and industry and help to set up institutions for scientific training. Scholarships would be granted to Lebanese students for study in German factories and scientific institutions. (For full text, see CDL, Dec 1961; see also: The USSR on Soviet protest.) (Hayat, Oct 21)

On March 20 an aviation agreement between Lebanon and the GFR was signed in Beirut (Hayat, March 21). In Dec the Lebanese Middle East Airlines and Lufthansa concluded an agreement for cooperation and division of passengers. (MEED, Dec 8)

On April 12 the GFR and Lebanon signed a criminal extradition treaty. (Hayat, April 13)

A four-man mission from the German Social Democrat party arrived in Beirut on April 21, as guests of the government, to study labour problems, culture and tourism (Anwar, April 22). In May Sulaymān Faranjīyah, the Lebanese Minister of Posts, and Uthmān Dana, the Minister of Public Works, visited the GFR. Faranjīyah discussed postal cooperation with his opposite number. (Hayat, May 14)

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

Italy. An Italian trade delegation arrived in Lebanon in May to explore investment opportunities in development projects, including the enlarging of Beirut harbour, road construction and land amelioration. (Hayat, May 17; R. Beirut, May 17 [W, 25])

In July the government announced that Italians working in Lebanon would be exempted from the tax on foreign workers. A similar concession had been granted to Lebanese workers in Italy. (Anwar, July 29)

An Italian firm was awarded a roadmaking contract. (Anwar, Oct 29)

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

Switzerland. In April an ordinance was issued exempting Swiss nationals in Lebanon from taxes on bolders of work permits, in recognition of reciprocity on the part of Switzerland. (Anwar, April 5)

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

United Kingdom. The UK was accused by the opposition and Kamāl Junblāt, the Minister of Education, of subversive activities.

In Feb Junblāt announced that he had information about a British Intelligence plot to assassinate various Lebanese and Arab statesmen. He declared that Camille Sham'un was implicated, and warned the government to keep a close watch on British agents in Lebanon. (Anwar, Feb 9; Hawadith, Feb 10)

Several (pro-UAR) papers attacked the British Middle East Centre for Arabic Studies (MECAS) in the village of Shamlan, near Beirut. They claimed that the Centre was training British spies and meddling in Lebanon's internal affairs. (Hawadith, Feb 1; Siyasa, Feb 11)

[The Centre was established in 1944 in Jerusalem by the British Foreign Office to train personnel for ME assignments. It was transferred to Jordan in 1947, and moved to Lebanon in 1948. (Times, April 14)]

Following these reports Junblāt demanded the closing of MECAS. (Jaridah, March 3, June 7; Anwar, April 12, May 6)

A British source said that the Centre's activities were limited to Arabic and Islamic studies. There were many Arab teachers on its staff and its students included Commonwealth citizens from Ghana and the Asian countries, as well as British Foreign Office personnel. (Times, April 14)

At the end of May it was reported that the Lebanese government had decided to close MECAS, but at the end of July the Foreign Minister announced that to the best of his knowledge it was not engaged in espionage. On July 31, in answer to a question in the Chamber, the government announced that MECAS was operating legally and would not be closed. (Anwar, May 28; Jaridah, June 7, July 25; Hayat, Times, Aug 1)

[Pro-UAR] papers alleged that the British embassy had had a hand in the attempt on Sā'ib Slam's life at the beginning of March. (See p 389.)

A British parliamentary delegation arrived on May 18 for an unofficial visit. (Hayat, May 19)

UAR sources as well as some Lebanese politicians and (pro-UAR) newspapers accused the UK of having supported the abortive coup d'état of the Nationalist Social party at the end of Dec. (See p 403 a.)

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

Yugoslavia. On Jan 20 it was reported that diplomatic relations between Lebanon and Yugoslavia would be raised to embassy rank (Hayat, Jan 21), but in a list of diplomatic missions carried by Al-Jaridah at the beginning of Nov the Lebanese mission in Belgrade still appeared as a legation. (Jaridah, Nov 2)

Negotiations on a cultural agreement were also reported in Jan (Jaridah, Jan 15; Hayat, Jan 20). [No reports were found on the conclusion of such an agreement during the year.]

It was reported in May that a Yugoslavian concern had won a contract for work in the Litani river development project. (Kul-Shay, May 6)

COMMUNIST COUNTRIES THE USSR

Keeping Lebanon Neutral; Protest Against US Sixth Fleet Visit. On Lebanon's Independence Day, as in the previous year (see MER 1960, p 78), Pravda expressed approval of the country's policy of neutrality: "The Lebanese people strives for the continuation of the policy of neutralism and non-participation in military alliances." It recalled the USSR's role in bringing about the evacuation of foreign troops from Lebanon in 1946 and 1958. "The Soviet Union is the loyal friend of the Arabs," the paper declared. (Pravda, Nov 22)

At a reception at Friendship House, Moscow, the Lebanese Ambassador emphasized Lebanese-Soviet friendship and Lebanese neutrality. (Tass, Nov 22 [SU 24])

The Soviet press quoted Lebanese protests against the visit of the US Sixth Fleet in March, including an allegation that it was intended to exert pressure during the election campaign [in 1960?—there were no elections in 1961]. (Atiya 1 Afrika Segodnya, Nos. 5, 6, 1961, quoted in Misan, Dec 1961; this article also contains an appreciation of Lebanese politics. See also Trud, March 3; Krasnaya Zvezda, March 10, 21, 24, 26; Pravda, March 14.) In Oct, a Lebanese spokesman replied to Lebanese Communist press attacks that Lebanon's harbours were not closed to ships of foreign nations. (Amal, Oct 19)

Cultural Relations; Soviet Cultural Aid Offer? On Jan 19 a Soviet cultural mission, headed by M. Prokofiev, Deputy Minister of Education, arrived in Beirut to discuss student exchanges and expansion of cultural ties. The Education Ministry accepted an offer to arrange a study tour in the USSR for Lebanese technology lecturers. (Hayat, Jan 20, 21; Jaridah, Jan 21)

It was reported, but denied by a Soviet embassy spokesman, that the USSR had offered Lebanon cultural aid (Nahar, Feb 15; Hayat, Feb 22). On March 9 Kamāl Junblāt, the Minister of Education, spoke of talks on a Soviet loan to the Ministry (ANA, March 9 [11]). [No such loan had been reported by the end of the year.]

In Feb a reception on the 75th birthday of the Lebanese writer Marūn Abbūd was held at Friendship House, Moscow, organized by the Soviet Society for Friendship and Cultural Relations with countries of the Arab East, the Soviet Writers' Union and the Asian Institute of the USSR Academy of Sciences. It was attended by the Lebanese Ambassador, Soviet writers and scholars, and Arab students in the USSR. (R. Moscow in Arabic, Feb 9 [SU 11])

In May Dr Georges Hanna, president of the Society for Cultural Relations between Lebanon and the USSR, held a reception in Beirut in honour of the visit of Aram Khachaturian, the Soviet composer. (Tass in English, May 19 [SU 24])

Trade Relations. A protocol, extending the Soviet-Lebanese trade agreement of 1954 for another three years and increasing trade in each direction from £1.15m. to £1.20m. ($6.8m.—$9.1m.) annually, was signed in Beirut on Jan 23. The USSR undertook to buy Lebanese fruit to the value of one-third of Soviet exports to Lebanon (Tass, Jan 23 [W Feb 9]; Hayat, Jan 24; for full text see CDL, March 1961) (See also MER 1960, pp 57-8). During the negotiations the chairman of the Lebanese Manufacturers' Association publicly expressed the hope that the USSR would stop dumping on the Lebanese market industrial products, such as finished cotton goods, which injured local industry and labour. (Hayat, Jan 17) It was reported that Lebanon had rejected a Soviet offer for fuel oil on easier terms than those obtained from the West. (Kul Shay, Jan 14)

The Lebanese government ratified the agreement on June 21. (R. Moscow in Arabic, June 23 [SU 27])

[There were many reports in the Lebanese press on trade with the USSR, especially on fruit exports, which met with difficulties in Western markets.]

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

Soviet Loan Offer Rejected. It was reported in Feb and March—and repeatedly denied by Lebanese government sources—that the USSR had offered a loan to Lebanon (Anwar, Feb 16; Jaridah, March 23). According to another source, the Lebanese Foreign Minister expressed readiness to accept a loan, but not Soviet experts (Haqadith, March 3). A similar report appeared in August (Kul Shay, Aug 5), but according to Al-Hayat a minister had stated that a USSR offer for a loan or technical aid had been refused and would not be repeated. (Hayat, Aug 15)

Soviet Armenian Ambassador-designate Rejected. The replacement of USSR Ambassador S.P. Kiktev set off extended negotiations. Lebanon objected to the candidate proposed because of his Armenian extraction. Finally, at the beginning of July, the USSR announced the appointment of Vasilii Korniev, USSR Consul-General in Damascus, to the post. (Anwar, March 15; Al-Yaum, June 4; Nahar, July 1; Hayat, July 11; Izvestia, Sept 17)

Political Propaganda Issues. At the end of May Lebanese Communist newspapers attacked the government for censoring a film of the space-flight of Yuri Gagarin, the Soviet cosmonaut, claiming that an American film on a similar topic had not been censored. The censorship authorities answered that only sequences containing Communist propaganda had been censored, since the law prohibited political propaganda in films. The USSR embassy refused to show the censored film. (Nida, Anwar, May 24; Pravda, May 25; Hayat, June 4)

An American record was removed from the Lebanese market following a protest by the Soviet embassy on the ground that it praised the Russian pre-revolutionary era, thus injuring the friendly relations between the two countries. (Nahar, Sept 2)

Contacts with the Greek Orthodox Church. On July 15 the Metropolitan of Antakya (Antioch), Ilya Salibi, head of the Greek Orthodox Church in Lebanon and Syria, gave a farewell reception for Kiktev, the outgoing Soviet Ambassador. He praised the traditional relations between the local community and the Russian Church and people, and thanked the Ambassador for his efforts to further these relations and his aid to the Greek Orthodox community in Beirut (Nahar, July 16). (The Russian Church donated the equipment for the Greek-Orthodox hospital in Beirut. See MER 1960, p 78.)

Soviet Protests Against Lebanese GFR Relations. On July 14 the Soviet Ambassador drew the attention of the Lebanese Foreign Ministry to the "misconduct" of the West German embassy in Beirut, which used the title "The German Embassy" in its correspondence. (Izvestia, July 16)

On Dec 12 the USSR embassy demanded the cancellation of the clause in the Lebanese-West German technical cooperation agreement of Oct 20, which made the agreement applicable to West Berlin (see p 408 b; for full text see CDL, Dec 1961), and which, it said, illegally treated Berlin as part of the GFR. The embassy statement added that public opinion might regard this as encouragement of West German aggressive intentions against Democratic Germany. Moscow Radio commented that this was a direct blow at Lebanon's official policy of positive neutralism. (ANA, Dec 12 [14]; R. Moscow in Arabic, Dec 14 [SU 16]; Hayat, Dec 13)

In reply, Foreign Minister Taqia declared that the agreement was absolutely valid, but said he wished to avoid a verbal battle with the USSR (Hayat, Dec 16). Kul Shay wrote that the real reason behind the Soviet protest was Lebanon's unyielding attitude to local Communist activity. (Kul Shay, Dec 16)

Lenin Peace Prize Awarded to a Lebanese. The Lenin Peace Prize for 1961 was awarded on May 1 to Anton Thabit, a Lebanese engineer (a leader of the Lebanese Peace Partisans). In June he was presented with the prize by a Soviet academician in Beirut. (Pravda, May 1, June 27; Tass, May 2 [SU 4]; Nida, June 7)

OTHER COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

Bulgaria. A Bulgarian delegation which arrived in Beirut on Nov 1 proposed the establishment of diplomatic relations and closer trade ties (ANA, Nov 2 [W 9]). [By the end of the year no diplomatic representatives had been exchanged and no trade agreement signed.]

Czechoslovakia. On Feb 20 an aviation agreement was signed between Czechoslovakia and Lebanon, providing for two direct weekly return flights—one from each country. (Hayat, Feb 21; see also MER 1960, p 78.)

In April the Federation of Independent Trade Unions in Lebanon accepted an invitation from the Czech Workers' Organization for representatives to visit their country. (Amal, April 22)

A protocol was signed in Beirut on Nov 7 increasing the value of trade between the two countries from £1.9 million ($4.1 million) to £12 million ($5.5 million). Czechoslovakia would buy 7,500 tons of Lebanese citrus fruits annually and use 55% of the income from its exports to Lebanon for the purchase of Lebanese products. (CDL, Dec 1961)

For volume of trade see table: ME Foreign Trade.

During the year Czechoslovakia granted ten scholarships to Lebanese students. (Jaridah, April 2, Dec 9)

In the middle of Dec an official Lebanese cultural mission left for Czechoslovakia. (Hayat, Dec 12)

German Democratic Republic. A trade protocol, signed on May 22, raised the annual value of trade between Lebanon and East Germany from £17.5 million to £21.5 million. East Germany undertook to buy 8,000 tons of citrus fruits annually and allocate 65% of the income from its exports to Lebanon for the purchase of Lebanese products and transit goods. (ANA, May 22 [25]; Jaridah, May 23)

Poland. Diplomatic representation was raised to embassy rank. On March 14 the Polish minister presented his credentials as ambassador to the Lebanese Foreign Minister. (Anwar, March 15)

A Lebanese-Polish trade agreement, signed on Oct 5, replacing the 1956 agreement, which expired at the end of the year, provided for trade of up to £19 million each way, and undertook to import 5,000 tons of citrus, among other agricultural products, yearly. (Hayat, Oct 6). (For full text see CDE, Nov 1961.)

NON-ARAB MIDDLE EAST COUNTRIES

Cyprus. On Jan 5 the Cypriot Vice-President, Dr Fazil Küçük, arrived in Beirut "for a special visit." He met the Maronite Patriarch, Bulus Ma'ushi, and the Minister of Economy, and announced that Cyprus would open an embassy in Beirut during the year to foster political and economic relations. (Hayat, Jan 6, 10, 18)

At the end of April a Cypriot parliamentary and government delegation held talks in Beirut on the improvement of political and economic relations. (R. Beirut, April 29 [May 2])

A Cypriot economic delegation conducted talks in Beirut on trade and aviation agreements in Nov and it was reported that the talks would be resumed "shortly" in Nicosia. Lebanon had reportedly refused a request that Cyprus Airways should be allowed to pick up passengers in Beirut on flights to the Persian Gulf. (R. Beirut, Nov 13 [15]; ANA, Nov 20 [W, 30])

In Nov the Lebanese authorities decided to set up a permanent exhibition of industrial and agricultural products in Cyprus. It was reported that Cyprus was willing to facilitate the sale of Lebanese goods by reducing tariffs. (Jaridah, Nov 14)

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

Ethiopia. In June it was reported that Lebanon would establish an embassy in Ethiopia. (Anwar, June 20). [This had not been done by the end of 1961. The Lebanese Ambassador to Sudan remained accredited to Ethiopia as well. The Emperor of Ethiopia's visit to Lebanon, forecast in 1960, did not take place in 1961 (see MER 1960, p 369).]

Iran. At the beginning of April it was agreed to extend the aviation agreement between Iran and Lebanon. (Hayat, Feb 24, April 6)

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

Israel. See the Arab-Israel Conflict.

Somalia. In July three students left Hargeisa for Beirut to study agronomy. (R. Mogadishu, July 27 [W Aug 3])

Turkey. In Feb it was reported that opium was being smuggled from Turkey to Lebanon by boat. (Anwar, Feb 5)

On May 27 the Lebanese customs authorities uncovered a large gang engaged in smuggling into Lebanon, from Turkey, arms bearing Turkish army marks. Machineguns, rifles, pistols, hand-grenades and ammunition were found in Beirut. [No mention was made of the consignee of these arms.] (Jaridah, Anwar, May 28)

At the end of the same month a [pro-UAR] paper reported that a Turkish spy net working in the interests of Israel had been discovered in Lebanon. (Siyassah, May 25)

In July the Lebanese authorities rejected a Turkish demand to extradite a Kurdish leader with Turkish citizenship, on the grounds that he was a political refugee. (Nahar, July 27)

For trade figures see table: ME Foreign Trade.

LATIN AMERICA

Argentina. It was reported in Nov that the Argentine government had asked for permission to erect cold storage facilities in the free port of Beirut harbour to store Argentine meat destined for Middle Eastern and African markets. Al-Jaridah, reporting this, remarked that all requests for facilities in the free port were readily accepted by the Lebanese authorities. (Jaridah, Nov 26)

Brazil. At the end of March an agreement was signed permitting the Brazilian Centre for Coffee Marketing to erect storehouses in the free area of Beirut harbour. (Jaridah, March 23). See MER 1960, p 368.

On July 16 a Brazilian delegation arrived in Lebanon to supervise the setting up of a coffee marketing centre and discussed the development of trade. (Hayat, July 18; ANA, July 16 [W, 20]). When local coffee merchants protested that the centre would damage their business, the government replied that it would be of benefit to the country. (Hayat, Aug 11, 13)

It was agreed that Brazilian ships bringing coffee would carry back to Brazil apples, grapes and pears from Lebanon; the talks touched on the formation of a combined company to foster trade. (Hayat, Aug 11, 13)

In Aug Pierre Eddeh, chairman of the Lebanese Bank Union, left for Brazil for talks on economic relations. (Hayat, Aug 15)

Colombia. On June 21 a cultural agreement was signed in Bogota between Lebanon and Colombia. One of the aims of the agreement, valid for three years, was to encourage reciprocal tourism. (Jaridah, June 22)

Cuba. In Jan the Lebanese government informed Cuba, through the latter's chargé d'affaires in Beirut, of its interest in the situation of Lebanese emigrants in Cuba. (Hayat, Jan 13)

Peru. At the beginning of Dec a commercial delegation from Peru discussed with the Lebanese authorities the expansion of trade between the two nations. (Jaridah, Dec 1; Amal, Dec 2)

ASIA

India. At the end of Jan the president of the Indian Chamber of Commerce visited Lebanon to discuss the marketing of Indian products and the use of Beirut as a transit port for Syrian cotton on its way to India. (Jaridah, Jan 26)

In Feb an Indian trade delegation made preparations to establish a permanent exhibition of Indian industrial goods in Beirut. (Hayat, Feb 22)

An Indian warship arrived in Beirut harbour on April 17 on a goodwill visit. (Hayat, April 18)

Pakistan. President Ayub Khan of Pakistan stopped off in Lebanon on Jan 12 on his way to Europe. He was welcomed by PM Sām and dined with President Shehab. (Hayat, Jan 13)

The government of Pakistan granted two scholarships for Lebanese students for the year 1961-2. (Nahar, May 13)

Indonesia. In April it was revealed that the Lebanese Foreign Office had informed Indonesia, in reply to an inquiry, that its budget did not permit the opening of a legation in Jakarta (Jaridah, April 6). [There is an Indonesian legation in Lebanon.]

Later it was reported that the Lebanese minister in India was to be accredited to Indonesia as well. (Jaridah, Sept 30)

Japan. A Japanese government plan to set up a commercial centre in Lebanon for the sale of Japanese goods in the Middle East and Africa was first discussed by a Japanese representative in Beirut in April. After meeting President Shehab, he announced that the latter had welcomed the suggestion.

Under the plan, it was reported, a special area would be set aside for Japanese use in the free port of Beirut harbour. Assembly plants, to be exempted from income tax, would be set up for Japanese goods, which would be distributed throughout the Middle East and Africa with the help of Lebanese emigrants. Japan offered technical and cultural aid in return.

During the following months the plan was discussed in detail. The Japanese representative met Lebanese emigrants in Africa. Pierre Eddeh, chairman of the Lebanese Bank Union, left at the beginning of Nov to discuss the plan in Japan.

At the beginning of Dec it was reported that the general outline of the proposed project, but not the details, had been agreed on. In the meantime it was decided to set up a Japan-Lebanon Bank, with its main office in Beirut and branches in Middle Eastern and African countries. (Hayat, April 11, Nov 24; Jaridah, April 13, June 22, Nov 5, 14, Dec 7)

During the year Japanese industrialists tested the possibilities of establishing various plants in Lebanon. Plans were reported in April for the erection of electrical appliances, canning, textile and machinery plants (in July) and a tractor plant (in Sept). Local manufacturers expressed misgivings lest some of these projects might injure local industry. (Hayat, April 21; Jaridah, July 2, Sept 6, Nov 14, Dec 2)

GENERAL

Policy: To Strengthen Relations and Combat Israel Activities with the Aid of the Lebanese Emigrants. In Jan the Parliamentary Committee on Foreign Affairs discussed a memorandum by the Foreign Minister on Lebanon's policy in Africa, which was aimed at "strengthening the relations between Lebanon and Africa in particular and the Arabs and Africa in general, and combating Israeli activity in this continent."

The most important points, it was reported, were: (1) "Extension of diplomatic representation throughout the continent on embassy level"; (2) "Appointment of the maximum number of cultural attachés"; (3) "The Lebanese emigrants must fulfil their propagandist duty in coordination with the diplomatic missions"; (4) "A census of emigrants and their trade activities in each African country so that the economic agreements with each country could be based on this census" (Jaridah, Jan 18); (5) Sending Arabic teachers and awarding scholarships to students interested in Arabic. (Hayat, Jan 24)

In Feb it was reported that the Lebanese Foreign Ministry had hastily prepared [general] draft agreements for conclusion with African countries offering, inter alia, to open schools for the teaching of Arabic by Lebanese teachers. These were then sent to the diplomatic representatives in Africa for submission to the authorities, and copies were sent through the Arab League secretariat to the Arab governments to enable them to take similar steps. The urgency was due, it was reported, to "secret information" to the effect that some African countries had expressed a desire to replace their agreements with Israel by similar agreements with the Arab states (Hayat, Feb 14). [No further reports were available on this matter and no such agreements were apparently concluded during the year.]

It was reported in June that the Lebanese government intended to invite African heads of state to visit Lebanon in the summer, and that the heads of state of Ghana and Freetown (sic) had accepted the invitation. The PM of [Northern] Nigeria was due to visit Lebanon on July 4. [For his visit, see under Nigeria.] (Hayat, June 7)

Later it was reported that the Foreign Ministry had been asked by the Lebanese emigrants in Africa to persuade the visiting African leaders to allow them to withdraw their money for investment in Lebanon (Sayyad, Nov 9). [No African head of state visited Lebanon in 1961.]

Extension of Lebanese Representation in Africa; Diplomats Shirk African Service. [Throughout 1961, the Lebanese press reported on the government's plans to extend Lebanon's diplomatic representation in Africa. Some of the missions that had been decided upon the year before were actually set up and their heads of mission were nominated. (See under individual countries.)]

In March it was reported that the Foreign Ministry had decided to set up five embassies with resident Ambassadors in all Africa. Each Ambassador would be accredited to several countries, with a resident consul or chargé d'affaires in each.

Al-Hayāt criticized this policy and called for additional representation in view of the interests of the Lebanese emigrants in Africa as well as the general Arab interests in combating Israeli influence there. (Hayat, March 20, 30)

[By the end of 1961 there were, however, only three resident Lebanese Ambassadors in non-Arab Africa (in Abidjan, Accra and Dakar). The post of resident Ambassador in Liberia, which was vacated in Sept, was not filled again during the remainder of the year. For a possible reason for this situation, see below.]

As in 1960 [see MER 1960, p 369], reports continued that Lebanese diplomats were shirking service in Africa. In Feb it was reported that the Foreign Ministry had failed to persuade a number of diplomats to accept nomination for African posts, in spite of promises to raise their representation allowance. The reasons given were the climate and the political situation in Africa. The Ministry had succeeded only in forcing the diplomats under ambassadorial level to accept nominations, under the threat of dismissal from the service. (Nahar, Feb 15)

Economic Relations. During the year there were several reports on possibilities and government efforts to develop trade with the African countries (e.g. Hayat, Jan 1; Nahar, Dec 8; Jaridah, Dec 10). However, in the Lebanese trade statistics as published in Le Commerce du Liban for the years 1959-61, African countries did not appear (though they might be included under the heading of "other countries"). (CDL, May 15, 1961, Sept 15, 1962)

There were also reports that commercial missions of the government and of commercial and industrial institutions would go to Africa (Jaridah, Feb 18; Hayat, Aug 13), [but no reports on such missions were received].

Henri Jumayil, Liberian Minister in Lebanon, and Anis Bibi, vice-president of the Bankers' Association of Lebanon, went to West Africa in the spring. They reportedly reached agreements with the authorities in Ghana, Ivory Coast, Liberia and Senegal to set up Lebanese banks in these countries (Amal, March 23). Foreign Ministry efforts to encourage and facilitate the opening in Africa of branches of Lebanese economic and financial institutions were also reported (Jaridah, June 22). [No reports were received that such banks or institutions had been opened.]

A Lebanese economic counsellor was appointed for West and Equatorial Africa where he was to try to conclude trade agreements. (Jaridah, Dec 13; Hayat, Dec 16)

Cultural Relations: The Lebanese Ministry of Information sent propaganda films on Lebanon to African countries. The films reportedly met with great success, especially in Lebanese emigrants circles. (R. Beirut, March 22 [24]; Amal, March 23; see also Siyasah, Nov 9; Jaridah, Nov 11.)

The Lebanese government planned to set up four cultural centres in Africa, the main one in Senegal. Their purpose would be "to make propaganda for Lebanon and the Arab questions" (Anwar, Aug 8). [It was not clear whether there was any connection between these centres and the "Lebanese House" or clubs which were also to be set up. See below under Emigrants; Senegal.]

In March it was reported that a plan had been prepared for the award of scholarships to African countries (Hayat, March 11), and in July the government asked the Chamber for the appropriation of an additional $22,831 from the Education Budget, in favour of foreign students in Lebanon, mainly from Africa (Anwar, July 29). (See also below under individual countries for requests for Lebanese teachers and for the award of scholarships.)

THE LEBANESE EMIGRANTS IN AFRICA

(See also above—Policy—and under individual countries.)

Emigrants Claim Interests Jeopardized; Lebanese Government Intervenes. [Mounting complaints by Lebanese emigrants that their interests—mostly mercantile—were being seriously endangered by the policies of the newly independent African states continued in 1961. The Lebanese government concerned itself more and more with their affairs, and intervened on their behalf.]

Fu'ad Buraydi, Director of the Emigrants' Department in the Lebanese Foreign Ministry, went to West Africa in Jan to examine the state of the Lebanese communities there. (Anwar, Jan 8)

In Dakar Buraydi discussed the setting up of a "Lebanese House" to serve as a meeting place for Lebanese and Africans. Similar clubs were to be established in other African capitals with large Lebanese communities (Hayat, Feb 11). [For further developments see under Senegal, below.]

On his return to Lebanon Buraydi said there were 35,000-40,000 Lebanese in West Africa. [According to Lebanese 1960 statistics there were 35,000 emigrants in Africa excluding Egypt, North and South Africa. See MER 1960, p 364.] They were prosperous, though some had misgivings because of recent laws, and had requested Lebanon to intercede on their behalf. Buraydi added that the governments concerned had assured him that there was no ground for anxiety. (Hayat, Feb 3)

Al-Haydi criticized the government for inactivity in the face of bad news from the emigrants in Africa. It was not only the number of embassies to be opened in Africa that was important, but the quality of the representatives, who would have to face a wave of nationalism and xenophobia, the curtailing of "financial freedom," and the "Israeli demon," whose penetration was aimed especially against the emigrants. (Hayat, Jan 24)

In March a Lebanese Foreign Ministry source confirmed that the condition of the emigrants in Africa had deteriorated, though he said that the reports were exaggerated, and gave the following reasons: (1) economic and administrative changes; (2) new laws in some countries hampering trade and commerce, while the emigrants were not allowed to take their money out; (3) refusal of the African banks to grant loans to the emigrants on the grounds that they were not nationals of the country and did not possess real estate; (4) preference by the law in many countries to local nationals in commerce and finance. (Hayat, April 1)

Emigrants Return to Lebanon? [Towards the end of the year, there were reports of a further deterioration in the situation of the emigrants.] According to information reportedly reaching merchants in Lebanon from their Lebanese trading partners in Africa, most of them had started to close down their businesses, with the intention of returning to Lebanon, because of their mounting difficulties. As a result, Beirut commercial circles feared curtailment of economic activity in Lebanon and asked the government to approach the African authorities on behalf of the Lebanese merchants there. The government promised to act accordingly. (Jaridah, Oct 31)

In Nov bank managers in Lebanon said that large sums were reaching their banks from some countries in Asia and West Africa. (Anwar, Nov 11)

UAR Paper Attacks Lebanese Emigrants. In July the editor of Rizq al-Yasuf, Ihsan Abd al-Qudus, wrote that the Lebanese emigrants in Africa had cooperated with imperialism for economic reasons, turning their backs on the nationalist movement and keeping aloof from the people, thinking only of Lebanon. They were divided among themselves, as in their own country, he declared.

It was true that the emigrants had helped the economy of their host countries, but, in spite of a common religion—Islam [?—it may be assumed that many, if not the majority of the emigrants, were Christians]—the emigrants were very distinct from the inhabitants. They had built no mosques or hospitals and all their profits were sent to Lebanon.

With the advent of independence the issue had come to a head: the authorities had put a stop to Lebanese immigration, and some governments had acted against the emigrants by taxation, restrictions on commerce, and heavy penalties for smuggling. Consequently, many Lebanese had decided to leave. The article ended by saying that it was not too late to make amends; the emigrants should regard their host countries as their own, invest money in them and take part in their public life. (Ruz al-Yusuf, July 10)

Al-Haydt's Dakar correspondent declared that the accusations contained in the article were groundless. It had caused great dismay among the emigrants, he said, and had aroused suspicion of them among the Africans, especially in Senegal. (Hayat, Aug 3)

Emigrants' Ties with Lebanon. The Lebanese government awarded 150 scholarships for children of Lebanese emigrants in Africa. (Hayat, Jan 10)

In July it was reported that 7,500 Lebanese emigrants from Africa were spending their summer vacation in Lebanon, while a similar number were on their way, according to emigrant sources. The report emphasized the large income Lebanon derived from such visits. (Jaridah, July 11)

ENTENTE COUNTRIES

Lebanese Emigrants in Ivory Coast. In Aug it was reported that President Houphouët-Boigny had assured a delegation of Lebanese emigrants that there would be no change in their conditions and that they could consider the country their second home.

There were said to be some 2,500 emigrants in the Ivory Coast (according to 1960 Lebanese official statistics—1,854, MER 1960, p 364). A third of them lived in the capital, Abidjan, where they were the wealthiest of the foreign communities. (Hayat, Aug 16)

Diplomatic Relations. In Oct Jân Hâjji Tûma, first Lebanese Ambassador to the Ivory Coast, presented his credentials. (Manar, Oct 6)

He had also been appointed Minister to Dahomey, Niger and Upper Volta (Jaridah, July 16), [but was not accredited to these countries until later].

It was reported that the Lebanese community in the Ivory Coast had grave misgivings about his qualifications. (Hayat, Aug 20)

Upper Volta. On Dec 7 Camille Sham'un, former President of Lebanon, attended Upper Volta's Independence Day celebrations on the invitation of its President. (Hayat, Dec 8)

CAMEROUN, GHANA, GUINEA

Cameroun. The SG of the Cameroun Foreign Ministry visited Lebanon in Aug. He said he had discussed the exchange of diplomatic representation. (Hayat, Aug 20)

Ghana. Lebanon's new resident Ambassador to Ghana was also accredited to Guinea and Mali. [There was no

Ghanaian representative in Lebanon.] (Revue du Liban, Oct 21)

On Jan 29 Uthmân ad-Dana, Lebanese Minister of Public Works, left for Ghana at its government's invitation. He brought a message from President Shéhab to President Nkrumah expressing Lebanon's wish to conclude agreements with Ghana to strengthen their ties. (Hayat, Jan 29, 30, Feb 3; R. Damasius, Jan 30-IMB, Jan 31)

On his return, on Feb 6, Dana said Nkrumah had accepted an invitation to visit Lebanon in the spring (Hayat, Feb 7). [The visit did not materialize during the year.]

In Feb Krobô Edusei, Ghanaian Minister of Transport and Communications, came to Beirut for the inauguration of an air service to Accra (R. Beirut, Feb 5 [W, 9], Revue du Liban, Feb 11). [On the signature of the air agreement, see MER 1960, p 369.]

Following this visit, it was decided to send an official Lebanese mission to Ghana to discuss the conclusion of cultural and economic agreements [but no such delegation went during the year]. (Ansat, Feb 9)

Guinea. [The Lebanese Ambassador to Ghana presented his credentials as non-resident Ambassador to Guinea on Oct 18. This post had previously been filled by the Lebanese Ambassador to Liberia, who had meanwhile vacated this post.]

On Oct 28 Seydou Diallo [Guinean Ambassador to Cairo] presented his credentials as Guinea's [first, non-resident] Ambassador to Lebanon. (Hayat, Oct 29)

The Lebanese government welcomed a Guinean request to set up a warehouse in the free port of Beirut for Guinean timber to be exported to the Middle East. (Hayat, Nov 14; Jaridah, Nov 26)

LIBERIA, MALI

Reported Friction with Lebanese Emigrants in Liberia. At a dinner on Jan 5 given by the Lebanese community in Liberia, President Tubman requested the community to take Liberians into business and teach them the principles of trading. (Liberian Age, Jan 9)

The Monrovia port authorities accused Lebanese merchants of "unscrupulous business procedures" for having ordered large quantities of merchandise while being unable to clear it on arrival at Monrovia for lack of funds. A Monrovia paper, reporting this, said that there was a "mad rush" of merchants from Arab countries into Liberia, which was explained by Lebanese emigrants as due to Liberia's liberal business policy. (Liberian Age, Feb 24)

In July it was reported that the Lebanese government intended to take up with the Liberian government the question of an alleged campaign against Lebanese emigrants. Several Lebanese trading houses had been damaged by attacks and others robbed. The Liberians had also forced several Lebanese commercial agents to give up their agencies in favour of Liberian nationals. The Lebanese Minister in Monrovia had discussed the matter with the authorities there, but without result. (Nahar, July 20)

The Liberian Minister of Communications, who was in Beirut at the time, vehemently denied these reports. He mentioned that the Lebanese were the largest foreign community in Liberia, controlling 65% of the country's trade [the same figure was also given in 1960—see MER 1960, p 370] and enjoying the same rights as Liberian nationals. (Jaridah, July 20)

Lebanese Investment Proposals Fail to Materialize. Deputy Emile Bustani [the well-known entrepreneur] said on a visit to Liberia that he intended to open a "Liberia Company" for construction and building. (Liberian Age, Feb 27)

[A Lebanese proposal to establish a joint Lebanese-Libyan development company was also made in 1960 (see MER 1960, p 370). Neither of these proposals, apparently, materialized during 1961.]

A delegation representing the Lebanese Al-Ahali Bank was to leave for Liberia to set up a branch there (Akhir Sa'ah, Cairo, April 12). [No report was received on the establishment of such a bank.]

A civil aviation agreement between Lebanon and Liberia was concluded in Beirut on July 28. Air Liban was accorded the same privileges as other international airlines operating in Liberia. (Liberian Age, July 31)

Diplomatic Representation Raised. The governments of Liberia and Lebanon decided to raise the status of their diplomatic missions to embassy as from Sept 10. (Hayat, Sept 19; Liberian Age, Sept 29)

Mali. The Lebanese Ministry of Education said that the government of Mali was interested in employing teachers from Lebanon for the forthcoming school year. (Anwar, July 9)

On Oct 9 Dr Karim Anzûl [resident Lebanese Ambassador to Ghana] presented his credentials to President Modibo Keita as his country's first [non-resident] Ambassador to Mali. In their speeches on the occasion both mentioned the role of the Lebanese emigrants in the country. (Esur, Bamako, Oct 11)

NIGERIA

Diplomatic Representation. In Jan the Lebanese consulate in Lagos was raised to embassy level. (Hayat, Jan 8)

In July it was reported that Nigeria had decided to open an embassy in Beirut [but this had not been done by the end of the year]. (Anwar, July 22)

Lebanese Emigrants Meet with Difficulties. During April and May considerable attention was paid by the Nigerian press to the question of the Lebanese emigrants.

Commenting on complaints against the activities of Syrian and Lebanese emigrants in Nigeria, one daily said it was not the first time that these traders were attacked, as they engaged in all fields of retail trade at the expense of the indigenous population. The paper demanded that the government should exclude all foreigners from the retail business or restrict their permits. (West African Pilot, Lagos, April 24)

Another paper maintained that Syrian and Lebanese immigrants had no right to call themselves Nigerians. It was unfair to make Nigerians suffer at the hands of those aliens, "who seem to have no sympathy whatsoever for the indigenous petty traders and craftsmen of this country," the article concluded. (Daily Express, Lagos, May 1)

Special attention was aroused by the accusation that Syrian and Lebanese emigrants were engaging in various trades without permits. On April 20 after a complaint by a member of the Federal Parliament, the Nigerian Federal Minister of Information said he would order an investigation. (Daily Express, Lagos, April 24)

Later a Lebanese printer was sentenced to a fine of £40 or four months' imprisonment with hard labour for contravening the printing press regulations. (Daily Times, Lagos, May 4)

On May 23 a Syrian delegation, in a meeting with the Nigerian Federal Minister of Information, denied that members of their community were engaged in "pools and printing trades." They said there were 101 Syrians and about 4,000 Lebanese in Lagos, and only one Syrian was engaged in the transport trade. [There were said to be 6,150 Lebanese emigrants in Nigeria—see MER 1960, p 364.] The minister assured them of the government's cooperation so long as they did not deprive the indigenous population of their living. (West Africa Pilot, Lagos, May 24)

Visit of PM of Northern Nigeria. On July 4 Sir Ahmadu Bello, PM of Northern Nigeria, arrived in Lebanon for a four-day visit. It had been originally set for March 20 and was twice postponed (Hayat, March 2, 22, April 11, July 5). Sir Ahmadu, and the Lebanese President and the PM, held talks on the strengthening of economic ties, and toured the country. (Hayat, July 5; Daily Times, Lagos, July 6)

He told a press conference that he had reached agreement on cooperation in economic affairs, culture and education. He welcomed the suggestion of President Ayub Khan of Pakistan for a union of Islamic states [?] and suggested that Arab policy should be based on Islamic nationalism and not on Arab nationalism. Sir Ahmadu said that his country's relations with Israel were limited to a few missions of engineers and experts. On Kuwait he said that Iraq had no right to annex this independent country. (Hayat, July 9)

Before leaving, on July 9, Sir Ahmadu said that he welcomed the cooperation of Lebanese businessmen in the economic development of Northern Nigeria. (R. Beirut, July 9 [W, 20])

Technical and Economic Cooperation. Throughout 1961, Lebanese newspapers repeatedly referred to a forthcoming visit by a Nigerian economic delegation (Hayat, Jan 12, Sept 6; Jaridah, March 14, Oct 25) [but it had not materialized by the end of the year].

Four Northern Nigerians were offered scholarships at the American University in Beirut, following Sir Ahmadu Bello's visit (Daily Times, Lagos, Aug 24). Lebanon was requested by the government of Northern Nigeria to send three judges and four lawyers to work as advisers in the Ministry of Justice. (Anwar, Sept 12)

According to Lebanese reports, the Nigerian [Federal?] government had agreed to employ doctors, agricultural experts and engineers from Lebanon, and a number of Lebanese had applied for such posts (Hayat, Nov 23). In Dec it was reported that a delegation of Lebanese economists would visit Nigeria to examine the country's economic needs and the possibility of setting up joint companies. (Siyasah, Dec 20)

RHODESIA

Rhodesian Delegation Requests Support for Independence. In Aug a two-member delegation [of Africans] representing the United National Independence party of Rhodesia came to Lebanon to request the government's support for their country's independence. They had talks with PM Slâm and Foreign Ministry officials. (Hayat, Aug 8, 9)

SENEGAL

Diplomatic Relations, Visits. The first Consul General of Senegal in Lebanon, Issa Kane, arrived in Beirut at the beginning of May. In Aug he became his country's first

Ambassador in Lebanon, and the consulate general was abolished. (Hayat, May 4, Aug 3)

In April the Lebanese consulate general in Senegal was replaced by an embassy (Hayat, April 22). The first Lebanese Ambassador to Senegal, Muhammad Ali Hamadah, presenting his credentials on April 24, said that the Lebanese emigrants wanted to cooperate in the execution of Senegal's economic and agricultural plans. In his reply, President Senghor said there were 10,000 Lebanese in Senegal [compare MER 1960, pp 364, 370], most of whom felt they were part of the country. (Hayat, April 26)

A Lebanese mission headed by the SG of the Foreign Ministry, Dr Fu'ad Amoun, attended Senegal's independence celebrations in April. (Jaridah, Anwar, April 13)

Shaykh Ibrahim Inas (Niyasse), a Senegalese Muslim leader, visited Lebanon in April on a tour of Arab and Muslim states. (Hayat, April 7, 8)

On May 15 Mamadou Dia, the Senegalese PM, stopped in Beirut for a day on his way to Mecca for the pilgrimage, and met PM Sliam. (Hayat, May 16; R. Amman, May 17-IMB, May 17)

In Oct Sharif Makki Haydar, from Senegal, described as the "Khalif of Islam in Black Africa," visited Lebanon on a tour of the Arab countries. He said that he would seek help for African states engaged in combating illiteracy and try to strengthen cultural relations with the Arab countries. (Hayat, Hawadith, Oct 31)

Among the Emigrants. In April it was reported that, on the initiative of the Lebanese Consul General, the Lebanese emigrants had decided to present Senegal with an independence gift. It seemed, however, that the community could not agree on the present. Al-Hayat's Dakar correspondent declared: "We have become a subject for jokes." (Hayat, April 6, 15)

In Aug it was reported that the Lebanese Ambassador in Dakar had obtained the agreement of the Lebanese and Syrian emigrants to the dissolution of their various associations, thus putting an end to internecine division and strife. The embassy was to see to the completion of a large club, which would be owned by the government of Lebanon and would serve the community and the Arab diplomatic missions. (Hayat, Aug 9)

Economic Difficulties of Emigrants; Policy of Senegal. In July, following complaints by emigrants in Senegal of restrictions on trading, the Lebanese government instructed its Ambassador to intercede with the Senegalese authorities. (Anwar, July 19)

In Nov, in a press interview, the Senegalese Ambassador in Beirut, asked why his government had taken measures against Lebanese emigrants, explained that it had no intention of acting against anyone; it only aspired to raise the standard of living, especially that of the agricultural population. Colonial policy had favoured the merchant, and the government now wished to destroy this system and reorganize commerce for the good of the peasant. Previously, many peasants had sold their groundnut crops before the harvest to Lebanese money-lenders in order to repay loans for seeds and provisions. The government had now fixed minimum quotas and minimum prices for crop purchases. This had forced the small traders and middlemen to regroup in order to be able to reach the set quota. The Lebanese had therefore to adapt themselves to the new conditions. (Revue du Liban, Nov 11)

Lebanese in Senegal Boycott Israel? It was reported from Dakar that in support of the Arab boycott no Lebanese emigrant had applied for foreign currency appropriated by the Senegalese government for imports from Israel. (Hayat, Feb 8)

SIERRA LEONE

Lebanese Emigrants and Independence of Sierra Leone. [Sierra Leone attained its independence on April 27.] The Lebanese community in Sierra Leone presented the government with a £24,000 hospital as an independence gift. (Daily Mail, Freetown, March 16)

Commenting on the status of Lebanese emigrants after independence, a Sierra Leone journalist wrote in Aug that this rich community of 6,000 [numbers were given variously in 1960 as 2,900 and 5,000—see MER 1960, p 371] need not have any apprehensions regarding their fate as they were part of the country and contributed much to its economy. Although the Lebanese had engaged in "sharp practices" in business and many envied their business qualities, their withdrawal could cause chaos in the country's economy. Rumours that they would be discriminated against and their enterprises taken over were nonsense; they could be assured of the government's continued protection. (Shekpende, Freetown, Aug 9)

[Lebanon was represented in Freetown by a chargé d'affaires.]

THE SAUDI ARABIAN KINGDOM

(Al-Mamlakah as-Sa'udiyah al-Arabiyyah)

INTERNAL AFFAIRS

SYNOPSIS; ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL SURVEY

SYNOPSIS

The struggle for power inside the royal family continued as the main feature in Saudi Arabia politics throughout 1961, and whereas the end of 1960 witnessed King Saud wresting control of government from Crown Prince Faisal, the end of 1961 saw the latter's return to power.

The formation of a government by King Saud in December had become possible because he made common cause against Faisal with the group of reform-minded or "free" princes, led by his younger brother Talal. Very soon, however, it transpired that Saud had no intention of introducing constitutional reforms. Still, an uneasy coalition lasted until September, for Talal's seat in the government was dependent on Saud, and Saud was reluctant to part with Talal without whom his position might be weakened in his struggle with the Faisal camp.

The King made an earnest effort to win over public opinion through conveying an image of a benevolent and industrious monarch working for the welfare of his subjects and the progress and international standing of his country. Talal, too, strove to build up public support for himself. Faisal continued to enjoy strong backing among the princes and the public. All this time the struggle for power continued, involving changing of sides and intricate manoeuvring on the part of the princes as well as members of the court. Consequently relations between the King and Talal deteriorated, and though attempts to appease Faisal without restoring him to power failed, the King dismissed Talal at the beginning of September. The place of Talal as Minister of Finance and National Economy was taken by Amir Nawwaf, who occupied a neutral position between the opposing camps, and whose influence was growing. Though it was assumed that Talal aroused the King's anger by expressing some of his opinions to the Beirut press, his dismissal was also interpreted as a move by the King to appease Faisal. A month later Faisal returned to Riyadh, while Talal, and two of his brothers who resigned from the government when Talal was dismissed, left the city. Talal soon resumed his public call for the basic reform of the regime in the political, social and economic spheres, within the framework of the Shar'iah.

The wheel turned almost full circle in November when the King's illness necessitated his departure for the USA. After some hesitation, and on the princes' recommendation, he appointed Faisal as his deputy, retaining the premiership for himself. The King stayed for the rest of the year in the USA, where he underwent a series of operations.

While the royal family was torn by the power struggle, it faced no serious outside challenge. The young educated generation, still a small group, but comparatively strong in the oil region of the east coast as well as in Jeddah, the country's main gateway, was reported to be divided into numerous factions, from Communists to "Nasserists" and "Ba'athists." Their known activities were restricted to occasional dissemination of leaflets and letters to foreign papers. Still, observers noticed, modern educational methods which were being introduced (as well as the growing influence of the outside world on the traditional way of life in general) were bound to bring about a change.

Meanwhile, the men of religion and tradition-minded tribal shaykhs continued to exercise a powerful influence. It was reported, for instance, that it was because of their pressure that Saud did not attend the Belgrade Conference in person, Yugoslavia being an "officially Communist and atheist country." Also, such innovations as schools for girls and female nurses in hospitals were introduced only after the approval and under the supervision of the Grand Mufti.

The institutional innovations during the year included a Supreme Planning Council and a Supreme Defence Council.

NOTE: The reports on the power struggle have been taken partly from the Cairo Al-Haqd'iq. It should be remembered that at the time the articles in question were published, the UAR was conducting a propaganda campaign against King Saud and his regime.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL SURVEY

In spite of the resignation from government in Dec 1960 of Amir Faisal, who had been responsible for a policy of retrenchment, 1961 saw no radical change of direction. At the end of the year, the financial position was still described as tight; the development budget for 1380/81 AH (1961) was not wholly spent (see also below: Talal's policy); the currency remained fully backed by gold and foreign exchange. On the other hand, the downward trend of imports was reversed. The output of crude petroleum rose by slightly more than 10%.

Unemployment remained an unsolved problem which seriously exercised public opinion. No reliable figures were available.

The 1380/81 AH (1961) budget balanced at 1,786m. riyals (4.5 riyals=$1) as against 1,637m. riyals in 1379/80 (re-assessed after the devaluation of the riyal on Jan 8, 1960). Expenditure on the royal house remained at 248m. riyals; defence went down to 180m. riyals (1960: 197m. riyals); education increased to 137m. riyals (1960: 122m. riyals); health 58m. riyals (1960:

55m. riyals); development figured originally at 291m. riyals and was allotted in Jan a further 35m. riyals (1960: 215m. riyals).

Revenues were expected mainly from oil.

ECONOMIC SURVEY

In July new paper currency was put into circulation. In autumn a gold purchase valued at $25m. brought the gold cover to 30%. At the end of the year, gold, silver and foreign exchange holdings totalled 1,072m. riyals. The riyal was freely convertible, and Saudi Arabia formally agreed to keep it so.

Crude oil production achieved another record of 69m. metric tons (1960: 62m.). Oil exports, crude and refined, totalled 540.7m. barrels valued at $941.3m. (1960: 493.6m. bbls at $873.4m.). Oil revenues by source were (1960 figures in brackets): Aramco, $352.2m. ($312.8m.); Getty Oil, $22.9m. ($18.4m.); Arabian Oil, $2.5m. ($2.5m.). The two last-mentioned companies were active in the Neutral Zone between Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, on-shore and off-shore respectively. Apart from royalties, Aramco claimed to have channelled about $72m. into the Saudi Arabian economy. On the other hand, Saudi Arabia reiterated her claim against Aramco for $180m. on account of profits due from the operation of Tapline; Aramco, as previously, denied the validity of the claim.

In Sept Aramco's liquefied petroleum gas plant at Ras Tanura, with a capacity of 4,000 b/d, went on stream; it was the first plant in the ME to make refrigerated propane and butane gas available in liquefied form for export. At the same time the company signed its first contract for the sale of natural gas for local industrial use. Development drilling continued on the Abu Hadriyah, Safaniyah and Abqai'q fields. Tapline throughput to Sidon rose to an average of 309,000 b/d (1960: 240,000 b/d). In April the (Japanese) Arabian Oil Company started exports from its Khafji field off-shore the Neutral Zone, with royalties going to Saudi Arabia and Kuwait in equal parts.

In Jan 1961 a Supreme Planning Council was set up consisting of the Ministers of National Economy and Finance, Communications, Oil and Agriculture, to deal with problems of long-term economic policy. The main projects completed or under progress in 1961, apart from oil activities, were extensive municipal development in the five chief cities (Riyadh, Mecca, Medina, Jeddah, Ta'if), mainly water supply and canalization, grain silos at Jeddah and Dammam, drainage of the Qatif swamps, expansion of the ports of Dammam (completed) and Yanbu, highways joining Riyadh with Ta'if and Medina with the Jordanian frontier, and additional railways in the eastern province. The Hijaz railway from Damascus to Medina was to be completely restored and opened for the 1963 pilgrimage season; Jordan, Syria and Saudi Arabia agreed to share the cost, estimated at £8m. The line was expected to bring an increase in the number of pilgrims but not to be economically profitable. 30m. riyals were earmarked for the improvement of the Holy Places. A West German firm contracted to prepare an overall industrial survey.

Imports rose from a total of 978m. riyals in 1379 AH (mid-1959-mid-1960) to 1,198m. riyals in 1380 AH.

Saudi Arabian official sources reported considerable progress in the various fields of education. (No figures were available on the number of school-age children in Saudi Arabia. A 1956 estimate of the country's total population was 6m.) The number of pupils receiving primary education rose from 85,847 in 1960 to 104,203 in 1961; those receiving various types of intermediate and secondary education from 6,807 to 10,049; and the number of students in teachers' colleges from 2,687 to 3,497. There was a corresponding rise in the number of teachers and classes. The King Saud University of Riyadh increased its academic staff from 28 to 56, and its student body from 213 (34 external) to 563 (200 external). 4.4m. riyals were spent on primary schools.

There were 87 centres for the elimination of illiteracy, with 9,220 students. An Islamic University was inaugurated at Medina.

The first government primary school for girls was opened in Medina in January; a department for girls' schools had been established in 1960 under the auspices of the Grand Mufti. (Private girls' schools had been opened earlier, mainly in Jeddah, among others by the daughter of Amir Faisal and the wife of Amir Muhammad Ibn Saud.)

The "latest foreign teaching methods and most advanced foreign scientific ideas" were taught for the first time in Saudi Arabia, in the new "School of Port" in Jeddah, it was reported in The New York Times (April 9). This, it was reported, often meant breaking some of the old rules. Boys at the school went to films and acted in plays, they were encouraged to draw or paint likenesses of animals and humans. They learned to sing and listen to music. They learned the Qur'an as well, but it was a far more moderate form of Islam they were absorbing.

THE STRUGGLE FOR POWER INSIDE THE ROYAL FAMILY

THE THREE CONTESTING CAMPS

The Three Contesting Camps. As recorded in MER 1960, when Faisal was removed from power in Dec 1960, King Saud formed a government in collaboration with Amir Talāl, the protagonist of constitutional reform, and his supporters. Before the changeover, Saud intimated support for the reforms but afterwards he gave no sign of intending to implement them and it was thought that by his earlier attitude he had only wished to gain the support of the reformers in his struggle for power against Faisal. Consequently, at the beginning of the year, three rival groups were seen to be emerging in the royal family, headed by three brothers:

1. The King [supported by a number of princes, his sons and others, called by the Cairo Al-Haqā'iq "the little kings"—see below]. (It was thought Saud had also the backing of "powerful tribal leaders and many of the young men of the capital, who were getting government jobs"; NYT, April 14.)

2. Faisal with his royal supporters and the reactionary elements, particularly the religious groups who looked to him for leadership. (He was, however, also thought to have "considerable support among the powerful merchants of Jeddah" and other cities of Hijaz, who remembered that as a former viceroy of Hijaz he usually had a receptive ear for their petitions; see NYT, April 14.)

3. Talāl who advocated a programme of constitutional reform, supported by another group of amirs and by the young intelligentsia, graduates of foreign universities and the professional middle class. (MER 1960, pp 366-7)

In his struggle with Faisal in 1960, the King had had the support of his uncle Amir Abdallah Ibn Abd al-Rahmān and of the so-called "free princes" who included his brothers Talāl, Nawwāf Badr, Abd al-Muhsin, Fawwāz and Majid. After Faisal's removal and the recapture of power by Saud, which came to be called the "white revolution" (al-inqilāb al-abyad), the six princes remained loyal to the King. During the first four months of 1961, the situation was reported to have developed as follows:

Abdallah, together with some other princes from among the King's brothers and uncles, went over to Faisal—as did Majid, one of the "free princes." In April it was reported that the King had cut the allowance of Amir Abdallah to the amount received by his other uncles; hitherto he had received a larger allowance in consideration of his high standing with the tribes. (Hayat, April 29)

Four of the six "free princes" continued to cooperate with the King: Talāl, Badr and Abd al-Muhsin entered the government, and Fawwāz became the governor of Riyadh.

Nawwāf declined the Ministry of the Interior and remained neutral. (Hayat, May 7)

During this period, it was further reported, the struggle became mainly one between the Faisal and the Talāl groups. The Talāl group and the King had a common interest in their struggle with the Faisal group. Faisal's return to power would have meant the end of Saud as ruler; moreover, Saud was determined not to give his opponents an opportunity to allege that the regime was unstable and impotent. Talāl and his group, on the other hand, were said to be willing to cooperate with the King and, for tactical reasons, to accept royal acts with which they basically disagreed. (Hayat, May 7)

Significance of Royal Rift. The rift in the royal family was regarded as significant, in that the King, as head of a state unified less than thirty years ago, counted upon his brothers as a device to hold the country together. "The late King Ibn Saud took many wives from different tribal strains in order to link each with the crown. So the King's brothers are like the string in a necklace in the tribal politics of Saudi Arabia." (NYT, April 14)

Activities of King Saud. [The take-over of the government by King Saud was followed by a spate of reports conveying a picture of intensive activity on the part of the King in his role as Prime Minister. Following are some Radio Mecca reports of Jan and April.]

On Jan 2 a directive was published, issued by the King to the ministers. He ordered: (1) the establishment of a "Sherī'ah system of appeal" in "view of the great importance of justice and our keen desire to safeguard the rights of our subjects"; (2) customs protection of local industry in fulfilment of the "policy of industrial development which we seek to pursue..."; (3) "closest observation in the application of the budget" as "we regard state funds as a trust in our hands."

On Jan 3 the King told journalists: "I am determined to work with all the strength I have to ensure comfort, prestige and dignity for the people."

On Jan 7 the Planning Council (see above: Economic and Social Survey) held its first meeting, presided over by the King. The meeting studied certain of the new projects which had been made public in detail on Dec 31, 1960. (For some of these projects, see: The Budget, in the Economic Survey, above.)

On the same day the King inaugurated a dam, built at his own expense, in Wadi Namar.

At a cabinet meeting on Jan 11, the King ordered that foreign experts be engaged to study the civil service and pensions systems and to amend them "so as to safeguard the interest of civil servants" [on this issue, see also below, under: Labour, Civil Service, Aliens] and to carry out a project for a dam at Abha "to bring economic revival to the people of Abha."

A cabinet meeting on Jan 15, presided over by the King, decided, among other issues, to abolish the real estate tax collected by the municipalities. The Health Minister communicated to the King the Grand Mufti's approval of courses for female nurses and the King explained that this measure would improve the standard of hospital nursing.

Mecca Radio later commented that after the abolition of the real estate tax had become known, the towns and villages of the western region had all been praising the King for his munificence. Other taxes also were to be rescinded, and the King had already abrogated the taxes on foodstuffs, building materials, and industrial tools. King Saud's activities, the comment went on, were not restricted to the fiscal field, but included the building of hospitals, roads and schools, and other projects.

The Finance Ministry building in Mecca, it was announced on Jan 18, would be converted into a hospital to replace another hospital, which would be demolished to widen a road. The Finance and Health Ministries were to study the establishment of a benevolent relief association, with branches throughout the country, to serve all citizens and visitors.

tour of the eastern province, where he was warmly welcomed. On this occasion he told the press that the government was diligently working to promote every aspect of life in the country in order that it might become a very active member in the Arab and Muslim community. He elaborated on development activities in education, industry and agriculture. Among other details, he said he had ordered the import of agricultural machinery, to be sold to farmers in instalments.

On April 21 the King inaugurated the Saudi Arabian Gas and Industrialization Company.

On April 24 he opened the Qatif irrigation project. (R. Mecca, Dec 31, 1960 [Jan 3, 1961], Jan 2 [4], 3 [5], 7 [10], 7 [W 12], 12 [14], 15 [17], 18 [21], 18 [W 26], April 17 [19], 20 [22], 21 [W 27], 24 [W 27].)

King Saud's need to cultivate public opinion was thought to have been one of the motives behind the termination by Saudi Arabia of the Dhahran agreement with the U.S. (Economist, March 25)

On May 24, in a speech at the Officers' Club in Ta'if, the King told the army of the forthcoming establishment of a Supreme Defence Council. (Blad, May 25)

A supporter of the King told a foreign correspondent in April: "I am sure the King is trying now to win his place in history as a great monarch; he is trying to be somebody. As a human being, he had everything he could have wanted. Now he wants to prove to the world that he can run this country better than everybody else." (NYT, April 14)

Talāl's Policy. The practical division of authority in the government was such, it was reported, that the King determined the international and Arab policy while leaving internal affairs to the government, led by Talāl. Talāl, it was further reported, had not opened the Treasury to pump money into circulation and get business moving in spite of the severe economic crisis. Talāl was a great believer in planning and refused to spend money except in accordance with a comprehensive plan. For this reason, he had even stopped the execution of projects which had already been approved. The government had agreed to call on foreign experts from the UN and the World Bank but, the writer remarked, to work out a comprehensive plan took a long time (Hayat, May 7). At the same time it was noted that the government of Crown Prince Faisal had been undermined to a large extent by "progressive elements" who criticized what they considered exceedingly stringent economy measures which hurt the tribes and business community alike. (The Statesman, March 6)

In the political sphere, Talāl, who was lacking in popular support because he had been abroad for a long time, was now striving to build it up quickly by cultivating "some of the youth" and journalists, "knowing that time was short." (Hayat, May 7)

Faisal's Supporters Push His Claims. Early in the year it was reported that relations between Saud and Faisal had improved. In Feb, however, it became known that Faisal's supporters, especially his brothers, had renewed their efforts for his return to power. It was reported that at a meeting in Riyadh, which Faisal did not attend, they signed a memorandum which was submitted to the King by Amir Muhammad Ibn Abd al-Aziz. The memorandum requested: (1) that Faisal be reinstated; (2) that certain princes be removed from the government; (3) that the King's counsellors, Abd al-Aziz Ibn Mu'ammār and Abdallah Ibn Huiaylān, be removed; and (4) that Shaykh Muhammad Surūr [as-Sabān] (on whom see immediately below) be induced to leave Riyadh and return to Hijaz. Saud replied: (1) it had been Faisal who had resigned, and he, Saud, could not be blamed for Faisal's failure to organize a new government; the fact that Faisal was not in the government did not lessen his importance as the King's brother and crown prince; (2) reconstitution of the government was not now possible, since it had settled down to work; (3) the counsellors mentioned were about to go abroad; (4) Muhammad Surūr had come to Riyadh on a visit only, and would soon return to Hijaz. (Hayat, Feb 22)

The princes supporting Faisal urged him to renew his political activity, but he refused. He pleaded with them to avoid an open struggle, maintaining that the issue was a matter of time and that the King could not continue to rule for long. His mistakes, shortcomings and weaknesses would bring about his downfall. In the end power would return to Faisal's hands. Thus the Faisal group embarked on a policy of concentrating on the Talāl group and of "ignoring the King."

When on March 15 Saud travelled from Riyadh to Mecca for a religious function, neither Faisal nor his supporters among the princes greeted the King upon his arrival. In view of the elaborate protocol of palace life, this was seen as a serious snub. The same thing happened when Saud returned to Riyadh from a visit to Kuwait. (Hayat, March 23, May 7; NYT, April 14, May 19; Time, May 19)

Muhammad Surūr as-Sabān Fails to Make a Comeback. Muhammad Surūr [as-Sabān] had been Minister of Finance and was dismissed when Faisal came to power early in 1959. Since then he had lived in Cairo where, it was reported, he had cultivated Saudi Arabian visitors with the aim of staging a comeback. When Saud took over from Faisal, Sabān returned to Saudi Arabia. His name was "so indissolubly linked with the inflationary policies that brought the country to the verge of bankruptcy in 1958 that his return aroused lively alarm among the business community." It had also angered Talāl who did not "relish a shadow finance minister at the King's elbow." Impressed by the volume of opposition, the King had declined Sabān's offer of service. In March Sabān was reported in Jeddah and, it was thought, on his way to Cairo. (Economist, March 18)

Struggle Over Appointment of Chief of the Royal Cabinet. According to Al-Haqā'iq, Sabān had been a candidate for the post of the Chief of the Royal Diwān; he was supported by "those anxious for the government." While the King favoured his candidacy, Talāl opposed it. Sabān, for his part, had made his acceptance conditional on the dismissal of Id Ibn Sālim, the Chief of the Royal Household (al-khāss al-malakiyyah).

Al-Haqā'iq claimed that Sālim, who had started his career as a car-washer in the royal garages, had acquired enormous influence over the King. He received the intelligence reports, and ministers as well as members of the royal family came to him for advice. Sālim, the paper said, was hated by the people.

As Sabān's candidacy fell through, Al-Haqā'iq continued, "the little kings" suggested the appointment of Prince Faisal Ibn Turki Ibn Abd al-Aziz. Knowing him to be an amiable man and well regarded by the King, they thought that they could utilize him in bringing the government under their influence. Talāl, however, vetoed his appointment. (He later became a minister; see below.)

The candidacy of the [neutral] Amir Nawwāf was then proposed by "those anxious for the government" accepted by the King and supported by many ministers as well as the people. The "little kings," however, opposed Nawwāf as an influential personality. (Haqā'iq, Nov 16)

Nawwāf's appointment was announced on May 5 (Ahram, May 6). Nawwāf, Al-Haqā'iq continued, declared that he would keep away from the King the "courtiers hated by the people"—he did so in regard to Ibn Salīm—and that all audiences with the King would require his approval. (Haqā'iq, Nov 16)

The King's Advisers Mu'ammār and Hujaylān. When King Saud formed his cabinet, he appointed Abd al-Aziz Ibn Mu'ammār and Faisal Ibn Hujaylān to the posts of royal advisers. Both were termed progressives. In March it was reported that they had apparently been appointed ambassadors to Switzerland and Spain respectively, but there were many who considered that "their responsibility for the formation of the new government was so great" that they should be kept in Riyadh. A difficult situation had arisen between the King's advisers and the ministers, because the King was also Prime Minister.

Hujaylān and Mu'ammār were men of about forty. The first had served in the embassy in Washington and was "an ardent nationalist," but no "Naserist." Mu'ammār, the son of an old friend of the King, had been imprisoned for a year after the Aramco strike in 1935, having been accused of association with the defunct "National Liberation Front." His opponents who brought about his removal had accused him of leftist tendencies and even of being "planted" by Moscow. (Daily Telegraph, Feb 7; Ecnamit, March 18; Hayat, March 23)

THE ELIMINATION OF TALĀL

Moves To Conciliate the King and Faisal. In April reports circulated that the Lebanese politician Hussein al-Uwayni had been mediating between Saud and Faisal, but an official denial of this insisted that the relations between the brothers were unimpaired. (Jihād, April 26, 27; Falastin, April 28)

At the same time, it was reported that members of the royal family had been unsuccessfully trying to reconcile the brothers by proposing that Saud become a constitutional monarch, and Faisal PM as well as Crown Prince. (Hawadith, April 28)

Al-Haqā'iq claimed that "the little kings" had "brandished the [sword] of conciliation" in order to reduce Talāl's influence and his "extremism." (Haqā'iq, Nov 9)

Al-Hayāt reported that many moves at conciliation, made with the encouragement of the King, had failed. Amir Nawwāf tried vigorously to mediate between the two sides, and he almost succeeded. He proposed the formation of a new government headed by Amir Khālīd Ibn Abd al-Aziz of the Faisal camp, on condition that two ministers in the present government be dropped and three new ministers from the opposition be added in their place. The proposal fell through because Faisal insisted that Talāl be dropped (Hayat, May 7). The King was also said to have offered to take Faisal back as acting PM, but without the power to make foreign policy: Faisal had remained aloof. (NYT, May 19)

The "Little Kings" Against Talāl. According to Al-Haqā'iq, a prominent role in undermining Talāl's position was played by the "little kings" (i.e. the group of princes, sons of Saud and others, who made up the third group—apart from those of Talāl and Faisal—struggling for power), as will be recorded below.

Appointment of Faisal Ibn Turki as Minister of Labour Causes Tension Between Talāl and King. Talāl and Nawwāf. At the beginning of June, the King appointed [his nephew] Amir Faisal Ibn Turki Ibn Abd al-Aziz to the newly-created Ministry of Labour and Workers. The suggestion for such a ministry had originally come from Nāsir al-Manqūr, whose candidacy for the office had met with the opposition of the princes.

According to Al-Haqā'iq, the "little kings" were effective in persuading the King to appoint Faisal Ibn Turki (having previously failed to secure his appointment as Chief of the Royal Household; see above) so as to strengthen the hands of his son Muhammad against Talāl in the government. Faisal Ibn Turki's appointment was said to mean: (1) the strengthening of the anti-Talāl front inside the government, which now included Faisal Ibn Turki, Muhammad Ibn Saud, the Defence Minister, Ibrahim as-Suwayl, the Foreign Minister, and Abd al-Aziz Ibn Hasan, the Minister of Education; (2) the driving of a wedge between Talāl and Nawwāf, as Talāl was said to have been deeply offended by Saud's appointment of Faisal Ibn Turki and by Nawwāf's announcement of the appointment without bothering to inform the government and without a budget having been provided for such a ministry. Talāl absented himself from his ministry but was persuaded to return to his duties. (Hayat, June 10; Haqā'iq, Nov 16)

Nawwāf Resigns From Diwān; Estrangement Between Talāl and Nawwāf. By royal decree published on July 20, King Saud ordered "in accordance with the suggestion of the head of the Council of Ministers" [i.e. Saud himself] that the Directorate of Broadcasting, Press and Publications be attached to the Royal Diwān, and Nawwāf, in his capacity of Chief of the Diwān, be responsible to the King for the department.

The same evening, however, Nawwāf resigned his post as Chief of the Royal Diwān (Bilad, July 20, 21). What had happened, according to Al-Haqā'iq, was that the "little kings" had instigated the King to make this appointment, and Nawwāf to accept it, with a view to establishing the paramountcy of the court over the government in executive matters, without informing Nawwāf of their real motives (Hayat, Nov 16). Talāl protested vehemently against this infringement of the executive authority. Talāl—or the government as a whole—informed the King that they were determined to resign if the decree remained in force. Consequently, Nawwāf tendered his resignation to save the King from a humiliating impasse, and Saud accepted it.

A letter to Al-Hayāt from a Saudi Arabian said that the crisis had originated in the insufficient demarcation of authority between the government and the Diwān. Nawwāf had been turning the Diwān into a means of by-passing the government, so much so that even ministers had started to use it to solve their problems. The Nawwāf crisis had not been the first one to arise from this state of affairs. (Hayat, Aug 18; Haqā'iq, Nov 16)

The "little kings," Al-Haqā'iq continued, celebrated a victory, having caused a rift between Talāl and Nawwāf and regained domination over the court; Ibn Salīm again became the King's confidant. (Haqā'iq, Nov 16)

Towards Reconciliation Between Saud and Faisal. In June there were reports of reconciliation meetings at Ta'if between the King and Faisal, on the former's initiative (Hayat, June 7, 13; Falastin, June 6, 17). One report was explicitly denied by official circles in Jeddah (Hayat, June 9). The King was also said to have consulted Faisal at the outbreak of the Kuwaiti crisis [end of June] at a meeting arranged by the "neutral" Amir Nawwaf.

At any rate, on Aug 8, the King called on Faisal at his house in Ta'if, at the entreaties, it was said, of Amir Muhammad Ibn Abd al-Aziz and other "neutrals." According to Al-Haqā'iq, their motive was to shake the position of Amir Talāl. The talk was inconclusive, since Faisal insisted that the government should resign prior to his reconciliation with the King. The King demurred, it was reported, because he did not wish to abandon those who had stood by him against Faisal, and because a new government would be loyal to Faisal. The following day, when the King left for Riyadh, Faisal was not among the persons taking leave of him. (Hayat, Aug 16, 17; Haqā'iq, Nov 16)

Talāl's Press Conference at Beirut Offends the King. On Aug 14 Amir Talāl gave a press conference in Beirut, where he had arrived on Aug 12 on a private visit. He said that the King had formed his government in order to carry out the changes which the country needed. Talāl emphasized the harmony which existed among the members of the government, and between the government and the King. When asked about the proposed constitution and the representative council (al-majlis al-tamthili) which, according to rumour, the King had rejected, Talāl replied that the Qur'an was Saudi Arabia's constitution and the Shari'ah her guide to action. However, a "set of basic principles for government" (usūl asāsī lil-hukm) was being considered, to define the rights and duties of citizens. A "national council" (majlis watani) was also envisaged to give the people a share in the government. Talāl referred to his alleged quarrel with Faisal as "only a difference of opinion over the ruling system." As regards foreign policy, Talāl declared that the lease of Dhahran had practically expired and that Saudi Arabia stood to lose in consequence about $10 million per annum. He also spoke in praise of Arab union (Hayat, Aug 15; NYT, Aug 16; Times, Sept 14). (On the issue of the Dhahran agreement, see below: International Relations; United States.)

This press conference, it was reported, aroused the King's anger. Observers in Beirut were reported to believe that it was the reference to the Dhahran base which had given offence to the King; others that it had been caused by the mention of a national assembly; and there were also suggestions that he was upset by the admission that a dispute existed between the royal brothers. (Times, Sept 14)

Al-Hayāt reported that the King upbraided Talāl by cable for interfering in matters outside his competence; Talāl countered that he had expressed opinions shared by the government at large. The King then ordered Talāl, who was at that time in Europe, to hasten his return. On Aug 29 Talāl reached Jeddah where he stayed for some time, since he felt offended by the King. It was only when his brothers Badr and Abd al-Muhsin remonstrated with him that he went to Riyadh. In the meantime the King had repeated his demand in another cable; he stressed in particular that only the Foreign Minister had the right to make statements on foreign affairs. (Hayat, Sept 10, 16)

The affair came up at the government meeting in the beginning of Sept. It was decided that Talāl should explain his conduct in a letter to the King, in order to close the matter, but no such letter was ever written. (Hayat, Sept 10, 16; Haqā'iq, Nov 30)

Talāl and Followers Leave Government; Faisal Returns to Riyadh. On Sept 11 the King published a decree announcing changes in the government. The new government did not include Talāl (hitherto Minister of Finance and National Economy), Badr (Communications) and Abd al-Muhsin (Interior). (Bilad, Sept 12; for details see table: The Government.)

Al-Haqā'iq held that the die had been cast at the government meeting mentioned above, when Saud and his supporters had told Talāl, in answer to his question, that the time was not appropriate for introducing constitutional reform. Talāl refused to take part in government business until the King redeemed his promises on this score, and the King dismissed him in consequence. Badr and Abd al-Muhsin resigned in solidarity with Talāl. (Haqā'iq, Nov 30)

Al-Hayāt, on the other hand, believed that the crisis had been brought to a head by Talāl's refusal, as Minister of Finance, to ratify the gift by the King of a tract of land to Amir Saud Ibn Jalawi, governor of the eastern provinces. (Hayat, Sept 16)

Observers generally regarded the rebuff as an attempt by the King to conciliate Faisal and his group. (Times, Sept 12; Hayat, Sept 12, 13, 15)

On Sept 16 [the "neutral"] Amir Nawwaf Ibn Abd al-Aziz was appointed Minister of Finance and National Economy. On Oct 5 the appointment was announced of Shaykh Abdallah Balkhayr, Director of the Department of Broadcasting, Press and Publications as Minister of State for Broadcasting, Press and Publications. (Bilad, Sept 17, Oct 6)

On Oct 10 Faisal returned to Riyadh. Prominent among those who greeted him was Amir Muhammad Ibn Saud, the Minister of Defence and Aviation. Kul-Shay' thought that the King and Faisal would be reconciled since there were so few personalities left to shoulder affairs of state. Al-Hayāt reported that the King consulted Faisal on the question of recognition of the new regime in Syria and found himself in agreement with him on inter-Arab questions in general.

As soon as Faisal arrived in Riyadh, Talāl left the city with his brothers Badr and Abd al-Muhsin and took up residence in Jeddah. (Kul-Shay', Oct 14; Hayat, Oct 17)

FAISAL'S RETURN TO POWER

The King's Illness. On Nov 16 the King suddenly fainted and was taken to the American hospital in Dhahran. It was reported that the 59-year-old King had been complaining for some time of fatigue caused by over-exertion since the ouster of Faisal in Dec 1960. In Dhahran, the King was seen by a number of specialists, including Dr. F.D. Moore of Boston. On Dr Moore's recommendation, the King went to Boston where he entered the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital. The nature of the monarch's illness was not disclosed. He was understood to be suffering from an ulcer condition. Official bulletins from Riyadh, however, denied this and claimed that his digestive system was in "very good order"; the physicians had advised the King to stay in hospital for a rest. On Dec 3 the King left hospital. On Dec 10 and 17 the King was operated for cataract on both his eyes; on Dec 27 his condition was reported to be good; on Dec 30 he underwent a "minor" stomach operation. (NYT, Nov 23; Bilad, Nov 23-Dec 10, Jan 1, 1962; R. Mecca, Nov 21 [23]; Hayat, Nov 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, 25, 28, 30, Dec 1; Falastin, Dec 11, 28; Manar, Jordan, Dec 18)

Faisal Appointed King's Deputy. When the King was hospitalized in Dhahran, Faisal was among those who immediately called upon him; thereafter Faisal returned to Riyadh (Bilad, Nov 19). Meanwhile, Amir Nawwaf, the Minister of Finance and Economy, assumed the functions of acting PM. (Hayat, Nov 19)

On Nov 21, upon the King's departure for Boston, a royal decree appointed Faisal as the King's deputy in his absence (R. Mecca, Nov 21 [23]). Foreign reports said that originally the King had intended to appoint a regency council composed of five ministers: Nawwaf, Muhammad Ibn Saud, Faisal Ibn Turki, Dr. Hasan Nasif and Shaykh Abdallah Balkhayr. However, Nawwaf himself suggested Faisal's appointment as deputy; Faisal arrived in Dhahran accompanied by his brothers Abdal-lab, Mut'ib and Khalid; even Talal was said to support Faisal's candidacy. The King agreed. (Hayat, Nov 23, Dec 3; Haq'iq, Dec 1)

Rumours spread that Faisal would use the King's absence to undermine his brother's position. However, Faisal announced that he would honour the trust placed in him, and introduce no changes in government until the King's return. The King, for his part, was said to have promised before his departure that on his return he would re-form the government on a broad basis. The general public received Faisal's return with satisfaction and as an indication that the rift within the royal family had been healed (Hayat, Nov 23, Dec 3). Later, Al-Hayat repeated reports that Faisal would become PM after the King's return, or else the King would remain PM with Faisal as deputy PM. According to these rumours, Nawwaf, Muhammad Ibn Saud, Faisal Ibn Turki and Shaykh Abd al-Aziz Ibn Hasan would stay in the government. (Hayat, Dec 8)

TALAL RENEWS CALL FOR REFORM OF REGIME
In Dec the Cairo Al-Haq'iq published articles which, it said, had been written by Amir Talal and had originally appeared in the Saudi Arabian Al-Qasim [date not specified by Al-Haq'iq] and in which Talal called for a basic reform of the regime. (Only one article was available to the editor.)

From time to time, Talal wrote, articles appeared in the press on topics such as socialism from the Islamic point of view, Arab nationalism and Islam, "there is no nationalization in Islam," systems opposed by Islam, etc. [This was a reference to articles against the UAR regime which became frequent in the last quarter of the year.]

It was indeed a duty, Talal continued, to discuss such questions and to clarify what was the right system for the country, in the political, economic and social spheres. "Everybody knows," the article continued, "that the Shar'iah is the [our] present and continuing system, and also knows that the gates of ijtihād are closed to the people save a small minority which does nothing but copy Islamic laws written hundreds of years ago." This state of affairs must not continue, the gates of ijtihād must be opened to all; "because we firmly believe in our true religion we must have a say in its affairs." It was imperative now to know the road the country was to take in the future and to study "scientifically, logically and realistically" axioms such as: "Arab nationalism is opposed to Islam... Islam is the basis of Arab nationalism... socialism is clearly stipulated in Islam..."

Times had changed and were changing ever more rapidly and it was no longer possible to deal with the country's problems "on the village level." A basic system for the state (niẓām asāsī lil-dawlah) must be found; this was inescapable under present conditions in the country and for its development.

"I know," Talal continued, "that if the above-mentioned system was found it might conflict with the teachings of Islam and its spirit, and to allay such fears I call for the formation of a high-level commission. It would comprise men of religion from our and other Islamic countries as well as experts in the economic and social sciences and others." This commission was to study the system and lay down new concepts for the political and social order.

The call for Islam and the call for Arab nationalism, Talal continued, was nothing new in this country but the call must be based on clear concepts. In this era it was not enough to make the call without fully believing in it, nor was it enough to criticize the principles and systems of others without having something better to show.

"The present era is an era of principles and reform (tanẓīm), and a nation that neither believes in certain principles nor reforms its affairs will not enjoy progress and prosperity. We have such principles, praise be to God, and they only want smoothing-out, concentration and reform (as-saql, at-tarkiz wa-at-tanẓīm) in order that we might face with them the people of the earth."

Talal concluded with a request that those in power concern themselves with these basic demands. (Haq'iq, Dec 7)

VARIOUS INTERNAL AFFAIRS

OPPOSITION TO THE REGIME

The "National Liberation Front." In Feb it was reported that leaflets had been distributed in Riyadh and Hijaz attacking the King and the Crown Prince. Official sources put the blame on leftist elements among the youth. (Hayat, Feb 22)

Another source said during the same period that the [leftist] National Liberation Front (jabhat al-tahrur al-awatani) had distributed leaflets against the "tribal despotism" which ruled the country. It attacked the "increasingly reactionary" policy of the King and his failure to fulfil his promises for constitutional reform. The front identified itself with the anti-imperialist struggle in the Arab states, Asia, Africa and America, and put forward a programme of four points: (1) abolition of autocracy and introduction of a parliamentary regime; (2) formulation of a national economic policy; (3) revision of all oil agreements; (4) adoption of "positive neutralism" and repeal of the Dhahran lease. (Afrique Action, Tunis, Feb 27)

Law on Trial of Ministers. On March 11 Mecca Radio published a law on the trial of ministers and officials of ministerial rank. The following crimes would make their perpetrators liable to a death sentence or 25 years imprisonment: (1) attempting to change the monarchy; (2) high treason; (3) endangering the state's internal security, safety and unity; (4) undermining the loyalty of the armed forces.

The law listed a series of crimes of subversive cha-raeter as well as the exploiting of official position for private benefit, disclosure of cabinet secrets, interference in affairs relating to the judiciary, or to government departments etc., and fixed the respective punishments.

The court to try offenders under this law would consist of three ministers selected by the cabinet. (For full text, see R. Mecca, May 11 [14]).

Al-Hayat attributed this legislation to information received by the authorities concerning the activity of a number of anti-monarchist organizations of an extreme leftist and nationalist character, and the leaflets distributed in the previous month, [though the connection between the law and these activities was not quite clear]. (Hayat, March 14)

More Opposition Activities. In May Al-Hayat reported growing resentment against the King, the Crown Prince and the royal house in general, which was taking shape in secret societies. The younger generation from which these societies had emerged, was split into numerous factions, from Communists and leftists to Ba'athists and Nasserists. The Communists and leftists and some of the nationalists were of the opinion that no situation after the elimination of the royal house could be worse than the present one.

Al-Hayat (June 1) published a statement which it had received from Riyadh, attacking the squandering of the oil income on the royal family instead of its allocation to development. Disatisfaction was said to be especially strong in the eastern provinces—in Dhahran and Dammam—which complained that they did not receive their share of development, although they contributed 90% of the country's revenue.

Opposition leaflets attacking the King and Faisal were distributed also in Jeddah. (Hayat, May 7, 26, June 1)

Press Asks For Reforms; King Courts the Press. In July Saud was reported to have summoned to Ta'if the leading members of the press after some of them had begun to campaign in Hijaz and in Riyadh but more particularly in the US oil company's concession areas, for larger representation of the educated élite on the Royal Advisory Council, and for the conversion of this assembly into a legislative body. It was commented that some surprise may have been expressed and an air of hopeful expectancy created when the King, instead of imposing fresh restrictions on the press, merely admonished it. (Hindustan Times, Aug 18)

In Sept the King ordered that the newspapers be despatched free by air inside the country and abroad, following a request by the press for royal encouragement (Bilad, Sept 24). Foreign sources also reported that the King had abolished press censorship. (R. Beirut, Sept 25-IMB, Sept 26)

Opposition Abroad. In Dec it was reported in Lebanon that a Saudi Arabian cell had been uncovered in Beirut, which had distributed leaflets attacking the King and his regime. The cell was said to have had ten members, who had been aided by Lebanese citizens and financed by an unidentified Arab organization. One Saudi Arabian had been arrested while distributing leaflets. Similar cells were believed to have remained active in Lebanon. (Amal, Beirut, Dec 10)

LABOUR, CIVIL SERVICE, ALIENS

Unemployment. [The problem of unemployment assumed ever larger dimensions during the year.]

In March Amir Talal, the Minister of Finance and Economy, announced that the government would carry out public works at an increased rate in order to create employment. (Hayat, March 14)

In April the government, having been requested by the King to attend to the labour situation, put the Labour and Workers' Authority (maslahat al-amal wal-ummal) under Násir al-Manqúr, the Minister of State, and decided to invite foreign experts to the country to look into the state of the Authority. (Umm al-Qura, April 21)

At the beginning of May a conference was reported between Manqúr, Abdallah ad-Dahib, the Director of the Labour and Workers Authority, and its senior staff. The minister promised the Authority every aid to enable it to fulfil its functions. Dahib was said to have enlarged upon the difficulties with which the Authority had to cope, its lack of suitable officials and the neglect it had suffered so far at the hand of the government. (Al-Qasim, Buraydah, May 2)

At about the same time readers' letters and an article in the weekly Al-Khalij al-Arabi attacked the helplessness of the Authority on the one hand, and the uncooperative attitude of employers on the other. "Irresponsible" dismissals by Aramco and other firms had recently further aggravated unemployment and led to a lowering of wages. Help could only come from a far-reaching works programme, such as that carried out in Europe in the 'thirties, and not from any legal steps. (Al-Khalij al-Arabi, Khubar, May 4)

On June 8 a Ministry of Labour, Workers and Social Affairs was formed, with Amir Faisal Ibn Turki at its head. (See above—The Royal House.) (Hayat, May 9). On Sept 11 Násir al-Manqúr was appointed in his stead. (Bilad, Sept 12)

In order to ease unemployment, the new ministry instructed employers not to permit overtime work. (Bilad, Aug 31)

However, reports of mass unemployment continued. According to the Riyadh newspaper Al-Yamamah, as quoted by Al-Haqiq, thousands of unemployed applied daily to labour exchanges in vain, while the government was warned of the consequences of its failure to cope with the problem. (Haqqiq, Dec 14)

Improved Conditions for Civil Service. Improvements in the terms of employment for the civil service were under consideration during the year. On Aug 3 new pension regulations were published. Family allowances and more favourable gradings were among other improvements considered. (Bilad, Feb 23, March 23, Aug 3, 4, 28)

Aramco. The Aramco report for 1960 gave 14,384 registered employees, of whom over 75% were Saudi Arabians. During the year 722 employees purchased homes under a company project, making a total of 2,800 within ten years. Twenty nine Saudi Arabians were sent to foreign universities at the expense of Aramco—12 to Lebanon and the remainder to the USA. At the firm's technical training centres in Saudi Arabia, an average of 4,531 studied during working hours and 4,212 after working hours. Another elementary school for the staff was opened (the eleventh established by the company) and the building of two intermediate schools was begun. A hundred and thirty two staff members were superannuated (Hayat, May 17). In July another 30 Saudi Arabian employees were sent abroad for study, 21 of them to Lebanon for general secondary education, and nine to various colleges and universities in the USA. (Bilad, July 18)

From Sept 1, the working week was shortened from 42 to 40 hours, without a reduction in wages. (Bilad, Aug 24)

A local newspaper attacked the company for arbitrary dismissals and failure to train an appreciable number of local graduate staff and any local petroleum engineers. (Khaliq al-Arabi, Khubar, May 4)

Aliens. Various measures were taken to prevent aliens from competing with Saudi Arabians on the labour market, and in the country's economy in general.

At the beginning of the pilgrimage season, it was reported that foreign pilgrims had been forbidden to trade whilst inside Saudi Arabia. (Falastin, Jordan, March 15)

The employment of aliens, especially Lebanese, in office work while qualified Saudi Arabians went unemployed, was the subject of complaint. (Bilad, March 5)

In Nov it was reported that the authorities were taking steps to ensure the employment of local labour. 75% of the employees in the banks, companies and stores were to be Saudi Arabians. Foreign employees were being registered as a first step to their being replaced by local staff. (Bilad, Nov 20, 30)

In Dec it was reported that the newly-organized Aliens Control Department had started to function (Bilad, Dec 4) and that a census would be conducted of aliens resident in the country. (Bilad, Dec 11)

Arab Refugees. [Arab refugees had a special status.] In Aug the King declared at a reception given by the refugees at Riyadh that they were not strangers in the Kingdom, and that they shared the rights and duties of Saudi Arabians. (Bilad, Aug 14)

In Sept "various passport departments received a circular explaining that all Palestinians residing in the Kingdom, including those who hold passports other than those issued by the All-Palestine Government," had the right to enjoy the special facilities detailed in a previous royal announcement. (Saudi Weekly Newsletter, Jeddah, Sept 25)

In Nov it was reported that the Saudi Arabian embassy in Beirut issued entry visas to Palestinians only on recommendation from the Arab Higher Committee. (Ha-nadith, Nov 17)

ISLAM AND THE STATE

Injunctions to Observe Relations. In May the King issued a message to "the princes, the qadis and the religious institutions in the Kingdom" calling on all his subjects, "whether small or big," strictly to observe the shari'ah. He said that this was especially necessary at the present time when propaganda was directed at Islam in order to replace it by principles unacceptable to God. Al-Hayat noted that the princes thought this to be another move in the struggle between the King and the princes in opposition. (Bilad, Hayat, May 14)

In Nov the authorities published a warning against "non-Islamic principles," such as socialism and Communism. In particular the press was exhorted not to deviate from the precepts of religion. Al-Hayat saw this warning against the background of Egyptian socialist measures and the mutual recriminations between Saudi Arabia and Egypt. (See Relations Between the UAR and Saudi Arabia.) (Hayat, Nov 14)

Opposition to Belgrade Conference. Prior to the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries, tribal heads and religious leaders were said to have advised the King, as "Keeper of the Holy Places," not to visit a country which had officially adopted the Communist-atheist creed; they also asked him to cease cooperating with leaders of such countries and issue a declaration denying "neutrality" in regard to Islamic principles. Leaflets on this issue were distributed in mosques at that time. The Conference was also attacked on similar grounds in the Mecca newspaper An-Nadwah. (Hayat Aug 16, 17; Haq'iq, Nov 23)

Improving the Holy Cities; Record Pilgrimage. At the beginning of Jan an executive body, headed by the King, was set up for the improvement of facilities for pilgrims in Mecca. 30m. riyal were set aside in the 1961 budget for "enlargement of the holy mosques and 20m. riyal for Mecca projects." (Bilad, Jan 19; Falastin, Feb 17; see also above: Economic Survey; the Budget.)

Record Pilgrimage. It was reported that pilgrimage to the Holy Places in 1380 AH (1961) had reached the record figure of 1,185,000 as against 750,000 in 1379 AH (1960). Health conditions had been very satisfactory, partly owing to the weather, and deaths had numbered 360, compared to 665 in the preceding year. (Jidah, Jordan, June 19)

A report by three Muslim doctors of the World Health Organization was reported to have noted that the lot of the pilgrims had been "completely transformed" by the improvements and "health control measures" introduced by the government. (Newsweek, Aug 21)

Islamic University Inaugurated. On Oct 24 an Islamic University for religious studies was inaugurated in Medina. The foundation expenditure to the amount of 3m. riyal came out of the royal household budget. Three hundred and twenty students were to enrol in the first year, 80% of them Saudi Arabians. (Umm al-Qura, Sept 8; Bilad, Oct 12, 25; see also below: Foreign Relations in General: Call for Establishment of "Islamic League.")

Islamic Programme on Mecca Radio. In Nov the Information Department announced that Mecca Radio was about to introduce a new programme named "The Call of Islam" (al-daw' al-ilah), to be broadcast daily for an hour and a half. The programme would include the transmission of prayers from the Ka'bah and various religious features by Muslim men of learning from all over the world (Bilad, Nov 15). [No monitoring record of this programme was available.]

THE ARMED FORCES

Supreme Defence Council Formed. On July 25 the King decreed the establishment of a Supreme Defence Council consisting of himself as chairman, the Minister of Defence and Civil Aviation as deputy chairman, the Inspector-General of the Army, the Chief of Staff and the Ministers of the Interior, Finance and Economy, Communications, and Foreign Affairs as members. The Council's task was to draw up "a long-term defence policy for the Saudi Arabian army," to provide it with equipment and men and raise its standard. The same evening, the Council held its first session. (R. Mecca, July 25 [27]; Bilad, July 26)

Saudi Arabia continued to profess a policy of neutralism and she was represented at the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries. As in previous years, she had no diplomatic relations with any Communist country, and, of the three Western powers, only with the United States.

Saudi Arabia informed the US that she would not renew the agreement by which the US Air Force enjoyed access to the US-constructed Dhahran airfield. The agreement was to expire on April 1, 1962. On the other hand, the US, which under the agreement was supplying military assistance and constructing civil aviation facilities at Dhahran at her expense, made it known that she would continue these activities. Relations remained friendly. At the end of the year King Saud went to the US for medical treatment. Relations with Aramco continued normal.

The Buraimi dispute continued to dominate relations with Britain; negotiations went on but were still inconclusive by the end of the year. In the dispute over Iraq's claim to sovereignty over Kuwait, the UK and Saudi Arabia found themselves for a time on the same side of the fence.

Saudi Arabia endeavoured to keep on friendly terms with all Arab countries but her relations with Iraq and the UAR greatly worsened. Her opposition to Iraqi claims over Kuwait was sharper than that of any other Arab country. Cairo, which after the break-up of Syria had embarked on a policy of "battling imperialism in the palaces of reaction, in Riyadh, Amman" and elsewhere, started to attack the Saudi Arabian regime in October. King Saud was charged with having conspired with King Hussein (who had visited Riyadh in August) and with "Syrian plotters" to destroy the UAR. Riyadh's relations with Sudan, on the other hand, improved. Saudi Arabia continued to sponsor all the usual Arab causes, from Algeria to the struggle against Zionism. (See Inter-Arab Relations.) Activities in the Islamic spheres developed conspicuously during the year. During the pilgrimage, in which a number of African and Asian Muslim political leaders participated, King Saud called for the establishment of an Islamic League to fight imperialism and to face the world blocs. The Islamic University, patterned after the Cairo Al-Azhar, which was opened during the year in Medina and which was to be attended also by Muslim students from abroad, may also be seen in this context. Of the 30 countries in which Saudi Arabia had diplomatic representatives, 17 were Arab and or predominantly Muslim; of the four African countries with which she established diplomatic relations during the year—Guinea, Senegal, Ghana and Nigeria—the first two were predominantly Muslim, and the President of Guinea as well as the Prime Ministers of Senegal and Northern Nigeria came on pilgrimage to Mecca. Close contacts continued also with Pakistan following President Ayub's visit to Saudi Arabia in the previous year.

FOREIGN RELATIONS IN GENERAL

Call for Establishment of "Islamic League." "Islamic Conference" at Jedda. At a reception which he gave for the leaders of the pilgrim delegations on May 20, King Saud (in a speech read by Amir Nawwaf) called for the establishment of a "strong Islamic League" (rabitah islamiyah qawriyah) to overcome the divisions in the Islamic world brought about by imperialism and in order to face the two competing world blocs. He also spoke of the Islamic University which was being established in Medina and said he would strive to have a considerable number of African and Asian students enrolled there. He elaborated on the Arab causes from Algeria to the Palestine question and Buraimi. PM Mamadou Dia of Senegal, who attended the reception, thanked King Saud in the name of all Muslims for his services as Keeper of the Holy Places. (Al-Bilad, May 21, Hayat, May 23)

On May 27 a number of Saudi Arabian and foreign Muslim notables, who had come on pilgrimage, met King Saud in Jedda and issued a number of resolutions. The foreign participants were: Sir Ahmadu Bello, the PM of Northern Nigeria; Shaykh Ibrahim Inas, the Mufti of Senegal; Sekou Kaba, Guinea Minister of the Interior; the Minister of Religion of Indonesia; the leader of the Cameroun delegation and the Malayan Consul in Jedda. The following resolutions were adopted: (1) affirmation of spiritual and material cooperation in accordance with the precepts of Islam; (2) affirmation of cooperation in the struggle against imperialism, especially on behalf of Algeria; (3) every Muslim to be active in the struggle against Zionism, which constitutes a danger to Islam; (4) support for the Islamic University of Medina; (5) recommendation of close high-level political cooperation. (Al-Bilad, May 29)

Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries. Saudi Arabia participated in the preparatory conference in Cairo as well as in the Belgrade Conference itself (see: The Belgrade Conference). King Saud did not go to Belgrade himself; it was reported that tribal heads and religious leaders had opposed his going to a country which had officially adopted the Communist-atheist creed (Hayat, Aug 16, 17; Haq'iq, Nov 2). Shaykh Ibrahim as-Suwayl, the Foreign Minister, appeared at the Conference as the King's personal representative. In his speech he stressed Saudi Arabia's policy of non-alignment, her desire for international justice and security, participation in the fight against imperialism and cooperation within the UN. [He took no stand on the controversial issues which occupied the conference.] (Doc. Belg. p 133 ff; see also: The Belgrade Conference)

The King on Foreign Policy. On Nov 12, on the occasion of the seventh anniversary of his accession, the King, in a speech read by his son Muhammad, the Minister of Defence, said: "Our foreign policy as regards Arabs... is based on the Arab League Charter... We sincerely work for the achievement of greater Arab unity despite unforeseen incidents and circumstances... Our policy as regards the Arab states is based on the spirit of Islam and free cooperation in all foreign, cultural, economic and military affairs against the common enemy... We regret, as does every Arab, what has occurred and what sometimes occurs among Arab states, matters which only benefit the enemies of the Arab nation. I seize this opportunity to call sincerely and truly for the closing of ranks... we should work concertedly on matters which need our attention most, namely the protection of the rights of our Palestinian brethren..."

"As regards the outside world we shall continue to pursue our frank and clear policy of befriending whoever seeks our friendship and opposing whoever is hostile to us. We proclaim to all our policy of neutrality, which endeavours to reduce international tension..." (R. Mecca, Nov 12 14; Bilad, Nov 13)

UNITED STATES THE DHAHRAN BASE

A central issue in Saudi Arabian-US relations in 1961 was the question of the Dhahran agreement which, Saudi Arabia declared, early in the year, it did not intend to renew.

Background. The airfield and installations at Dhahran had originally been built by the US during World War II. The mutual rights of the countries were determined by agreements of June 23, 1949, June 18, 1951 and April 2, 1957. The United States Air Force was permitted to use the base, which remained under "the complete authority and sovereignty" of Saudi Arabia. All fixed installations and other properties on the airfield established by the US became by virtue of the agreement the property of the Saudi Arabian government. The US also constructed civil aviation facilities at Dhahran. The US agreed to help Saudi Arabia procure US military supplies against payment as well as train and organize the Saudi Arabian army, air force and navy. The agreement was to expire on April 1, 1962. (For an official Saudi Arabian view on the status of the airfield, said to have US approval and made public in 1960, see MER 1960, p 381.)

Dhahran Agreement Not to Be Renewed. On March 16 the State Department announced that Saudi Arabia had asked the US to "withdraw its military operations from the Dhahran airfield." Saudi Arabia had notified Washington that she would not renew the 1957 agreement, which provided for US military access to the airfield. (NYT, March 17)

Saudi Arabian Motives. A commentary broadcast by Mecca Radio said that the Dhahran agreement was allowed to lapse because its object—helping Saudi Arabia to become independent in defence matters—had been attained. Relations with the US remained good. (R. Mecca, March 17 20)

In April Amir Talāh [the Minister of Finance and Economy] said in Cairo that his government would not renew the agreement because the US intended to continue its aid to Israel (Times, April 3). King Saud said in an interview in the same connection that he considered all aid to Israel as anti-Arab activity. (Bilad, April 23; ANA, April 23 25)

Foreign sources attributed the move to nationalist pressure, family considerations and anti-Zionism.

The Times attributed the Saudi Arabian step mainly to nationalist pressure within the Arab world. It added that "the Saudi Arabians may also feel that they have squeezed all they wanted out of the Americans," baving got a modern civil aviation centre. (Times, March 18)

Unofficial views reported from Washington were that "US use of the base had been a domestic political issue and Saudi Arabia had been a favourite target of attack for Arab nationalists and neutralists." King Saud had wished to continue the agreement but was opposed by [Crown Prince] Faisal and other members of his family (NYT, May 17). A "powerful clique of royal princes", another source said, had been "ceaselessly nagging the King to toss the US Air Force out of Dhahran. The princes were eager to appease Abdel Nasser and other Arab nationalists, who had used the King's suzerainty of a US base on Arab soil as an excuse for attacks on the Saudi Arabian royal family" (Time, May 14). It was remarked that it was impossible to say whether King Saud had yielded to pressure from the UAR. In any event, his action was consistent with the earlier request by Morocco for evacuation of American bases there. (Washington Post, March 20)

The hurry, said The Economist, was explained by King Saud's pressing need to wring the maximum advantage from a popular political decision at a time when his new government still governed uneasily. (Economist, March 25)

Another view expressed by officials in Washington was that the Saudi Arabian action had apparently been prompted by political controversy within the Arab nation over US friendliness towards Israel (NYT, March 17), but, according to Al-Hayāt, a State Department spokesman gave as his opinion that the "friendly relations between the US and Israel" had not been responsible for the above-mentioned action. (Hayat, March 18)

US Official Reaction. It was reported from Washington that the State Department would not attempt to reverse the Saudi Arabian decision. It had agreed to withdraw US military operations in the airfield. These included a military air transport service unit used for cargo and passenger aircraft and an air-sea rescue unit. The State Department said that it had no plans to cancel general aid to Saudi Arabia. "The US Government expects that its close and friendly operations with Saudi Arabia in various fields will continue." It promised that, before leaving, the US would finish the air terminal it had been building. It was now about 70 per cent complete and had so far cost $5m. (NYT, March 17, 18; Dept. of State Bul., April 3)

[Views differed as to the degree to which the US had been prepared for the development, and as to the feelings aroused. The official American view was that the Saudi Arabian announcement came as no surprise since] "discussions had been proceeding for some time with [Saudi Arabia] looking toward the non-renewal of the Dhahran Airfield Agreement" (Dept. of State Bul., April 3). Time said that the State Department "swallowed its surprise," and The Economist wrote that the Saudi Arabian step "surprised the US government by its timing rather than its text." "Whereas the talks about the base were leisurely, the Saudi Arabian decision was abrupt." (Time, March 24; Economist, March 25)

Value of Dhahran Base. [US opinion generally held that no major harm had been done to US global strategy.]

The airfield was mainly a staging post for the US Military Air Transport Services when supplying military missions in Iran, Pakistan, Turkey and the Far East. It was maintained by some 800 US airmen, with Saudi Arabian participation. (Economist, March 25)

From a strategic standpoint, the base had long been of only limited utility. There had been an understanding that no combat aircraft would be stationed there except in time of war when it would be of greatest value. The development of new missile systems, including the sea-launched Polaris, made bases like Dhahran far less important than they once had been. (Washington Post, March 20; Time, March 24)

According to The Times, it was probable that the US Strategic Air Command would have deployed some of their bombers at Dhahran in a grave emergency. Its main value would disappear when it ceased to be a base where repairs and maintenance could be carried out and stocks of equipment held. "Dhahran was certainly not on President Kennedy's list of overseas bases that are expendable, for the US had asked for the renewal of the agreement." The Americans could not be feeling happy about the Saudi Arabian move. By April 1962 the only air base available to the US in the Arab world would be Wheelus Field in Libya, more than 2,000 miles away. "The British answer to the kind of political pressures that have rendered Dhahran untenable has been to keep clear of neutral countries so far as possible and move to isolated places like Gan Island. This policy may have disadvantages in peacetime, but it would offer greater security in limited war situations where the attitudes of neutral countries may be unpredictable. The Americans are at present wholly dependent on mainland routes between the Near and Far East." (Times, March 18)

The Washington Post remarked that the lapse of the agreement would "also end the American acquiescence in some quite unpleasant personnel practices dictated by the Saudi Arabian government" [obviously a reference to Saudi Arabia's barring of American Jews from serving at the Dhahran base]. In Feb a State Department official had said Saudi Arabia was within "its sovereign right" in doing so. (NYT, March 17; Washington Post, March 20; also Time, March 24)

Further Developments. Immediately after the Saudi Arabian decision not to renew the agreement had become known, The Times correspondent in Washington reported "it is believed that a new arrangement will be found." (Times, March 18)

At the beginning of June the Saudi Arabian Ambassador in Baghdad was reported as saying that negotiations were going on between his country and the USA, since Saudi Arabia had decided not to renew the Dhahran agreement. He added that there were no military aircraft at Dhahran, and that the base served commercial purposes only. (Mustaqbal, Baghdad; Manar, Jordan, June 7)

In Aug Talal repeated at a press conference in Beirut, that US installations at Dhahran would be liquidated within eight months. Saudi Arabia was giving up an income of $10m. yearly by asking the Americans to leave the base. (NYT, Aug 16)

In Dec UAR and [pro-UAR] Lebanese newspapers alleged that King Saud's stay in the USA, where he had gone for medical treatment, served for secret negotiations concerning a renewal of the agreement. (Haqaiq, Dec 14; Ruz al-Yusuf, Dec 25; Hawadith, Dec 15)

US Military Assistance. According to evidence given on Aug 25 in the US Senate, the US military training mission in Saudi Arabia had been reduced from 376 to 250 persons. The US was continuing to sell Saudi Arabia military equipment. (US Senate, Committee on Appropriations, Foreign Assistance and Related Agencies Appropriations for 1962, Washington 1961)

Aramco. Arab sources at the UN stated that the termination of the Dhahran agreement would not affect American oil concessions in Saudi Arabia. (Ha'aretz, March 17; Hayat, March 18)

In Nov, when the King went to Boston for medical treatment, he addressed a short message to his people which included a passage thanking Aramco for his treatment in the company's hospital. (Hayat, Nov 23)

King Saud in the USA. In Nov King Saud went to the USA for medical treatment which continued into 1962.

(See Internal Affairs: Faisal's Return to Power.) At the end of Dec a State Department official called upon the King and handed him a message from the President, the contents of which were not disclosed (Hayat, Dec 29). On Jan 27, 1962 President Kennedy paid the King a courtesy visit at Palm Beach, Fla., where the King was recuperating. (NYHT, Jan 28, 1962)

UNITED KINGDOM

Buraïmi Dispute Continues Unsolved. [The Saudi Arabian position remained basically unaltered.] At the beginning of Feb Shaykh Ibrahim as-Suwai, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, said in a press interview: "Our rights are clear... Buraïmi is an inseparable part of our country" (Iraq Times, Feb 7). In Jan and again in March, Suwai announced that diplomatic relations with the UK would not be resumed until the Buraïmi dispute had been settled to his country's satisfaction. (Hayat, Jan 27; R. Mecca, March 24 [27])

In Jan it was reported that the UN Sec.-Gen. had forwarded to the UK and Saudi Arabia a report prepared by Herbert de Ribbing, Hammarskjöld's personal representative in regard to the Buraïmi dispute (see MER 1960, p 380), which included "constructive proposals" for the renewal of talks between the sides. Britain was reported to have reacted favourably to the report; however, her final attitude depended on further consultations with the Sultan of Muscat and Oman [who claimed part of the disputed area]. Earlier, a Foreign Office spokesman was reported to have declared that the UK would welcome the renewal of diplomatic relations with Saudi Arabia. (Akram, Jan 13; Ha'aretz, Jan 29; Manar, Feb 17; Hayat, Feb 24)

Al-Haydt reported that in mid-Feb talks had taken place at UN headquarters between Abd ar-Rahmān Azzām [political counsellor to King Saud] and Harold Beeley [British Deputy Representative at the UN] on the basis of de Ribbing's report. At the same time UN efforts were expected to implement the agreement which Azzām and Beeley were said to have reached in Dec 1960 concerning the repatriation of 2,500 refugees who had fled from the Buraïmi area to Saudi Arabia during earlier stages of the dispute. (Hayat, Feb 24)

In April an Egyptian newspaper reported that during his recent visit to Kuwait King Saud had discussed with the Ruler and the British representative the resumption of diplomatic relations with the UK. (Akhbar Sa'ad, Cairo, April 12)

In Aug de Ribbing again visited Saudi Arabia (Falastin, Aug 9; Jer. Times, Aug 23). On Oct 15 King Saud discussed the Buraïmi problem at length with de Ribbing and a British Foreign Office representative. The King expressed his hope for a speedy and peaceful solution. (Bilad, Oct 16; Hayat, Oct 17)

In Dec de Ribbing handed to the Foreign Office lists of refugees who wished to return to Buraïmi, for transmission to the Sultan of Muscat and Oman and the Shaykh of Abu Dhabi. (Times, Dec 6; Hayat, Dec 8)

At the end of the year The Times wrote: "A new stage in the long-drawn out dispute was reached on Dec 5 at a meeting [in London] between Lord Home, the British Foreign Secretary, and Azzām..." The talks covered the problems of the refugees and their bearing on the restoration of Anglo-Saudi relations. "The talks... seem to have gone reasonably well, but there have been so many setbacks and disappointments since the dispute began in 1952, that Foreign Office representatives were understandably cautious." (Times, Dec 6).

The Kuwait Crisis. On July 1, following Iraq's claim to sovereignty over Kuwait, both British and Saudi Arabian troops entered the country at Kuwait's request. Saudi Arabia denied that there was any liaison between the two forces and that the measures taken signified a rapprochement between Riyadh and London. (MENA, July 6 [7]; R. Mecca, July 8 [11])

Scholarships. In Sept Saudi Arabia informed the Arab League Secretariat that it had decided to donate 16 scholarships to African students. (Akhbar al-Yaum, Cairo, Sept 30)

Guinea. On May 15, during his stay in the UAR on an official visit, Sekou Touré, the President of Guinea, paid an unscheduled 13-hours visit to Saudi Arabia. Previously the Saudi Arabian ambassador to the UAR had handed him a message. At Jeddah airport, Touré was received by King Saud. They later met twice for talks. According to a Guinean statement, Touré was to discuss diplomatic relations between the two countries and questions connected with the Guinean pilgrims. The two heads of state decided to exchange diplomatic representatives. Touré invited his host to visit Guinea. Touré flew to Mecca and prayed with the pilgrims there.

A Mecca Radio commentary said that Touré's visit, although brief, had strengthened relations between Guinea and Saudi Arabia. The president had also affirmed Saudi Arabia's service to the cause of peoples longing for independence and freedom (Ahram, May 16, 17; R. Mecca, May 16 [18]; Bilad, May 17, 18). During his visit Sekou Touré gave his consent to the Saudi Arabian nominee for the post of ambassador to Guinea. (Ahram, May 17)

On June 14, the Guinean ambassador to Saudi Arabia presented his credentials to King Saud. The Guinean Foreign Minister was present at the ceremony. (Bilad, June 15)

Nigeria. In May King Saud accepted an invitation to pay an official visit to Nigeria later in 1961. The invitation was tendered by Sir Ahunadu Bello, PM of Northern Nigeria, who had come on pilgrimage (Jihad, May 31; West African Pilot, May 31). (The visit did not materialize.)

In June King Saud received members of a Nigerian mission headed by the Minister of State for Commonwealth Affairs. (R. Mecca, June 15 [17])

Saudi Arabia's first ambassador to Nigeria (and Ghana) left to take up his post in Aug (Ayyam, Damascus, Aug 21). [There was a Nigerian Ambassador in Jeddah.]

A Nigerian daily quoted a report by the Anti-Slavery Society that there was a "continuing slave traffic in children from Nigeria to Arabia." The article pointed out that Saudi Arabia and other countries in the Arabian Peninsula still recognized the status of slavery. The article quoted reports that slave-dealers were sent from Arabia under the guise of Muslim missionaries who guided poor, unsuspecting pilgrims to ports on the Saudi Arabian coast. These "pilgrims" were then imprisoned for illegal entry into the country and later sold into slavery. (Morning Post, Lagos, Nov 4)

Senegal. In Jan a representative of Senegal conducted negotiations with the Saudi Arabian Government on the establishment of diplomatic relations. He met King Saud who gave him agreement to the appointment of a Senegalese diplomatic representative in Jeddah. (Bilad; Hayat, Jan 22)

On Oct 5 the first Saudi Arabian ambassador to Senegal presented his credentials to President Senghor. (Hayat, Oct 8)

In May Mamadou Dia, PM of Senegal, accompanied by his Director of Information and Radio and the Mufti of Senegal, paid a fortnight's visit to Saudi Arabia where he carried out the Muslim pilgrimage rites. (Dakar Matin, May 18; R. Amman, May 30 [June 1])

Dia attended a reception given by King Saud in Mecca on May 21 for the Muslim leaders. Dia spoke after Amir Nawwaf who read the King's speech and expressed the thanks of the Muslims of Senegal and in general to King Saud for his services as Keeper of the Holy Places of Islam and the help extended to the pilgrims (Hayat, May 23). The Mufti of Senegal—but not the PM—also participated in an "Islamic Conference" held in Jeddah on May 27, which adopted a number of resolutions. (See above: Foreign Relations in General.)

Commenting later on the talks held between King Saud and Muslim leaders on inter-Islamic collaboration, Mamadou Dia said such a project should contain guarantees for non-intervention in the policies of the governments concerned under the guise of an Islamic union, and it should not serve as a cover for the expansion of a foreign power. Nothing precise had been decided upon. It was understood that King Saud, when he thought the time was favourable, would propose the means for the implementation of such inter-Islamic collaboration. (Dakar Matin, June 3)

On June 7 the Senegalese Minister of Information said at a press conference in Dakar that Dia had gone to Mecca as a private person, but had been considered an official guest of the government there. Dia was glad that his contacts with the King and others had furthered mutual understanding. Senegal favoured the convocation of a Muslim congress which would open the door for cooperation between Arab and African Muslims, provided it eschewed all conflict with other religions. (Dakar Matin, June 8; R. Paris for Africa, June 7 [9])

Sierra Leone. Shaykh Gibril Sesay, the secretary of the Sierra Leone Muslim Congress and founder-president of the Sierra Leone Muslim Pilgrims Association in Freetown, was to head the first group of pilgrims to Mecca. He was expected to hold discussions with the "Arab authorities" concerning the welfare of Sierra Leone pilgrims. It was through Shaykh Sesay in 1957 that Sierra Leoneans going on pilgrimage to Mecca were recognized as a unit. (Daily Mail, Freetown, May 5)

Somalia. Ten out of 55 Saudi Arabian government scholarships, for students from Arab and friendly countries for studies in the King Saud University, were intended for Somalia. (Manar, March 8)

In Dec, on learning of the floods in Somalia, King Saud telegraphed to the Somali President from his Boston hospital, expressing his sympathy for the victims. He also donated £10,000 for their relief. (R. Mecca, Dec 1 [5]; Jihad, Dec 3)

Upper Volta. The Saudi Arabian ambassador to Ghana and Nigeria attended the Upper Volta independence anniversary celebrations. (R. Mecca, Dec 5 [9])

OTHER COUNTRIES

France. There were no official relations between the two countries throughout the year. Saudi Arabian spokesmen and the King himself denounced "French aggression" and proclaimed that independence for Algeria was a condition for the resumption of diplomatic relations. (e.g. Hayat, Jan 27; R. Mecca, March 24 [27]; Falastin, June 17; Umm al-Qura, Aug 4, Sept 8)

Pakistan. In March the Pakistani Health Minister paid an official visit to Saudi Arabia; he carried a message from President Ayub to King Saud. (R. Damascus, March 24-IMB, March 24)

Another such message was delivered by the Pakistani Minister of Finance who came to the country on pilgrimage in May. (Hayat, May 23)

In Dec a Saudi Arabian military delegation, headed by Amir Muhammad Ibn Saud, the Minister of Defence, paid an official ten-day visit to Pakistan and toured military installations. (Hayat, Dec 19, 30)

Spain. On Jan 12 a treaty of friendship was signed at Madrid between the two countries. (Bilad, Jan 13)

USSR. In early summer, during the period of propaganda warfare between the UAR and the USSR, Amir Muhammad Ibn Saud, the Minister of Defence, told a Cairo radio correspondent that "the campaign directed against the UAR was in fact directed against all the Arabs." He expressed the hope that the USSR would stop the campaign "to preserve Arab-Soviet friendship." (R. Cairo, June 10 [13])

Yugoslavia. On April 5 a Yugoslav delegation left Saudi Arabia after ten days of commercial talks at Riyadh and Jeddah; it had been received by King Saud. (R. Baghdad, April 5-IMB, April 6)

SOUTHERN ARABIA AND THE PERSIAN GULF

ADEN COLONY AND PROTECTORATES

SYNOPSIS

The major political developments during the year were the talks on the British-sponsored federation of Aden Colony and the Federation of the Arab Emirates of the South. In April the Colonial Secretary visited Aden in connection with this project, and talks were held with federal and Colony ministers in London (in June-July) as well as in Aden.

The leaders of the Federation of the Amirates, i.e. the various local rulers who had become ministers in the federal government, strongly supported merger with the Colony, as did the ministers of the Colony government. The nationalists, on the other hand, led by the Aden Trade Union Congress (ATUC), opposed the project on the ground that it was designed to perpetuate imperialist domination over the territory; they demanded independence, to be followed by a unification of all Southern Arabia in a Greater Yemen, which in turn would be incorporated in an all-embracing Arab union.

Opposition also came from circles usually described as "moderate," including members of the Legislative Council which was regarded by the nationalists as an instrument of British policy. These "moderates," who originally would have been content with self-government, took exception to the secrecy of the talks in which only ministers participated, and perhaps also took cognizance of nationalist strength in the Colony. At any rate, they demanded that a national government be elected prior to negotiations for a federation and by the end of the year they demanded "freedom for Aden before 1963." There could be no doubt that the majority of political opinion in the Colony opposed the projected merger.

Political parties of various trends proliferated (their establishment had been called for by the Governor in 1960 in preparation for self-government) but no major party emerged. On the eve of the Colonial Secretary's visit, the nationalists, with the ATUC in the forefront, established an ad hoc coordinating body to fight the federation plan, but no permanent nationalist political organization had been formed by the end of the year.

In Aden Colony, where Aden-born Arabs were in a minority, the question of how the term "Adeni" would be defined became even more of a political issue than before because of the imminent change in Aden's status. The "Aden for the Adenis" circles, including nationalist-inclined "moderates," continued to advocate that franchise be given only to Aden-born persons, while the nationalist ATUC, with its large Yemeni membership, also wished to enfranchise the Yemeni immigrants. Both were opposed to granting rights to non-Arabs, whether for economic or nationalist reasons or both. The Indian, the largest foreign community, was at the centre of the controversy, as the Indian Association which represented mainly Hindu elements (as distinct from Indian Muslims) sought guarantees from the British in case of independence.

The Aden Trade Union Congress, in addition to its nationalist activities, continued its struggle against the Industrial Ordinance of 1960, which was being strictly enforced by the authorities; the leader of the only strike during the year (as compared with the tens of strikes before the ordinance came into force) was sentenced to prison.

The Federation of the Amirates was joined by its eleventh member, the Wāhidi sultanate of Balhaf and Bir Ali, the westernmost state of the Eastern Protectorate. The Hadhramaut states, on the other hand, showed no inclination to do likewise. The Federation acquired an army in the form of the Aden Protectorate levies which were handed over to it by the British; the force retained British command. Hostilities in Yafi and Awlaqi continued. In May-June a government offensive in Lower Yafi, with the help of the RAF, compelled the rebel leader Muhammad Ibn Aydarus to seek refuge in Yemen, where he endeavoured to establish a joint rebel command; he later left Yemen. In the reports on hostilities in Upper Yafi, the Musalli clan was conspicuous, while in those in Upper Awlaqi, pride of place was taken by the Shams.

In the Hadhramaut, a central event was the rebellion of the Saibāni tribes in the Wadi Du'an region of the Qu'aiti sultanate. It would seem that the rebellion was caused by local issues with no apparent nationalist overtones such as those in the Western Protectorate rebellions. The rebellion was put down by the government forces aided by the RAF towards the end of August. Both sides sustained a considerable number of casualties.

In Nov the Qu'aiti and Kathiri governments granted an oil concession to an American company, having already agreed between themselves in 1959 to share the anticipated oil income (see MER 1960, p. 392). The Thamud concession area was claimed also by the neighbouring Mahri state of the Eastern Protectorate while Yemen, which claimed all the Aden territories, announced that the agreement was "null and void."

FOREIGN INTERFERENCE

Yemen continued to make public its claims to sovereignty over Aden and announced that it would not recognize Aden's independence (if such were granted by Britain.)

The UAR continued its support of the nationalist movement in Aden, hospitality to Adeni nationalists and propaganda against the British presence in the region, (as will be seen from many references below). In May a UAR spokesman stated that Britain had refused the UAR permission to open a consulate in Aden. (Times, May 19)

ISSUE OF MERGER OF ADEN COLONY AND PROTECTORATES

[The major political issue throughout the year was the British-sponsored union between Aden Colony and the protectorates (compare MER 1960, p 388). Related questions were the constitutional development in Aden Colony, the widening of the Federation of the Amirates of the South to include all states of the Western Protectorate, and the proposed union of the sultanates of the Hadhramaut, Eastern Protectorate.]

BRITISH POLICY

Addressing the third session of the Aden Colony Legislative Council (Legco) on Jan 16, Sir Charles Johnston, Governor of Aden, said that he was pursuing the question of further constitutional development but "at the same time I must ask you to be patient." (The council had requested in Aug 1960 that a new constitution be brought into effect not later than the end of 1962.) The governor said it would be some time before the government would be in a position to announce firm proposals. There were many complex problems, including the possibility of "closer association" with the Western Aden Protectorate and in particular with the Federation of the Arab Amirates of the South. "We want it firmly rooted and must avoid hasty or premature action," he said. (Times, Jan 17)

Members in Charge Become Ministers. At the same time the governor announced that the Colonial Secretary had approved a ministerial system for Aden Colony. Accordingly, members-in-charge would soon assume ministerial status "more faithfully to represent their actual powers and responsibilities." The Times commented that this was a change in name but not in function, for the members-in-charge already fulfilled the role of ministers (Times, Jan 17). Aden Chronicle commented that the governor would continue to nominate his ministers, who would still be lacking any popular association (Aden Chr., Feb 2). The Voice of the Arabs was of a similar opinion and added that this was another step to link Aden with the federation and thus tie the whole region to British imperialism and isolate it from the Arab world. (V of A, Jan 18, 25, 26 [20, 27, 28])

MACLEOD VISITS ADEN

On April 4, Mr Iain Macleod, the British Colonial Secretary, arrived in Aden for an informal three-day visit to ascertain local views concerning Aden's future. On April 5 and 6 he visited the Eastern and Western Protectorates respectively. He met representatives of the Protectorates' governments and Aden executive and legislative councils members, and received representatives of the Indian Association, the National Union, the Ummah and the Sha'ab parties.

Colony: National Organizations Boycott Visit; Demonstrations. Public reactions to Macleod's visit represented the pro-government and nationalist trends.

The ATUC, which called for a hostile reception, succeeded, after weeks of futile contacts and attempts (Ayyam, Feb 18, March 6, 18, 23), in uniting the nationalist organizations on this issue. Before Macleod's arrival the ATUC called for a meeting of all "national organizations" to adopt a national stand toward the visit. Only the National Union Party was not invited, it being considered by the ATUC "a semi-governmental political party" as long as it was headed by a minister "in the present Aden government" [Hussein Ali Bayūmī] (Ayyam, March 29). Nineteen organizations participated in the meeting, including the ATUC, the South Arabian League, the Istiqlāl Party, the Yemeni Association, the Islamic Association, the Committee for the Boycott of Israel, the Committee for the Support of Algeria and several social and sport organizations. It was decided not to meet the Colonial Secretary, but to stage a popular peaceful demonstration (in spite of the ban on any kind of demonstration), and to hold a general popular rally on April 3. (Ayyam, April 5; V of A, April 2 [5])

The demonstrations were staged on April 3, according to plan, in Crater, Ma'alla and Tawahi, with thousands participating, according to nationalist sources. Crowds then gathered in the ATUC grounds for the popular rally. In another demonstration on April 6 in Shaykh Uthmān, coffins inscribed "The Federation" and "The Legislative Council" were carried to the Jewish cemetery and burned there. The demonstrations were peaceful. (Ayyam, April 5, 11; V of A, April 5 [8]; Aden Chr., May 4)

According to Cairo reports, the "popular organizations" participating in the rally signed a "national document" denouncing the "British imperialist" plan to establish a political entity of Aden and the Amirates. The organizations declared their non-recognition of the "British federation of sultans," and their rejection of the "governmental Legislative Council" and of treaties concluded by "self-styled" sultans, amirs, and ministers. The document denounced imperialist designs aimed at "defacing the Arabhood of the area," granting foreigners in Aden political rights, whilst denying them to "legitimate citizens from the Yemeni north." The rally declared the "national wealth" [natural resources] to be solely the property of the people and announced its opposition to the conversion of the area into a military base. It denounced the British "policy of suppression and extermination" in the amirates, the restrictions on the press and the anti-strike law. The only solution was complete and unconditional liberation of the area from British imperialism and reaction (V of A, April 5, 6 [7, 8]). The 19 organizations later formed a Congress of Popular Organizations (mu'tamar al-hay'at ash-sha'abiyah) with Abdallah al-Asnag as Chairman. (Ayyam, June 25; Aden Chr., July 6)

A number of the organizations' leaders, including Abdallah al-Asnag, were tried on April 29 and fined for organizing the demonstrations. On the eve of the trial, the "popular organizations" held a rally in the ATUC grounds, reportedly attended by some 10,000 people. (MENA, April 16 [18]; Aden Chr., April 27, May 4; Haga'iq, May 4; V of A, May 7 [9])

The "Arab South" youth organization in Cairo and "the Sons of the Arab South" in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, were reported to have denounced "imperialist schemes" regarding Aden. (V of A, April 4, 9 [6, 11])

"Moderate" vs "Phased Independence." The "moderate" point of view was represented by the National Union Party, the Ummah Party and the Sha'ab Party and members of the Legco [the term "moderates" was employed by both Aden Chronicle and The Times]. The pro-government Aden Chronicle commented that both the people of Aden and the British government were inclined to support self-government and gradual progress towards full independence with an eventual merger with the Federation and the Eastern Protectorate rather than immediate independence (Aden Chr., April 6). In more detail, M.A. Luqman listed demands for the creation of a constituent assembly to formulate a constitution, for the exclusion of non-Adenis from the electoral lists and for equal political status for Aden and the Protectorates. (Fat. Jaz., April 10, 13, 14)

Legco member Sa'id Muhammad Hasan Hason published a report on the Legco meeting with Macleod. He said he had demanded immediate and unconditional independence. Mr Macleod had answered that he expected a request for constitutional amendments within self-government before the request for complete independence. The other Legco members, including the ministers A. S. Ali, H.A. Bayumi and A.S. Basendwah, as well as M.A. Maqtari, A.A. as-Safi and H.I. Khodabux had stated that neither they nor 85% of the people supported the request for complete independence. (Ayyam, April 9)

[Later in the year it appeared that these differences among the "inoderates" became more pronounced. See further below.]

In the ensuing press debate on the issue, V.K. Joshi, Minister of Works, [a Hindu, president of the Indian Association], pointed out the problems which would be posed by independence and which would take time to solve: the need to form an independent army, the political differences between the Colony and the Protectorates, the economic impact of the withdrawal of British forces before other sources of revenues were secured. In reply, Muhammad Salim Ali, head of the ATUC National Bureau, wrote that Aden would not be abandoned since it was part of the great Arab nation; Aden Port's advantages were not due to British enterprise; and the people were the army which would defend freedom. (Ayyam, April 16, 23; V of A, April 30, May 3 [2, 5])

Leaders of Federation Welcome Union. In a speech of welcome to Macleod on April 6, the Sultan of Lahaj, Fadl Ibn Ali, Chairman of the Federal Supreme Council of the Arab Amirates of the South, called for "independence in full union with the colony of Aden and other south Arabian states." In reply, Macleod told the Council that the federated states had entered the Federation voluntarily; "if Aden and other states are to unite with the Federation, I am sure you will agree it must be with their consent." (Times, April 7)

Sultan Ibn Ali had also earlier taken the opportunity to express his support for such a union; so did Sultan Salih Ibn Hussein [al-Awdhali], and later Sharif Hussein of Beihan, Federal Minister of the Interior. (Aden Chr., Jan 19, Feb 16, Aug 10)

Hadhramaut Opposed to Union Schemes. When visiting Mukalla on April 5, Macleod received a four-point memorandum from a group of dignitaries in Mukalla, demanding revision of the Protectorate's treaty with Britain, unification of Hadhramaut, creation of elected legislative and municipal councils and increased economic aid. Macleod said later that the demands should follow, and not precede, a wider association between Hadhramaut and other protectorate states. (Times, April 6; Hayat, Ayyam, April 7)

Following the visit, reports said that both the Kaihri and the Qu'aiti states were unwilling to join a federal union with the Western Protectorate (Aden Chr., April 13; Fat. Jaz., April 14). (The Wihidi state, however, joined the WAP in Nov; see below.)

Earlier, rumours had been reported from Mukalla of discussions of a federal union between the Qu'aiti and Kathiri states, which would then merge in the WAP federation. It was remarked that it could not be expected that the two states would agree to pool their resources and incomes, since one was better off than the other. (Aden Chr., Feb 9)

Britain Continues Policy of "Phased Independence" and Federation. Summing up the impressions he gained in his talks, Macleod was reported to have said that the demand was more for self-government and phased independence than for immediate independence. He said the British government thought it likely that, within the next 12 months, some kind of constitutional conference would be held with leaders from the Colony and the Protectorates. This did not mean that major constitutional changes were envisaged, but he felt there was a general demand for a closer association between Aden and the states. (Fat. Jaz., April 6; Aden Chr., April 6, 13; Times, April 7)

Colony and Federation Governments Work Towards Union. Union talks between the Aden government and Federation dignitaries had been reported already before the Macleod visit (V of A, March 23 [25]). In May, economic talks were reported which, "it was hoped," would be followed by closer political ties. (Aden Chr., May 11)

During the same month, Governor Johnston completed a series of talks at the Colonial Office on constitutional issues in the Colony, including its relationship with the Federation. (Aden Chr., June 15)

TALKS ON MERGER; WIDESPREAD OPPOSITION
Talks in London. In June, at the invitation of the Colonial Secretary, a delegation from the Supreme Council of the Federation arrived in London to discuss questions of the Federation, and union with the Colony. On July 1 they were joined by Governor Johnston and the five Aden Colony ministers. (Times, June 13, 30, July 3; Aden Chr., June 15, 29; Hayat, July 2)

On their return home, Shaykh Muhammad Farid, Chairman of the Executive Council of the Federation, said all three sides had agreed that Aden should join the Federation. V.K. Joshi, Minister of Works of Aden Colony, stated that there had been evidence of a keen desire on the part of both the Federation and the Colony to come much closer. (Aden Chr., July 20, 27)

A statement issued at the conclusion of the talks referred to valuable progress made in discussion of matters of joint concern between the Federation and the Colony. (Times, Aug 9)

Talks Continued in Aden. Talks were resumed on Aug 8 in Aden with the participation of the Federal and Colony ministers. An official statement said the talks were likely to lead to much closer links between the Colony and the Federation; members of the Legislative and Federal Councils and "others" would in due course be given an opportunity to express their opinions in the matter.

In Sept a delegation consisting of Adeni and Federal ministers went to the Amirates to canvass support for the merger.

The participants set up working parties to deal with questions in detail and there were further meetings of the ministers in Sept and Oct. Johnston went to London in Sept and Nov to report on the talks which, he said, had got off to a good start. (Times, Aug 8, 9, Nov 11; Aden Chr., Aug 10, 24, Sept 7, Oct 19, Nov 9; Hayat, Aug 9, Sept 7; Fat. Jaz., Sept 23)

Nationalist Stand: Total Opposition. Nationalist rejection of the talks was based on arguments that the Adeni ministers lacked popular authority and that the union plans were designed to perpetuate imperialist rule in the region; the only solution for Aden was immediate and unconditional independence.

In June, on the arrival in London of the Federal delegation, the ATUC, in a communiqué from its London Office, said that the Federation was forced on the people, the RAF had been told to attack villagers who opposed the Federation, press freedom was denied in Aden, union rights disregarded and demonstrations prohibited (Aden Chr., June 22). There were many subsequent statements in this vein by the ATUC. SG Asmag said the ATUC was sending a delegation to the permanent secretariat of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Conference and would appeal for support to the UN and friendly countries (Mid. Mir., July 8, Aug 12; Aden Chr., July 6). In Oct, in a note to the representatives of foreign states in Aden, the ATUC called on them not to recognize any political entity set up by the British supposedly in the name of the people of Aden (MENA, Oct 28 [31]). During the same period, the ATUC published an appeal for support to "all free people and international organizations," demanding self-determination for all Aden territories by means of plebiscite under UN supervision. (V of A, Oct 31 [Nov 2])

In Sept, it was reported that the "national organizations" in Aden had submitted a memorandum to the British Governor demanding the suspension of the talks. The only solution was for Britain to recognize the freedom and sovereignty of the people and leave it to them to decide what sort of federation they wanted. (MENA, Sept 12 [14])

Opposition to the talks and to the federation plan was also reported from the South Arabian League, Muhammad Ibn Aydarus, the rebel Sultan of Yafi and Ali Abd al-Karim, [the exiled ex-Sultan of Lahej]. (Mid. Mir., July 5, Aug 12; Aden Chr., July 6; Haq'iq, Nov 9; V of A, Aug 19 [22]; Nov 13 [15], Nov 20 [22])

On Sept 22 "leading nationalist elements," at a conference of all political parties and organizations in Aden, proposed civil disobedience throughout the Colony but a resolution in these terms was not passed, due largely, according to Aden Chronicle, to the lukewarm support of the "two most powerful" political organizations in Aden—the [nationalist] ATUC and the [moderate] People's Constitutional Congress (on the attitude of which, see below). (Aden Chr., Sept 28)

[The UAR fully backed the nationalists.]

"Moderates" Demand National Government Before Union. [From the sources available, it would seem that the "moderates" polarized into two camps: on the one hand, those who collaborated more closely with the British government, notably Legco members who were also ministers, and other Legco members on the other. The latter took exception to the secrecy of the talks from which they were excluded and demanded that before a merger with the Federation, the Colony must be placed politically on a par with the Federation and have a national government elected by Adenis only, i.e. to the exclusion of members of foreign communities. It would seem that their attitude hardened as time went on. It should be noted that Aden Chronicle and Fatā al-Jazirah, the main sources for this chapter, were both owned by members of the Luqman family who belonged to the latter group of moderates. The editor-in-chief of both papers was Muhammad Ali Luqman; Ali Muhammad Luqman, managing editor of Fatā al-Jazirah, was a Legco member and founded the People's Constitutional Congress, with a programme couched in nationalist and even socialist terms. See: Political Parties.]

In June, when the London talks started, Aden Chronicle suggested that the Federation rulers should have informed their peoples and their "brethren in Aden" of the objects of the talks. (Aden Chr., June 29)

Legco members I.K. Khan, A.M. Luqman, M.A. Maqtari, S.M. Hassan, M.S. Hussein, A.A. as-Sāfi, J.A. Saleh and M. Abdallah cabled to the Colonial Secretary in protest against "calling ministers to discuss the future of Aden and ignoring our opinion," and declared they would not be bound by the decisions of the meeting.

The newly-formed People's Constitutional Congress (PCC; A.M. Luqman, Secretary-General) demanded a national government for Aden Colony before any other decisions were taken to determine its future.

Aden Chronicle added that there were too many disparities, in administration, economy and outlook, to permit an immediate union between Aden and her hinterland. At the same time, the paper said that public opposition was not to talks between the Federation and Aden but to the authority granted to the hereditary autocracy and the nominated and elected members of the Legco to decide the future of "about a million people." (Aden Chr., July 6; see also July 27)

In Aug, when the talks were resumed in Aden, the Democratic Party of South Arabia and the PCC submitted memoranda to the Aden government demanding elections for a national government in which only Adeni (or "Aden-born"—the PCC version) nationals would have the franchise; only such a government was qualified to negotiate for union with the Federation (Aden Chr., Aug 10, 24, 31; Fat. Jaz., Aug 12, Sept 23). At the same time, Legco members U.A. Shihāb, A.A. Sāfi, A.Q. Mak-kawī, S.M. Hassan, and A.M. Alwān, in a memorandum to the government, demanded the suspension of the talks and "drastic constitutional changes" which would grant the Aden Arab element in Aden the final decision in regard to self-determination. (Aden Chr., Sept 7; Fat. Jaz., Aug 25)

In Nov Ali Muhammad Luqman informed the Colonial Secretary of the additional PCC demand for "freedom for Aden before 1963" and the right to self-determination after the election of a national government. (Times, Nov 15; Aden Chr., Nov 16; Mid. Mir., Nov 18)

In Dec a PCC member told the press that Legco did not represent the nation, since its members were not party nominees and were therefore responsible only to themselves. (Aden Chr., Dec 28)

ADEN COLONY

THE GOVERNMENT

Members in Charge Become Ministers (see p 433 a).

Change in Government. For members of the Legislative Council and the Executive Council, see MER 1960, p 384.

On Oct 24 A.S. Ali, Minister of Posts and Information, tendered his resignation for personal reasons, but retained his membership in Legco. He was replaced by M.S. Hussein, Legco opposition member and Secretary of the Sha'ab Party. (Aden Chr., Oct 26, Nov 2; Mid. Mir., Nov 4)

Attempt on Life of V.K. Joshi. On Aug 13 V.K. Joshi, Minister of Public Works and Civil Aviation [and President of the Indian Association, narrowly escaped death when explosives were hurled at his house (Fat. Jaz., Aug 15, 18; Aden Chr., Aug 17). [No motives were mentioned in the sources available. For Joshi's involvement in a political controversy, see below: Immigration, Status of Indian Community.]

Ban on Political Activities of Civil Servants. In Feb it was reported that the government had banned the participation of civil servants in any form of political activity. (V of A, Feb 9 [11])

In July, the newly-formed Democratic Party asked that the ban be relaxed. (Aden Chr., July 20)

BRITISH FORCES

On March 1, 1961, Headquarters British Forces, Arabian Peninsula, at Aden was redesignated Middle East Command. The Command area included the Araoian coast and up to the Persian Gulf as far as Kuwait, as well as Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika and the western half of the Indian Ocean. (Army Quarterly, July; NYT, July 7; for details of the Command's forces see p 90 b.)

Baghdad and Cairo alleged that the British were constructing an atomic base in Aden. (See e.g. Akhir Sa'ah, Cairo, Nov 8; R. Baghdad, Nov 14 [16])

THE ADEN TRADE UNION CONGRESS

Organization. In Feb a large labour rally, presided over by Abdallah al-Asnag, SG of the Aden Trade Union Congress (ATUC), heard the latest plans and organizational programme.

On the political plane, the ATUC would resist the forces of imperialism and reaction all over the "Yemeni State," comprising Yemen and Aden. Internally the cultural committee of the ATUC would endeavour to keep members informed by means of news bulletins, broadcasting services, lectures, etc. The Committee had obtained the services of legal, economic and medical advisers. (Aden Chr., Feb 16)

In a press interview Asnag gave the following information on ATUC organization:

General Organization. The ATUC embraced eight separate federations, "each decentralized and administered by a secretary": petroleum workers, transport, teachers, government and local government employees, civilian employees of the armed forces, commercial workers, technical workers, banks and insurance. Each federation elected an executive, which sent a minimum of two and a maximum of four members to the Council of Representatives. The council held annual elections for the executive board which consisted of nine members: president, vice-president, SG, deputy SG, an assistant secretary [each] for national affairs, industrial relations and cultural affairs, treasurer and assistant treasurer.

The National Bureau: See below: Political Activities.

Source of Finance: Membership fees and local donations.

Affiliation: the ATUC was affiliated to the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions (ICATU) and to labour organizations in the UAR, Libya, Lebanon and Iraq. [The ATUC was also affiliated to the ICFTU.]

Activities: In addition to policy-making and arbitration, the ATUC conducted "a vigorous weekly programme of lectures, debates and internal broadcasts."

Membership: The ATUC had 15,000 paying members (Aden Chr., June 1). In Nov Asnag said it was estimated that some 40% of all workers employed in the oil installations, as well as in the port of Aden, were members of the Congress (Tanyug, Nov 28 [EE Dec 1]). Fifty per cent of the union members were said to be temporary immigrants from Yemen and the Protectorates. (Aden Chr., Jan 5)

Abdallah al-Asnag. A biographical sketch of the ATUC leader contained the following details: He was born in Grater, Aden, in 1934. His father (d. 1960), a municipal clerk, was a renowned Arabic poet and as such enjoyed the patronage of the Imam of Yemen. His father had imbued him with a love of Arabic literature, and with the ideals of freedom and Arab unity. Two incidents especially had a formative influence on the boy when he was at secondary school: the Palestine war in 1948, when his father published a "polemic" on Arab unity, and, when he was 16, the authorities' refusal to allow pupils to celebrate the formation of the Arab League. Asnag and other students hired buses and toured Aden denouncing the Education Department. Asnag continued his feud with this department on national issues, while studying at the Shaykh Uthman College, and later at the Teachers' Training College, both of which he left without completing his studies because of his nationalist "frustrations." Meanwhile, he had started to write on nationalist issues for the Al-Ba'ath newspaper.

In 1953 Asnag was employed as a clerk by Aden Airways where he organized a union and became its president; the only other union in Aden at that time was the Technical Workers' Union. The Aden Airways' management gave way to a series of demands by the union, and in the wake of this success, other unions soon came into being. Later, Asnag formed the ATUC.

Asnag was described as a "short, chubby little man" with a "cautious smile and mild manner"; he was a voracious reader and a witty man. He was a Muslim "but claims he is not over-religious." He said his outlook was one of a "liberal socialist" and he strongly refuted any suggestion of Communist tendencies. (Aden Chr., June 22)

A Purge. In Feb Asnag told the press that the ATUC would weed out certain corrupt and inefficient elements from the leadership of the unions (Aden Chr., Feb 16). In March the ATUC published its decision to expel Abd al-Qadir Fariawi and Mustafa Ri'at, on the grounds of "misbehaviour and open association with the British authorities in Aden." (MENA, March 31 [April 5])

Opposition to Industrial Ordinance; "Work Stoppages." (Compare MER 1960, pp 385-6.)

In April it was reported that the ATUC had asked the British Trade Union Congress (TUC) for an expert to set up machinery for the settlement of disputes by negotiation. Asnag said the trade unions refused to deal with the industrial court and would not register with it any agreements they made with employers. (Aden Chr., April 27)

In Aug it was reported that, to express their grievances, unions had been resorting to work stoppages at the airport, the harbour, BP (Aden) Ltd., the RAF hospital and the National Bottling Company. The ATUC conference had now formed a special committee to intensify the struggle against the Industrial Ordinance. (Aden Chr., Aug 24)

The ATUC enlisted the aid of the British TUC and international labour organizations in its struggle against the ordinance. (See below: International Labour Relations.)

Labour Disputes: Technical Workers Strike. On Feb 24 the technical workers at the Lebanese "Mathercat" company staged a peaceful demonstration led by Abdallah Ali Murshid, SG of the Technical Workers' Union, to demand limited hours of work during Ramadan (Ayyam, March 1; NCNA, March 3 [FE 6]). Later Cairo reported that Murshid and two others had been sentenced to a week's imprisonment and to a fine for staging the demonstration. (V of A, March 28 [30])

On Oct 20, 5,000 technical workers went on a six-day strike—the first to take place since strikes were outlawed by the Industrial Ordinance in 1960—after a dispute with the Civil Contractors' Association over increased wages, sick, annual and holiday leaves, overtime pay and severance pay. A compromise offer by the CCA was rejected. Asnag said that the Union had made every effort to reach a settlement by negotiation. (V of A, Oct 29 [Nov 2]). Later, an agreement was concluded, which partly met the workers' demands.

In Nov, Abdallah Ali Murshid, the Union secretary, was sentenced to 24 months' imprisonment with hard labour on charges of sedition and encouraging strikes contrary to the Industrial Ordinance (Aden Chr., Oct 26, Nov 16, 23; Times, Nov 25). The government also deported 17 Yemeni workers, fined ten strikers and charged four members of the union executive with participation in the strike.

The ICFTU protested against these measures (ICFTU Press and Radio Service, No. 19, Nov 3); so did the WFTU in a telegram from Prague to the Governor of Aden. (NCNA, Oct 28 [FE, Nov 1])

New ATUC Paper. In Oct it was reported that the ATUC would issue a new paper, Al-Ummal; [its former organ Al-Amal had been closed down in 1960]. (Fot. Jaz., Oct 28)

Political Objectives and Activities. [The ATUC was the major local political force in Aden Colony and the focus of nationalist activity. For ATUC activities in the political sphere, see under: Issue of Merger of Aden Colony and Protectorates; Political Parties.]

The main political objective of the ATUC was the merger of all Aden territories ("southern Yemen") and Yemen under a democratic regime and the adherence of this state to an all-encompassing Arab union; this entailed the elimination of British colonialism from Aden and the curtailment of the sway of the sultans in the Protectorates. Asnag said the ATUC's creed was socialism; they did not believe in Communism. The ATUC opposed immigration [of non-Arabs] and demanded the enfranchisement of the Yemenis in Aden. (Aden Chr., Feb 16, May 18, June 1, 29)

In 1960 the ATUC requested that Aden be put under UN trusteeship. (R. Moscow, Jan 26 [SU 28]; Aden Chr., Jan 26)

ATUC political activities were coordinated by a national bureau (maktab qaumi). In March the formation was reported of new national bureau committees: Aden town national branch committee, the northern [i.e. Yemeni] branch committee, Arab relations committee headed by Muhsin al-Ayni, Afro-Asian relations committee, planning committee, international committee. The heads and secretaries of these committees would be considered assistants to the SG of the national bureau, Muhammad Salim Ali. (Ayyam, March 16)

Ayni, a Yemeni political exile, was expelled from Aden in Jan; he also later appeared under the title of Permanent Representative of the ATUC in Cairo and the Arab Countries (see p 702 b).

The ATUC in Aug resolved to expand the national bureau, in order to separate political activities from purely labour affairs. (A proposal for an organizational separation of political activities from trade union activities was made in 1960 by an Egyptian expert; MER 1960, p 385.) (Aden Chr., Aug 24)

International Labour Relations. International Labour Organizations: The British TUC, the ICFTU and the ILO all intervened with the British government on behalf of the ATUC.

The ICFTU executive board, at its meeting in Brussels, Nov 28-Dec 2, 1960, adopted a resolution calling on the British government to ensure repeal of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, reinstate the workers dismissed in connection with the general strike of Aug 1960 and license a new ATUC journal.

The ICFTU also submitted a complaint to the ILO in this matter. The ILO governing body did not accept the ICFTU "allegation" that the 1960 Ordinance ran counter to ILO conventions but called the attention of the British government to the importance it attached to the principle that where the right to strike was subject to restriction, conciliation and arbitration should be "adequate, impartial and speedy, which was not the case where the employer was the Aden government"; it also called for trade union and press freedom and asked for information on dismissals. (ICFTU, Free Labour World, No. 127, Jan 1961, p 39; ICFTU Information Bulletin, No. 15-16, Aug 1-15, 1961, p 97; ICFTU Press and Radio Service, No. 6, Aug 10, 1961)

On July 27 representatives of the ATUC, the British TUC and the ICFTU met in London to discuss industrial relations in Aden—the industrial ordinance, the dismissal of workers who had struck in 1960 and the banning of the ATUC newspaper, and agreed that the TUC should present the case to the Colonial Office. (ICFTU Press and Radio Service, No. 6, Aug 10, 1961; ICFTU 7th World Congress Report, 5-13, July 1962)

Somalia. At the beginning of Jan, following a visit by Asnag to Hargeisa, a joint statement by Asnag for the ATUC and Abdi Hussein Esa for the Somali Confederation of Labour, said: (1) the two "national centres" would establish closer contacts and "harmonize international labour policy," (2) the newly formed AATUF should be supported by all African trade unions as a step towards the immediate emancipation of Africa's political, social and economic life, (3) the SCL fully supported the ATUC struggle against British anti-trade-union policy in Aden. (Aden Chr., Jan 12)

Italy: Following a meeting in Aden between a member of the Italian Labour Federation [?] and leaders of the ATUC, a joint statement was issued expressing the wish for closer relations, denouncing imperialism, expressing support for a people's right to self-determination, declaring the Italian federation's sympathy with the ATUC struggle for labour rights, and denouncing the plans to divide the "natural Yemen." (Ayyam, March 29)

Yugoslavia: ATUC delegations visited Yugoslavia in June (Assistant SG Muhammad Sâlim Ali and Muhiin al-Ayni). (Tanyug, June 15 [EE 19]; R. Belgrade, June 15 [EE 22]) and in Nov (headed by Asnag). (Tanyug, Nov 25 [EE 29])

A joint statement issued after the talks in Nov expressed the support of the Yugoslav Trade Union Federation for Aden's national liberation aspirations, especially a plebiscite in exercise of self-determination, and the struggle of the ATUC for the "fundamental interests of the Aden people." The two organizations condemned colonialism and neo-colonialism, and pledged support to the anti-colonialist struggle. (Tanyug, Nov 30 [EE, Dec 2])

UAR: In Aug it was reported that the UAR had presented 2,000 textbooks to the ATUC Cultural Bureau. The UAR and Iraq had also promised a number of scholarships. (Aden Chr., Aug 24; Akhbar, Egypt, Sept 5)

On Nov 13 a joint statement was issued by the UAR Trade Union Federation and the ATUC "in view of the grave events... [in] the Arab world." The two parties, being "members of the Arab union" (ittihâd al-arab) believed in their important role in the Arab movement and pledged themselves to consolidate the union. The UAR Federation supported the ATUC in its just struggle against the imperialist designs and restriction of trade unions in Aden and in its efforts to promote the cause of the "Southern Yemen, which is known as Aden and the Protectorates." The ATUC congratulated the UAR workers on the revolutionary socialist laws and on their participation in profits and management. The Arab workers in the Yemen and the UAR denounced the "secessionist movement" in Syria. (MENA, Nov 13 [15])

POLITICAL PARTIES

Proliferation of Parties. [The Governor's call for the formation of political parties made in Jan 1960 was taken up mainly by moderate circles. While there had been only little progress in 1960, seven new parties were formed in the first half of 1961, bringing the sum total by July to ten. As the population of the Colony was only some 200,000 and the nationalists were organized mainly in the ATUC, these parties—mostly based on one of the town quarters—could not have a large membership.]

It was remarked that popular support for some of the parties was doubtful and that their programmes were almost identical (Ayyam, March 14; Aden Chr., June 1). A typical report (in Feb) on the formation of a new party in Shaykh Uthmân said that M. S. Hussein, Legco member, had called for a meeting of several leading personalities to "discuss the need for a political party." (Aden Chr., Feb 9)

The Nation Party (hizb al-ummah). The party was founded in Shaykh Uthmân at the beginning of the year, with Ali Ahmad Isma'il as president and Makram Antar as secretary. On May 12 it held a "thousands strong" popular rally, which passed resolutions calling for (a) complete independence for Aden and the Protectorates after an interim period, during which the people must be trained for eventual political, administrative and military responsibility; (b) formation of a committee "to undertake military training" (ex-officers of the Aden Protectorate Levies were said to have volunteered assistance); (c) formation of committees to alleviate unemployment and fight illiteracy; (d) foreign communities in Aden to keep aloof from political activities; (e) tours to the Protectorate to be organized in order to propagate the ideal of federation and unity; and (f) the granting of political rights to women. (Fat. Jaz., May 16; Aden Chr., May 18, June 22)

On Nov 1 the party held a popular rally on the occasion of the seventh anniversary of the Algerian rebellion and cabled the UN denouncing French policy in Algeria. There were two splits from this party; see below. (Fat. Jaz., Nov 6)

Democratic Liberals Party (hizb al-ahdâr ad-dimuqrâtî). This party was established as a merger of two groups which split off from the Ummah party.

In May a group of defectors from the Ummah party formed the Free Arab Progressive Party (hizb al-ahdâr al-arabi al-taqaddumi) which held that Aden Colony, the Protectorates and Yemen constituted one entity and part of the Arab world, called for independence for all South Arabia, objected to immigration into Aden and to "capitalistic exploitation", called for nationalization of public services, supported the labour movement, and advocated development of heavy industry. (Aden Chr., June 29)

In July another rift in the Ummah Party was reported, resulting in the formation of the Democratic Party. The party was reported to intend to ask the government to relax restrictions on the political activities of civil servants. The party also protested against the proposed amendments to the Shaykh Uthmân constitution, giving greater authority to the Governor in local government. (Aden Chr., July 12, 20, 27)

In Oct, after the break-up of the UAR, it was reported that the two parties had organized licensed demonstrations by over 250 schoolboys, aged 8-17, in Shaykh Uthmân and Ma'alla against the Syrian government and in support of Abdel Nasser. (Aden Chr., Oct 12)

At the end of the year the two parties merged and formed the Democratic Liberals Party. (Fat. Jaz., Dec 2)
The People's Party (hizb ash-sha'ab). Its formation in Shaykh Uthmân was announced in Feb, with Legco member M.A. Maqatari as president and Legco member Muhammad Sa'id al-Husseini as secretary. (Fat. Jaz., Feb 13, April 10)

The People's Constitutional Congress (hay'at al-mu'tamar ad-dustûri ash-sha'abi) was formed on May 23, with Legco member Ali Muhammad Luqman [managing editor of Fatât al-Ja'itrah] as secretary (Aden Chronicle, June 1). The party was thought to include members of the Colony's intelligentsia (Mid. Mir., May 25). Its objectives were announced as independence for Aden and the Amirates and their merger, a constitutional, democratic socialist form of government, cooperation with nationalist, democratic and socialist movements in the Arab world to eliminate colonialism, social discrimination and tribalism, and promotion of international peace and Arab unity (Aden Chr., Aug 10; Fat. Jaz., Aug 5). In July the PCC expressed support for Tunisia in her dispute with France over the Bizerta base, and Luqman announced its readiness to recruit volunteers "for the defence of Arab freedom." (Aden Chr., July 27)

(For PCC opposition to the talks on union with the Federation, see p 435).

Merchants' Party. On July 11 the formation was announced of a new party out of the ranks of the Muslim Association (see MER 1960, p 386), sponsored and supported by Arab merchants in Aden. (Aden Chr., July 13)

National Union Party (al-hizb al-ittihādī al-watānī). This party, successor to the Aden Association, was established in 1960, with Hussein Ali al-Bayūmi, Minister of Labour and Welfare, as its president (MER 1960, pp 386-7). The party's political objectives were listed by the Aden Chronicle as follows: Aden and southern Arabia were inseparable; anyone who considered Aden and southern Arabia his permanent and only home was a citizen of Aden; complete union with Protectorate states; recognition of government in these states only if it sprang from popular choice; establishment of party branches in these states; the party would seek to realize the idea of a Greater Yemen when conditions in Yemen changed; it recognized the trade union movement, had "no vested interests in it," and would "discourage any interference with it." (Aden Chr., June 22)

In Jan Abd ar-Rahmān Jarjūrah, Secretary of the Party, said that there was no noticeable difference between his party, the Independence Party and the South Arabian League, but a proposal by his party for a merger had not been taken up. These two parties, however, denied that they had been contacted. (Ayyam, Jan 3, 7, 9)

In March the party announced that it would commence cultural activities in April. (Fat. Jaz., March 24)

The ATUC opposed the party as a "semi-governmental party" as long as it was led by a minister in the Aden government [Bayūmi]. (Ayyam, March 29)

The Independence (Istiqlāl) Party was founded, it was reported, largely by residents of Crater South to represent their quarter "as a counterbalance to the National Union Party." Membership was open to any Arab, defined as anyone who was born or lived in southern Arabia, having severed all connections with his mother country, and who can write or speak Arabic. The party's principal objectives were independence for Aden and southern Arabia, a sovereign Arab republic, a cooperative socialist form of government, compulsory education, a national economic structure and a national army. (Aden Chr., June 22)

The South Arabian League (SAL). The SAL was active both in Aden and abroad. Its leader, Muhammad Ali al-Jifri, remained in exile, in Cairo.

At the end of Dec 1960 an attempt was made on the life of Rashid al-Hariri, acting chairman of the SAL in Aden. In Jan Abdallah Abd al-Majid as-Salafi, SG of the Committee for the Boycott of Israel, was attacked by unknown assailants.

Cairo and the SAL described these incidents as political terrorism by "British agents." The attempt on Hariri followed a speech in which he attacked supporters of imperialism in the Federation. The SAL alleged that the attempt was made by Yaḥyā Awad al-Fadli, an officer in the government national guard, who had been incited to this act by [Sultān] Ahmad [Ibn] Abdallah al-Fadli, Minister [of Agriculture] in the federal government. The authorities had also searched the house of Muhammad Salīm Ba-Wazīr, acting SG of the League, but had only found an issue of As-Nidāl [published by the League office in Cairo]; he had been tried and fined 500 shillings. The League and the ATUC protested to the government against these attacks which they described as "political terrorism," as did Cairo Radio. (Akhar, Cairo, Dec 21, 1960; V of A, Dec 31, 1960 [Jan 3, 1961]; Ayyam, Jan 3, 9, 11; R. Cairo, Jan 14, 17 [17, 19])

At a convention in Feb the SAL established executive offices (makātib tanfidhiyah) for labour, culture, national guidance, the Eastern and Western Amirates and the north [i.e. Yemen]. (Ayyam, March 4)

On Feb 22 the League celebrated the UAR's 3rd anniversary (Ayyam, Feb 25), despite—according to a Cairo source—a ban by the Aden authorities. (MENA, March 14 [16])

In Feb Muhammad Ali al-Jifri, the [exiled] head of the League, and Subhānallah al-Habashi, its SG, attended the Arab lawyers' convention in Cairo, which adopted a resolution supporting the struggle of the people of southern Arabia (Ayyam, Feb 27). In June the SAL asked for the support of the forthcoming Belgrade conference of non-aligned states. (Ayyam, June 16)

In Nov it was reported that SAL leaders in exile in Cairo would be allowed to return to Aden. Contact had been made in Cairo by a British officer. SAL leaders wished to return provided there were no conditions attached to the permit. An official [Aden] spokesman denied these reports. (Mid. Mir., Nov 25)

ATUC-SAL Relations. In Feb the ATUC accused the League of destroying the homes of poor people by arson in the village of Aydarus on the Shaykh Uthmān road, under the false pretence that the village was hiding weapons belonging to the British army. This was denied by the League. The ATUC, however, repeated the accusations and intimated that this act was intended to demonstrate the nationalist zeal of the League and to facilitate the collection of contributions. The ATUC alleged that the SAL had embezzled £10,000 contributed in 1958 by the UAR to Aden worked for the national cause, as well as £1,000 of the BP workers' money. (Ayyam, Feb 28, March 3, 4; compare also MER 1960 p 388.)

In Feb and March contacts were reported between SAL and ATUC leaders in an unsuccessful attempt at a merger. The discussions reportedly broke down because of differences in nationalist attitudes, personal differences and opposition in the SAL to Asnaq; the ATUC also accused the SAL of anti-labour connections. (Ayyam, Feb 18, March 6, 18, 23)

Congress of Nationalist Organizations. A plan by the ATUC to revive the Arab National Congress had been reported in 1960 (see MER 1960, p 388).

In April, on the eve of the Macleod visit to Aden, 19 "nationalist organizations," on ATUC initiative, jointly protested against British plans for Aden's political future and demanded independence for southern Arabia (see p 433 a). In May it was noted that unity did not last for long after Macleod's departure (Ayyam, May 16); the Congress, however, was mentioned again later, as when in June representatives of its affiliated organizations met in order to adopt a united stand on the question of the status of the Indian community. (Ayyam, June 25; see also under relevant heading below.)

Various Organizations. In Jan a Committee for Support of Algeria was formed in Shaykh Uthmān; it also demanded independence for Aden. By May the committee had ceased to exist. (Ayyam, Jan 26, April 5, May 16)

In Feb the President of the Aden Women's Club announced that the name of the Club had been changed to the Arah Women's Club. Branches had been opened in Little Aden and Shaykh Uthman. (Aden Chr., Feb 16)

In April the formation was reported of an Arah Youth Organization in Tawahi. Its objectives were liberation of "Yemen, north and south," from imperialism and reaction, the attachment of the liberated parts to the UAR, and support of the people's right to self-determination. (Ayyam, April 7)

IMMIGRATION, FOREIGN COMMUNITIES AND ADENIZATION

[In 1961, because of the imminent change in the status of Aden, questions related to aliens became even more of a political issue than in previous years. Aliens, especially Indians, dominated Aden business life, and this aroused the opposition of both the nationalists, who also claimed that the government intended to destroy Aden's Arab character, and of native Aden businessmen who were otherwise regarded as "moderates" in politics. The latter also insisted that in an elective system, the introduction of which they demanded, franchise should be accorded only to "Aden-born" citizens, a qualification which would have excluded the many thousands of Yemeni immigrants, mainly workers. The ATUC, on the other hand, which regarded Aden as the "Southern Yemen," demanded the enfranchisement of the Yemenis. See also Parties; Issue of Merger of Aden Colony and Protectorates.]

[The population of Aden Colony in 1960 was estimated at 200,000.] According to the census held in Feb 1955, the population was 138,441 including: Arabs—55,791; Yemenis—48,088; Indians—15,817; Somalis—10,611; Europeans—4,484; Jews—831; others—2,819 (The Statesman's Year-Book 1962; Macmillan & Co. Ltd., London, 1962, pp 140-1). In 1961 the number of Indians was given as some 20,000 (see below).

In Jan M.A. Abdu said in the Legco that before independence alien immigration must be prevented and foreigners deprived of franchise. (Aden Chr., Jan 5)

In Feb Cairo Radio, and following it Moscow Radio, claimed that the British authorities had devised a "new plot" to destroy Arabism in Aden by bringing in a large number of foreigners and granting them Aden citizenship. (V of A, Feb 16 [18]; R. Moscow, Feb 16 [SU 21])

Status of Indian Community. In April a public debate opened concerning the status of the Indian community in Aden which, it was reported, comprised some 15,000 Muslims and 5,000 Hindus. The Muslims were mostly Aden-born and largely integrated with the Arah natives through intermarriage as well as culturally and politically. The Hindus were immigrants who had retained their Indian citizenship and close ties with India, their language and separate institutions. Most of them were organized in the Indian Association which was represented in the government by V.K. Joshi.

When Macleod visited Aden in April, Joshi submitted to him a memorandum in the name of the Indian Association asking for guarantees for the interests of the Indians in the Colony in case of independence.

The Indian Muslims, in a letter to the Colonial Secretary, sharply dissociated themselves from this step, declaring that they were not one community with the Hindus and Joshi did not represent them. They claimed they were Adenis, and though they had not succeeded in electing an Indian Muslim to the Legco they were satisfied with various statements in the Legco "by our Adeni Arab brethren that we, the Indian Muslims, and the Adeni Arabs are one..."

N.R. Nair, hon. secretary of the Indian Association, published a letter in the press in which he said the memorandum stressed Indian identification with the interests of Aden and asked that in return they should be treated as equals and be allowed to participate in the constitutional talks. Nair noted that they were perturbed by the inclination to differentiate between parts of the community on a religious basis.

Letters and articles in the press, including several by Indians, criticized the claim of a foreign community to political equality and the reference to their citizenship in the Commonwealth as a basis for claiming Aden citizenship (Aden Chr., April 20, 27, May 4, 11, 18, June 8; Ayyam, May 10, 11, 12, 28)

The ATUC attitude was expressed in a letter to the editor by Abdallah al-Asmag in which he said that all the Indians had done in Aden was "to hoard money [and] monopolize business." They had not severed their ties with their homeland, looked down upon and kept aloof from the natives and did not, as a minority and as foreigners, deserve equal shares in the citizenship of the country. (Aden Chr., June 1)

On June 11 representatives of the 19 organizations belonging to the Congress of Popular Organizations met to discuss developments caused by the memorandum and to adopt a united stand on the issue. (Ayyam, June 25)

A.I. Sa'di, Minister of Education and Emigration, stated that both Arabs and non-Arabs not born in Aden, who had families and property in Aden and had severed their relations with other countries, should be considered Adenis. Those, however, who had come to Aden to earn a living only should keep out of politics and would receive Aden's hospitality in return. Sa'di assured the foreign residents that they had nothing to fear from a national government but they "should not delude themselves into thinking that they are the uncontrollable rulers of Aden." As to the Aden-born [non-Arabs] "they are as good Arabs as ourselves." H.A. Bayumi, Minister in the Aden government (and President of the National Union Party, the former Aden Association), stated upon his return from the London talks in July that only "Aden-born" should have active and passive franchise in the next elections to Legco. (Aden Chr., May 18, July 27, Aug 10)

[Apparently, not all the Hindus were of one opinion.] In May it was reported that in a recent meeting of the Indian Association a rift occurred between the executive and a number of members who strongly opposed the memorandum. In June there were reports of meetings between the leaders of the Indian Association and leaders of the National Union Party, the People's Constitutional Congress and the ATUC following strong opposition inside the Indian [Hindu] community to the memorandum. Asmag denied that any formal talks had taken place and reiterated his opposition to the Indian stand (Ayyam, May 28, June 14, 17, 21). In July, at a meeting of Indian merchants, mostly Hindus, it was resolved to help Aden achieve constitutional progress and to refrain from seeking any special rights and from interfering in politics. (V of A, July 29 [Aug 1])

In Aug [?] the Aden Boycott of Israel Committee warned all foreign communities against interfering in Aden national affairs and taking a stand against the will of "this Arah people." (V of A, Aug 2 [4])

Demands for Revision of Laws Concerning Immigrants. In Feb. A.M. Luqman demanded a revision in the clause in the immigration law, which provided for "exemption permits" and facilitated large-scale immigration, thus depriving the Adenis of work, medical care and education and threatening to turn them into a minority. An exempted immigrant had all the rights and opportunities possessed by an Aden-born citizen. A person attained exempted status if one of his forefathers had attained such status—even if he himself was a new immigrant—or if he was accorded exemption himself. The immigration officer accorded exemption freely, Luqman said. (Fat. Jaz., Feb 17)

In March, A.M. Luqman suggested the amendment of the Births, Deaths and Marriages Registration Law, in particular the provision which allowed late birth registration and thus enabled new immigrants to obtain Aden birth certificates and identity cards. Registration should be no later than three days after birth. The suggestion was endorsed by Ministers As-Sa'idi and Basendwah and a committee to consider the issue was formed by Legco in April. It invited parties and individuals to express their views before it and heard much opposition to a change in existing procedures. (Fat. Jaz., March 23, April 18, May 2, 5; Aden Chr., June 22)

In Aug the People's Constitutional Congress demanded that the Governor cancel the announcement allowing persons registered in the 1955 electoral lists to apply for registration in case their names did not appear in the current lists, as this measure was contrary to the demands for the limiting of franchise to Aden-born persons only. The government replied that the law did not allow postponement of the procedure. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 22, Sept 14)

In Nov it was suggested that a way be found to register as Adenis children born to Adenis abroad. (Fat. Jaz., Nov 27)

THE ADEN PROTECTORATES

THE FEDERATION OF THE ARAB AMIRATES OF THE SOUTH

Projected Merger Between Federation and Colony: See separate heading above.

Wahidi Sultanate Joins Federation. In the autumn it was reported that the two Wahidi sultanates of Balhaf and Bir Ali had merged and joined the Federation. (The Wahidi sultanates were the westernmost states of the Eastern Protectorate, bordering on the Western Protectorate.) In Nov it was reported that Sultan Nasir [Ibn] Abdallah Muhain al-Wahidi [of Balhaf, the senior Wahidi state], had become a minister in the federal government (see below). Wahidi was the eleventh state to join the Federation.

Cairo and Baghdad commented that this was a new plot of British imperialism. (Fat. Jaz., Sept 23, Oct 29; Haqa'ig, Cairo, Nov 23; R. Baghdad, Oct 30 [Nov 1]; V of A, Dec 7 [9])

New Ministries. At the beginning of Nov the formation was reported of three new ministries in the federal government: (1) Information—Sultan Nasir Ibn Abdallah, Wahidi; (2) State Affairs—Sultan Nasir Ibn Aydarus, Lower Awlaqi; (3) Justice—Shaykh Abdallah al-Hamid, Dathina. This brought the number of ministers in the Adenization. There were some reports on individual cases of Adenization in the civil service (Aden Chr., July 20, Oct 26) but there was scant progress. In Jan A.A. as-Safi, Legco member, said in the Council that most of the government departments had not yet been Adenized and demanded that the government accomplish this as soon as possible (Fat. Jaz., Jan 26). In Dec Fatid al-Jazirah wrote that Adenization existed only on paper and amounted to only 1%. (Fat. Jaz., Dec 21)

Articles in and letters to the press, as well as various organizations, dealt with this question and also accused foreign companies and firms of disregarding Adenization and giving priority to foreign workers. (Ayyem, Jan 19-21; Aden Chr., Jan 26, April 20, July 20; Fat. Jaz., Nov 19)

In March it was reported that K.W. Simmons, Chief Secretary to the Government of Aden, had told Legco that recipients of government scholarships would be required to sign an undertaking to serve in the civil service for not less than five years after completing their studies. If the Overseas Studies Board had reasons for doubting whether the candidate would honour the undertaking, the Board might require him to produce sureties. (The issue had been raised in 1960, MER 1960, p 389.)

The Aden Chronicle, welcoming this measure, mentioned that the relaxation as to Arabic language standards allowed in 1959 for scholarship candidates had been cancelled. The paper demanded that awards for overseas training for serving officers should also be made subject to the Arabic language conditions and that discretion be exercised in favour of Adeni candidates (Aden Chr., March 2)

Military Training Introduced. On Oct 17 a first group of students at the Aden College, aged 17-19, started a two-year military training course under the supervision of a British officer and NCOs. (Aden Chr., Oct 19)

Supreme Council to ten, every state except Aqrabi being represented by a minister. (Aden Chr., Nov 2; for six formerly existing ministries, see MER 1960, p 390; no report was available on a tenth ministry.)

Aden Protectorate Levies Become Federal Army. On Nov 29 the Aden Protectorate Levies (see MER 1960, p 390) were handed over to the Federation. Henceforth, they were to constitute the federal army, thus coming under the control of the Sultan of Lahaj, federal Minister of Defence.

The force now included five infantry battalions, an armoured car squadron, a signals unit and administrative units. It was basically an Arab force trained and commanded by some 90 British officers and NCOs. Command would continue to be British and, for some time to come, the federal army "would have to rely on [the British] Middle East headquarters" [located in Aden]. Britain would make funds available to increase the pay of both the federal army and the federal guards. (Times, Nov 30; Daily Telegraph, Nov 30)

Baghdad Radio described the handover as a "new farce" enacted by the British imperialist authorities in the Arab home. (R. Baghdad, Nov 29 [Dec 1])

In Dec an agreement was reported between the federal government and London to raise the salaries of all members of the federal guards [formerly the Western Protectorate government guards] and the federal army beginning July 1960. (Fat. Jaz., Dec 2)

In June a delegation went to Jordan to arrange for the training of federal guards officers in Jordan. (Ayam, June 15)

Budget, British Financial Aid. [The federal budget—excluding the budgets of the individual states—for 1961/2 totalled £1,473,729 of which £1,276,324 was covered by a British grant-in-aid. On the expenditure side, £969,000 was allocated to internal security, £189,000 to public works and development, £96,000 each to interior and health, £43,000 to education.]

In July Shaykh Muhammad Farid, Minister of Finance, on returning from talks in London, said that Britain had agreed to increase its annual development and welfare aid to the WAP (in the framework of the Colonial Development scheme) from £250,000 to £400,000.

In Nov Shaykh Farid went to London to negotiate further British aid, in particular the financing of a three-year development plan. Shaykh Farid intended to ask for £7½m. for the plan; Britain had already agreed to a block grant instead of the annual subsidy paid hitherto. (Times, April 7; Aden Chr., July 27, Oct 19, Nov 2)

Border Relations with Yemen, see p 706.

"Constitution for Dathina." In May it was reported that the Dathina Confederacy (30,000–40,000 inhabitants) had promulgated its first constitution. Dathina was ruled by a council, each member of which was responsible for a government department, with an annually rotating chairmanship. The constitution provided for a Na'ib, Hussein Mansur, said that local councils and justices of the peace had now been established throughout Dathina, which had also set up its own customs system. The occasion was celebrated with public festivities.

Dathina was one of the best cotton-growing areas in the Federation and had now 37 privately-owned tractors. A secondary school building was being completed in Mudiya, the capital. (Aden Chr., June 1)

Towards Municipal Elections in Lahej. Opening the 11th session of the Lahej Legislative Council in Oct, Sultan Fadl Ibn Ali said his government was discussing the possibility of allowing the people to elect their own representatives to the municipal councils. (Aden Chr., Nov 2)

UPRISING IN YAFI

Rebel activities in Upper and Lower Yafi continued; government counter-action came to a head in June.

Enlisting International Aid? In May the Jordanian press reported on the activities in Amman of one Abdallah Ahmad al-Mud'iq (or al-Fud'iq), "SG of the Yafi Federation." He intended to tour Arab, African and Asian countries to enlist support for the rebellion in the Arab South. (Jihad, May 14; Manar, May 29)

Hostilities in Upper Yafi. In Jan an uprising was reported in "Hilin" against Sultan Muhammad [Ibn] Salih Ibn Umar of Upper Yafi. Among the rebels was Shaykh al-Musalli. The Sultan asked the Aden government for help and several RAF airplanes bombed the rebels. (Fat. Jaz., Jan 21)

CORRENDUM: The reports on fighting in Upper Yafi in MER 1960, p 391, based on BBC sources (12 Jan, 3 Feb) relate to Jan 1961 and not to Jan 1960, and should be read here.

A Yemeni report in May said the "villages of Musalli," among others, had been severely attacked by aircraft [no date given]. (Saba, May 11)

On June 8, according to Muhammad Ibn Aydarus, British aircraft raided localities in Upper Yafi, including the village of Musalli. (Saba, July 13)

In Aug Cairo published the text of a leaflet which, it said, had been dropped by the RAF (no time specified) bearing an ultimatum to the inhabitants of Nisara'a (?) and al-Musalli (?) to leave the villages because they were giving asylum to members of the Musalli family and others (names specified) who had launched an unprovoked attack on Hilan (?)—[Hilan?—see above]. (V of A, Aug 16 [18])

Offensive Against Rebels; Aydarus Seeks Refuge in Yemen. In June Arab sources reported an offensive by government forces against the Lower Yafi stronghold of Muhammad Aydarus, forcing him to seek refuge in Yemen.

The reports spoke of heavy air raids. Aydarus, in a statement issued later in Ta'izz, said the air raids started on May 29 on Al-Qara and continued for 12 days on towns and villages (which he named) in Lower Yafi, especially in the areas of Wadi Rasid and As-Sa'ad. On June 8 the raids were extended to Upper Yafi; among places raided there, Aydarus mentioned Al-Musalli. The inhabitants had been warned by leaflets to evacuate the whole area. (Saba, July 13)

San'a reported on June 5 that many refugees from Yafi had arrived in Beida, Yemen, after six days of air raids on their area. Cairo reports said the aircraft had attacked towns and villages with incendiary bombs, rockets and machineguns and had destroyed a large number of houses. A cable to President Abdel Nasser from the "Yafi people" was quoted, stating that many lives had been lost and over 200 families had been rendered homeless.

The Jeddah paper Al-Bilad said that the British had imposed a "starvation blockade" on rebels in the mountains of Upper Yafi but tribesmen were smuggling supplies into the area. An earlier report, at the end of April, said that government forces had been concentrating around the rebel area. (R. San'a, June 5 [8]; V of A, June 7, 10, 11, 26 [9, 13, 28]; MENA, June 11, 12, 13 [13, 14, 15]; Akhbar Sa'ah, Cairo, June 21)

Aden Chronicle wrote that Muhammad Ibn Aydarus, a "brave and popular chieftain," had crossed into Yemen after the RAF, which had been called upon to subdue the rebellion, had accomplished this task; his men had been decimated and his ammunition dumps—supplied by Yemen—had been lost. (Aden Chr., Aug 10)

From Ta'izz, where he was received as a guest of the Yemeni government, Aydarus issued an appeal to Muslims and Arabs everywhere, as well as to world opinion, for support in the "war of extermination" which imperialist forces were waging against the people of Yafi. (Aden Chr., July 10; Saba, Ta'izz, June 29, July 13)

Efforts to Unify Rebel Command. On June 16 an agreement was concluded [in Yemen] between Muhammad Ibn Aydarus, Sultan of Lower Yafi, and Sultan Muhammad Ibn Umar Abd al-Taqq "and all the citizens of Harharah," Upper Yafi, providing for joint defence of Upper and Lower Yafi against imperialism and its agents, and traitors. (Saba, July 13; also reported in V of A, Aug 30 [Sept 1])

At the beginning of Aug Aydarus published an appeal to all nationalist forces in Aden to join hands in the struggle against imperialism. He said he was prepared "to make all efforts possible to unify the forces of the armed movement under a joint command representing all the areas of the revolutionary south." (Nasr, Aug 3; V of A, Sept 7 [9])

In Aug it was reported from Cairo that Aydarus had met in Beida all the rebel commanders in the various parts of the "Arab South." They had unanimously decided to form a joint general command of all the forces fighting colonialism in the "Arab South" under Sultan Muhammad Ibn Aydarus (V of A, Aug 10 [12]; Jihad, Aug 10). [There was no confirmation of this report.]

Alleged Yemeni Aid; Imam Opposed to United Rebel Army? The presence of Aydarus in Yemen was one of the matters reportedly discussed between Naqib Salih Ruwayshan, the Yemeni governor of Beida, and the Deputy British Agent, Mr R. R. Johnson, at their meeting in Mukeris on Aug 14. Aydarus was understood to be organizing a "South Arabian Legion" with Yemeni help, but the Imam Ahmad was believed to be against this move. (Mid. Mir., Aug 19)

A report in Sept said that by "a Sharifian decree" Aydarus had been supplied with some 30 Russian-made rifles and five machine-guns, ammunition, 5,000 "French riyals," a quantity of millet and five mules. These supplies had been sent from San'a to "Salah" in 16 trucks. (Fat. Jaz., Sept 6)

UPRISING IN AWLAQI

Activities of ash-Shams Rebels. A federal communiqué in Feb said that a party of Ahl ash-Shams (tribes) had attacked a position of the federal guards in Upper Awlaqi. After a prolonged exchange of fire, the defenders had succeeded in warding off the attack. After tracking the attackers for 48 hours, a patrol of the guards managed to engage them in battle. Two of the rebels were wounded and taken to hospital in Aden: Shaykh Hamid Ibn Hussein Ibn Sarib, "one of the foremost leaders of the Shams rebels," and "the shrewd and famous commander" Shaykh Ali Am'ur. (Ayyam, Feb 27)

Cairo reported in April that the combatants in Upper Awlaqi had blown up roads. (V of A, April 11 [13])

On April 8 Awlaqi rebels successfully ambushed federal guards on the road from Al-Mahfid to al-Ahmar —Mudiya in either Awlaqi or Dathina territory. An officer and a soldier, both Awlaqi, and a local deputy political officer were injured. The rebels were thought to belong to the Shams tribes (Ayyam, April 11) and said to be known as "Shuyu'iyah"—Communists. (Aden Chr., April 13)

Air Raids Reported. On May 13 the "Arab South" office in Cairo reported that the RAF had repeatedly raided "the villages and dwellings of the Awlaqi tribe" and completely destroyed them because "members of the tribe had refused to join the British forces." A British officer and two soldiers had been killed while on their way to Nisab in Upper Awlaqi.

Several British officers and soldiers were killed in an ambush laid by the warriors in Dhala. (MENA, May 13 [16])

EASTERN PROTECTORATE

Wahidi States of Balhaf and Bir Ali Join Federation of Amirates. See above: Western Protectorate.

The Hadhramaut and the British-sponsored Scheme for Union of the Aden Territory. See above: Issue of Merger of Aden Colony and Protectorates.

Political Life in the Hadhramaut. In Jan it was alleged that the "Hadhramaut government" did not allow the formation of cultural clubs and associations for fear they might engage in politics (Fat. Jaz., Jan 17) and that Amir Hussein Ibn Salih al-Kathiri, the deputy Secretary of State, had closed down the only Arabic monthly in the state, Al-Ash'ah. (Ayyam, Jan 19)

In April it was reported that Abu Bakr Ibn Shaykh al-Kaf (the famous benefactor of Hadhramaut) had resigned from the Kathiri State Council. No reason was given, but the paper suggested that he resented the fact that the Council members held on to their seats in the Council while the Kathiri people demanded from the Sultan the establishment of a legislative council, which Abu Bakr considered a fair demand. (Fat. Jaz., April 4)

In May the Voice of the Arabs reported that a request had been submitted to the authorities in Mukalla (Qu'aiti) for permission to form a new political party called "The Islamic Cooperative Party of Hadhramaut" (al-hizb al-islami at-ta'awuni al-hadhrami). (V of A, May 4 [6])

In Aug it was reported that a number of citizens of "Sayem" (Sayyun, capital of Kathiri?) were endeavouring to form a new party to be called "The Popular Party" (hizb ar-rabi'ah ash-sha'abiyyah) to defend the rights of citizens there. (V of A, Aug 29 [31])

In Oct clamorous demonstrations in support of President Abdel Nasser, and work and transport dislocations, were reported from Mukalla. Apparently, this was all sparked off by two guests in a coffee house expressing grief over the breakup of the UAR and starting a round of cheers for the UAR. (Fat. Jaz., Oct 9)

Tribal Rebellion in Qu'aiti. At the beginning of the year, a tribal rebellion broke out in the Wadi Du'an province in the Qu'aiti Sultanate. It appeared that in 1960 (?) the government had banned the indiscriminate firing of rifles in certain settled areas in and around Wadi Du'an (including the wadis of Du'an al-Ayyar (or Laisar) and Duan al-Ayman, Wadi al-Ayn and Wadi Amd).

The tribes in this area, the Marāshidhah, the Hālīkah (Halka), part of the Khāmī'ah (Khām'ah) and others, all belonging to the Saibān tribal federation, held a meeting on Jan 14 at which they resolved to reject the ban on shooting and not to recognize the State Council and the Sultan's Council.

In March it was reported that the muqōdimoh [official heads?] of the Saibān tribes, the Hālīkah, the Marāshidhah and others, had submitted their resignation from their positions to the Na'ib [government representative] of Du'an province, Shaykh Hasan Muhammad Bā-Surrah [of the Khāmī'ah tribe], on the ground that they were unable to cope with Bedouin opposition to the ban as well as to the treaty of Shuhūrah (?). The Bedouin, they said, were enraged and bent on commencing hostilities. The Bedouin claimed that the sound of shots drove off the monkeys which would otherwise damage the fields and that they also used the weapons to defend themselves against wild beasts and robbers. The Bedouin reportedly also accused those who wished to overthrow customs and traditions of "deviation from nationality (jinsiyyah), nationalism (qawmiyyah) and Bedouin Ara-him." They were also said to claim that the "Shu-hrah treaty" between the Bedouin and the government was signed by townsmen who did not belong to the Bedouin at all and who should now keep away from them. The Bedouin were angry with all their muqaddimah for accepting the treaty.

The tribes had also been requested to submit hostages to the Qu'aiti government in Mukalla. Several tribes complied, but the Khāmi'ah and the Hālikah refused to comply.

The Nā'ih and the Sultan rejected the resignation of the muqaddimah and told them that they would be held responsible for any breach of the peace in the Wadi. (Fat. Jaz., March 25, 28, Aug 29; Ayyam, May 12)

The rebellious tribes destroyed the "eastern road" connecting the seaboard with the interior of Hadhramaut, and ambushed traffic. As the alternative al-Kāf road was in bad shape, the interior became exposed to danger of hunger and Bedouin raids.

A government force which left Mukalla for the rebel area, equipped with "heavy armoured cars and tanks," found the road impassable. The people in the interior were said to have taken refuge in the houses of the sādah [or Sayyids, the privileged descendants of the Prophet] and the mandūs (mansab—head of a family of Sayyids and recognized spiritual leader) who were traditionally honoured by the Bedouin. (Fat. Jaz., March 28)

In April it was reported that armoured detachments had taken up positions outside certain towns in the affected area, and that reconnaissance planes had been sighted over the Wadi. The Bedouin, instructed by their leaders to keep away from the valleys and highways, withdrew to the mountains. (Fat. Jaz., April 4)

In May, in a press interview, Nā'ih Bā-Surrah said that on April 31 (sic) he had met the tribes at a place called Bayn al-Jibāl ("between the mountains"), at the invitation of the Muqaddam Sa'id Bā-Nuḥaym (Bā-Naḥim?), the "leader (sa'im) of the Saibāni tribes." He said he had asked the tribes to cancel the resolutions of their Jan meeting or alternatively to submit in writing their agreement to the shooting ban. The Marāshidah tribe was also requested to deliver to the authorities a certain person named Bā-Ahūth, who was charged with robbery. Bā-Nuḥaym agreed to this request in the name of his tribe, the Marāshidah.

However, the elders (uqalā) of the other tribes withdrew their support from Bā-Nuḥaym, as he had agreed with them not to acknowledge the guilt of Bā-Ahūth, and this he had now done. Among the disaffected tribes were the Sūmuhi (also spelled: Sumūhi), the Hālikah, the Bā-Qadim and Bā-Sallūm clans of the Khāmi'ah tribe, and others. Some people were asking themselves, it was reported, whether it was not the noise of the aircraft over Kor Saiban which had changed the Muqaddam's mind. The break between him and the tribes was thought to be the harbinger of more troubles in the area. (Ayyam, May 12; also Fat. Jaz., May 2)

An official Qu'aiti announcement on July 30 said that government forces had suffered 16 killed and 25 wounded in a recent clash with the Khāmi'ah rebels. At the same time, the Qu'aiti government thanked the RAF for help in repelling the Khāmi'ah who had been looting and pillaging in the area. An official Aden statement said RAF aircraft had completely destroyed two Khāmi'ah settlements and intensive ground and air action was keeping the tribesmen on the move and might force them to surrender. An RAF spokesman said that only one Shackleton aircraft had been used "on each occasion" and no casualties had been reported because the population had been warned to leave before the attacks. (Times, July 31)

Another report added that government forces had been ambushed by some 200 Khāmi'ah tribesmen, who themselves suffered eleven fatalities. (Fat. Jaz., July 30; see also Hayat, Aug 5)

A report on developments (without dates) before the July battle said that the Khāmi'ah had attacked and robbed some ten vehicles carrying provisions and passengers on the road from Mukalla to Du'an. A force sent to punish the rebels had not found them. The government then sent workers to repair the road and soldiers to guard them. These were the soldiers who were ambushed. One of the places destroyed by the aircraft was Sharj Halh (?) near Du'an al-Aysar. The Bedouin had reacted by attacking a position of government forces in Wadi Al-Aysar; there were no casualties. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 29)

Mecca reported that King Saud had received cables from "sons of the Arah South" residing in Saudi Arabia and from the "Tayirah tribes" in Hadhramaut, denouncing the air attacks on the tribes. (R. Mecca, Aug 3, 5 [5, 8])

Cairo reports in Aug said the government forces had lost 200 men. Other reports purporting to quote official announcements said aircraft reinforcements and an aircraft carrier had arrived in Mukalla and aircraft were seeking out the rebels in the mountains; the government forces were encountering difficulties because of the terrain and because the rebel armament was superior. (MENA, Aug 9 [11]; V of A, Aug 15, 16 [17, 18])

On Aug 18 the tribesmen attacked government officers at Sharq al-Hurairah and Aūra—the residence of the Nā'ih—in Wadi Du'an. A woman was killed (Fat. Jaz., Aug 29). According to Cairo, purporting to quote "London radio," seven government officials had been killed. (V of A, Aug 22 [24])

At the same time it was reported that the head of the Marāshidah tribe had tried to mediate but the government had stipulated unconditional surrender and this the rebellious tribes refused to accept.

Shortly afterwards, however, it was reported that the Khāmi'ah and the Hālikah had surrendered hostages to the government. The reason for the surrender was not known. It was thought that the tribes might have exhausted their ammunition, suffered from hunger caused by the government blockade, feared the jet planes or became torn with internal strife. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 29, Sept 4)

In Oct the government withdrew the ban on shooting, realizing the great damage it had caused to tribal security and to agriculture. (Fat. Jaz., Oct 17)

Trial of Rebels. The trial of 50 (according to Baghdad 76) captured tribesmen opened in Mukalla on Oct 7. The defendants were the Khāmi'ah, Hālikah, Hāmidīyān, Asīrīnāh and Awābīḥāh tribes as well as individuals of these tribes. They were charged with intention to weaken the position of the government, spreading havoc in the country, robbery with violence, high treason through conspiracy with foreign elements (which were not detailed in the reports) and damage to the "reform movements" of the government and the people. The prosecution demanded the imposition of penalties customary under Islamic law—death sentences, cutting off hands and feet and deportation for life. (Fat. Jaz., Oct 13; Mid. Mir., Oct 14)

In Dec the court sentenced six men to death, in absentia, and 11 to prison terms ranging from three to six years, and ordered the destruction of 20 rifles. (R. Baghdad, Dec 21 [22]; Aden Chr., Dec 28)

Oil Agreement. On Nov 5 the Qu'aiti and Kathiri governments signed an agreement granting the Pan-American International Corporation a 45,000 square mile concession providing for a ten-year exploration period with a possible five-year extension and a 30-year exploitation period for each oil field discovered. The two governments would receive 55% of the company's net profits and would have an option to participate in up to 20% of the company's rights and obligations under the agreement; if this option were exercised, the profits would be divided on a 50:50 basis. The company agreed to build a small refinery once commercial exports began.

Negotiations had started in Aden in May and continued in Thamud in Aug. The Thamud concession area was also claimed by the neighbouring Mahri state, to the east of it. Yemen, which claimed the whole of Hadhramaut, announced that any agreements between international organizations and local shaykhs were "null and void." (Aden Chr., May 18, Aug 3, Nov 9, 23, Dec 28; Petroleum Times, Dec 1)

KUWAIT, MUSCAT AND OMAN, PERSIAN GULF PRINCIPALITIES

BRITAIN AND THE PERSIAN GULF IN GENERAL

New British Resident. In May it was reported that Sir William Luce had been appointed H.M. Political Resident in the Persian Gulf. [The post had been vacant for some time. The Resident's headquarters were in Bahrain and he had Political Agents in Kuwait (until after independence, when the Agent was appointed Consul-General, later Ambassador), Bahrain, Doha (Qatar) and Dubai (Trucial States).] Luce's former post was Governor of Aden [where he played a leading part in establishing the Federation of the Amirates] and he was a former officer of the Sudan Political Service. He was spoken of as a "Colonial Office man" and Cairo commentators among others alleged that Britain was trying to put the clock back in the Persian Gulf. (Times, May 12, 19)

British Oil Interests. "A threat to the oil in the Middle East," The Times remarked editorially during the Kuwait crisis, "is one of the main occupations of British strategy" (Times, July 11). The way to protect the oil interests, it was observed, just as it had been formerly the way to protect the route to India, was "to protect the weak coastal powers and the minorities against outward pressure of the powers and peoples of the interior." This was what the newly-established ME Command (HQ in Aden) was doing from the Aden-Yemen border through Oman and Buraimi to Kuwait. (NYT, July 7; see also D.C. Watt: The Arabian Peninsula in British Strategy, Military Review, Feb 1961)

Britain's Position and Policy in the Gulf. [The advent of Kuwait's independence and later the Kuwait crisis prompted questions on the future of the Gulf principalities and especially Britain's position and policies in the area. Disatisfaction with the present state of affairs was expressed as well as the need for new departures; in the material available to the editor, however, there was no suggestion that Britain should withdraw completely from the area in the near future.]

A pamphlet, Middle East Issues, published in Feb by the Fabian International Bureau on the basis of a report by a working party of the Labour Party, as reported by The Times, suggested that "any British financial contribution to capital investment in the ME should take the form of a diversion from London of Kuwait's funds."

Britain would never be able to assist the ME countries with more than Kuwait's annual investment in London. The diversion of these funds might be difficult in a period of economic expansion in Britain "but it would have the real advantage for Britain of associating the maintenance of Kuwait's oil industry with the investments of the Arab world as a whole."

In an examination of Britain's commitments in the Persian Gulf, the pamphlet argued that the area's immunity from "the liberating, modernizing tides that lap the rest of the Arab world" had provided the British government with a breathing space which should be used to start the process of decolonization. "Unfortunately, Whitehall shows all the signs of regarding it as an unconditional extension of empire." The Gulf states and Aden deserved the promise of eventual self-determination and, if possible, a definite date for British political withdrawal. "But the key to the situation in the Gulf is to react sensibly rather than to initiate positive policies. For a start the rulers should be allowed to have relations with other countries. The date palm curtain cutting off the Gulf from the rest of the Arab world will be torn down sooner or later. We could make a start by lowering it a few inches now."

The Times commented editorially that any hints of what a future Labour government's policy in the ME would be were always valuable. In those fields of the ME "where Britain can be said to hold real initiative—the Persian Gulf, southern Arabia, and perhaps relations between the Arabs and oil"—there was a question whether the British government should "in the old imperial manner, compel, or should they try to persuade?" The Fabian answer was not always clear. As to the suggestion to react rather than initiate positive policies, what if there was no clear political goal toward which the Gulf Arabs as yet wished to work, the paper asked. The Times termed the suggestion that Kuwait's funds should be "diverted" from London to ME countries, "the fatal temptation to let good intentions lead to high-handed interference." (Times, Feb 3)

In May the ME correspondent of The Times asked "whether Britain is making sufficient use of her special... position on the Gulf to try to change present systems [of the shaykhdoms] or whether she is merely letting events take their course." In the face of the internal problems of the region and the influence on it of Saudi Arabia, the UAR and Iraq, should Britain "step forward a little or should she in time withdraw from her role of adviser and protector and rely on commercial treaties to bring her the oil she needs? Few people in Britain are likely to agree in favour of the second course..." (Times, May 19)

"The British silver cord has been loosed; all the Queen's gunboats and men cannot perfectly restore the peace of mind of the... Gulf sheikhs..." The Economist commented in July during the Kuwait crisis. Whether rich or poor, the problem of the sheikhdoms was that they were both "so small and so emphatically outmoded." Relations among the rulers themselves were also bad. "With their uncertain frontiers, dispiriting feudal structures, and young generations growing up with a yearning for wider horizons, these sheikhdoms are natural targets for territorial claims" and they were coveted by their large neighbours: Iraq, which now claimed Kuwait; Saudi Arabia, "subtler, swifter of action and not so sharp of word," which was in dispute with Abu Dhabi, Muscat and Oman over Buraimi, and with Qatar over the frontiers (though with the latter in a friendly fashion, since Qatar was a Wahhabi enclave); and Iran, which in 1957 enacted a law making Bahrain an Iranian province. (For sources, see below.)

Suggestions for Sharing Oil Wealth; Progressive British Disengagement; Sheikhdoms Seen Viable. What to do about it? "Sharing their... oil wealth with the Arab East" would make the sheikhs "more honoured, more responsible—and far less vulnerable," The Economist suggested. The sheikhs also "had little choice but to revise the pattern of their political life to meet the needs of mid-century."

A later article by The Economist's ME correspondent suggested that the crux of the argument for not disturbing existing British arrangements in the Gulf had been that the situation in Kuwait must not be upset. But as Kuwait had now been given independence, there was no reason why Britain should not embark on progressive disengagement throughout the Gulf.

Most of the sheikhdoms would probably continue to exist if British protection were withdrawn. Iran's claim to Bahrain would be resisted by the Arabs as well as discouraged by Iran's Western allies. Qatar and Saudi Arabia were "on the best of terms." The Sheikhs of Abu Dhabi and the Sultan of Muscat might lose Buraimi to Saudi Arabia] and the Sultan might see his "shadow" sovereignty over the interior of Oman challenged again by the "Saudi-supported Imam Ghālib..." but they too were unlikely to be challenged in their homelands. (Economist, July 15, Aug 19)

British Project to Establish Gulf Federation Claimed by Baghdad and Cairo. [Baghdad and Cairo repeatedly claimed that Britain was working towards the establishment of a federation of the Persian Gulf principalities from Kuwait to Muscat and Oman.] At the end of May Kuwait officially denied that such a federation under Kuwait's leadership was or had been under consideration by the government. (MENA, May 31 [June 2])

On June 25, when Premier Qassim first publicly stated Iraq's claim to Kuwait, he also alleged that "imperialism wanted to establish itself" by setting up an "Arab Eastern Federation" just as it was establishing the Aden federation to the West. Such a federation would dominate the "Arab [Persian] Gulf" and in particular threaten Iraq and block her approaches to the Indian Ocean. (R. Baghdad, June 25 [27])

[In July, following the outbreak of the Kuwait crisis, the rulers of Abu Dhabi, Dubai and Qatar and the Sultan of Muscat and Oman visited London.] Baghdad Radio later tied these visits to the alleged federation plan. (R. Baghdad, Sept 20 [22])

In Oct Baghdad Radio asserted that Kuwait, Qatar, Bahrain and Dubai were to establish a secret organization to combat liberal propaganda. At a meeting in Qatar, attended by the British Resident, agreement was reached on the formation of a committee for this purpose. (R. Baghdad, Oct 9 [11])

In Nov a Cairo paper claimed that Sir William Luce, the new British Resident in the Gulf, who as Governor of Aden had been successful in setting up the Federation of the Amirates in the Aden Protectorate, was now endeavouring to establish the federation of the Gulf sheikhdoms which would have economic and defence treaties with Britain. In addition to protecting the Rulers from their neighbours (e.g. Bahrain from Iran; Qatar from Saudi Arabia), the projected federation was designed to enhance British influence in the area in face of American influence in Iran and Saudi Arabia. (Akhbar Sa'ah, Nov 8)

THE STATE OF KUWAIT

(Dawlat al-Kuwait)

SYNOPSIS AND ECONOMIC SURVEY

Independence and the Kuwait Crisis. Kuwait became an independent and sovereign state with an exchange of notes, on June 19, between the Ruler of Kuwait and the British Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, terminating the 1899 agreement which provided for British protection for the sheikhdom. The new agreement also provided for British assistance upon request by the Ruler.

Kuwait's newly-found independence was immediately challenged by Iraq, which claimed sovereignty over it. The Ruler asked for British and Saudi Arabian assistance, and troops of these two countries arrived in Kuwait on July 1. The British troops were withdrawn by Oct 10, having been relieved by an Arab force, the first contingents of which arrived on Sept 10 (see: The Kuwait Crisis).

Even before 1961, Kuwait had gradually taken over the management of its foreign relations and had been admitted to UN agencies. By the end of the year, she had exchanged diplomatic representation with the UK, the US and a number of other countries. She also sought to enlist international support by sending goodwill missions to a large number of countries all over the world. The admittance of Kuwait to the UN was vetoed by the USSR on the ground—among others—that the new state continued to constitute a British colony.

In her dispute with Iraq, Kuwait sought and obtained the aid of the great majority of Arab countries, both of the UAR and of her antagonists and especially Saudi Arabia. In July she was admitted to the Arab League. In other ways, Kuwait continued her traditional policy of keeping aloof from inter-Arab disputes and of maintaining good relations with all. In seeking support, Kuwait promised financial assistance to the Arab countries, for which purpose she arranged to set up a special fund.

Internally, the ruling Sabah family continued to monopolize power completely. The Ruler continued to be assisted by a Supreme Council comprising family members only, each with a defined departmental responsibility. In April the deputy Ruler resigned, reportedly because of rivalry for the succession. The institution of British Political Agent was abolished as of July 1.

In Aug there was a new departure when eleven notables were summoned to form a joint committee with the Supreme Council to prepare a bill for the election of a Constituent Assembly. At the end of the year, in the first elections ever to be held in Kuwait, 20 members were elected to a Constituent Assembly on an individual basis; the Supreme Council members became Assembly members ex-officio. A provisional constitution was promulgated by the Ruler in Jan 1962 (not recorded in this volume) and the Supreme Council was redesignated the Council of Ministers.

A Kuwait currency was introduced on April 1 when the Kuwait dinar was fixed at par with sterling. A new flag was also introduced and steps were taken to reorganize the government in keeping with the needs of a sovereign state.

Population. According to a 1961 census, the population was 321,621, of whom some 210,000 lived in the town of Kuwait. Over half the population were foreign nationals engaged in the oil industry and services. There were some 120,000 Kuwaiti nationals, 45,000 Iraqis, 35,000 Palestinians (mostly Jordanian nationals), 10,000 Lebanese, 3,000 Egyptians, and several thousand Saudi Arabians. According to an Iranian estimate, there were also about 70,000 Iranians.

Oil. Kuwait was in 1961 by far the largest producer of oil in the ME, estimated crude oil production amounting to 82,482,000 metric tons and an additional 9.8m. tons in the Kuwait Neutral Zone. Direct payments to Kuwait by the oil companies (excluding payments for oil from the Neutral Zone) amounted in 1961 to $454m. This was the generally accepted figure; there was, however, a view that revenue might have been nearer to £200m, i.e. $560m.

The oil concessions were as follows: the greater part of Kuwait territory was covered by a concession of the Kuwait Oil Co., the major producer, owned jointly and equally by BP and Gulf Oil Corp. of America, with 50% of the company's profits accruing to the Ruler. Kuwait's interest in the Neutral Zone was granted to the American Independent Oil Co., which operated jointly with the (American) Getty Oil Co. In 1958 the (Japanese) Arabian Oil Co. was granted the concession for the Ruler's half-share in the offshore area of the Neutral Zone, guaranteeing the ruler a minimum share of 57% in the profits; in March 1961, the company made its first commercial shipment of oil to Japan. In Jan 1961 the Royal Dutch Shell group was granted a concession in the Kuwait offshore area, on a 50:50 profit-sharing basis. The first two groups set up refineries.

The Economy and Social Services. The land being desert, there was no agriculture except for experimental farms. Drinking water was distilled from sea water and the brackish water available was also utilized; a sweet water source was lately discovered. The economy, originally built around the natural harbour and the resultant trades, was transformed in the 'fifties by the huge oil revenues which accrued to the Ruler who gradually built up a welfare state. Originally, the income was allocated in roughly three equal parts to current expenditure, investment abroad—mainly in Britain—and development, but in the latter years there was a retrenchment in development spending (which included land purchase) and a rise in current expenditure, due, inter alia, to the financing of social services. There was a free health service and free education which also included free meals, books, clothes, etc. There were over 45,000 pupils and 2,000 teachers. Kuwait town was turned into a modern city with many public amenities.

Kuwait port was developed into a deep-water harbour; power plants and an extensive road system were constructed. Local, private and government investment resulted in the establishment of a number of industries, especially building materials. In 1961 plans were in hand for a petro-chemical plant, an aluminium smelter and a steel mill, based on imported ore. An asbestos-cement company was set up and two joint state-private enterprises were established on a 51:49 basis: a flour-milling company and a national manufacturing company to which existing state plants were to be sold. In June the Kuwait National Oil Co. (60% government-owned) took over local distribution of oil products for the Kuwait Oil Co. There was a locally-owned tanker company and two national airlines as well as a locally-owned bank and insurance companies.

Government land purchases, large-scale building, local purchases and contracting by the oil companies and their employment of local labour produced great prosperity among merchants and contractors while workers' living standards were relatively high. Still, large-scale immigration produced a measure of unemployment.

A budget law was issued in 1960, providing for proper budgeting, but no budget was published for 1960/61.

VIEWS ON KUWAIT

"Feudal and Welfare State." The Times ME correspondent, writing in May before the Kuwait crisis, remarked that Kuwait was "both a feudal and a welfare state." Kuwait was ruled by a family accountable only to itself. No one was "both able and willing" to state how the annual oil revenue of perhaps close to £200m. was allocated between the ruling shaykhs and the state nor was there a clear separation between the two as to holding-ings abroad.

One of the chief methods of distributing wealth was the purchase of land by the government from the Shaykha and others. Between £200m. and £300m. was thought to have been spent on these purchases during the last five years. Up to a third of the land was resold at lower prices; most of it was used for development, public buildings, streets, parks, etc.

Nor had the general public been forgotten; in fact, some of their neighbours said they were being spoiled. There were free education and health services, cars were seen everywhere, even outside tents in the desert "in which some workers, by their own choice, continue to live. No matter how much cream is skimmed off the top in Kuwait, there has been enough over for others." (For source, see below.)

mily and resulting in "rumour, guesses, and more rumour" that harmed Kuwait. But on the whole "the Kuwait community" was "proud and contented." There was no sign of the formation of trade unions. A Kuwait Oil Co. official, discussing "labour and race relations" in the company, "spoke rather like a gardener surveying his blooms." If any cause for tension lay ahead, it was to be found in the foreigners who constituted the majority of the population. Their labour was indispensable, but they were not Kuwait citizens. A decision on their future would soon have to be made. (Times, May 18)

A View of the Ruler. An article in The New York Times on Shaykh Abdallah as-Sālim as-Sabāh, the Ruler of Kuwait, characterized him as a "conservative Arab gentleman and a tradition-minded Muslim" whose "dream of a good life would be to retire to a garden somewhere with four wives and a copy of the Qur'ān." He was about 64 years old. The fortune held in his name was reckoned at as much as $1,000m., but he was a man of simple tastes, not a lavish spender (he had only one car), and regarded his wealth as a trust fund for his subjects.

Before becoming the Ruler he was well-known as a financial expert, conciliator and negotiator and perhaps because of these traits was chosen by the family council as the new Ruler in 1950, after the death of his predecessor.

When oil royalties began to flow in large amounts, the Ruler embarked on a programme to turn Kuwait into a welfare state. At home he jealously guarded the family's power, rejecting any effort to give outsiders a real voice in government and especially trying to hold at arm's length the educated young men who demanded reforms. He also had to deal with the rivalry for the succession and, were it not for this, he quite possibly would have retired several years ago.

In Arab affairs, the Ruler's policy had always been to remain aloof from quarrels and keep Kuwait uncommitted and independent.

The Ruler had only one wife; neither of his two sons was regarded as likely to succeed him. (NYT, July 4)

Intention to Establish Hereditary Monarchy Denied. In May Egyptian sources reported that a monarchy would be declared in Kuwait following independence and that the Supreme Council was discussing the question of hereditary succession (Akhir Sa'ah, May 24, 31). However, it was officially denied that the government intended to change the present system. [Traditionally, the Ruler was chosen by the Sabāh family from among its members.] (MENA, May 31 [June 2])

Resignation of Deputy Ruler. In April, following a dispute with the family council, Shaykh Abdallah al-Mubārak as-Sabāh resigned from his posts of Deputy Ruler, Chief of the Armed Forces [?] and Chief of Police and Public Security and left the country. The dispute reportedly concerned the question of succession. After abortive attempts at reconciliation, in which King Saud participated, the family council decided on June 15 to accept Shaykh Abdallah's resignation from the post of Chief of Police and appointed to this post Shaykh Sa'ad Abdallah as-Sālim as-Sabāh, the Ruler's eldest son and former Deputy Chief of Police and Public Security. (Akhir Sa'ah, May 2; Hayat, May 3, June 20; Falastin, June 21; MENA, June 19 [W 22])

On June 27 Shaykh Abdallah returned to Kuwait, reportedly on the invitation of the Ruler. The Times interpreted this as a closing of the ranks in the face of the Iraqi-Kuwait crisis. (Falastin, Times, June 28)

Rumours Denied of Ruler's Intention to Resign. In Sept reports were denied that the Ruler, Shaykh Abdallah as-Sālim, intended to resign and that authority would be transferred to his son, Sa'ad Abdallah. (Kul Shay', Sept 2, 9)

New Appointments. In Oct it was reported that Shaykh Sabāh Sālim as-Sabāh had been appointed head of the newly established Foreign Affairs Department, in addition to his position as head of the Health Department (Falastin, Oct 4). The department was established by a decree of the Ruler, dated Sept 3. (Kuwait al-Yaum, Sept 3)

In Nov it was reported that Ashraf Lutfi had been appointed Chief of the Ruler's bureau (Falastin, Nov 7); Khālid al-Ahmad al-Jābir as-Sabāh—Chief of the Diwan; Sālim al-Hamid al-Jābir as-Sabāh—chief military ADC; Shaykh Muhammad Ahmad al-Jābir—Minister of [President of Department of] Defence; and Shaykh Khālid al-Abdallah as-Sālim—Minister [President of Department] of Health. (R. Kuwait, Nov 30 [Dec 2]; Haqā'iq, Dec 14; Akhbar al-Yaum, Dec 16)

Kuwait obtained the assistance of UAR experts in various administrative fields (see p 140 b).

CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY

On Aug 26 the Ruler issued a decree providing for the election of a Constituent Assembly "preparatory to the issue of a constitution for the country... based on democratic foundations..." It stipulated:

- 1) An organization committee would be formed consisting of 11 persons (names given in Siyasah, Beirut, Sept 6).
- 2) A joint council would be formed from the members of the Supreme Council [all of whom were members of the ruling Sabāh family] and the members of the organization committee. "In addition to its present duties," [?] the joint council would prepare a bill for the election of the Constituent Assembly, which would prepare the constitution.
- 3) Elections to the Constituent Assembly would take place on Nov 1, 1961. (R. Kuwait, Aug 27 [29])

The Assembly was to consist of elected members and the members of the Supreme Council (who later were re-designated ministers). Candidates had to be over 30 and literate.

The right to vote was given to all Kuwaiti males over 21, except for policemen, soldiers and naturalized Kuwaitis. The country was divided into ten districts, each electing two candidates. No provision was made for parties in the election. The elections were to be secret. Election committees would consist of one officer each from the departments of justice (chairman) and police, as well as one representative of each of the candidates in a given district.

The elections were postponed to Dec 2 and again to Dec 30. The number of eligible voters was estimated at 40,000. There were 74 candidates, one of whom, Dr Ahmad al-Khatib, was reported to be a nationalist. The government allowed election propaganda meetings. In Sept all Kuwaiti citizens abroad were instructed by the Ruler to return home (Kuwait al-Yaum, Sept 10; Manar, Hayat, Sept 12; Kul Shay, Sept 23; Jihad, Oct 10; Haqiq, Nov 23, Dec 14; Kifah, Beirut, Dec 22; Times, Dec 30). The elections were said to have aroused very little interest. (Figaro, Dec 29)

The elections took place on Dec 30. Of the 20 candidates returned, the largest number of votes went to Mansur Musa al-Majid (848) and Ya'qub Yusuf al-Humaydi (678). Dr Khatib [the reputed nationalist] received 360 votes. The lowest number of votes received by a successful candidate was 272. (For full results, see: R. Kuwait, Dec 31 [Jan 3, 1962])

VARIOUS INTERNAL AFFAIRS

National Currency Introduced. A Kuwaiti dinar was put into circulation on April 1. The current Indian rupee was to be withdrawn as of May 15. The two governments had reached an agreement on the terms governing the conversion of the Indian currency into local dinars. (MENA, March 2 [W 6]; R. Delhi, March 23 [W 30])

The new dinar was set at par with sterling and its weight was 2.48828 grams gold. It was divided into 1,000 fils, 100 fils being equivalent to one dirham. (Falastin, March 30)

According to the Kuwait currency law of Oct 19, 1960, the new dinar was to be covered by 50% gold and 50% commercial securities and foreign currency easily convertible into gold. (Falastin, March 30; Hayat, April 1)

Immigration, Unemployment; Iranian. In April it was reported that residence of aliens in Kuwait had been restricted to one year, whereas previously the British Agent used to grant permanent residence. (Masa, Jordan, April 24)

In June the Kuwaiti security authorities announced that steps would be taken to deport unemployed workers who stayed illegally in the country. The number of unemployed was reported as 20,000, including Jordanians, Lebanese, Syrians, Iraqis and Iranians, and they constituted a disruptive element. (Hayat, June 21; Falastin, June 22)

In Nov it was reported that Kuwait had asked the oil companies to employ as many Kuwaitis as possible, to employ Arabs in posts which could not be filled by Kuwaitis, to make purchases locally through Kuwaiti merchants and also to reduce working hours and institute a pension scheme. (V of A, Nov 26 [29])

In Jan it was reported that 88 Iranians had drowned in the Gulf while attempting to enter Kuwait illegally. (Iraq Times, Jan 9).

Press. In March, ten licences were granted for newspapers (names listed in Siyaah, Beirut, April 1). The appearance of new papers, including an organ of the armed forces, was reported in Aug, Sept and Nov. (Musawwar, Cairo, Aug 25; Siyaah, Sept 7; Jaridah, Nov 19)

The Army; Establishment of Air Force. In the summer of 1961, the Kuwait army was reported to consist of 3,000 troops armed with British weapons, some armour and 12 [light] aircraft including four helicopters. It was commanded by Brigadier Mubarak Abdallah, a Sandhurst graduate and the son of Abdallah al-Jabir as-Sabih, President of the [Justice and] Education departments. (NYT, June 27; Times, July 8)

In July it was reported that the government intended to introduce military training in schools at the beginning of the next academic year. (Falastin, July 11)

On Aug 4 a £500,000 contract was announced for British jet aircraft (Provosts) to form the nucleus of Kuwait's air force (Times, Aug 5). An earlier report said that six planes would be ordered, Kuwait would send civil pilots to Britain for military training and the air force would be supervised by an RAF officer. (Manar, Feb 20)

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Establishment of Foreign Affairs Department and Diplomatic Service. In Jan the Kuwait government announced the forthcoming establishment of a Ministry of Foreign Affairs and a diplomatic service, members of which were to be trained in London. As of Jan 23, it was reported, Kuwait had assumed control of its foreign affairs, hitherto managed by the British government. (Hayat, Jan 27, 28)

[However, not until Sept did Kuwait assume full management of her foreign affairs.] In May The Times remarked that Kuwait still dealt with some countries or foreign nationals through Britain (Times, May 5). In Sept, on the announcement of the establishment of ambassadorial relationship between Britain and Kuwait (see below), The Times commented that this change formalized the assumption of full responsibility by Kuwait for her own foreign relations. The transition had been taking place progressively for the last two or three years but had been hampered by a shortage of trained staff. The paper said that eleven Kuwaiti foreign service officers had been receiving training in the UK since Aug. (Times, Sept 23)

On Aug 30 a decree by the Ruler announced the formation of a Foreign Affairs Department. (Difa, Aug 31)

Goodwill Missions. Five Kuwaiti friendship missions left Kuwait at the end of Aug for tours of UN member-states in order to explain the Kuwaiti problem. In Nov the return was reported of the mission to Asia, which had visited Burma, India, Indonesia, Japan, Malaysia, Pakistan, the Philippines and Turkey, and the mission to Latin America, which had visited Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, Ecuador, Mexico and Venezuela. (R. Kuwait, Aug 27 [29], Nov 4 [7])

Recognition. In Nov it was reported that 60 countries had extended recognition to Kuwait. (Manar, Nov 20)

Diplomatic Relations. [Kuwait was admitted as a member of the Arab League on July 20. In Sept she established diplomatic representation with the UK and the US. She also established such relations with Iran, Japan, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the UAR. Kuwait's admission to the UN was vetoed by the USSR, but for some time she had been a member of specialized agencies and international organizations and during the year joined others. For details see below]

Arab Countries. See pp 139-40.

United Kingdom. On May 2 Kuwait denied reports that it intended to join the British Commonwealth. (MENA, May 3 [4]; Hayat, May 3)

[The British protection over Kuwait was terminated by an agreement dated June 19. Subsequently, British forces landed in Kuwait in accordance with the new agreement and in response to a request by the Ruler for assistance in face of the Iraqi threat to her independence. By Oct 10 all British troops had been withdrawn, having been relieved by an Arab force.]

At first, after the conclusion of the agreement, the British Political Agent in Kuwait remained there with the same function and the Lord Privy Seal stated in the House that there had been no request by the Ruler for a change in the Agent's title; but ten days later [Iraq had meanwhile claimed sovereignty over Kuwait] be stated that as a result of consultations with the Ruler, the title would shortly be changed (Hansard C, Vol. 642, Col 954-8, June 19, Vol. 643, Col. 448, June 28). As of July 1, according to a Kuwaiti announcement, the British Political Agent (J.C.B. Richmond) was re-designated British Consul-General. (Falastin, July 2)

On Sept 22 the appointment was announced of Mr J.C.B. Richmond as Ambassador to the State of Kuwait. The Times said that the Consul-General, which now became the British embassy, would no longer be under the supervision of the Political Residency in Bahrain.

Khalid Khālid al-Ghunaym was appointed Kuwaiti Ambassador to the UK. (MENA, Aug 16 [18]; Times, Sept 23, Oct 19, Nov 9; Hayat, Sept 23)

The USA. On Sept 22 Kuwait announced the establishment of diplomatic relations at ambassadorial level with the USA (Hayat, Sept 23). On Dec 14 the appointment was announced in Washington of Parker T. Hart as first American [non-resident] ambassador to Kuwait. Hart was the American [resident] ambassador to Saudi Arabia and Minister to Yemen. (Ha'aretz, Dec 15)

Brazil. In May it was reported that Brazil was inviting the Kuwait Minister [President of the Department] of Finance to visit Brazil. (Jaridah, May 9)

GFR. In Jan the Kuwait Minister [President of the Department] of Justice and Education arrived in West

Germany for a tour of educational and cultural institutions. (Iraq Times, Jan 16)

Greece. In June it was reported that the Ruler had accepted an official invitation to visit Greece. (MENA, June 11 [13])

India. The Ruler visited India in March. (MENA, March 22 [24])

Kenya. The Ruler contributed £E10,000 to raise the standard of living of the Muslims in Kenya. (Akhbar al-Yawm, Cairo, Oct 14)

Philippines. In Oct a Kuwaiti delegation conferred with Philippine officials on the possibility of opening up trade relations between the two countries. (Times, Oct 5)

Somalia. On Aug 10 the Ruler received the Somali Consul-General in Aden, who was visiting Kuwait. (MENA, Aug 11 [12, 14])

Communist Countries. For first reaction of Communist countries to Kuwait's attainment of independence, see p 125 b. In Nov, in the Security Council the USSR vetoed Kuwait's admission to the UN on the ground, inter alia, that Kuwait remained in fact a British colony. (S/PV 984, Nov 30; see also: the Kuwait Crisis)

Poland. In July a delegation of Kuwaiti merchants paid a ten-day visit to Poland. They placed trial orders for food products, wireless sets and tyres and also discussed a project for the construction of a freezing plant in Kuwait. (PAP, Aug 2 [EE 4])

Diplomatic Relations. In Nov a Kuwaiti official denied reports that Kuwait would not establish diplomatic relations with Communist countries. (Falastin, Nov 9)

In Dec it was reported that Kuwait had removed the ban on visits by its citizens to Communist countries and intended to send goodwill missions to some of them. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Dec 11)

The United Nations and International Organizations. Kuwait's application for UN membership was vetoed by the USSR in the Security Council in Nov (S/PV 984, Nov 30). Kuwait adhered to the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies and became a member of ILO (June 13) and FAO (Nov 9). It was also a member of UNESCO and WHO as well as of ICAO, IMCO, ITU and UPU. (UN Year Book 1961, pp 528, 598, 603, 613, 650, 620, 671, 655, 660)

In March a development advisory mission of the IBRD went to Kuwait at the request of the government. It included experts on public administration and budgetary procedures, education and public health. (Times, March 21; UN Year Book, 1961, p 624)

MUSCAT AND OMAN

SYNOPSIS

The year opened with the British-Omani talks held in Lebanon which failed when the rebel leaders demanded sovereign status for Oman and immediate withdrawal of British forces. A rebel spokesman said that they would now intensify their military activities (see MER 1960, pp 402-3, and below).

The reports available did not allow for a clear picture of Omani rebel activities during the year. Arab sources reported mining activities as well as armed clashes with British forces; British sources confirmed part of the former which they attributed to "infiltrators" but denied the latter. There was, however, a British press report on coordinated terrorist activities in the Persian Gulf area, including the sinking of a British liner. The Arab countries declared openly, at the UN and elsewhere, that they were aiding the rebels. Iraq claimed that she was providing the greater part of this aid.

Meanwhile, the British were considerably increasing their aid, both military and economic, to the Sultan.

The main feature of the year was the debate on the Omani question in the UN General Assembly. In Oct 1960 the 15th session accepted a request for the inclusion of the question in its agenda. The Special Political Committee debated it in April and decided to defer it to the 16th session. A draft resolution, supported by the Arab, the Communist and a number of Afro-Asian countries called for the independence of Oman. Britain, which opposed the inclusion of the item in the agenda, argued that the Sultan enjoyed complete sovereignty over the country as a whole. The resolution was debated in the 16th session in Dec and was not adopted.

The Omanis also failed in their endeavours to secure admission to the Arab League.

BRITAIN AND THE SULTAN OF MUSCAT

Sultan in London; Issue of Gulf Federation. In July Sa'id Ibn Taymūr, Sultan of Muscat, went to England and was received by Edward Heath, the Lord Privy Seal (Mid. Mir., July 29; Times, July 25). In Sept Baghdad Radio reported another meeting between the two and claimed that the Sultan's visit was connected with the visits to London in July of other rulers of the Gulf principalities and with a British plan to establish a federation in the Gulf. (R. Baghdad, Sept 20 [22]; see also p 446 b)

Increased British Aid. Civil estimates published in Britain on March 24 predicted an increase in the grant to the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman from £947,000 to £1,058,750, and an increase in assistance to the Sultan's armed forces from £5,250 to £447,175. (Times, March 25)

A British source said that both economic development and the strengthening of the Sultan's armed forces had been speeded up as a result of an agreement of Aug 1960 for an increase in British financial assistance. Health centres, dispensaries and agricultural stations were being built, anti-malaria spraying carried out and new roads and schools planned. (Army Quarterly, July 1961)

Military Cooperation. A British source, reviewing the situation in 1960 and the first half of 1961, said the Sultan's armed forces frequently cooperated in exercises in the country with sub-units of British Forces Arabian Peninsula units. These were mostly joint exercises supported by the Navy and the RAF. (Army Quarterly, Jan, July 1961)

Masira Island Said to Serve as British Base. A statement by the Omani office in Damascus attacked Britain for having turned Masira Island [in the Arabian Sea, off the coast of southern Oman] into a British military base "threatening the Middle East area." The statement added that the British military authorities now attached increasing importance to Masira Island as a result of growing troubles in the Aden Protectorates. (Fajr al-Jadid, Jan 31)

ACTIVITIES OF THE OMANI EXILES

Replacement of Omani Office Heads. On Jan 3 the Omani Imamate office in Cairo announced that Imam Ghālib Ibn Ali had appointed Mustafa Ghazāl temporary head of the Omani Imamate office in Cairo and Faisal Ibn Ali head of the Imamate office in Damascus instead of Shaykh Salih Ibn Isa al-Hārithi and Shaykh Muhammad al-Hārithi, who had been relieved of their posts on Nov 24, 1960. (MENA, Jan 3 [5]; Gumhuriyah, Cairo, Jan 5; see also MER 1960, p 403)

In June an Omani delegation headed by Shaykh Yahya Ibn Abdallah, head of the Imamate office in Dammam (Saudi Arabia), arrived in Damascus to publicize the Omani question in preparation for the forthcoming UN debate; it was also to visit Iraq and Kuwait. (Akhir Sa'ah, June 14)

Imam Sets up "Consultative Council." A "Consultative Council (majlis istishāri) of the Amirate of Oman" was set up in Sept by "decree" of the Imam. It was to be composed of the leaders of the Omani revolt and to have its seat wherever the Imam took up residence (Akhir Sa'ah, Sept 6). [The Imam's permanent residence was apparently still in Dammam but he spent two months in Cairo, from Aug 7.]

The Council held its first meeting in Cairo on Sept 12. It decided on the composition of the Omani delegation to the UN—Shaykh Sulaymān Ibn Hīmār, Tālib Ibn Ali, and Muhammad al-Amin Abdallah—and the Omani delegation to the Arab League Council—Shaykh Sulaymān Ibn Hīmār, Shaykh Tālib Ibn Ali, Shaykh Hīmār Ibn Sulaymān, and Shaykh Faisal Ibn Ali, head of the Omani office in Damascus. (MENA, Sept 11 [14])

THE ARAB COUNTRIES AND OMAN

[The Arab countries continued to sponsor the case of the deposed Imam of Oman, both by bringing up the issue at international Afro-Asian and neutral forums and at the UN as a case of anti-colonialist struggle (see index) and by extending material aid.]

Arab League Refers Omani Application for Membership. [Imam Ghālib had applied for Omani membership in the Arab League in 1954 but the League Council, at its 23rd session in March 1955, decided to defer the issue. At its 24th session, in Oct 1955, the Council resolved to recognize the independence of Oman over Iraq's objections but again deferred the question of membership.]

At the conference of Arab foreign ministers, held in Baghdad on Jan 30-Feb 4, 1961, plans for advancing the Omani cause at the UN were approved. The Imam's brother attended the conference as an observer. (Zaman, Jan 31, Feb 5)

On Aug 17 the Imam, who had come to Cairo for this purpose, applied officially for membership of the League. (Times of India, Aug 9)

In Mecca it was announced on Aug 30 that Saudi Arabia supported the Imam's application. (Manar, Jordan, Sept 1)

The 36th session of the League Council decided on Sept 16 to place the application on the agenda for the Arab foreign ministers scheduled to convene at Casablanca in Oct (Hayat, Sept 20). [The Casablanca meeting of Arab foreign ministers never took place.] At its meeting in Riyadh in April 1962, the Council decided to defer the question of Oman's membership to a subsequent session. (Hayat, April 4, 1962)

Iraq Claims Omanis Depend Primarily on Iraqi Aid. In Jan Maj-Gen. Ahmad Salih al-Abdi, Iraqi Chief of Staff, said that Iraq had provided great quantities of arms, supplies and equipment to the Omani fighters. (Times, Jan 7)

On Aug 22 Baghdad Radio, quoting an article from a Lebanese paper, said that a certain Arab state [the UAR] had filled the Omanis with words of support, while Qas-sim had filled them with money and weapons. The "Omani revolution depends primarily on Iraq's material and military aid." Iraq had also asked the Arab states to make financial contributions in support of the Omani revolt, but some of them had been content to extend radio support. (R. Baghdad, Aug 22 [24])

AFTERMATH OF FAILURE OF BRITISH-OMANI TALKS; SULTAN'S OFFER OF AMNESTY

British Statement on Talks, Offer of Amnesty to Rebels. On March 15, in answer to a question, the Lord Privy Seal Edward Heath said "the former rebel leaders," who fled from the Sultanate in 1959, had later taken the initiative in seeking terms for their return. After consulting the Sultan, the British representatives took part in informal and exploratory contacts with some of these leaders. The Sultan was willing to grant an amnesty to the rebels and permit them to return in safety subject to satisfactory guarantees that they would keep the peace. A statement made by the rebel leaders at a meeting in Jan afforded hope that a settlement could be achieved, but at a further meeting in Feb, the rebel leaders completely reversed their attitude and demanded the recognition of sovereign status for a part of the Sultan's territory, Oman. This went even beyond the interpretation previously placed by the rebel leaders upon the Sib Agreement of 1920. Moreover, it went beyond the interpretation placed on the agreement by Muhammad Ibn Abdallah al-Khalili and the other shaykhs who signed it. The Sultan, however, only the previous week had confirmed his offer of an amnesty. (For further details on the negotiations, see below: the accounts of the British and the Saudi Arabian delegates at the UN.) (Harvard C, Vol. 515, Col 123-4, March 15)

Further Talks? On May 2 a British spokesman denied any knowledge of an intention to renew the talks between British and Omani representatives. He was commenting on a statement attributed by Cairo Radio to Shaykh Tālib Ibn Ali to the effect that contacts for the resumption of negotiations had been initiated in mid-April in Dammam, Saudi Arabia, where the Imam was residing (Mid. Mir., May 6; Jihad, Jordan, May 3). The Imam, for his part, told newsmen on arrival in Cairo from Dammam on Aug 7 that talks had been held with the British during the past three months, but no progress had been made. "The door for negotiations is still open," he added, "if the British show signs of being reasonable." (Times of India, Aug 9)

Question of Publication of Sib Agreement. In answer to a question in the House of Commons on June 12 as to whether it would publish the text of the Sib agreement [which had never been officially issued], the government replied that Britain was not responsible for the negotiation of the agreement: "In fact, the British Political Agent was responsible for bringing the parties together but, thereafter, they carried on their own discussions and they reached agreement between themselves." The question of publicity for that document was a matter for the Sultan, as the British government had never been responsible for his external relations. (Harvard C, Vol. 526, Col. 23-24, June 12)

Issue of Amnesty. It was reported in Dec that the Sultan had written to the shaykhs of the principal Omani tribes expressing his readiness to allow any of his subjects to return peacefully to their homes and families, provided they gave assurances of good behaviour. The offer was directed to those Omanis who supported the former Imam, Ghālib Ibn Ali, in his revolt and fled the country in Jan 1959. Since then they had been living in exile in Dammam and elsewhere and many were known to be anxious to return but feared arrest if they did so. (Mid. Mir., Dec 23)

REPORTS ON HOSTILITIES IN OMAN

Arab Reports on Renewed Hostilities—British Counter-activities. In Jan an Iraqi source reported the resumption of hostilities after a quiet period. The Omanis were attacking the "British and mercenary forces," employing modern weapons which were arriving regularly from abroad. The British were carrying out extensive arrests. The Omanis had twice attacked British patrols in the vicinity of Nazwah (Nizwa), killing one British soldier and wounding three. A mine exploded under a British vehicle, wounding 7 (Fajr al-Jadid, Baghdad, Jan 24). Earlier Cairo, reporting similar incidents, also mentioned an attack on the British force in Nazwah.

Counteractivities of the British forces reportedly covered the whole of Oman and they imposed a day and night curfew (V of A, Jan 1 [3]). The Oman Imamate office in Cairo said a warrior arrested by the British had died under "beastly torture." (Zaman, Baghdad, Jan 12)

In Feb, it was reported that two British vehicles were blown up in the Sib al-Malih region near the Oman Petroleum Development Company's installations. Another dispatch said "the British authorities at Ibbi" had executed the Omani fighter Khalaf Ibn Hamid al-Ibbi, who had been arrested on Nov 15, 1960. (V of A, Feb 18 [21])

On March 1 the Omani office in Damascus reported that resistance in Oman had entered a new phase, in accordance with the strategy of the "revolutionary command." The insurgents had planted a mine on the route of "Brigadier Waterfield, Minister of Defence in the Muscat government," and other British officers, but a private car, which preceded the officer's vehicle, was blown up; two passengers were killed and five injured. (Mid. Mir., March 4)

On March 21, the same source reported the death of two British officers as a result of a mine explosion in the Rastaq region. The British authorities had announced a state of emergency and imposed heavy fines on villages in the area. (Manar, March 23)

British Source Confirms Mining Activities. A British army journal surveying activities in 1960 and 1961 up to May said that in the second half of 1960 the security situation in Muscat and Oman had been "most satisfactory." The majority of arms shipped into the country "in the shape of Egyptian plastic mines as well as hand grenades and other equipment" had fallen into the hands of the security forces, due to an "inspired intelligence effort" and growing cooperation on the part of the local population.

The activities of the Imam and his followers in Dammam were confined to paying terrorists to infiltrate and lay mines. In 1960 six out of every seven mines were recovered unexploded, including 40 handed in by the people ordered to lay them. There were slight increases in mining activities in Dec 1960 and April 1961 assumedly in order to coincide with the UN debates on the Oman question. One British soldier was killed by a mine in 1961 (up to May) but none in 1960. In Feb a civilian car was blown up (as related above). (Army Quarterly, June, July 1961; Note: After the July 1961 issue, The Army Quarterly discontinued its biannual review of events in the Arabian Peninsula.)

More Arab Reports on Mine Incidents. The Omani Imamate office in Cairo announced on May 21 that eight British soldiers had been killed and others wounded when mines laid by Omani nationalists exploded in Nazwah and Bahla, destroying two military vehicles. Other mines in the Rastaq area had caused further enemy losses. Another report, apparently referring to the same incidents, added that the British had retaliated with widespread arrests of unarmed civilians, whom they accused of aiding an attack on a British post when an officer was killed and a number of other ranks were wounded. They had also imposed heavy fines on the inhabitants in the affected area. The nationalists had seized a quantity of arms. (V of A, May 20, 21 [23])

The British reportedly distributed leaflets promising money rewards for information on arms smuggling to the Trucial Coast amirates, Muscat and Oman. (V of A, May 30 [June 1])

Loss of British Liner in Gulf Attributed to Terrorism. In April a British liner, the Dara, sank in the Persian Gulf in the vicinity of the Amirate of Abu Dhabi as a result of a fire, resulting in the loss of 212 lives. The Voice of the Arabs claimed that the fire resulted from an explosion of ammunition and explosives intended for the British forces in Muscat. An official spokesman in London was quoted as saying on May 2 that this was "entirely untrue and completely without foundation." A British source later ascribed the sinking to an Arab terrorist attack. (V of A, April 30 [May 2]; Mid. Mir., May 6; Daily Telegraph, July 16)

British Source Confirms Far-Reaching Terrorist Campaign in Persian Gulf. The Daily Telegraph reported on July 16 that a growing terrorist campaign was under way in Oman and the Persian Gulf shaykhdoms. It said the campaign was financed by the UAR and was directed against Britain and the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman. Bombs had exploded in a British bank, two British ships, a Dutch ship, an aviation office, an oil pipeline, and a British-chartered aircraft. A terrorist attack was responsible for the sinking of the Dara in April (see above).

Although the terrorists had been operating for 18 months it was only in recent weeks that British intelligence sources had confirmed that there was a political pattern behind their attacks. (Daily Telegraph, July 16)

Inter-Tribal Fighting. In Aug the Imam's office in Cairo alleged that the British policy of "divide and rule" was responsible for bloodshed between Omani tribes. The tribes of Bani Ghafir and al-Hawasinah were reported to have engaged in fighting, which resulted in the destruction of a village. Another clash was said to have taken place between the Bani Hashim and Bani Rashed tribes. (Jihad, Jordan, Aug 9)

Further Arab Reports and a British Denial. On Aug 7 the Imam said in Cairo that the revolt against the colonialist forces had flared up in Bani Rawahah, and the enemy had lost eight men. (V of A, Aug 8 [10])

On Oct 15 the Omani office in Cairo reported that two British soldiers had been killed and five seriously wounded in clashes with Omani fighters in an Omani ambush in the Wadi Bani Kharus. Another British car had been damaged by an Omani mine which killed the driver and wounded three others. A spokesman for the British War Office said he had no information of such clashes. On Oct 18 the report was denied. The Times said it could now be stated that no British troops had been involved in shooting incidents in the area since Jan 1959. The last mine incident was in March 1961 and there were no casualties. (Times, Oct 16, 18)

Incidents Listed in UN Debate; British Denial. On Nov 27, in the course of the UN Special Political Committee's debate on the Oman question, the Saudi Arabian representative, Ahmad Shukairy, cited the following incidents reported by Imamate sources: on Oct 14, armed clashes broke out at various points throughout Oman, including Wadi Bani Kharus and the town of Bahlah; in Oct a sunset-to-sunrise curfew was imposed by the British in most Omani towns; according to a report of Nov 6, a British armoured car had been ambushed in Jabal Akhdar and a number of British and local soldiers had been killed; on Nov 13 it was reported that "enemy forces" had attacked Falaj and arrested a number of "nationalists," several engagements had taken place in the Wadi Samaj area, British reinforcements had continued to arrive by air from Bahrain, and air attacks had taken place near Nazwah, Bahlah and Jabal Akhdar; on Nov 14 it was reported that Omanis had attacked British posts at Awali; in retaliation the British had bombed Nazwah, and in a number of "nationalist" counterattacks, several British soldiers had been killed and wounded. (UN Doc, A/SPC/SR. 299)

The British representative denied that there had been recent armed clashes with British troops and declared that there was no more fighting except for occasional mine-laying incidents by "infiltrators." The only British personnel in Oman, he said, consisted of a topographical unit of 30 men and small parties, never exceeding a dozen men, which had been engaged in exercises in Oman from time to time, "without firing a shot." (A/SPC/SR. 301)

In Dec the Imamate office in Cairo announced that a British patrol had been ambushed, 2 soldiers had been killed and others wounded. (Akhbar, Cairo, Dec 20)

THE OMAN QUESTION AT THE UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY 15th SESSION

Background to UN Discussion. Already on Aug 13, 1957 the representatives of 11 Arab countries requested in a letter to the UN Security Council that an urgent meeting be convened to consider "the armed aggression of the UK against the independence, sovereignty and the territorial integrity of the Imamate of Oman." The letter stated that Britain's aggression had during the preceding few weeks taken the form of a full-scale war against the people of Oman. The matter came up at the Security Council's meeting on Aug 20, 1957, and the representative of Iraq — as the sole Arab member of the Council — pressed for the inclusion of the item in the agenda. The British representative opposed the request, terming the Arab complaint "inconsistent, incoherent and improper." The USSR representative strongly supported the Arab request, while the US delegate stated that in view of the insufficiency of information his country would not commit itself; he made it clear, however, that the US did not accept the interpretation of the situation in Oman as set forth in the Arab letter. The request was rejected by 5 (Australia, Colombia, Cuba, France and the UK) to 4 (Iraq, the Philippines, Sweden and the USSR), with the US abstaining and China not participating in the vote. (UN Docs., S/3863, S/PV. 783-4)

The Arab Case for the Independence and Sovereignty of Oman. A formal request for the inclusion of the "Question of Oman" in the agenda of the 15th session of the General Assembly was made on Sept 29, 1960 by ten Arab countries (MER 1960, p 402). In the accompanying Explanatory Memorandum, it was stated that the Imamate of Oman formed the greater part of "what is erroneously called" the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman; that for the past 1,200 years the people of Oman used to be ruled by their own elected Imams; and that Oman's independence and sovereignty was consolidated by the expulsion of the Portuguese from Muscat in 1650 by Oman troops. Since the latter part of the 18th century, it was further stated, Britain had sought to extend its influence over Oman by attempting to impose on it the rule of anglophile Sultans of Muscat, but the people of Oman had stubbornly resisted those attempts. The conflict between Muscat and Oman had come to a head at the end of World War I, and when Muscat was about to surrender, the British intervened to settle the dispute. The outcome had been the conclusion of the Treaty of Sib between Muscat and Oman on Sept 25, 1920, which "confirms without ambiguity the independence of Oman."

CORRENDUM: MER 1960, p 400: "In 1921... the treaty of Sib was concluded," correct to: "In 1920..."

The memorandum went on to say that, "as is well known, the present conflict arose as a result of the constant refusal of the Imams of Oman to grant oil concessions to British companies in their territory." Oman was invaded by British forces and the capital, Nazwah, was occupied on Dec 17, 1955. Since then the people of Oman "continued their resistance to the military aggression directed against their independence." (UN Doc. A/4521)

Communist Bloc Supports Arabs; Western Powers Object To Placing Item on Agenda. An opening skirmish over the question of Oman took place on Oct 25, 1960 in the General Committee [the body which examines requests for placing items on the agenda]. The Arab and Communist Bloc delegates pressed for the inclusion of the item, while Britain and France objected. The US representative stated that, considering that the facts with regard to the region were exceedingly complex and that it was "not even certain who were the real parties in the dispute," his delegation would abstain on the procedural question of the inclusion of the item, as it had done in the Security Council in 1957. In the end, the Committee recommended the placing of the item on the agenda by a vote of 14 to 2, with four abstentions. (A/BUR/SR. 131)

On Oct 31, 1960 the GA approved the recommendation and allocated the item to the Special Political Committee for consideration. (A/PV. 909)

Discussion at the 15th UN Session. The Special Political Committee took up the question as the last on its agenda at the end of the second part of the 15th UN session, between April 19 and 22, 1961.

Shukairy Spearheads Attack on Britain. Opening the debate, Ahmad Shukairy, the Saudi Arabian representative, said that although Britain claimed that she was not a party to the conflict, her forces were blockading Oman by land and sea and attacking the people of Oman with machineguns, heavy mortars and jet aircraft. The argument was advanced, Shukairy said, that Oman was a dominion of the Sultan of Muscat and Oman, and that Britain was intervening at the Sultan's request.

Against this "absurd argument" Shukairy restated the Arab case for the sovereignty of Oman (see above). Muscat was merely the principal port of Oman. The Sultan was no more than "a cat's-paw of the British," he added, while Oman was "perhaps the oldest democracy surviving as a state."

The British, "on the pretext of combating slavery and piracy," had broken up the territory of Oman into nine separate units [i.e., Oman and Muscat and the seven Trucial States]. Even so, the Treaty of Sib was evidence of the formal recognition of Oman's sovereignty by the Sultan of Muscat. Hostilities were renewed in recent years because of the discovery of oil in Oman. "It was a fact" that following the occupation in 1955 of Nazwah, Oman's capital, the British had immediately started drilling operations in the area.

Shukairy further stated that in the secret meetings in Lebanon in 1960 and early 1961, the British had jounded out the Omani delegation on the possibility of withdrawing the complaint to the UN; this had been refused by the Omanis, and the negotiations had collapsed. (On these talks, see MER 1960, pp 402-3, and above.) Shukairy concluded by calling upon the UK to withdraw the troops from Oman and "dismantle all military bases" there. (A/SPC/SR. 255-6)

The British Case for the Sovereignty of the Sultan of Muscat. The British representative, C.T. Crowe, denounced Shukairy's statement as "a series of distortions, omissions and half-truths," and declared that there had never been a separate state under the Imam of Oman, independent of, and separate from, the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman. Theoretically, the office of Imam had not been necessary to the Ibadhi tribes which inhabited Muscat, and actually, apart from a brief interlude, there had been no Imam from 1821 until 1913. At that time, however, the religious leaders in the interior had become incensed by the Sultan's modern outlook "and particularly by his efforts, at the instigation of the UK government, to suppress the slave trade and the traffic in arms." The main factions had combined in 1914 to revive the Imamate, but troubles had continued between the tribes and, following the murder of the Imam and the election of a new one, his supporters had asked the British Political Agent in Muscat to mediate. As a result, the Sib agreement had been concluded in 1920 with a number of shaykhs of the interior. Although that agreement had accorded the tribes a large measure of autonomy, they had contracted to remain in peace and amity with the Sultan's government, "thus in effect acknowledging his sovereignty."

Referring to the assertion that Britain intervened in Oman because of oil interests, the British representative pointed out that the oil concession had been granted by the Sultan, Sa'id Ibn Taymr, as long ago as 1937, "but it was only when the increasing riches of Saudi Arabia had demonstrated what oil wealth could mean for an absolute ruler, that certain shaykhs in Oman had seen the death of Imam Muhammad in 1954 as an opportunity to secure for themselves any benefit that might come from the discovery of oil in Oman." The election of the new Imam, Ghālib Ibn Ali, "had taken place in a marked atmosphere of intrigue," and upon his election he had claimed to be an independent ruler and purported to annul the oil concession. It was significant, Crowe observed, that Imam Ghālib's application for membership in the Arab League had not been accepted at that time. After the suppression of the revolt in 1954, the Sultan had allowed Ghālib to retire to a village in the interior, and the only persons still not reconciled were his brother, Tālib, and a few followers. They had left Oman only to come back after some time at the head of an "Oman Liberation Army," which had been trained and equipped in Saudi Arabia. Britain had responded to the Sultan's request for support only because of Saudi Arabia's interference. The main revolt had come to an end in Jan 1959, with the occupation of Jabal Akhdar by the Sultan's forces, which had been aided by "less than 300 British troops." Since then, there had been no rebellion except for the occasional infiltration of "individual terrorists" from Saudi Arabia to mine roads in an attempt to justify stories of continued fighting. There were now no British combatant units permanently stationed in the Sultanate, although a small number of British personnel were seconded to the Sultan's army and air force, and small UK units sometimes went to Oman for training exercises of short duration.

As to the contacts in Lebanon, Crowe reiterated the account given in March by the Lord Privy Seal (see above: Aftermath of Failure of British-Omani talks). He attributed the reversal of the attitude of the rebel leaders to outside pressure from those governments which, for reasons of their own, had encouraged the original rebellion. (A/SPC/SR. 257)

UAR: Will Help Omanis in Their Struggle. Other Arab representatives joined in accusing Britain of illegal intervention. The UAR representative wished to make it clear that his country "would do all it could to help its Arab brothers in Oman in their struggle against colonialism." Referring to the British representative's statement that the Arab League had not accepted Oman as a member, he said this was incorrect: "The application of Oman had, rather, been reviewed in the special circumstances of Oman's military occupation" (A/SPC/SR. 256-7). The representative of Iraq asked the UN to dispatch an impartial commission to investigate the situation (A/SPC/SR. 257). The representative of Lebanon said that if Saudi Arabia had supported the Omanis, it had done so "because it was a tradition among Arabs to help their brothers to defend their rights and freedom," but the UK had no right to intervene in conflicts arising between Arab brothers. (A/SPC/SR. 258)

USSR and Neutralists Support Arab Position. Supporting the Arab thesis, the representative of the USSR, Platon Morozov, pointed out that "many delegations had given evidence to show that Oman had been an independent state for many centuries," thus contradicting "the aggressors' pseudo-historical analysis" (A/SPC/SR. 259). The delegations of Afghanistan, Cuba, Guinea, Indonesia and Yugoslavia also supported the Arab stand. (A/SPC/SR. 257-9)

Western Representatives Passive. No representative of Western countries, except for the UK, participated in the debate.

Draft Resolution; Discussion Deferred to the 16th UN Session. Towards the end of the debate, on April 21, a draft resolution was introduced by Afghanistan, Guinea, Indonesia, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Tunisia, the UAR, Yemen, and Yugoslavia. By the draft resolution, the General Assembly, recalling its declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, would: (1) recognize the right of the people of Oman to self-determination and independence; (2) call for the withdrawal of foreign forces from Oman; and (3) invite the parties concerned to settle their differences peacefully with a view to restoring normal conditions in Oman (UN Doc. A/SPC/L. 67)

This draft resolution was not voted on during the 15th UN session. On April 22 the British and Saudi Arabian representatives agreed to an Indian suggestion to postpone further consideration to the 16th session, and it was so decided. (A/SPC/SR. 259)

DISCUSSION AT THE 16TH UN SESSION

NOTE: For the detailed voting record on the Oman question, see pp 31-2, Nos. 60-64.

During the 16th session, the Oman question was discussed in the Special Political Committee between Nov 27 and Dec 4.

Arab Draft Resolution Presented. The Committee had before it a draft resolution on Oman identical to that submitted during the 15th session. The list of sponsors had increased by now to 16 [from the original 14] as a result of Syria's secession from UAR and the addition of Mali. (UN Doc. A/SPC/L. 78 and Add. 1)

Omani Delegation Granted Hearing. On Nov 23 the Arab delegations submitted a formal request that the Committee grant a hearing to an Omani delegation consisting of Tālib Ibn Ali (brother of Imam Ghālib), Shaykh Sulaymān Ibn Hīmār al-Nabḥānī and Muḥammad al-Amin Abdallah (Secretary of the Omani office in Cairo). (Bilat. Oct 23; UN Doc. A/SPC/59)

On Nov 27, when the Committee began the debate on Oman, the British representative opposed this request on the grounds that the Committee was now being asked to hear a delegation which claimed to represent a territory forming part of an independent state. The Arab representatives countered that the British contention prejudged the issue, as it was for the Committee to decide whether the question was, or was not, an internal one. The request was then put to a vote and accepted by 40 votes to 26, with 23 abstentions. (A/SPC/SR. 299)

The following day, Muḥammad al-Amin Abdallah was invited to address the Committee as spokesman of the Omani delegation, and he repeated in general terms the Arab charges of British aggression. (A/SPC/SR. 300)

The Sultan Protests. The Sultan of Muscat and Oman, for his part, sent a cable to the President of the General Assembly, protesting at both the hearing given to "the so-called Omani delegation" and the holding of the debate itself, since "the matters involved fell exclusively under the internal jurisdiction of the Sultanate." (UN Doc. A/SPC/62)

Arab Speakers. Almad Shukairy, the representative of Saudi Arabia, again opened the debate with a speech against Britain's intervention in Oman. While in general repeating the arguments he had advanced at the 15th session, he placed special emphasis on the claim that the struggle of "Omani nationalists" against "British aggression" was continuing even while the Committee was discussing the issue; (see above: Reports on Hostilities). The outside world knew little of all these happenings, he said, because of the curfew which had been imposed over most of the country and the embargo placed on all informational media. Referring to the Sultan's alleged subservience to imperialism, he stated that, during World War II, the Sultan had given Britain and the US permission, for a cash payment, to build an airport on Masira Island;

"perhaps the existence of that airfield explained the US position on the question of Oman." In answer to British charges of Saudi Arabian intervention in Oman, he stated that his country "considered itself entitled to give the population of Oman every kind of help it needed to recover its liberty and independence." (A/SPC/SR. 299, 301)

All the other Arab delegations participated in the debate, and advanced arguments to uphold Oman's right to independence and in denunciation of the British position. [However, a note of divergence was discernible in some of the Arab representatives' references to the relationship between Oman and Muscat.] Whereas the Saudi Arabian representative maintained that, historically, "Greater Oman" had included Muscat as well as other areas, and that its "dismemberment" was the fault of the imperialists (A/SPC/SR. 301), the representative of Iraq claimed that the two countries "showed strongly marked differences of geography, history, economy, politics and religion." [Thus, the implication of the Saudi Arabian position was that Muscat and Oman should be considered as one country, but that the Imam should be recognized as the legitimate ruler instead of the Sultan; the Iraqi representative, in contrast, implicitly advocated the separation of Oman from Muscat.] The Iraqi delegate further declared that his country "would continue to support the people of Oman in its struggle for independence" (A/SPC/SR. 301). The UAR representative, also referring to British charges of Arab intervention, stated that his country was "proud" of having aided the Omani nationalists. (A/SPC/SR. 303)

The UK Representative. C.T. Crowe again declared that in his government's view the situation was not one which the UN was entitled to discuss. Whatever interpretations were placed on the agreement of Sir, he said, the matter was now of "purely historical interest," since the agreement had been unilaterally terminated by the Imam's rebellion of 1954-55. There was no indication of any desire in the country to revive the religious office of Imam, still less an Imamate with secular powers, for the vast majority of Omanis regarded the Imamate as "an archaic institution." Crowe denied the reports of recent clashes. (A/SPC/SR. 301; see also above: Reports on Hostilities.)

Other Delegations. The representative of France supported the British position, observing that "an unfortunate situation seemed to be developing in the UN: that of dramatizing, for private ends, situations which were no concern of the Organization." (A/SPC/SR. 305)

The Arab point of view was supported by the Communist bloc delegates, as well as by Ghana, Afghanistan, Cambodia, Indonesia, Cuba, and Mali. The representatives of India, Ceylon, Iran, Ethiopia, the Ivory Coast and Brazil stated that while they were in sympathy with other parts of the draft resolution before the Committee, they could not support para. 1, which purported to recognize Oman's independence of Muscat. Representatives of some Latin American countries (Mexico, Guatemala, Ecuador, Paraguay) announced that they intended to abstain on the draft resolution because the issue in their view had not been clarified sufficiently (A/SPC/SR. 302-306). The US delegation did not participate in the debate.

Resolution Not Adopted by Assembly. The 16-Power draft resolution was voted on by the Special Political Committee on Dec. 4. After separate votes on paras. 1 and 2, the resolution as a whole was adopted by the Committee by a roll-call vote of 38 to 21, with 29 abstentions. It was opposed by the W. European and "white Commonwealth" countries, the US, Israel, Panama and the Dominican Republic. Most of the abstainers were Latin American and the U.A.M. group of countries, also Pakistan and Malaysia. India and Iran, after abstaining on para. 1, voted in favour of the resolution as a whole. (A/SPC/SR. 306)

The General Assembly's vote on the draft resolution, on Dec 14, resulted in 33 in favour, 21 against, and 37 abstentions. (Some of those who voted for the resolution in the Committee—like Mauritania, Nepal and Ghana—either switched to abstention or were absent.) Since it failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the draft resolution was not adopted. (A/PV. 1078)

PERSIAN GULF PRINCIPALITIES

Corrigendum: See MER 1960, p. 403, Background Note. Read: The total population in 1959 was 142,213.

Oil; and the Economy. [Estimated crude oil production in Bahrain in 1961 was 2,250,000 tons as compared with 2,257,000 tons in 1960. Oil receipts in 1961 were $2.1m. riyal ($11m. as compared with $13m. in 1960).]

Death of Ruler; Isa Ibn Salṣān New Ruler. Shaykh Salṣān Ibn Ḥamad Al Khalīfah, Ruler of Bahrain, died on Nov 2 at the age of 67. His eldest son, Shaykh Isa, succeeded him "in view of his appointment as heir apparent during his father's lifetime." In a statement broadcast on Nov 2, the new ruler promised to observe all the obligations and agreements concluded with the state's friends and allies. (Times; Hayat, Nov 3; R. Kuwait, Nov 2 [4]; Mid Mir, Nov 4)

The Ruler of Kuwait ordered the observance of three days' mourning in Kuwait and went to Bahrain in person to express his condolences. (R. Kuwait, Nov 2 [4]; R.

Amman, Nov 4-IMB, Nov 5). A Saudi Arabian condolence mission left for Bahrain on Nov 3 (Hayat, Nov 4). President Abdel Nasser cabled his condolences (R. Cairo, Nov 4-IMB, Nov 5). Gen. Ḥāḥis al-Majālī, the Jordanian Chief of Staff, visited Bahrain and delivered Ḥusein's congratulations to the new Ruler. (Fat. Jaz., Aden, Nov 20)

A commentator pointed to what he described as Shaykh Isa's precarious position in the face of local pro-Nasser trends, his inexperience and his relatively meagre budget. "Isa is as pro-British as his father... but if he is to maintain the connection he must learn to win his people's respect by being a wise leader—fast." (Topic, Nov 25; see also below: Anti-British Trends.)

The royal princes were reported to be demanding from the new Ruler an increase in their monthly salaries (the late Ruler had turned down this demand). (Akhbar Sa'ah, Cairo, Nov 22)

Other Changes in Government. (For composition of government, see MER 1960, p. 403.)

In March Shaykh Khalifah Ibn Muhammad Al Khalifah, Director of Police and Public Security, died at the age of 59. He was replaced by Shaykh Muhammad, son of the Ruler, who left three months later for the UK for training in military affairs. (Times, March 29; Hayat, June 9)

Nationalist Activities, Anti-British Trends; Attacks on British Forces. Visiting Bahrain at the beginning of the year, a New York Times correspondent remarked that the Ruler was certainly not being difficult with his British protectors but "British protection exacerbates the insistent demands for further independence, arising from the growing class of younger Bahraini who have been educated abroad." There were British military bases in the islands (see also p 90 a) as well as British merchants and civil servants and "they create a British colonial atmosphere." There were minor signs of the demand for change, as when some months ago the colonial Indian type of head-dress of the Arab police was changed because of Bahraini objections. The Bahrainis also took over the immigration department from the British (see below). The British were protecting the Ruler from his old rivals, the Rulers of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, as well as from Iranian claims. They were also protecting him from his own young men, but at the same time pressing him to train the same young men to replace his British civil servants. (NYT, March, 4)

Anti-British Trends; Attacks on British Forces. A report from Bahrain in March said that, every morning before dawn, patrols in Manama and Muharraq had to erase subversive slogans which had been put on the walls during the night. Illegal leaflets were circulated, some bearing the "ominous name" of the Committee of National Union which, "inspired by Communists and Arab nationalists," caused the disturbances of 1956. [The St. Helena prisoners, on whom see below, belonged to this Committee.] Since the autumn of 1960 there had been threatening developments. "Nasser-inspired forces" in Muharraq alone were estimated at 10,000. This "subversive movement" was sustained by broadcasts from Cairo and Baghdad, and also from Moscow and Peking, with the Ruler now their main target whereas in 1956 they had concentrated on the British. There was some tension between the Ruler and the British over the questions of the St. Helena prisoners and the Indian community (on both issues see below). Some observers believed that all the makings of a new outburst in Bahrain were visible. (Intelligence Digest, England, March 1961; also quoted by Sawt al-Arab, May 10 [13])

In Oct Baghdad Radio reported that a British aircraft had been blown up at Bahrain airport on arrival from Kuwait. Strict security measures had been introduced and Arab airport workers had been replaced. (R. Baghdad, Oct 9 [11])

A British statement on Oct 30 said a small explosion in the stores area of the Muharraq RAF station in Bahrain had occurred the previous night, causing minor damage but no casualties. This was the third of what were unofficially believed to be bomb incidents, all involving the RAF in the Persian Gulf. (Times, Oct 31)

In Nov Baghdad Radio reported that three British soldiers repairing their armoured car near Manama were overwhelmed by masked nationalists and forced to surrender their arms and equipment. A group of Bahrain youths were detained for questioning. (R. Baghdad, Nov 27 [29])

In Nov it was reported that after the death of the Ruler the struggle conducted by Bahraini youths against transforming the islands into major British bases, had gained new momentum. The movement was reported to be led by a younger brother of the late Ruler, Ahmad Al Khalifah, who had studied in Cairo and Europe. The British adviser in Bahrain had threatened to exile him from the island. A big fire had been started in one of the British bases in Muharraq, resulting in damage to several military vehicles. The Bahraini youths had distributed leaflets and the authorities had failed to discover the printing press. (Jihad, Jordan, Nov 9)

Immigration: Iranians, Indians. On Jan 27 the Bahrain Immigration Department was taken over by the government and became responsible for entry visas. British subjects and officials of the British government and of other foreign governments were exempted from this procedure (V. of A, Feb 20 [22]). This was interpreted as one of the signs of the Shaykh's inclination to assert his independence. (NYT, March 4)

The department was requested to "check the overpowering number of foreigners, particularly Iranians," who were "jeopardizing the welfare of Bahrain." (Gulf Daily Times, Feb 9)

The Indian community, especially in Manama, was reported to be "heavily Communist-infiltrated." There was a "well-established courier service between Indians in Bahrain and the Communist Party of India. The chief suspects are prosperous Indian merchants." The Bahrainis contended that the British were preventing the elimination of these "centres of subversion" for fear of difficulties with the Indian government. (Intelligence Digest, England, March)

Bahrain Political Prisoners in St. Helena (see MER pp 403-4). In a letter to the editor of The Times, dated Dec 30, 1960, the British Judicial Adviser to the Ruler of Bahrain protested against the suggestions made in the British press and by "some ill-informed members" in the House that if the prisoners were transferred to Bahrain, they would be treated cruelly there. The letter said the penal code in force in Bahrain since 1955 was based on English law, the courts were among the least harsh in the ME and elsewhere, and the prisoners there were treated fairly. The two prisoners in Bahrain convicted together with the three in St. Helena were given even more favourable treatment, and the ruler was incapable of any form of cruelty to those people. (Times, Jan 5)

In Jan the Lord Privy Seal, Edward Heath, and George Brown, deputy leader of the Labour Party, visited Bahrain and paid a visit to the Jidda penal island where these two prisoners were staying. They said they found them living in good conditions. (Times, Jan, 19)

On Jan 26 Mr Stonehouse, MP apologized in the House for his statement on Dec 20, 1960, in which he "adopted without consideration an intimation that [the prisoners] would have their heads chopped off" [if they were to be returned to Bahrain] (Times, Jan 27). Another apology for using this expression came from William Yates, MP, who on a tour of the ME went especially to Bahrain to see the Ruler. He said in future he would not criticize decisions of the Ruler but only those of "government advisers which I consider half-baked." He asked the Ruler to show clemency to the prisoners. He said he had no doubt that the exiles "would not be injured in any way here, and could apply for mercy through the Ruler, the only way for clemency." (Times, Feb 23)

There were further questions and answers in the House on Jan 30 (Times, Jan 31) and on Feb 8. On the latter date, the Lord Privy Seal said that the three prisoners had communicated their wish to be returned to Bahrain if they were not to be released. (Hansard, C, Vol 510, Col. 399-400, Feb 8)

In June the three men were freed after successful habeas corpus applications. On June 13, the acting Chief Justice of St. Helena ruled that the three prisoners, Abd al-Aziz Shamlan, Abd ar-Rahman al-Bakir and Abd al-Ali Alaywat, had been unlawfully detained in St. Helena and ordered that they be discharged and awarded costs (Times, June 14; Hayat, June 20). On June 19 the Lord Privy Seal said in the House that the court judgement had been based not on the ground that there was any defect in the men's original trial, but that the warrant under which they were transferred from the custody of the Ruler in 1956 was invalid. (Hansard, C, Vol 527, Col. 939-43, June 19)

The ex-prisoners arrived in England on July 14. They were reported to intend remaining in England for an indefinite period but in the certain hope that a government statement would be made about the payment of compensation to them. They had been issued with St. Helena passports, in which each was described as a "British-protected person of Bahrain, without consultation with Bahrain authorities." They were met by John Stonehouse, MP, who expressed his satisfaction at seeing them at liberty but protected from being returned to Bahrain "where they would have been imprisoned again."

Abd ar-Rahman al-Bakir told the press that it was the British government which really ruled Bahrain. He described the court that judged him in 1956 as "no court at all but a creation of the Political Resident." He said that Bahrain was in a state of feudalism which was supported by the British government. (Times, July 3, 15)

QATAR

Oil and Royalties. [Estimated crude oil production in Qatar amounted to 8.2m. metric tons in 1960 and 8.4m. metric tons in 1961. Royalties accruing to the ruler in 1960 came to $54m. (or $1,350 per head of the estimated 40,000 inhabitants).]

British Influence Reported Curtailed. [UAR sources reported throughout the year on a policy on the part of Shaykh Khalifah Ibn Hamad Al Thani, the heir apparent, of curtailing British influence.]

In Jan it was reported that Shaykh Khalifah had issued a decree terminating the services of the British adviser. (For similar information, see MER 1960, pp 406.) He had also changed the name of the "British adviser's residence" (ddr al-istishariyah al-britaniyah) to Government House, and had ordered that Qatar was henceforth to make its purchases in Arab countries instead of in Britain. He was considering inviting Arab economic advisers to replace the British. He had, for the first time, sent a delegation to represent Qatar at the Arab League cultural meeting. (Ayyam, Damascus, Jan 11; Akhbar Sa'ah, Jan 25)

In June it was reported that Qatar intended to demand the abolition of British inspection over its consular affairs. It also intended to abolish entry visas for nationals of Arab countries. (Ruz al-Yusuf, June 26)

At the end of the year, UAR sources reported that Shaykh Khalifah had been appointed Prime Minister and Minister of Finance and intended to reorganize the government with the aid of UAR experts. At his invitation, a UAR judge left for Qatar to take up a position as legal adviser. (V of A, Nov 9 [11]; Akhbar Sa'ah, Dec 6)

Reported Federation Plans. See above: British Policy in the Gulf and Reported Federation Plans.

Ruler Visits London. On July 4 Shaykh Ahmad Ibn Ali Al Thani, the Ruler of Qatar, arrived in London on an official visit. He was received by Queen Elizabeth and by Lord Home, the Foreign Secretary. (Times, July 5, 7; R. Baghdad, July 5 [7])

First Prince to Pursue Higher Studies. Prince Suhaym Ibn Hamad Al Thani, brother of Shaykh Khalifah, the Deputy Ruler, left Qatar to pursue higher studies at Cambridge. He was the first Qatar prince to do so and had been encouraged by his brother among others. (Akhbar Sa'ah, June 21)

Friendly Relations with the UAR. [See also above: the sympathetic UAR reporting on Shaykh Khalifah's alleged anti-British policies.]

Education; Cultural Relations. At the beginning of the year, the UAR university authorities agreed to accept unconditionally holders of Qatar secondary school certificates. The enrolment of Qatar graduates at UAR universities, and cultural cooperation in general, were discussed by the UAR Education Minister and Shaykh Qasim Ibn Hamad Al Thani, Qatar Education Minister, on July 19 in Cairo. (R. Cairo, Jan 28 [W, Feb 21]; MENA, July 19 [21])

A UAR education and press delegation attended a festival in Qatar on April 13. (Haqqiq, April 20)

Miscellaneous. In June Qatar Arabs were allowed to enter the UAR without visas. (MENA, June 26 [27])

A large delegation from Qatar attended the Egyptian revolution anniversary on July 23 in Cairo. (Ruz al-Yusuf, June 26)

Ruler Visits Cairo. On July 25 Shaykh Ahmad Al Thani, the Ruler of Qatar, arrived in Alexandria on a six days' official visit to the UAR [on his way from London—see above]. He was received by Zakariya Mubhy al-Din, the Minister of the Interior. He was expected to discuss the promotion of Arab solidarity between the two countries. On July 27 he was visited by President Nasser at As-Safar Palace, Alexandria. The President decorated the Shaykh and his son. The Ruler attended various ceremonies and toured industrial establishments. (Ahram, July 26, 28, 30, 31)

It was commented that the Ruler's visit (as well as the visit of the Ruler of Dubai during the same period) was apparently designed to find out whether the UAR would support their independence at a future date in case Britain released them from their treaty obligations. (Times of India, Aug 9)

Saudi Arabia: Ruler and King Saud Exchange Visits. On Jan 24 the Ruler of Qatar arrived in Riyadh on a three days' official visit. He was received at the airport by King Saud and the two rulers were "understood to have discussed... the strengthening of brotherly ties between the two Arab countries." (R. Mecca, Jan 24 [26]; Iraq Times, Jan 30)

On Feb 6 King Saud arrived in Qatar on a three days' return visit and was given a hearty welcome. (Falastin, Feb 7; R. Mecca, Feb 6 [8]; Hayat, Feb 11)

On March 25 [ex-ruler] Shaykh Ali Al Thani arrived in Riyadh as a guest of King Saud. (R. Mecca, March 25, 27 [28, 29])

In Dec authoritative sources in Riyadh said that contacts were taking place between Saudi Arabia and Qatar on the demarcation of the land and sea borders between the two countries. (ANA, Dec 22 [W, 28])

Loan to Lebanon? In Feb it was reported in Beirut that Qatar had agreed to grant Lebanon a loan for municipal projects in Tripoli, Sidon and Zahle. Lebanon aimed at raising a loan of L.E.5m (Hayat, Feb 24, March 1). [No report was received that the loan had been contracted.]

Ruler Visits Kuwait. On May 21 the Ruler arrived in Kuwait on a two-day visit to the Ruler of Kuwait. (MENA, May 22 [23])

Ruler Visits Jordan. On Aug 2 the Ruler arrived in Jordan for a four-day visit at the King's invitation. The Ruler contributed JD100,000 to the Jordanian armed forces, and JD3,000 to the charity associations in the Kingdom. (Falastin, Aug 2, 4; Jihad, Aug 3-5, 7)

TRUCIAL STATES

(See also above: British Policy in General)

The Government: Rulers and British Political Agent, as in MER 1960, p. 407. Political Officer in Abu Dhabi: R.D. Oliphant.

Trucial Council. The seven ruling Shaykhs were "loosely federated" through a Trucial Council [established in 1952, the same period as the Oman Scouts, under British advice] but, it was reported, each Shaykh "remains proudly independent and jealous of his neighbours" (NYT, Feb 23). Amman Radio referred to the Council which held semi-annual meetings under British supervision as an outcome of "secret attempts since 1945" to establish a kind of federation among the shaykhdoms. (R. Amman, June 18 [20])

Social and Political Change Seen. Richard P. Hunt, a New York Times correspondent who toured Trucial Oman at the beginning of 1961, remarked that for generations the people there had lived "on dates, fish and trade." Now there was oil (in Abu Dhabi), the beginning of farming (in Ras al-Khaimah) and trading (in Dubai—see heading below). Life was beginning to change rapidly and the territory was stirring with new ideas. Political change was brewing along with social change and those who knew the territory believed it inevitable that the stirrings of change would put the power of the shaykhs—who were still governing like patriarchs over their tribes—against some form of nationalism. (NYT, Feb 23)

British Policy; The Oman Scouts. The correspondent mentioned above described British policy in the territory and the role of the Trucial Oman Scouts. The British Political Agent, with residence in Dubai, acted as "a combination schoolmaster, referee, counsellor and foreign minister" for the seven shaykhs. The shaykhs were free to govern their countries and trade as they liked but they were not free to war against each other "as some would like to do," or to raid shipping, permit slavery and make treaties with other powers. "The Agent's job is to leave the shaykhs free to be good, but not to be bad. Under his paternal eye, they are encouraged to educate their people and to develop their countries. They are prevented from abusing their civil and religious power."

When rival shaykhs threatened each other, the Oman Scouts intervened. This force, which consisted of some 1,200 Arab soldiers commanded by British officers, had succeeded in pacifying the territory. In regard to tribal disputes, they mostly used traditional Arab peace-making methods accompanied by a show of force.

The scouts patrolled the desolate, roadless interior of the shaykhdoms to stop gun-running and contraband, pursue criminals and protect oil properties. They also continued to hold Buraimi oasis (see p. 429 b) and control the passes to Muscat and Oman in order to block the traffic in fighting men and weapons to the Omani rebels (NYT, Feb 24, 25 [2]). According to another source, the scouts also combated slave traffic. (Sunday Pictorial, June 18, 25)

Abu Dhabi, Dubai Rulers Visit London After Kuwait Crisis. In July the rulers of Abu Dhabi and Dubai visited London. Commenting on the arrival of Shakhbūt Ibn Sultān, Ruler of Abu Dhabi, for a six-day official visit, The Times said the Shaykh would be interested to hear British views on the future of the British-protected Shaykhdoms after the Iraqi claim to Kuwait (Times, July 18). In Nov the Ruler of Abu Dhabi conducted talks in New York with American oil companies concerning oil explorations in the amirate. (Hayat, Dec 13)

Contemplated Change in Political Status Reported. In Oct it was reported in Cairo that Sir William Luce, British Political Resident in the Gulf, was touring the Trucial States in order to convince the shaykhs to accept a new arrangement for relations with Britain. The proposed arrangement involved the signing of a series of agreements acknowledging the termination of British protection over the seven states, to be followed by new agreements which would tie their economies and defence to Britain, while internal affairs and government would be left to the shaykhs. (Akhir Sa'ah, Oct 18)

Issue of Iranian Immigration. Arab sources continued to complain of a flow of Iranian immigrants into the shaykhdoms. It was alleged that there was a design to turn the Arabs in the area into a minority. Iran would then claim these regions, on the basis of an Iranian majority. (Akhbar al-Yaum, Cairo, Oct 28; Beirut al-Masa', Nov 1)

Dubai, Ras al-Khaimah and Sharjah sent delegations to the Arab educational congress which opened in Cairo on June 25. (Hayat, June 26)

"Egyptian Cultural Mission in the Oman Coast." Its "inspector," Kāmil Abu Ghāli, was mentioned as visiting Qatar in April. (Haq'a'iq, Cairo, April 20; see also under: Sharjah)

Dubai Ruler Visits Cairo. On Aug 5 the Ruler of Dubai, Shaykh Rashid Ibn Sa'īd al-Maktūm, as well as his son and heir (on their way from London), arrived in Cairo on a two-week visit. They were received by President Abdel Nasser and visited various establishments and industrial plants. (R. Cairo, Aug 6 [8]; Eg. Gaz., Aug 6, 10, 13)

Oil in Abu Dhabi. [Drilling and building of oil installations in Abu Dhabi were continued by the IFC group (Petroleum Development, Trucial Coast) and, offshore, by Abu Dhabi Marine Areas (BP and CFP).] Exploitation was to start in 1962. (Petroleum Press Service, March, April)

"Officials in the Gulf" were reported to "express consternation at the prospect of Shaykh Shakhbūt getting oil money on a large scale..." He had "made a start by insisting on payment in hard cash." (Economist, Aug 19)

In July a representative of the Abu Dhabi government arrived in Jordan to recruit civil servants for the amirate. (Jihad, July 5)

Sharjah. The Deputy Ruler of Sharjah stated in April that there were 21 Egyptian teachers, male and female, in the shaykhdom. There were 500 boy and 300 girl students. (Haqaiq, Cairo, April 20)

Prosperity in Dubai. A New York Times correspondent described Dubai, a seaport city of 30,000, as one of the boom towns of the Gulf. The prosperity was the work of the ruler, Rashid Ibn Sa'id al-Maktûm, "a shrewd trader," in cooperation with his British advisers as well as "imaginative and flexible" Iranian, Pakistani and Arab merchants. Dubai had a $17m. yearly export-import trade, due to a considerable extent to dhow smuggling of merchandise to Iran, which had high import duties, and of gold to Bombay, which could earn the trader 40% of his investment within four weeks. The ruler was aiding the sea trade by keeping the harbour free of silt. He had revenues of about $700,000 a year and was building the largest city in Trucial Oman. Municipal services, land registration and schools were progressing rapidly and the town was patrolled by a smartly-uniformed police force. (NYT, Feb 24)

In Jan it was reported that the ruler of Dubai had announced the enactment of legislation giving the municipal council wider authority. (Gulf Daily Times, Jan 14)

Slavery. A report in a British paper alleged that an estimated 8,000 young men and girls were annually sold into slavery in the Trucial Coast. One of the sources was the Iranian littoral where children were captured by slave raiders from Trucial Oman who crossed the Gulf in dhows. The slaves were mostly sold into Saudi Arabia. Most rulers and notables in the territory had slaves whom they made no effort to conceal from the British representatives. The Trucial Oman Scouts fought the slave traffic and so did British gunboats on the Gulf; they had succeeded in raising the price of slaves but not in stopping the traffic. (Sunday Pictorial, June 18, 25)

R. P. Hunt in the New York Times wrote that "technically" slaves had been free for many years in the territory "but a few, usually, old family servants, are still discovering their freedom." About 30 slaves a year reached the British Agency and were manumitted. (NYT, Feb 24)

THE REPUBLIC OF SUDAN

(Jumhuriyat As-Sudan)

INTERNAL AFFAIRS

SYNOPSIS AND ECONOMIC SURVEY

SYNOPSIS

During 1961, while the military government—which comprised the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces—continued its previous policies, and while at least outward calm prevailed in the armed forces, civilian opposition to the military regime, which had come to the fore in the second half of 1960, became even more intense.

The independence of Sudan continued to figure as the main political idea advocated by the government; in its name, the government exhorted the people to national effort, unity and support of the regime. The Sudanese nation was depicted as Islamic in religion and cultural base, Arabic in language, and black African in nationalist identification; as previously there was no identification with Arab nationalism.

The reorganization of local government, begun in 1960, was completed in July. The government presented the scheme to the public as the basis of Sudanese indigenous democracy; the establishment of local and province councils was eventually to be followed by the constitution of a "central council." The scheme, government spokesmen declared, also aimed at involving the citizens in the affairs of government and at the decentralization of administration. The councils were established in March, all members being appointed by the government. All provincial "government representatives" who under the new scheme succeeded the governors and also presided over the province councils, were army officers. As already recorded in MER 1960 (p. 414), the opposition criticized the new set-up as regressive on the grounds that local elections which had worked well for 20 years, up to 1958, were now being abolished in favour of government appointments.

The reorganization of local government was followed by the appointment of a committee to study constitutional advancement, headed by Chief Justice Abu Rannat, who had also served as chairman of the commission which recommended the new local government scheme. It was directed to study the introduction of an electoral system for the local government councils and the formation of a legislative, the "central council"; both the provincial and the central councils were to be partly elected and partly appointed by the government.

Efforts to canvass public support included tours of the country by Gen. Abbud and other members of the government. Foreign policy events such as General Abbud's visits to both Moscow and Washington and President Brezhnev's visit to Sudan were also utilized to bolster the regime's prestige. In the economic sphere, stress was laid on the efforts in economic and social development (see Economic Survey, below).

The opposition to the regime comprised all sections of the public, traditional religious sects as well as trade unions, the party leaders of the former regime as well as the intelligentsia, students, manual and white-collar workers. Among the workers, especially in the railway and industrial centre of Athara, Communists were also active. In so far as the sources available indicated, the opposition was to the military regime itself, not to any specific policy of the government, except in the case of trade unions.

In February, the murder of Patrice Lumumba, the first PM of Congo (L), occasioned protest demonstrations by workers, lawyers, students, clerks and also by women during which anti-government slogans were shouted.

On June 17, in the course of a dispute over wages and social benefits which had started in February, the railways and Nile steamer workers, organized in Sudan's strongest unions, went on strike in defiance of the Labour Disputes Act of 1960 (see MER 1960, p. 411). Thereupon the government dissolved the Railway Workers' Union. The strike, which was reported to have been fairly effective, ended after a week. It was renewed on July 25, but under the threat of dismissal the strike crumbled after two days. Throughout this affair, the government employed a stick and carrot policy but ultimately acted moderately and most of the measures taken against the workers were withdrawn.

It was reported that the Ansār and Khatmiyah sects and the politicians of the former regime had become active among the unions, and especially the railway workers. Demonstrations took place in Umdurman on June 14 and 15, after the dissolution of the unions (though the reports available did not indicate a direct connection with this event); a Sudanese report at that time gave a picture of intense opposition activity in Khartoum. On July 11, twelve politicians of the former regime were arrested, and deported to the South; prominent among them were leaders of both the Ansār sect—Ummah party and the Khatmiyah sect and National Unionist Party. General Abbud charged them with "dark conspiracies," including the incitement of students, to reinstate the former regime. The arrests gave rise to another spate of demonstrations in the northern towns, though these had been banned, and many arrests were made. A serious clash between the police and demonstrators took place on Aug 21 in Umdurman when at least 12 Ansār youth and three policemen were killed. Siddiq al-Mahdi, the Imam of the Ansār, who had not been arrested together with the other leaders in July, was now placed under house arrest. Six weeks later the Imam died and was succeeded by his brother, al-Hadi. It was reported that the late Imam, who had repeatedly declared his opposition to the continuation of military government, had made a death-bed will in which he requested his successor to keep the Ansār organization intact and to work for democratic government; al-Hadi had vowed to continue where Siddiq left off "in the religious and nationalist fields."

Demonstrations of students of Khartoum university, ostensibly in support of the Algerian cause but in fact against the government, took place in November. When members of the students-council, said to have been members of the dissolved parties, were arrested, a students strike was declared which was also joined by high school students. Thereupon the authorities closed the university which was reopened only in January 1962.

In South Sudan the government continued its policy of Sudanization through the spreading of Islam and Arabic, while the activities of Christian missionaries were further curtailed. The government also took various measures to win the support of the South and provide public evidence of such support. Meanwhile Southern opposition took a new turn when a number of persons, described as intellectuals trained in missionary schools, sought political asylum in Kenya with the reported aim of establishing an exile-government that would strive either to achieve the South's complete independence or its autonomy in a Sudanese federal framework.

ECONOMIC SURVEY

NOTE: This survey follows mainly the Economic Survey 1961 published by the Sudanese Ministry of Finance and Economics, Khartoum, May 1962, and the Report of the Bank of Sudan for 1951.

The Sudanese economy in 1961 was marked by continuing development, and a sizable deficit in the current account of the balance of payments as a consequence of increased imports and stagnation in exports.

Population, Labour Force. The population of Sudan in 1961 was estimated at 11.9m.; the economically active population at 5.6m. Population growth was estimated at 2.8% per annum. According to the 1955/6 census, some 86% of the labour force was engaged in farming, animal husbandry, hunting, fishing and forestry, whilst 5.5% were employed in manufacturing and construction; up to 1961 only fractional changes were assumed to have taken place.

Gross Domestic Product. Gross domestic product in 1960/1 was estimated at £S357.2m.; £S187.2m. from the traditional section of the economy and £S170m. from the modern; it totalled £S347.8m. in 1959/60 and £S284.2 in 1955/6. The gross domestic product per head, however, was outstripped by population growth: it was estimated at £S29.95 in comparison with £S30.02 in 1959/60. Overall annual growth in the economy from 1955/6 was estimated at 4.7%, 6.5% in the modern sector and 3% in the traditional sector. During the same period, gross domestic product per head only rose by 2% annually because the population grew by some 2.8% annually.

The gross domestic product by economic sectors was composed as follows:

Composition of Gross Domestic Product by Economic Sector
(In percentages of total G.D.P.)

Sector	(*)
	1955/6	1960/1
a) Agriculture, livestock, forestry, fishing	61	57
b) Transport & distribution, banking	14	15
c) Mining, manufacture, public utilities	1	2
d) Building and construction	6	7
e) Crafts, domestic and miscellaneous, services, ownership of buildings	12	11
f) Administration and social services	6	8

* Provisional

Production. The production of cotton, the most important crop, fell 8%, from 2.95m. kantar in 1959/60 to 2.4m. kantar in 1960/1; the area planted remained about the same but the yield in the Jezirah was damaged by insects and dropped from 4.1 kantar per feddan in 1959/60 to 2.7 kantar. However, a large increase was expected in the 1961/2 season because yields were above average and further stages of the Managil extension were completed. Other figures for agricultural production in 1960/61 were incomplete.

As can be seen from the above table, manufacturing, mining and public utilities (mainly electricity) amounted to only 2% of the gross domestic product. Consumer goods formed some 80% of manufacturing output.

Foreign Trade. Sudanese exports stagnated, and were lower in value than in 1960 (£S62.2m. in 1961 as against £S63.4m. in 1960). This was due largely to the difficulties in disposing of the cotton crop; cotton exports declined and the value per ton of ginned Sald cotton fell 6% in comparison with 1960. There was also a fall in exports of gum arabic, the second most important product exported; groundnuts and American-type cotton and cottonseed exports rose.

Imports, on the other hand, increased £S17.8m. to the unprecedented level of £S81.5m. Thus the trade deficit amounted to £S19.3m. as against only £S0.3m. in 1960 and a surplus of £S9.7m. in 1959. The increase in imports resulted from the effects of high investment, an increased demand for raw materials and a higher demand for imported consumer goods caused by a rise in the means of payment.

Balance of Payments, Foreign Aid, Foreign Exchange Reserves and Debts. The adverse balance of trade mainly accounted for an unfavourable balance of payments, in contrast to the military regime's first two years in power.

The deficit in "Invisibles" accrued mainly from transport and travel, while the balance of interest payments was favourable to Sudan. The net income of £S6.1m. from official loans and grants resulted from drawings of £S8.1m. and repayments of £S2m., as follows:

The Soviet project-tied credit of £S8m. agreed on in Nov was not drawn upon.

At the end of 1961 the foreign debt was £S26m. The foreign exchange reserves decreased from £S58m. at the end of 1960 to £S32m. at the end of 1961, as they were used to cover the deficit in the balance of payments.

The Budget. The following are budget figures for 1960/1 and 1961/2:

THE BUDGET (in £Sm.)

	1961/2		1960/1
	Estimates	Actual	Estimates
Ordinary Budget
Revenue	56.2	63.1	57.0
Expenditure	47.9	48.2	50.3
Surplus	8.3	15.9	6.7
Development Budget	25.4	17.3	38.1
Overall Deficit	-17.1	-1.4	-31.4

The increase of close to $8m. in revenue over the estimate derived mostly from import duties (imports having risen more than foreseen), the sugar monopoly (world prices fell), and cotton profits (due to favourable prices obtained for most of the 1959/60 crop).

60% of revenues in 1960/1 were derived from indirect taxation and the sugar monopoly, as against only 2% from direct taxation; 15% of the remainder from the income of agricultural undertakings, interest, and dividends.

Expenditure in the 1960/1 budget of £S48.19m. was divided as follows: economic services—32%; social services—25%; general administration and other items—43%.

It was proposed to meet the overall deficit in the 1961/2 budget, deriving from the development budget, by foreign aid, the third instalment of the Aswan Dam compensations from Egypt—(together £S12m.), and drawings from government reserves. It was also expected that actual expenditure on development would fall below estimates, while ordinary revenue might again exceed them.

Monetary Development, Prices. Means of payment rose from £S40.8m. at the end of 1960 to £S48.3m. at the end of 1961; of this increase, £S4.2m. were bank advances to the private sector, of which £S2.4m. were advanced for financing exports. Means of payment were equally divided between currency on the one hand and deposit and quasi-money on the other.

In spite of this increase in means of payment, credit and money both remained tight. The rise was absorbed mainly by importers overstocking and delays in transport, chiefly between Port Sudan and Khartoum.

The tight money situation somewhat curbed the rise in prices. The cost-of-living index rose by nearly 6% in the first half of the year. This was attributed to the large inflow of foreign capital, spending by foreign technicians and the poor agricultural crop in 1960. Prices, however, fell again during the latter part of the year.

Investment and Development. Gross fixed investment in 1960/1 was estimated at £$43.1m. or 11% of the total national means of £$401.9m. in contrast to £$21.2m. or 7% of the total means of £$288.9m. in 1955/6.

The table in the left-hand column shows actual expenditure under the development budget in 1960/1 and estimated expenditure in 1961/2, the first year of the new 7-year economic and social development plan.

£$4.2m. of US development aid should be added to the figure for 1961/2, as this amount was not included in the budget.

The £$17.3m. actually spent in 1960/1 fell short of estimates by £$7m. and it was assumed that a similar pattern might occur in 1961/2.

While further stages were being completed of the Managil extension, work was to start on two new dams, Khashm al-Girba and Roseires; for the latter Sudan obtained $50m. credits on easy terms (see p 76).

Newly opened industrial establishments included an integrated textile mill, (Sudan American Textile Industry), said to be the largest of its kind in the ME, and a state-owned tannery, built by Yugoslavia, with a capacity to supply local needs and leave nearly 50% of the output for export. A training and development centre in leather trades, to be established by the UN Special Fund, was to assist in the development of a leather industry.

Projects under construction included the cardboard factory at Aroma. New projects approved by the government included plants for production of building materials, aluminium sheets, air conditioners, razor blades, drugs, perfumes and cosmetics, cardboard and paper, and tomato sauce. The Soviet credit was to be used to finance the construction of two grain elevators, plants for asbestos and cement, milk powder, dried fruits and onions, fish canning, and a cotton experimental station.

An industrial bank was inaugurated in Nov with an initial capital of £$3m.

VIEWS AND POLICIES

INTERNAL AFFAIRS

NOTE: The views and policies recorded here are supplementary to those quoted in MER 1960 (p 409); none of the latter was superseded.

NATIONALISM AND NATIONAL IDENTIFICATION

[The words nationalism (qawmiyah) and patriotism (watanīyah) were rarely used by Sudanese leaders nor were attempts made to define Sudanese nationalism. Basically, the Sudanese leaders advocated complete independence, and they gave the word "independence" meanings usually associated with "nationalism." At the same time there was a pronounced identification with African nationalism and practically none with Arab nationalism.]

These identifications were not made as specific declarations but as matter-of-fact statements in discussions of other topics. The attitude of the Sudanese to Africa as contrasted with their attitude to the Arab world was also brought out in President Abbud's joint communiqué with President Kennedy and PM Khrushchov, where African affairs were dealt with extensively and Arab affairs were not even mentioned.]

has been, and still is, the noble legacy for whose preservation we care now and which we shall guard for coming generations... The meaning of independence must be before our eyes in internal and external affairs, and it should leave a characteristic impress on all the work we do... In this way, the meaning of independence may become synonymous with the dignity of the citizens and the honour of all of us..."

"It was inevitable that the word independence should touch the souls of the citizens, doing away with envy and animosity, and making its imprint on their lives with the consequent release of their potentialities, and that all this should be reflected in the lives of the people, developing their economy and spreading progress, and causing the spirit of participation in public responsibility to grow in them." (R. Umdurman, Jan 1 [3])

Fostering Sudanese Nationalism. Anonymous author in Sudan, a government English language monthly, in an article on the Nubia monuments: "Excavation and survey will add to world history and will help instill confidence and cohesion to Sudanese nationality." (Sudan, Feb)

"Sudan's African Destiny." Ziyādah Arbāb, Minister of Education, on laying the cornerstone of Abbud Cultural Hall, Umdurman, Nov 17: [The building] "will be a confluence of three cultural streams, one emanating from Europe, the second... from the Middle East and the third... from Africa, the continent which has awakened to retrieve its old glory.

"...the destiny ordained by the fate for our country from the dawn of life... [in] merging the different cultures which come from other countries with the genuine African cultural legacy." (S. Daily, Nov 21)

Identification with the "Black Man." President Abbad in answer to a question by an American correspondent, Nov 1960: "I think that we [italics supplied] still need the help of the white men here in Africa, because they are more educated and advanced in technical and economic matters... The help of the white man is most important to the underdeveloped countries." Q. "You are following that policy here yourself?" A. "Yes..." (S. Daily, Jan 31)

National Integration—Through Development and Settlement of Nomads. President Abbad, Nov 17: "This overall development and economic programme should aim at safeguarding the integrity of the national structure... attention should be given to our... underdeveloped regions until the residues of the past are completely removed... For this reason we shall not rest so long as a great part of our citizens continue to lead a nomadic life away from... education and... medical care. We shall do all we can for their settlement..." (S. Daily, Nov 20)

THE POLITICAL REGIME

"The Revolution Originates With the People." President Abbad at Shendi, April 3 [?]: "In the name of the Revolution, the principles of which you cherish deeply in your souls and the aims of which originated in your souls... I affectionately greet you..."

"...what we have achieved, has been inspired by you..." (Sudan, May; the English text has been corrected here.)

The Failure of "Imported Democracy"; Indigenous Democracy Through Representative Local Government. President Abbad inaugurating the province councils, July 1: "Democracy is a philosophy of government which... has been practised by different countries according to their environment and requirements. It is no use to import a democratic system... without pruning it to our circumstances... The revolution came to save the country from the old regimes... [whose] imported parliamentary partisan system was about to drive the country into a deep chasm of instability..."

"...the absence of democratic institutions on provincial levels was the chief reason for the failure of democracy in the Sudan... In the middle sector between the local councils and the central government, public representation was lacking..."

"The present system [i.e. the new local government system] is surely [truly] Sudanese."

"We gave the base of the democratic rule, namely the local government councils, every care and attention."

"Today the first constitutional institutions on provincial level came into being."

"The broad line of the constitutional development which I will introduce involves the creation of a Central Council to be established with the present institutions in a pyramid, with the local councils as a base after introducing the local councils elections by a reasonable percentage system." (S. Daily, July 2)

The Tasks of Good Government. President Abbad, July 1: "... a good government is that which can realize the aspirations of [the] citizens for social justice, economic revival, internal stability, complete union of all national sectors and maintaining good relations with all countries of the world. When we came to power nothing of that existed... Then we started to build from the base..." (S. Daily, July 2)

Regime Bids for Public Support Through Development. Editor of Sudan, government English language monthly: The people "know that the revolution[ary] government intends to gain the support of the people through nothing but development programmes." (Sudan, May)

EDUCATION, RELIGION

The Goals of Education. Ziyāhah Arbāb, Minister of Education, Jan 1: "The aim of education in Sudan is to create a strong generation from both sexes to preserve their national legacy, religious culture and pride in their country and not to refrain from manual labour and handicraft." (S. Daily, Jan 4)

Religious Tolerance, but Guarding Against the Missionaries. The governor of Equatoria province, Feb 11: The policy of the new regime is based on the concept that "religion is for God and the fatherland is for all" (ad-din lillāh wa al-waṭan liljāmī), that religion is only a force which drives the people to become righteous citizens, who love each other and help each other justly and fear God. The government will not permit religion to become a cause for hate, disturbing the peace, and non-enforcement of the laws.

The government is on guard against those who might want to fish in muddy waters; it is aware of the actions of a fanatic religious group [the Christian missionaries], which respect neither any other's religion nor the law of the land. (Sudan al-Jadīd, Feb 15)

THE GOVERNMENT'S POLITICAL ACTIVITIES

THE GOVERNMENT

EFFORTS TO WIN POPULAR SUPPORT

[Tours of the country by the PM and cabinet members constituted one of the regime's principal efforts to win popular support.]

Touring the Provinces. President Abbud, accompanied by the entire High Command of the army, visited the Northern province from April 1-7, stopping at all the major towns. At Atbara, the main centre of railway and other organized workers in Sudan, he was received by the workers and told them: "We are ready to examine all complaints with justice and sincerity." In every place he was welcomed by the citizens; he conferred with leading local personalities.

In his speeches President Abbud stressed that the enthusiastic receptions tendered him were the most eloquent testimony to the popular approval of the revolution. He stressed the role of the revolution in the progress of Sudan and in the liquidation of its backwardness. He emphasized the decentralization policy which, he said, meant leaving the affairs of each province in the hands of the local people best qualified to understand their local needs. A recurring theme in his speeches was the need to develop the country, and he exhorted his audience to work hard and to combine efforts to this end. (R. Umdurman, April 3, 6, 7 [5, 8, 10]; Ra'y al-Amm, April 1, 6, 7, 8; S. News, April 15; Sudan, May)

Government officials said that the tour was in a large measure the result of local invitations to "come and see us." According to The Daily Telegraph the aim was to learn the workers' state of mind and that of the union men in Atbara and meet with tribal chiefs who still held a good deal of influence. Although the government was encouraging the movement away from tribalism, it appreciated the benefits emerging from maintaining good relations with tribal heads. Another unofficial aim, it was thought, was to remind the Northern Sudanese that there were in existence forms of political life other than those emanating from Cairo. (Daily Telegraph, April 4)

Maj.-Gen. Hasan Bashir Nasr, Minister of State for Cabinet Affairs and Deputy-Commander of the army, toured the Darfur province at the end of April. He met with members of the local councils and with the tribal chieftains and discussed with them the needs of their localities. He inspected the government services and promised to fulfil the various requests. (Ra'y al-Amm, May 4)

THE NEW PROVINCIAL ADMINISTRATION

[During the year the new provincial administration was set up, in accordance with the Act passed in Nov 1960 (MER 1960, pp 413-4). The new administration in each province was composed of (1) a Government Representative, (replacing the governor) appointed by the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces; (2) the Province Council, a legislative body, partly appointed by the central government and partly elected by the local government council from among their members; (3) the Province Authority, the executive, composed of departmental officers of the various ministries in the province.]

Aims: Establishing a Democratic Base, Civic Training, Decentralization. The aims of the new local administration system were set out by President Abbud and Brig. Maqbūl al-Amin al-Hājī, the Minister of Interior and Local Government.

President Abbud said on July 1 that "the absence of sound democratic institutions on [the] provincial level was the chief reason for the failure of the parliamentary system in Sudan." The "imported" democratic system of the previous regime had driven the country into chaos, as it was unsuited to local conditions. The revolutionary government was now inaugurating a Sudanese system of democracy, building from the base of democratic rule, namely local government. The next step in constitutional development, after the establishment of the local and province councils, would be the creation of a central council. However, this new system was dependent on the active participation of faithful and responsible citizens. (Sudan, July)

The active participation of the citizens in the responsibilities of government was also presented as an independent aim of the province councils. Brig. Maqbūl said: "It would be sufficient if these [provincial] councils achieve nothing except for involving the citizens in the affairs of government; it would be enough if they achieved not even one of the stated goals but awakened the provincial society and supplied the social and health services and the cultural needs of the citizens." (Ra'y al-Amm, June 13)

Another aim was decentralization. "Centralization," Brig. Maqbūl said, was "no longer a suitable pattern of government for this age, particularly in a wide and extensive country like the Sudan." (Sudan, July)

Ar-Ra'y al-Amm commented that it was hoped that "local inclinations" which had for a long time wished for a free hand to work for the progress of their regions would now no longer "feel a sense of bitterness and disappointment at being barred from the management of the affairs of their regions." (Quot. in S. Daily, July 3)

Santino Deng Teng, the Minister from the south, commented that the decentralization introduced by the new system had "finished" the demand of Southerners, for changing Sudan into a federation. (S. Daily, July 4)

Powers and Tasks of the Province Councils. The Minister of the Interior outlined the powers and tasks of the province councils, in accordance with "the Schedule of the Provincial Administration Act" [which was not available to the editor of MER] as follows: The councils were empowered to initiate and promote activities, to establish and maintain institutions in the fields of education, culture, social welfare, agriculture (including land reclamation, irrigation and drainage projects), public health and public works and to advise the central government on these fields. The province councils were also to approve the budgets of the local councils. The province council would constitute a body corporate and have financial independence. The council's revenue would come from appropriations in the general budget as well as from taxes and imposts payable directly to the council.

The province council and authority would be established by warrant of the central government which would also supervise their work and approve the provincial budget. Each minister would have the power to confirm, suspend or cancel province council by-laws and to supervise and inspect the council's activities in the fields pertaining to his ministerial responsibility.

Though the province councils were to be generally responsible for the promotion of local government, the local councils were to be autonomous. The provincial council would take over when a local council failed to perform its duties. (Sudan, July)

The councils were to convene three or four times a year. (S. Daily, July 19).

Composition of Provincial Authorities. On Jan 12 the Council of Ministers approved an act establishing the composition of the province authorities in the nine provinces. Each authority would be headed by the representative of the Ministry of the Interior, and the authority's secretary, and would comprise officials of the different ministries stationed in the provinces. For example, the following province officials would be members of the authority of the Northern Province: the health officer, the chief surveyor, the education officer, the supervisors of the private and government irrigation works, the veterinary officer, the engineer, the information and labour officer, and the financial supervisor. In other provinces other functionaries would participate, all in accordance with the special conditions of each province. (S. Daily, Jan 13)

Local Councils. On March 4 and 5 the Minister of the Interior made public the names of the 2,300 members of local councils. One hundred and seventy of them were appointed to the province councils. The appointment was for the year 1961; but at the end of the year the term was extended until June 30, 1962. (S. Daily, March 5, 6, July 2, Dec 19)

chairmen and their representatives in the province councils [but in fact they were appointed; see above]. The chairmen were to be ex-officio members in the province councils. (Sudan al-Jadid, March 27)

Provincial Councils. On June 12 were made public the names of 129 civilians who were appointed members of the province councils by the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces (full list in Ra'y al-Amm, June 13). The Minister of the Interior stated that the appointees represented all the different elements in the country (R. Umdurman, June 12 [15]). Two additional categories of council members were listed: The representatives of the local government councils who constituted 50% of the province council membership, and the ex-officio members of the province authorities. (Ra'y al-Amm, Dec 19; see also MER 1960, p 414)

The next day the province governors were appointed Government Representatives in the provinces, in which capacity they were to head the province authorities as well as the province councils. Their former deputies were appointed chairmen of the authorities as well as secretaries of the councils.

All Government Representatives were army officers: (1) Northern Province—Brig. Muhammad Mahdi Hämüd; (2) Khartoum—Brig. Awad Abd ar-Rahmân; (3) Blue Nile—Col. Hussein Ali Karrâr; (4) Kassala—Maj.-Gen. Al-Khawwâd Muhammad Ahmad; (5) Kordofân—Brig. Az-Zayn Hasan at-Tayyib; (6) Darfur—Brig. Hamad an-Nil Dayfallah; (7) Upper Nile—Col. Abdul Hussein Makhhrûs; (8) Equatoria Province—Brig. At-Tâhir Abd ar-Rahmân; (9) Bahr al-Ghazâl—Col. Ahmad Hasan Sâlim. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 13, 14; R. Umdurman, June 13 [15])

Activation of the New Administration. The province councils held their inaugural meetings on July 1. They elected by secret ballot their vice-chairmen—the chairmen being the Government Representatives—and had the inaugural speeches of the President and the Minister of the Interior read to them. The meetings adjourned the same day until an unspecified date. (S. Daily, July 2, 13). [Until the end of 1961 no additional meetings were reported.]

On Sept 1 the officers of the former provincial administrations took up their new duties: The governors (mudîr) became Government Representatives; the district commissioners and their deputies (mufattiḥ al-markaz, ma'mûr) became local government inspectors or executive officers. (Ra'y al-Amm, Sept 1, 2)

CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT

"Central Council" Promised. On July 1 and again in a speech to the nation on Nov 17, third anniversary of the military revolution, President Abdud announced a plan which, he said, was intended ultimately to lead to a permanent constitution. He said that he had appointed a committee to study and recommend the establishment of a central national council, which would be partly selected by the province councils and partly appointed by the government. The next step would be partial elections for the at present appointed province councils. (Ra'y al-Amm, July 2; Sudan al-Jadid, Times, Nov 18)

Public Enthusiasm at Prospects of Democracy. The Sudanese press, in commenting on the President's anniversary speech, concentrated on his promise to introduce the central council. Ar-Ra'y al-Amm wrote that the inroduction of a parliamentary system based on general elections was the aspiration of every loyal citizen. As-Sudan al-Jadid stated that "ours is by nature a democratic nation"; the people were full of joy when they heard that democracy "shall be restored to them in the purest and noblest manner"; they sang and danced and congratulated each other. (Quot. in S. Daily, Nov 20)

A foreign source said the majority of the Sudanese saw in Abbud's announcement the first step towards the termination of military rule. Observers in Khartoum pointed out that while the government was aware of its success, it knew that the regime could not continue indefinitely. (Sayyad, Beirut, Dec 7)

Al-Hadi al-Mahdi, who had succeeded Siddiq al-Mahdi as head of the Ansar sect, stated on Nov 28 that "the establishment of a national committee to study the question of a constitution is in line with our national aims. We hope that the committee will be organized on a representative basis." (Ahram, Nov 29; S. Daily, Dec 2)

The Constitution Committee. The composition of the committee and its directive were announced on Dec 27. It was headed by Muhammad Ahmad Abu Rannat, Chief Justice. The committee, the directive said, was to study the introduction of an electoral system for local government councils and to draft legislation for the formation of a legislative body. This body, the "central council," was to be partly elected through the province councils and partly "selected." (R. Umdurman, Dec 27 [29]; S. Daily, Dec 27)

SUDANIZATION

Protection of Sudanese Workers. The Department of Labour made arrangements for the opening of a section which would supervise the entry and exit of foreigners and their work in Sudan in an effort to protect the Sudanese officials; a number of ministries participated in these arrangements. (Sudan al-Jadid, March 1)

Promotion of Arabic. All foreign schools were informed that they must include the Arabic language in their curriculum; beginning from 1964 all foreign students studying in Sudan would have to pass the Arabic language examination in order to receive their diplomas. (Sudan al-Jadid, March 12)

The European languages section of Sudan radio introduced a series of broadcasts on the Qur'an for those who do not understand Arabic. (Sudan al-Jadid, March 12)

THE WADI HALFA ISSUE

[In contrast to 1960 when the Nubians of Wadi Halfa were protesting against their intended transfer from their region (MER 1960, pp 416-7), the year 1961 was comparatively quiet. Nubian delegations visited the Khashm al-Girba development area which was designated by the government for their resettlement. When they returned they indicated a positive attitude towards the proposed area.]

Government Attitude Toward Wadi Halfa Inhabitants. On Jan 4 Maj.-Gen. Tal'at Farid, Minister of Information, told a delegation of Wadi Halfa citizens that the government did not bear them any malice but appreciated their position and their sacrifice and would do everything to help them. He was ready to assist anyone who wanted to go to Khashm al-Girba to see for himself the splendid prospects there. (R. Umdurman, Jan 5 [6])

In Feb a Wadi Halfa delegation which had visited Khashm al-Girba reportedly said that they considered it to be "the best home" they could have. (R. Umdurman, Feb 9 [10])

Another delegation from Wadi Halfa met President Abbud on April 20, after having toured Khashm al-Girba. Their spokesman said that they now had confidence in the government's desire to help them find new homes. He said that the delegation would honestly tell the people what they had seen and especially about the fertility of the Khashm al-Girba region. (Ra'y al-Amm, April 22)

[The government proceeded with the development of Khashm al-Girba area all through the year.]

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE OPPOSITION

Liquidation of Sudanese Party Assets. On Jan 7 an amendment to the 1959 law on the liquidation of party assets was announced; it provided that any balance of assets over liabilities of political parties in the provinces were to be transferred to the Minister of the Interior on demand. (R. Cairo, Jan 7 [10])

COMMUNIST ACTIVITIES

[During 1961 the police continued to arrest Communists for distributing circulars or for other forbidden activities. They were brought to trial together with those arrested in 1960, and some were sentenced to long prison terms.

During the railway workers' strike the police uncovered an important Communist cell in Athara, the centre of the railway workers and of trade unions. Further investigations led to the arrest of members high in the hierarchy of the Communist party.]

In an interview with an American correspondent in Nov 1960, President Abbud said he did not feel there was any Communist threat in Sudan, particularly since the economic conditions had improved. He said there were about 30 to 35 Communists under detention. (Sudan, Jan 1961)

Trials and Arrests. On April 20 a military court in Wad-Madani sentenced Al-Badri Hasanayn to five years imprisonment for having been caught with Communist circulars in his possession in Aug 1960. On the same day Muhammad Salih al-Tarzi was brought to court at Athara on a similar charge. (Ra'y al-Amm, April 21)

Athara police uncovered Communist circulars on Sept 9 in a house in the Al-Faki Madani section. The police investigation resulted in the arrest of Yis Sharafi Hasan. (Ra'y al-Amm, Sept 12)

Two Communist Cells. On June 21 the police discovered a Communist cell in the Qubba quarters of Obeid and arrested Munsafa Abu Hasanayn and Sulayman Hamid al-Hajj, who had two Arabic typewriters, a printing press, and printed circulars in their possession. They were brought to trial on July 11. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 22, July 12)

On June 22 the police uncovered an important Communist cell at Aibara. In a bunker a typewriter, two mimeograph machines, paper and many circulars were found; the circulars were similar to those which were distributed during the railway workers' strike. Hundreds of copies of the Sudanese Communist clandestine magazine At-Tal'ah and other Communist literature were also uncovered. Uthman al-Hasan Muhammad Uthman, who was caught in the bunker, confessed, according to Ra'y al-Amm, that he was a member of the Communist party and that he had printed the circulars. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 23; Akhir Sa'ah, Cairo, July 19)

As a result of extensive investigations the police brought another 15 men before a high military court at Athara. Among those arrested were: Al-Hajj Abd ar-Rahman, a member of the central committee of the Communist party, and Muhammad Muhammad al-Hamad Salim, a member of the provincial committee and in charge of the financial affairs of the party in Athara. Among the other party functionaries were members of the Aibara city committee and members in charge of neighbourhood and professional cells.

Uthman was sentenced on Nov 6 to ten years imprisonment, reduced by the C-in-C of the armed forces to five years; Abd ar-Rahman and Salim to three years, and others to shorter terms, while two were acquitted. (Ra'y al-Amm, Oct 8, 11, 13; Sudan al-Jadid, Nov 7)

GROWING OPPOSITION TO GOVERNMENT

Lumumba Murder Demonstrations. A number of demonstrations protesting against the murder of Patrice Lumumba, the first PM of Congo (L), were held on Feb 14-16 in Khartoum by University students, lawyers, clerks, workers, secondary school students and women.

On Feb 15 The Sudan Daily reported a "terrific wave" of demonstrations had swept Khartoum. Several demonstrations proceeded to the Ministry of Information where the Minister, Tal'at Farid, exhorted the demonstrators to keep discipline and order as "soldiers of the Revolution." [According to the text published he did not mention the Lumumba issue.] There was also a demonstration in Umdurman.

Anti-government slogans were shouted during all except the women's demonstrations. (On the government policy regarding the Congo question, see p 152 h.) At the lawyers' demonstration in Khartoum on Feb 15 one of the lawyers attacked the Foreign Minister for siding with President Kasavubu against Lumumba's representative at the UN Assembly and criticized the government for granting permission to the UN to land on Sudanese airfields one day before Lumumba was murdered. The speaker was arrested and sentenced to six months imprisonment.

The police dispersed the demonstrators and arrested 19 persons, mostly workers and students; some were given four months jail terms, some suspended sentences, and one was given ten lashes. (S. Daily, Feb 16; Sudan al-Jadid, Feb 18, 20, 25, March 7)

Siddiq al-Mahdi Calls for End To Military Regime. On April 11 Siddiq al-Mahdi, the leader of the Ansar sect, told a Daily Telegraph correspondent in Khartoum, while disclosing the terms of a note which he had sent to the government the previous month, that the military regime "has performed a useful purpose but has now outlived it." (In Nov 1960 Siddiq al-Mahdi was the principal signatory to a memorandum calling on the military to hand over power to an elected civilian authority. See MER 1960 p 417.) Al-Mahdi added that he had not lost hope that the government would respond favourably to his approaches. He suggested that representatives of the army and the people should jointly prepare rules for elections. These could be administered during a transitional period by a caretaker government, appointed by the army and civilians. Al-Mahdi thought that after the end of the military regime "new political parties would emerge naturally." He threatened that if his note were ignored the possibility of "passive resistance" or of strikes might be considered. Nevertheless he said that he did not advocate violence. "I am the only man in this country who could raise a war or a rebellion," he added, "but I would not do it." He ended the interview by emphasizing that he was not against individuals in the government but against the regime itself. "I supported the regime with reservation from the start but on the understanding that it was temporary. My attitude has now changed because with my own eyes I see many wrong things happening. The army is seeking to retain power." (Daily Telegraph, April 12)

[The government did not react to this statement; its contents were not reported in the Sudanese press.]

Anti-Government Circulars and Demonstrations. Anti-government demonstrations took place in Umdurman on June 14 and 15; thirteen of the organizers were arrested, among them two workers, two clerks and a student. They were charged with harming national security. Eleven of them were given jail terms of three weeks to four months, two were freed. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 18, 23, 29)

Arrest of 12 Politicians and Aftermath. On July 11 in accordance with a resolution of the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces of July 9, 12 politicians of the old regime were arrested. They were flown to Juba in the Southern Sudan and lodged in officer hostels in a military camp. The arrested men were denied communication with the external world. They were: (1) members of the Ummah party: Abdallah Khalil, (former PM); Muhammad Ahmad Mahjoub, (FM); Amin al-Tawm, and Abdallah Abd ar-Rahman Naqdalh, (both Ministers of State); (2) members of the National Unionist party: Isma'il al-Azhari, (PM); Muharak Zarq, (FM); Muhammad Ahmad al-Mardi, (Minister of Local Government), (3) others: Shaykh Abdallah al-Mirghani, [a prominent member of the Khartoum sect] (MP); Abd al-Khalil Mahjoub (leader of the dissolved Communist Anti-Imperialist Front); Abd ar-Rahman Ibrahim Jibril; Ahmad Sulayman; Abd ar-Rahman Shakhur. (Ra'y al-Amm; Ahram; Hayat, July 12)

In a speech on the same day Gen. Abbud charged those arrested with placing their personal interests above those of the nation; he maintained that they had engaged in opposition activities which were not in the common interest; they had spread rumours to mislead the ordinary people and incite the students. Their only aim had been to realize their personal ambitions through bringing back the old regime. In spite of warnings they had persisted in their destructive activities, and had continued preparing their "dark conspiracies." They had interpreted the government's patience as weakness. It was therefore decided to arrest them. (Ra'y al-Amm, July 12)

"1958 Coup Completed." Al-Hayat commented that the arrest of the politicians had completed the bloodless 1958 military coup d'état. The Times commented in similar vein.

For the last two years there had been growing political unrest fostered by the officially banned parties who based their claim to power on their past achievements: The Ummah party pointed to the part it had played in securing Sudan's independence as well as to its active opposition to the military government; the National Unionist party based its aspirations on its victory in the 1956 plebiscite and its achievements in the Sudanization of the government.

During the last nine months, since the party leaders had petitioned the military to return to the barracks, the situation had grown even more serious. The railway workers' strike [for which see below], as well as opposition activities by the Ansār during the preceding weeks, had caused the government great concern. The Ansār and Khatmiyah sects had also become active in the trade unions, especially among the railway workers.

The government reacted by putting pressure on the Ansār men who had not paid taxes and confiscated some of their land. There were also disturbances between the government and the Communist Anti-Imperialist Front. (No details were given.) The arrests came as no surprise to observers, who had remarked on the dilemma which the Abbad government faced in reconciling its professed liberal intentions with the challenge posed by the resurgence of political activities. However neither Siddiq al-Mahdi, the leader of the Ansār, nor any of his closest associates had been arrested, perhaps, according to The Times, because an "earlier attempt" by the authorities to arrest Siddiq's son and brother had been thwarted by some of the Ansār. (Times; Hayat, July 12)

Demonstrations Forbidden. On July 11 following the arrests, the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces banned all forms of gathering in the name of youth organizations, the wearing of special costumes, marching in columns, the carrying or hoisting of flags other than the national flag, and the reciting of holy verses in a manner contrary to religion (Ra'y al-Amm, July 12). It was understood that this ban was directed against the young followers of the Ansār and Khatmiyah sects. (Akram, July 12)

Demonstrations Against the Arrests. Demonstrations started however immediately after the arrests. On July 11 demonstrators in Umdurman demanded the release of the "independence hero" [Ismā'il al-Azhari]. They numbered, according to a Sudanese newspaper, about 130. They were dispersed by force and ten of them were arrested and brought before a military court. Eight of the ten objected to being tried by a military court and refused to recognize its authority. (Ra'y al-Amm, July 23)

Other demonstrations took place in Umdurman on July 12 and 15 and on Aug 14; one of them was organized by a clerk and a student. (Ra'y al-Amm, July 26, 30, Aug 30)

In Obeid, a centre of the Ansār sect, a demonstration took place on July 28. The demonstrators came out of the mosque after the Friday prayers and shouted anti-government slogans. Many of them were arrested and brought to trial. Eight were sentenced to terms ranging from one to five years imprisonment. (Ra'y al-Amm, Aug 4, 13, 15, 18; ANA, Aug 8 [10])

Bloody Clash With Ansār Youth. The most serious clash

between demonstrators and the police took place in Umdurman on Aug 21 on the eve of the Prophet's birthday celebration (ma'lid an-nabi), when a group of youths of the Ansār sect marched from the tomb of Al-Mahdi to the Prophet's Birthday Square. According to an official statement they were marching "in an illegal semi-military procession under a religious guise." The police asked them to disperse but they refused; the police then used tear-gas. The demonstrators then attacked the policemen with clubs and knives and the police opened fire. 12 of the demonstrators were killed and 19 wounded [the number was apparently much greater]; three policemen were killed and five wounded. (S. Daily, Aug 23; Ra'y al-Amm, Aug 22, 23, 29; Akram; Hayat, Aug 23, 30)

[The immediate reaction of the government authorities was rather moderate.] Representatives of the province government attended the funerals of the demonstrators killed and expressed their sympathy to the bereaved families. The police began an immediate investigation but made no arrests. Only after the wounded recovered did the police arrest 34, but they were released on bail on Dec 18. (Ra'y al-Amm, Aug 23, Dec 19)

In contrast, the police placed Siddiq al-Mahdi, the head of the Ansār, under house arrest, and arrested 100 leaders of the sect. The government spokesman explained this step as a means of preventing Siddiq from inciting his followers to new riots. (Hayat, Aug 23)

Government sources reported that after the demonstration, Umdurman and the rest of the country were quiet; even the funeral of those killed had created no incidents. (Ra'y al-Amm, Aug 23)

At Khartoum University on the other hand, attempts were made to organize a protest strike. Two students were dismissed from the university for their attempt to organize the strike (Hayat, Aug 30). [No further details about the strike were reported, and it apparently did not take place.]

The head of the Khatmiyah sect, Ali al-Mirghāni, issued a public statement in which he expressed his regret for the "bloody events." He offered his condolences to the bereaved families and called on all to work for the good of the country; he declared that one of the most sacred duties of every citizen was to work for the security, peace and prosperity of the country. (Ra'y al-Amm, Aug 30)

Ansār Leader Dies, His Will Commands and His Successor Vows Continued Opposition to Present Regime. Sayyid Siddiq al-Mahdi, the Imām of the Ansār religious sect, died on Oct 2, from a heart attack. Born in 1911 to Abd ar-Rahmān al-Mahdi, he was the grandson of the founder of the sect, Mahdi Muhammad Ahmad, who led the Dervish revolt in 1882. He succeeded his father, who died in 1959, as head of the Ansār. He was president of the Ummah party that was in power before the coup d'état in 1958 after which political parties were dissolved.

President Abbad and all his ministers as well as Sayyid Ali al-Mirghāni, the head of the Khatmiyah sect, were among those who came to pay their condolences.

Students headed the funeral procession in which army officers carried the Imām's body, draped in the Sudanese flag. Many of the mourners fainted. (Mid. Mir., Oct 7; S. News, Oct 11)

Siddiq was succeeded as Imām of the Ansār by his brother, al-Hadi. From Cairo were reported the following details of the last will of Imām Siddiq, which had been received from the Secretariat of the Imām al-

THE OPPOSITION

Hadi: "During the last moments of his life Imām Siddiq confided the following to his elder son, Sayyid as-Sādiq al-Mahdi:

1. Our demand is the demand of the whole country: (a) General freedom, democracy and a representative system of government; (h) the Mahdi family have no specific demands for enmity with anybody; (c) you should uphold these demands whatever the cost may be; (d) the Ansār organization should continue intact; (e) you should be careful to maintain your relations with its followers and friends.

2. A five-man council should be formed to consist of Sayyids Abdallah al-Fadl, al-Hādi al-Mahdi, Yahya al-Mahdi, Ahmad al-Mahdi and as-Sādiq al-Mahdi. They should be united in looking after its religious and nationalist affairs. When you meet to select a successor, the selection must be endorsed by the Ansār.

When the council met before the interment of Imām Siddiq it was decided that in view of what were considered critical circumstances and to ensure the unity of the Ansār sect it was necessary to choose a successor forthwith. When Sayyid al-Hādi was chosen unanimously, he declared: "The great principles willed by my brother, the late Imām Siddiq al-Mahdi, and which the people agreed to support, will be my guidance. I will begin in the religious and nationalist fields (from) where Siddiq ended. I will raise the flag in the field and carry it forward. May God help me!" (Mid. Mirror, Oct 21)

Later in the month, Imām al-Hādi paid a visit to President Abbud. An official statement published some days later said that al-Hādi had expressed his thanks to the President for the government's participation in the mourning for and the funeral of the late Imām. The interpretation of this visit by some citizens, the statement continued, was "far from the truth." The meeting was cordial but no subjects were discussed which could give rise to such "misunderstandings" [on which the statement gave no details]. (S. Daily, Oct 30)

Students Demonstration; University Closed. On Oct 4 a student demonstration at Khartoum University expressed support for the struggle of the Algerian people. A number of students shouted anti-government slogans. The police dispersed the demonstrators; some were arrested and brought to trial. (Sudan al-Jadid, Nov 9)

The student's council requested the release of the detained students; instead the government arrested some of the members of the council. The number of the arrested reached 19; Akhīr Sā'ah reported that they had been members of the dissolved political parties.

On Nov 8 the students reacted by declaring a strike and on Nov 12 the authorities closed the university and the students were ordered to return to their homes. (Ra'y al-Amm, Nov 9, 10; Akhīr, Sudan al-Jadid, Nov 13; Akhīr Sā'ah, Cairo, Nov 22)

[By the end of the year the university was still closed.]

High School Students Join Strike. The students of the Technical Institute in Khartoum proclaimed a [solidarity?] strike on Nov 8. They were joined during the following days by students from more high schools. (Ra'y al-Amm, Nov 10; Sudan al-Jadid, Nov 13, 14, 15)

The Ministry of Education warned the students that unless they returned to their classes by Nov 16, they would not be able to return until Jan 1, 1962, and the authorities would consider their suspension from school; they would not be allowed to take their final examinations. (Sudan al-Jadid, Nov 13, 15)

In Nov the authorities decided to reopen the university on Jan 2, 1962. (S. Daily, Nov 23)

Other Opposition Trials. A military tribunal was set up to try the accused, Hamid Muhammad Uthmān and Abdallah Mustafa Hamad an-Nil, under article 4a of the Sudanese Defence Regulations of 1952, for offences against the State. The trial began on Jan 25. (R. Urduman, Jan 25 [25], Jan 25 [28])

On June 13 the High Court of Khartoum sentenced an engraver by trade to a year's imprisonment, for distributing anti-regime circulars, under article 4a of the Sudanese Defence Regulations. He was caught on July 27, 1960. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 14)

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PRESS

[Unlike 1960 which saw the press play an important role in the political struggle (see MER 1960, p 412), the year 1961 was comparatively calm.]

Al-Ayyām Closed Down. On Jan 16 the government closed the Sudanese paper Al-Ayyām, which had the highest circulation. The official reason given was that it had published an article which had harmed the good name of Sudan and insulted the diplomatic corps; this was a violation of the press law. [Bashir Muhammad Sa'id, its editor and author of the article, was one of the signatories of the petition presented to President Abbud at the end of Nov 1960 which requested that he terminate military rule. (For the petition see MER 1960, p 417).] (S. Daily, Jan 17; Times, Monde, Jan 18)

[Another factor may have contributed to the closing of the paper.] Muhammad Ali Bashir, chairman of the dissolved Railway Workers Union, and Muhammad al-Hasan Bashir, an Al-Ayyām correspondent reporting from Atbara, were charged in Aug with disseminating harmful lies. The correspondent published an interview with Muhammad Ali Bashir in which the latter charged the Railway Administration with interfering on behalf of a number of candidates in the election of the Workers' Union which was held on Jan 7. (Ra'y al-Amm, Aug 3)

Al-Ayyām was closed previously by the government in Dec 1959, but resumed publication in April 1960. (Times, Jan 18)

THE GOVERNMENT AND LABOUR

THE GOVERNMENT AND LABOUR

Registration of TUs. (See MER 1960, pp 410-3.) Three new trade unions—the Ministry of Education Workers, the Khartoum University Workers, and the Khartoum Municipality Workers—were registered in Jan, bringing the total number of unions registered so far to 26. (R. Cairo, Jan 22 [W 26])

Elections to Railway Workers Union. Elections for members of the council, secretary and president of the Railway Workers' Union were held on Jan 6-8. Later, Ali Muhammad Bashir, who was elected chairman, accused the Railway Administration of intervening on behalf of certain candidates. (Ra'y al-Amm, Jan 7-9, Aug 3)

Workers' Pro-Government Demonstrations. According to official information, in May labour unions twice demonstrated in favour of the government. On May 4 workers of the Central Electricity and Water Administration in Umdurman and Khartoum marched in a peaceful demonstration to the Ministry of Information and Labour, thanking the Minister for his efforts to find a solution to the conflict which had arisen between the Administration and the workers (R. Umdurman, May 5 [10]; Ra'y al-Amm, May 5). On May 11 the Khartoum Province [government] Workers' Union demonstrated in appreciation of the authorities' efforts to satisfy the workers' demands. The chairman of the union pointed out the loyalty of the members of his organization to the revolution. In reply Maj.-Gen. Ta'at Farid, Minister of Information and Labour, stated that his office was established to serve the workers, and he emphasized that the labour laws aimed at protecting the workers' interests, so long as the workers abided by the laws. (Ra'y al-Amm, May 12)

RAILWAY WORKERS' STRIKE

Workers' Demands. On Feb 7 the Railway Workers' Union raised a number of demands, and the Railway Administration began to examine them. (The demands were jointly worked out with the workers of the Department of Steamers in Khartoum.) (Sudan al-Jadid, Feb 8)

When by April 10 the Railway Administration had not responded, the union presented a memorandum to Muhammad al-Fadi, the director general of the Railways. It reiterated the workers' basic demands: (1) a wage increase of 45%; (2) a new evaluation of the workers' grading system; (3) retirement pension at the age of 60 for workers belonging to the insurance fund and retirement pension at the age of 65 for all other workers. The memorandum gave a detailed explanation of the reasons and causes which prompted the demands. (Ra'y al-Amm, April 12)

Fruitless Negotiations; Union Declares Strike to Start on June 17. The director general of Railways met with the representatives of the union on May 6 and 7. He rejected their request that he reply to their demands within a set time limit. A week later he failed to respond to a request by the union representatives to meet with them. Thereafter, on May 18 the workers informed him that they could not wait any longer and that they would have to take appropriate measures to achieve their demands; the responsibility for the consequences would rest with him. A few days later the union published notices calling for a strike. The director general turned on May 31 to the director of the Labour Department and requested him to arbitrate the dispute in accordance with the Labour Disputes Law of 1960 (see MER 1960, p 411).

On June 1 the Union notified the director general that on June 17 a seven-day strike would be declared. (R. Umdurman, June 7 [9]; Ra'y al-Amm, June 7)

Government Intervention. The director of the Labour Department responded to the request for arbitration and invited representatives of both sides to meet with him on June 3. He called the attention of the Union to para 16 of the Labour Disputes Law which forbids the proclamation of a strike after one of the parties had asked the director of the Labour Department to arbitrate. However, the union representatives did not come to the meeting. Three days later (June 6) Maj.-Gen. Ahmad Majdhub al-Bahari, Minister of Communications, entered the picture. He publicly warned the workers against declaring an unlawful strike (Ra'y al-Amm, June 7). On the following day he spoke of the harm a strike would do to the economy. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 8)

Following these developments the central committee of the Railway Workers went from Athara to Khartoum to meet with the director of the Labour Department. They were joined by the representatives of workers of the Department of Steamers. At the meeting of June 8, they maintained that the direct negotiations between them and the employer were not terminated, in accordance with art. 5 of the Labour Disputes Law [hence their failure to respond to the director's invitation]. The director of the Labour Department replied that the law forbids any strike threats. The meeting ended inconclusively. On June 9 the committee returned to Athara. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 8, 10)

In two statements issued on June 10 and 11, the Minister of Communications rejected the arguments of the union and advised the workers not to proceed with an illegal strike; he warned them of the legal consequences should they stop working. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 11, 13)

Attempts at Settlement. On June 11 an attempt was made at Athara to form a committee composed of public figures to attempt to arbitrate the dispute. But the Minister of Communications in his sixth public statement on the subject, issued on June 12, rejected the proposed arbitration; he maintained that as the matter had been brought before the Department of Labour, it alone was authorized to settle the dispute. He again warned the union not to declare the strike. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 13)

Dissolution of the Railway Workers' Union. On June 13 the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces decided to dissolve the Railway Workers' Union with immediate effect because of its "blatant defiance of the law" by declaring an illegal strike and because of the possibly adverse effects of such a strike on the economy. The Minister of Communications warned that legal proceedings would be taken against every worker who would strike. He assured the workers that the dissolution of the union would not affect the normal relations between the Railway Administration and the workers, that their rights would be protected and their grievances heard. (R. Umdurman, June 13 [15])

An Umdurman Radio commentary said the previous appeals and warnings issued to the workers by the government were not a consequence of panic but emanated from the government's responsibility, kindness and justice. The workers should have realized that the revolutionary government was capable of enforcing the law. The Supreme Council had acted as the surgeon who amputates the diseased member to prevent the spread of infection. The country would now proceed "in calm and tranquil conditions" to build its future.

The radio also reported that a number of trade unions had called on the railway workers to desist from the strike. (R. Umdurman, June 13 [16])

Politicians, Sects Said to Be Involved in Strike. An article in Ath-Thawrah quoted by Umdurman Radio on the day of the dissolution of the union gave a picture of widespread unrest, and connected the politicians of the former regime with the strike. It was no coincidence, the article said, that the streets of the capital should be filled with leaflets and the tea shops with politicians of the former regime. These men had attempted to use the workers to achieve their interests. The article referred to some incidents for which these men had been responsible, including the shedding of the "blood of farmers in Amber-Korti," and concluded that it was a pity that the workers should choose their friends among such men. (R. Umdurman, June 13 [15])

The Times later reported that the Ansār and Khat-miyah sects had become active in the trade unions and especially among the railway workers. (Times, July 12)

Official Denial of Communist Influence. At a later date, on Oct 10, the Minister of Communications denied, in answer to a question, any Communist connection with the railway workers' strikes and said: "The Sudanese are far from being Communists owing to the nature of their religion, their morals and the absence of class differences between them. If a few of them have deviated, I do not think that they would affect the activities of the State. The recent strikes occurred through misunderstanding, ignorance and chaos." (R. Umdurman, Oct 10 [12]) [No comments on this strike were found in the Communist sources under survey for MER.]

The Strike. In spite of the government's warnings, the strike began on the day it was set: June 17. According to the Minister of Communications, "the number of strikers in Khartoum, Port Sudan and Obeid did not amount to more than 10%." (It should be remembered that the centre of the Railway Union and its greatest strength was at Athbara.) (Ra'y al-Amm, June 18) [The steamers employees also went on strike.]

On June 19 and 20 the Railway Administration recalled the veteran workers who had left the railway, for a six-month period. The Minister of Communications reported a great response to this call, he also maintained that the number of strikers who were returning to work in Khartoum, Madani, Sennar and Kaveina was constantly increasing, 1000 engineering workers at "railway headquarters" were continuing work as usual.

The authorities announced the departure of individual trains and steamers and said on June 21 that trains were moving on proper schedule and that it was now possible to supply the public in all areas with all the necessities. (R. Umdurman, June 19, 20, 21 [21, 22, 23]; Ra'y al-Amm, June 20, 21, 23)

Minister of Communications at Centre of Strike. On June 22 the Minister of Communications arrived at Athbara where he discussed operational arrangements and methods to "deny saboteurs the opportunity to impede the programme of work or to create dissension in the ranks of the workers." A member of the Northern Province council addressed a public reception in the city square and stated that the workers had used the strike weapon many times as a means for obtaining their demands; the strike was not aimed against the revolutionary government. He asked the Minister to treat the workers' requests with consideration.

In his response the Minister recalled the development of events which culminated in the illegal strike, and assured his audience that the government would continue to care for the welfare of the workers. From there the Minister went to the railway workshops and met with the non-striking workers and praised their patriotism. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 23)

End of Strike. On June 24 the Minister of Communications announced that as of 10 a.m. all railway workers had returned to work, and that train operations were back to normal. [A-Ra'y al-Amm stressed particularly the return of the workers at Athbara.] (Ra'y al-Amm, June 25)

[No report has been found on the causes for the termination of the strike.]

The strike was reported to have been fairly effective. The trade unions were said to have threatened to continue their struggle. (Times, July 12)

Post-Strike Government Policy: "Stick and Carrot." [The government now took punitive as well as conciliatory measures. It imposed financial penalties on strikers on the one hand and promised improvements in working conditions on the other; it used moderate language in treating the strikers and the strike.]

On June 27 the government announced that for each day of strike, the workers would lose two days' pay. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 28)

On July 6 the Minister of Communications announced, at a press conference, that the government had decided to introduce many improvements for the workers, but he did not spell them out. He praised the conduct of the workers and pointed out that except for a small number of workers, the strikers did no harm either to public order or to security. The dissolution of the union was "the direct result of its error of declaring an illegal strike." But it was not to be ruled out that the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces would in future reconsider the issue. (Ra'y al-Amm, July 7)

The Strike Renewed. On July 25 a number of workers, especially those at Athbara, renewed the strike. The number of strikers was reported as 1,354. On the same day the strikers at Athbara demonstrated and shouted anti-government slogans. Sixteen persons were arrested and brought to trial. Four were acquitted on Aug 9, and the other 12 were given suspended sentences on condition of guarantees for good behaviour for one year (Ra'y al-Amm, July 27, 30 Aug 1, 10). On July 26 the Minister of Communications announced that any worker who had not returned to work on July 27 would be considered dismissed and that strong measures would be taken against him.

The threat proved effective, and on that day the majority of the strikers returned. The Minister of Communications announced that those who had not returned would be dismissed and punished. (Ra'y al-Amm, July 27, 28; R. Umdurman, July 27 [29])

Government Measures After Termination of Strike. [Even now the government continued to operate along the same lines as before; it promised improvements and punished strikers; ultimately however, it acted moderately and most of the measures taken against the workers were cancelled.]

On Aug 3 it was reported that many additional railway workers would be included in the pension scheme, in addition to the cost of living increase which was instituted by the Railway Administration.

The workers who struck were dismissed and ordered to appear before discipline committees. Most of them were reinstated, but they were denied the pay increases which had been recently granted the others. Among those dismissed was Ali Muhammad Bashir, chairman of the dissolved union, who was released from jail together with Mahjûb Uthmân, the secretary general of the union. (Ra'y al-Amm, July 29, Aug 1, 3, 4, 6)

In the end all the dismissals save the latter two were cancelled. On Aug 10 the Minister of Communications met at Atbara with representatives of the workers and the railway administration. He declared all dismissals as cancelled and assured the workers that the government was striving to improve their conditions. He also announced that Abu Bakr Ali Rida was named general manager of the railway administration, as the "service period of the former manager had ended" and he "was pensioned off." (R. Umdurman, Aug 11 [14]; Ra'y al-Amm, Aug 11, 25)

In Oct. in fulfillment of a promise made by President Abbud during his visit to Atbara to grant financial assistance for the schooling of workers' children, the authorities ordered the payment of £53,200 [recipients not reported] for scholarship grants for 788 children, at the rate of £5 2, 6, 10 and 15 respectively for each student in elementary, intermediate, secondary and higher institutions. (S. Daily, Oct 18)

THE SOUTHERN SUDAN

Synopsis. [The government continued to apply its policy of Sudanization in Southern Sudan through the spreading of Islam and the Arab language. At the same time the government further curtailed the activities of foreign Christian missionaries who were deemed an adverse force to the national integration of Sudan on the Islamic-Arabic basis.]

There was some evidence of continued political unrest; a number of political refugees fled the country and a Minister made a statement which implied that there was agitation for autonomy of the South in a federal framework. The government continued to take various measures to win the support of the South for its policies and to provide evidence of such support.]

POLITICAL UNREST, PACIFICATION EFFORTS, ADMINISTRATION

Southern Political Refugees. [Compared with previous years there were no reports of serious unrest in Southern Sudan.]

A Cairo source reported in March that since the beginning of the year eight persons had fled the Southern Sudan to Kenya. The last one was an important official by the name of William Ding who had asked for political asylum. The refugees were intellectuals who had received their training in the missionary schools. Their flight, the weekly claimed, was part of an imperialist plot carried out by the missionaries and the staff of their mobile hospitals in the south. Their aim was to establish a government of exiles whose task would be to separate the Southern Sudan from the North or to achieve autonomy for the South in a Sudanese federal framework. (Rux al-Yusuf, March 6)

An official Sudanese source said that complete security and stability reigned in Southern Sudan and that the flight of some Southerners to Kenya was caused by personal differences which had nothing to do with politics. (MENA, March 15 [17])

New Decentralized Provincial Administration. Claimed "to Finish" Federation Aspirations. In July Santino Deng Teng, the Minister for Animal Resources and a Southerner, said that with the introduction of the province councils (see above: The New Provincial Administration) "the call for federation is finished." Though the advocates of federation in the South really wished to tear the country apart, they clamoured for an opportunity to administer their affairs by themselves. This latter aspiration had now been realized throughout the country. (S. Daily, July 4)

Support Shown for the Government. [The Sudanese press often published reports to show the support of the Southerners for the government. Following is an example.]

In Oct it was reported that many delegations of citizens from Upper Nile province came to the Government Representative to convey their congratulations on the safe return of President Abbud from the Belgrade conference. "Each delegation expressed their appreciation of the President's activities at the conference, absolute support for the Revolution Government... had a letter addressed to Gen. Abbud and the leader of each delegation read his letter [to the Government Representative]." (S. Daily, Oct 5)

Local Government Activities. From time to time reports appeared on the work of the focal councils in the South. A meeting of the Yambio rural council, Equatoria province, was reported in Oct. In addition to routine procedure, this meeting adopted a proposal from the central government to set up a "fishing industry"; it heard a report from the inspector of village schools, was informed of the appointment of two representatives to the province council and confirmed the allotment of land for cotton cultivation. "All items... were discussed in an amicable atmosphere." (S. Daily, Oct 12)

A Visit to An Outlying District By the Military Ruler. Following is a detailed description of a one-day visit of the Military Ruler and Governor of Upper Nile province to Fangak, Zeraf district. Fangak, he pointed out on one occasion, was "not much heard [of] in the province headquarters" but now he had seen it and found it well organized.

He arrived early in the morning by steamer and he was received by the local officials, notables and the Nuer Umdahs who gave him a "bull name" in accordance with local custom and presented him with a bull; the governor in return gave them two bulls.

Making his round of local offices and institutions, he asked the district commissioner to present the patients of the local dispensary with gifts of grain.

At the market place the merchants complained of transport difficulties during the rainy season; the governor in reply urged them to form a "sort of a co-operative" to concentrate their buying and stocking of commodities.

Visiting an elementary school he urged that the [resident] pupils be provided with good food and clothing in order to attract more pupils from the villages. He asked that the pupils be given gifts of sweets. At another school he discussed transport problems, and suggested that local Christian priests would be preferable to foreigners.

At a meeting with officials and members of local councils including tribal chiefs, the governor expounded the advantages of the new provincial administration, especially the participation of the people in conducting their affairs.

In the afternoon there were three hours of tribal dances and in the evening films were shown by a mobile cinema unit which had accompanied the governor.

This was just one of a series of tours which the governor had planned, the report concluded. (S. Daily, July 19)

CURTAILING CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY ACTIVITIES

Abbud: Missionaries Oppose National Independence. On Sept 1 in his speech at the Conference of the Non-Aligned Countries in Belgrade, President Abbud said Colonialism "may also take the form of improper direction to the internal affairs of a certain country by means of conditioned aid or trade or imposed culture or religion. The resistance of missionaries to national independence is still fresh in many minds." (Doc. Belg., p 57)

Missionary Hospitals Taken Over and Medical Activities Curtailed. In July it was announced that the Ministry of Health had taken over missionary hospitals in Upper Nile and Kordofan provinces and in the Nuba mountains. The Ministry intended to terminate all missionary medical work everywhere in Sudan, except at Umdurman missionary hospital. (R. Umdurman, July 24 [W. Aug 10])

Missionary Activities Curtailed. In Oct a Dutch priest, an Italian nun and an American Protestant missionary were expelled from Sudan. In Nov two Verona missionaries were expelled after 24 hours' notice. Missionary schools, The Catholic Times reported, had been confiscated in Southern Sudan as far back as 1957 and no new missionaries were allowed into the country. No religious buildings were permitted to be erected and parents had to apply in writing to the police for permission to have children baptized. The application form had to be obtained from the district commissioner and the application itself had to be sponsored by the village chief, who was often not a Christian. Since Aug, it was reported, no missionary was allowed to leave the grounds of his mission without the permission of a district commissioner "who often lives hundreds of miles away." Permission to visit people who were gravely ill was granted only rarely. (Catholic Times, Oct 20; Univette, Nov 24)

SUDANIZATION; SPREADING OF ISLAM AND ARABIC

The Grand Qādi's Visits, Islamization. Mahjūh Ishāq, the Grand Qādi of Sudan, began on Jan 15 a 15-day tour of the Southern provinces. The Shaykh, it was reported, was received everywhere with great enthusiasm by the governors, the army, government officials, Qādis and other religious functionaries and local notables. Special prayers were offered for him; and he in turn distributed clothing and other gifts to the people. [A campaign against nudity was part of the Islamization effort; compare MER 1960, p 418.] He dedicated new religious buildings and expressed the belief that "the word of God would grow among the Dinka." At one place the Qādi was met by "a large number of Eastern Nuer chiefs" who had been "embracing Islam since [last] Sept."

Speakers on various occasions stressed such themes as the "importance of Islam as the national religion of Sudan." (S. Daily, Jan 15, 16, 24, 29, Feb 9)

When he returned to Khartoum Shaykh Mahjūh stated that Islam was spreading rapidly in the South and that encouraging the study of Arabic was an important means for spreading Islam. During his tour he had Islamized some 2,000 people. (R. Cairo, Feb 9 [11])

When the Shaykh met President Abbud he expressed the gratefulness of the population for the government's efforts on behalf of Islam. (Sudan al-Jadid, Feb 13)

The Qādi of Wau said that visits like that of Shaykh Mahjūh encouraged those working for Islam. He stated that in the Awil district alone more than 400 persons had been Islamized during the Shaykh's visit. (Sudan al-Jadid, Feb 20)

Establishment of Religious Institutions. In May Ali Baldu, the Governor of Equatoria province, announced that some 30 new khalwas (school and prayer centres) and 14 mosques would be erected in his province in addition to the 43 khalwas and 13 mosques already in existence. He added that an institute for religious studies would be established in each district. (Ra'y al-Amm, May 13)

In June it was reported that the government had decided to open a faculty of Islamic studies at Juba (Musawwar, Cairo, June 16). In Aug plans were announced for opening an additional nine institutes for Islamic studies. (Ra'y al-Amm, Aug 15)

Promotion and Supervision of Cultural Activities. In Sept the Government Representative in Upper Nile province appointed a committee for the promotion of culture with the aim to advance "the social mission" by the following means:

1. The unification of language to spread national consciousness;
2. Consolidation of national integrity;
3. Encouraging virtuous and good conduct.

For these ends the committee was to promote sport, public recreation facilities, music and art shows, and folklore. The committee was empowered to supervise all cultural activities in the province, to coordinate societies promoting "public culture" and to report on them to the authorities; committee members would become ex-officio honorary members of any such society. (S. Daily, Sept 28)

The Department of Religious Affairs selected a number of high school students from the South studying in Umdurman to serve as teachers of Arabic and religion in the elementary schools in Equatoria province. (Ra'y al-Amm, Oct 18)

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SYNOPSIS, VIEWS AND POLICIES

SYNOPSIS

Sudan continued to pursue a policy of "positive neutralism" or "non-alignment" while keeping out of international entanglements as far as she could. She utilized her non-aligned position for getting aid from both East and West as well as to bolster her international prestige, not least for internal political considerations. President Abbud participated in the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries where he took a moderate stand.

Sudan strove to develop cordial relations with both Communist countries and the West. President Abbud visited the Soviet Union in July and the US in October, while President Brezhnev of the USSR paid a return visit in Nov. While in his public utterances in the US Gen. Abbud spoke in praise of US economic assistance, US-Sudanese friendship and Sudan's confidence in the US's support for freedom, Sudan was nevertheless closer to the East in her attitude to international issues. This was made clear in the joint communiques of Gen Abbud with President Kennedy on the one hand and President Brezhnev on the other. Abbud and Brezhnev stated that their community of views on fundamental international questions provided opportunities for Soviet-Sudanese co-operation in the world arena. The Soviet government also endorsed Sudan's non-alignment policy. No such outright endorsement was included in the Abbud-Kennedy communique and a divergence of views was also discernible in regard to African affairs. On the German and Berlin questions, Abbud's attitude was non-committal in both documents. Like all Arab countries at the UN General Assembly, Sudan voted much more often with the USSR than with the US (64.1% against 24.8% of all votes at the 15th session; 56.8% to 18.4% at the 16th session). In this respect she was placed about halfway between Arab countries such as Iraq, the UAR and Morocco which had the highest voting coincidence with the Communist countries and those with the lowest, namely Tunisia, Libya and Jordan.

While US economic and technical assistance continued—some $13m. were programmed for US fiscal year 1961, and about $12. for 1962—Abbud obtained a $22m. credit in Moscow for development projects. A major achievement in the aid field was the $50m. agreement for the financing of the Roseires dam project through long-term loans on easy terms by the World Bank, the International Development Association and West Germany. The latter also continued to extend other important development and technical assistance.

More contacts were also established with the East European countries and the People's Republic of China. Close cooperation continued with non-aligned Yugoslavia which played an important role in Sudan's economic development efforts; the two countries established a joint-shipping line.

Sudan continued to be on good terms with the UK; the British-trained-and-equipped Sudanese army received a British gift of arms, and Sudanese army officers trained in Britain. The UK continued to be Sudan's most important trading partner.

Sudan continued to identify herself with Africa more than with the Arab world. No pronunciation on Arab nationalism was apparently made by the Sudanese leaders while they often emphasized Sudan's Africanness. Significantly, in Gen. Abbud's joint communiques with the Soviet and US Presidents, no mention was made of Arab questions—save for Algeria—nor of the Arab-Israel conflict while African questions figured prominently and in detail. At the Belgrade conference Gen. Abbud spoke of Sudan as an African, not as an Arab, country.

In practice Sudan kept out of inter-African as much as of inter-Arab affairs. She declined invitations to attend both the Casablanca and the rival Monrovia conferences. At the same time she promoted her relations with individual countries and especially with the UAR, her powerful neighbour, though neither on the Congo question nor in regard to the Casablanca group did she follow the UAR's lead. Sudan was the only Arab country, besides the UAR itself, which by the end of the year had not yet recognized the Syrian Republic which had seceded from the UAR.

As for other ME and African countries, relations continued to be closest with Ethiopia. Various contacts were established also with other African countries.

VIEWS AND POLICIES

[Note: The views and policies recorded here are supplementary to those quoted in MER 1960 (p 421); no change in declared policies was discernible. For Sudanese views and attitudes on world issues see under The Belgrade Conference, and also President Abbud's joint communiques with President Kennedy and PM Khrushchov, below. On Sudanese identification with African nationalism, see above: Internal Affairs, Views and Policies. It may be noted that along with other neutralist leaders, President Abbud discontinued the use of the term "positive neutralism," resorting exclusively to "non-alignment."]

Sudan Respected By Neutrals and East and West. President Abbud, Nov 17: "The Sudan is no longer a mere space on the map of the world but has become a powerful state whose friendship is sought by world nations."

"The Sudan appeared to the world in its true face. It was trusted in Moscow, appreciated by the leaders who met in Belgrade and supported in Washington, and so the true worth of the Sudan has been well established all over the world. When I toured the East and the West I wished that you were with me to share the pride I felt, the appreciation I received and the praise I heard on your behalf." (Sudan News, Nov 27)

The Policy of Non-Alignment and Anti-Colonialism. President Abbud, addressing President Brezhnev of the USSR, Khartoum, Nov 16: "We in the Sudan... keep the doors of our markets open to all. We stretch a hand of friendship to all countries irrespective of their political and social systems, and support the liberation movements and independence of nations, because we strongly believe that by so doing we shall contribute to the alleviation of world tension and strengthen the foundations of peace." (S. Daily, Nov 17)

African Union—A Project for Future Generations. President Abbud in an interview with an American correspondent, Nov 1960: "At present every country in Africa must make itself economically and industrially sound.

And after that we may think of a United States of Africa." But he said in answer to further questions that he did not think union would come about during his lifetime. (Sudan, Jan 1961)

"Duty of Spreading Islam in Africa." In an article on al-ma'had al-ilmī (institute of Islamic and Arabic studies) of Umdurman, Sudan, the government monthly, said that it was the "historic duty" of Sudan to spread Islamic culture among the peoples of Africa. Sudan claimed that al-ma'had was the "largest institute of Islamic culture in Africa south of the Tropic of Cancer" and ranked second only to Al-Azhar of Cairo. It was established in 1912 and in 1943 it engaged teachers from Al-Azhar in order to raise the standard of teaching. In 1955 a Religious Affairs Department was formed which enabled al-ma'had "to meet its developing responsibility in spreading the Islamic culture amongst Sudanese and other African people." Al-ma'had's certificates qualified their holders to enrol for shari'ah studies at the Faculty of Law, Khartoum University, while graduates of its "higher section" were also accepted at Al-Azhar. During the current year Al-Azhar had made available to Sudan 30 scholarships, ten of them to al-ma'had graduates. Al-ma'had had foreign students from Nigeria, Somalia, Morocco and Southern Arabia. June 8], June 6 [W. 15]*)

On Aug 5 Emperor Haile Selassie inaugurated in Addis Ababa a social club, Sudan House, which he said would further strengthen Sudanese-Ethiopian ties of friendship. He also expressed his gratitude to the Sudanese people for their help in the liberation of Ethiopia 20 years ago. The Ethiopian Herald commented that "the pattern set by the Sudan and Ethiopia [in] regarding boundaries as points of friendship is worthy of imitation . . . particularly [by] African [nations]." (Ethiopian Herald, Aug 6, 8)

COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

USSR

[The two main events of the year in the relations between the USSR and Sudan were the visit of President Abbud to the USSR in July and that of President Brezhnev to the Sudan in Nov. The visits were accorded wide publicity by both Sudanese and Soviet news media as symbols of the growing friendship between the two countries.]

Trade Protocol. A Sudanese trade delegation visited the Soviet Union in Jan, and on Jan 9 a trade protocol was signed in Moscow extending for another year the trade agreement of March 16, 1959. The protocol provided for an increase in trade for 1961 to twice the value of the trade in 1960. [The 1960 trade protocol had also envisaged a 50% increase over the preceding year from £S2 million to £S3 million—see MER 1960, p 79.] The USSR was to supply equipment and machinery, railway rails, timber, textiles, wheat, sugar, cement and other goods, in return for Sudanese cotton, oil seeds, raw hides and other traditional Sudanese exports. (R. Moscow in Arabic and Tass in English, Jan 9 [SU 11])

Following this announcement press reports appeared that the Russians would export arms to Sudan. This was denied on Jan 11 by the Sudanese Minister of Commerce and Industry. An editorial note of the BBC monitoring service said that Moscow Radio in its Arabic broadcasts on the protocol had used the word iād [atād] which means equipment but has also the secondary meaning of "munitions"; Tass in English on the same day however said "equipment." (BBCM, Jan 12)

On Nov 1 a trade agreement covering the period 1962-64 was signed at Khartoum, stipulating a further increase in Soviet-Sudanese trade. The signing took place during a prolonged tour of Sudan by a Soviet trade delegation. (R. Umdurman, Oct 9 [W, 12], Nov 1 [3]; R. Moscow, Nov 2 [W, 9])

A Soviet Visit. Vladimir Semenov, the Soviet Deputy-FM, held talks in Khartoum in Feb, while on his way to a conference in Addis Ababa. (ANA, Feb 5 [7])

Congratulation on the First Space Orbit. by Maj. Gagarin (April 12), were sent to PM Khruushchov by President Abbud. Commenting on the flight, Brig. Maqūl al-Amin al-Hājj, the Minister of the Interior, said: "The Russians, in their forty-year old resurrection, have won the space race; would it not be possible that the Sudan in a shorter period may win a race that humanity never conceived before." The Russians, he said in another statement, would "no doubt direct the knowledge thus obtained to the good of humanity, because they are advocates of peace and love." (Sudan, May)

A Sudanese Visitor. Muhammad Uthmān al-Yasin, the Sudanese Deputy-FM, visited Moscow in April on an inspection tour of Sudanese missions abroad. He was received by Soviet FM Gromyko among others. (R. Moscow, April 4 [SU, 6]; Tass, April 7 [SU, 10])

President Abbud's Visit to the USSR. The announcement of the Soviet invitation to President Abbud to visit the Soviet Union was made in Dec 1960 (see MER 1960, p 79) and the visit took place between July 17 and 27. President Abbud was accompanied by the Ministers of Foreign Affairs, Public Works and Mineral Resources, Finance and Economy and Agriculture, Irrigation and Hydro-electric Energy. Beginning July 19 talks were held with Soviet government leaders headed by President Brezhnev and including First Deputy-FM Mikoyan, FM Gromyko, Marshals Rokossovsky and Grechko and senior officials in the economic and cultural fields.

The Sudanese party toured Tashkent where they met with Muslim functionaries and attended the Friday prayers at a mosque together with "5,000 Muslims."

They then went to Sochi where on July 22 President Abbud met PM Khruushchov who was vacationing there. The Sudanese party also toured Leningrad before returning to Moscow on July 25. (Pravda, Sudanese Press, July 18-27)

A joint communiqué by Presidents Abbud and Brezhnev on July 26 expressed mutual agreement on "such questions" as "general and complete disarmament" [compare with Abbud-Kennedy communiqué below] and the prevention of the spread of nuclear weapons to the African continent. As to the German question, the Soviet side set forth its views regarding a peace treaty while both sides agreed on the urgent need for a peaceful settlement of the problem. The communiqué sharply condemned colonialism "in all its forms and manifestations" with special reference to Angola, "imperialist intervention" in the Congo, the "intrigues of French ruling circles" regarding Algeria and French military action in Bizerta; it also denounced racial discrimination in the Union of South Africa, South West Africa and Mozambique, Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Both sides affirmed their "historic duty" to continue their support of the movement for independence in Africa. The Soviet government declared that it "fully understood the national policy of Sudan" and appreciated its policy of neutrality and non-alignment with military blocs. Both sides considered that their community of views on fundamental international questions provided opportunities for Soviet-Sudanese cooperation in the world arena. Finally, the communiqué declared that in response to a Sudanese request the USSR had agreed to extend economic and technical assistance in the construction of a number of industrial projects and in organizing the training of workers and technicians. (Pravda, July 28)

[The communiqué made no mention of Arab questions other than Algeria, nor of the Arab-Israel conflict.]

President Brezhnev's Visit to the Sudan. The Soviet President paid a return visit to Sudan from Nov 15 to 22. President Brezhnev's entourage included Deputy-PM Malik, Deputy-Minister of Foreign Trade Semichastnov, Deputy-Chairman of the State Committee for Foreign Economic Relations, I.V. Arkhipov, and the Head of the Near East Dept. in the Foreign Ministry, V.I. Kiselev.

In addition to meetings with Sudanese government leaders and attending the usual state functions, the Soviet visitors were present at the celebrations marking the third anniversary of the Sudanese revolution and toured the country. On a number of occasions President Brezhnev made brief speeches which usually compared Sudan's current efforts and tasks to those of the Soviet Union in its early pioneering days and extolled Soviet accomplishments in spheres of economic construction which the Sudan had just begun to tackle. On Nov 20 Umdurman Radio broadcast a translation of an address by Brezhnev to the Sudanese people in which he described Soviet achievements since the Revolution and outlined the programme for the construction of Communist society as adopted at the 22nd Congress of the CPSU. He also dealt with the Soviet viewpoints on peaceful co-existence, world disarmament, a German peace treaty, colonialism, apartheid and finally with relations between the USSR and young states in Africa. Soviet-Sudanese relations, he declared, could serve as an example for Soviet-African cooperation. (R. Umdurman, Nov 14, 15, 20 [15, 16, 22]; Tass in English, Nov 15, 17, 18 [17, 20, 21]; Pravda, Nov 15-18, 20-21, 23; Sudanese Press, Nov 14-23)

On Nov 21 Presidents Abud and Brezhnev signed an economic and technical cooperation agreement (see below for details), and issued a communiqué which reaffirmed their positions as set forth in the Moscow communiqué of July 26 (see above). They noted with "great satisfaction" the further development of friendly relations and the strengthening of economic links between Sudan and the USSR. (Tass in English, Nov 22 [24]; Izvestia, Sudan News, Nov 24)

Economic and Technical Cooperation Agreement. Following President Abud's visit it was reported that the USSR would make available to Sudan a $22 million credit for various development projects (see also table: International Economic Assistance to ME countries). Umdurman Radio commented that this provided further evidence of the correctness of the Sudanese government's policy in accepting unconditional assistance from any country regardless of its social system; Soviet-Sudanese economic cooperation was "undoubtedly based on mutually honest intentions" (R. Umdurman, Aug 1 [3]). The agreement was signed in Khartoum on Nov 21 on the occasion of the Brezhnev state visit to the Sudan. (Tass in English, Nov 22 [24])

In Nov it was reported that Soviet experts had left Khartoum for the Northern province to study the technical aspects of constructing a fruit-canning plant. (R. Umdurman, Nov 28 [30])

According to an unconfirmed Egyptian report Sudan had made a request for the supply of Soviet aircraft and rockets under the economic aid agreement. (Akhir Sa'ah, Nov 22)

THE GERMAN FEDERAL REPUBLIC

Military Relations. On his way home from the UK Maj.-Gen. Hasan Bashir Nasr visited the GFR from March 22-28. On arriving in Khartoum he said he had "discussed various matters, the results of which will be seen shortly." (Ra'y al-Amm, March 23; R. Umdurman, March 28 [29])

In June the GFR joined with the World Bank and the International Development Corp. to provide a $30 million loan for the construction of the Roseires dam. The GFR's part was $19.5 million. (See table: International Economic Assistance to ME Countries.)

In July it was reported that the GFR was considering the granting of a £57.5 million loan for railway development. (S. Daily, July 25)

On Nov 25 a GFR industrial exhibition was opened in Khartoum in the presence of President Abbud and

Dr Hans von Merkatz, the GFR Minister of Federal Council Affairs (S. Daily, Nov 26). President Abbud accepted an invitation conveyed to him by Dr von Merkatz to visit the GFR sometime in 1962. In Dec, the exhibition buildings were handed over to the Sudanese government as a gift. (SNA, Dec 12)

Otto Bach, the President of the West Berlin parliament, visited Sudan in Dec. He announced an offer of 15 scholarships for technical studies in West Berlin. (Sudan al-Jadid, Nov 25, 27, 29, Dec 4)

In Nov Brig. Irwah, the Minister of Commerce and Industry, in an interview over German television, expressed appreciation of West German cooperation in such Sudanese projects as the sugar refinery, the Sennar dam electricity project and the building of irrigation canals in Managil. (R. Umdurman, Nov 28 [30])

The Sennar hydro-electric project, to provide 25,000 kwh., was being financed and executed by a consortium of three firms, two German and one British. The first stage was inaugurated in April. (Sudan, May)

An agreement between Sudan and German contractors for the construction of a sugar refinery had been signed on March 2, 1960. The refinery, to cost £55 million, was being constructed at Genaid, 130 km south of Khartoum. (Sudan, Jan)

THE UNITED KINGDOM

On Jan 16 Sudan and the UK signed an aviation agreement. (S. Daily, Jan 17)

Deputy-Army Chief Visits Britain; Military Aid. Maj.-Gen. Hasan Bashir Nasr, Deputy-C-in-C and CGS of the Sudanese Army, paid an official visit to the UK from March 12 to 22 at the invitation of Field Marshal Sir Francis Festing, CIGS. (Times, March 13, 14, 17; Sudan News, March 15, 30)

It was reported that Bashir Nasr made the following requests, that: Britain grant Sudan a £20 m. loan, the British government use its influence on British capital to increase its investments in Sudan, the West display a greater interest in the financing of the Roseires dam and Britain arm a new mechanized unit and form an air force and a military transport service. (MENA, April 20 [22])

Following the visit Sudan received a British gift of military equipment. It included four Provost jet training aircraft, six Saladin armoured cars and twelve Ferret scout cars; these arrived in Khartoum in Oct. (Times, April 6; Sudan News, April 15; S. Daily, Oct 8; R. Umdurman, Oct 25 [W Nov 2])

A British correspondent in Sudan reported earlier that the Sudanese army was equipped with British arms. During the Congo crisis Sudan had accepted armoured carriers from the UAR as well as from the USSR (compare MER 1960, pp 156 and 79); Gen. Abbud however had said: "We know and like British arms and do not particularly want to change." (Daily Telegraph, April 4)

On Nov 7 at the ceremony of officially handing over the arms, Maj.-Gen. Bashir Nasr said: "We consider this gift a symbol of the traditional friendship between our two countries which we are both doing our best to consolidate and promote." (Ra'y al-Amm, Nov 8; S. Daily, Nov 8)

In March it was reported that ten Sudanese officers were training in the UK. They were the last of 50 officers who had been training there during the last two years. (S. Daily, March 22)

President Abdudd said in a speech in Nov that Sudanese pilots had been trained in the UK (and in Yugoslavia). (Sudan News, Nov 27)

A Minor Diplomatic Incident occurred in Nov, when the Sudan Progress Report, which was to be issued on Nov 17, the third anniversary of the revolution, contained a passage expressing disappointment at "Kuwait's call for help from the colonizers, our number one enemy"; a reference to Kuwait's call for British military assistance in face of Iraq's claims on the country. It was reported that the British Chargé d'Affaires had expressed a strong unofficial objection to this passage. It was understood however that the passage had crept into the report without the knowledge of senior officers and steps were being considered to remedy the situation. (Daily Telegraph, Nov 15)

Visitors, Miscellaneous. A British firm participated with two German firms in the financing and construction of the Sennar hydro-electric project designed to provide 25,000 kw. The first stage of the project was inaugurated in April. (Sudan, May)

The Duke of Edinburgh made a stopover in Sudan on Dec 14-15 (on his way home from Tanganyika) to visit the Wadi Halfa antiquities. He had a short meeting with President Abdudd and the members of the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces. (SNA, Dec 15)

THE UNITED STATES

Military Relations. In May two Sudanese officers, commanders of military schools, toured US army installations. (Ra'y al-Amm, May 2)

President Abdudd's Visit to the US. On Oct 4 President Abdudd arrived in Washington, accompanied by five ministers (a sixth had preceded him), on an 11-day state visit to the US. He had received the invitation on April 20. [Abdudd had been invited to the USSR in Dec 1960 and the visit took place in July.] He flew in President Kennedy's aircraft which had been sent especially to Sudan. At the airport he was received by President Kennedy and was given full military honours.

The two presidents conferred twice, and on Oct 6 they issued a joint communiqué. The document said the two presidents had a most cordial exchange of views; they shared a common concern for the preservation of world peace, and a common reliance on the UN; they agreed on the importance of reaching, through negotiations, solutions to existing disputes especially when the right of self-determination was involved.

President Abdudd stressed the importance of rapidly implementing the right of self-determination throughout Africa. President Kennedy expressed satisfaction with the African peoples' political gains and stated his hopes for further progress.

President Abdudd explained that Sudan's policy of non-alignment was designed to strengthen her independence and to enable her to play a constructive role in resolving tensions. President Kennedy confirmed that the US endorsed the determination of the newly independent countries of Africa to maintain their independence.

President Kennedy drew attention to the struggle of the people of West Berlin to preserve their independence and to the US's determination to support them. President Abdudd confirmed that Sudan attached great importance to a peaceful solution of the question consistent with the legitimate expectations of the people of Berlin and of Germany.

The two presidents were in complete agreement as to the importance of the early conclusion of a nuclear test ban agreement based on an effective system of inspection and control. They also agreed that efforts should be continued in the field of general disarmament.

President Abdudd explained the steps Sudan had been taking to promote economic development and social justice in accordance with an integrated national plan. The two presidents agreed that talks should continue between their advisers with a view to expand their co-operation in key areas in which the US could most effectively assist in Sudan's self-help efforts. President Kennedy accepted an invitation to visit Sudan "whenever his presidential duties permit." [Arab questions and the Arab-Israel conflict were not mentioned. Compare this communiqué with that of Gen. Abdudd and President Brezhnev, for which see above.] (S. News, Oct 11)

It was reported that Abdudd desired US economic support for the following projects: a Khartoum-Port Sudan highway, a Sudanese international airline, a sugar refinery and a plant to manufacture sacking.

Although expressing his gratitude for some $53 million in US economic aid in the five years since Sudan's independence, Abdudd told the press that he would also continue to accept Soviet assistance, in fact any assistance public or private, as long as this did not interfere with "our principles and policies."

In his public utterances President Abdudd spoke of the "deep affection and close friendship" between Sudan and the US and expressed the Sudanese people's confidence in the US tradition of fighting for and supporting the independence and freedom of peoples everywhere.

Washington observers were quoted to the effect that Abdudd's visit was unusual in that "there are no conflicts" between his country and the US. The New York Times commented: "Arriving apparently with neither hat nor complaints in hand, he appeared to be a man free of pressure."

On Oct 6 Abdudd left Washington for California, Chicago and New York, and after participating in the UN General Assembly session he left the US on Oct 16, again making the journey in President Kennedy's plane. (NYT, Oct 5, 6, 7; Ra'y al-Amm, Oct 3-17; Sudan News, Oct 11, 16; Dept. of State Bull., Oct 30)

US Economic and Technical Assistance. In an interview with an American correspondent in Nov 1960 President Abdudd said: "The help that we have received [from the US] has been very useful... But... American routine... needs to be hurried... It is too slow. There is too much routine... We should like to have quicker and... more aid." In answer to a further question the President said he could give no example of aid from another country received any faster. (S. Daily, Jan 31)

[According to figures available to the editor new agreements on US aid in calendar year 1961 totalled $46.6 million. (For details see table on Foreign Assistance, p 76.) This sum does not include the $0.9 million for the Khartoum-Port Sudan road project (mentioned below), as this sum might have been made available from funds previously approved. A sum of $8 million listed in the afore-mentioned table was approved in the calendar year 1960 and has therefore also been excluded here.]

US aid programmed for the US fiscal year 1960 amounted to $13.0m. and for 1961 to $11.0m. of which $3.4 m. was to be surplus food under PL 480. (US Senate, Committee on Appropriations; Foreign Assistance for 1962, Washington 1961, pp 298, 300)

According to Sudanese statistics, drawings from US grants in 1961 amounted to £53.9 m. ($11.2 m.) (Economic Survey 1961, Ministry of Finance and Economy, Khartoum, May 1962)

Total US aid to Sudan up to Oct 1961 was said to have amounted to some $53 million (see above: the Abbad visit).

According to a [US?] review, US dollar grants totalling $22 million—£57.68 million—had been made available to Sudan through USOM from 1958 to Oct 1, 1960. These grants were especially designed to alleviate the foreign currency shortage which was acute at the time the programme started. Sudanese importers were enabled to draw upon the dollar fund for government-approved imports, by depositing Sudanese pounds into a special government-controlled fund; these monies in turn were used to finance development projects. The total of approved import applications had reached £56.9 million and some £50.8 million had remained available for future development schemes. (Sudan, Feb)

Among the many USOM activities special attention was given in Sudan to the survey by an American team of the projected Khartoum-Port Sudan road on a budget of $900,000. This project was started shortly after President Abbad's visit to the US. (See e.g. S. Daily, Nov 15)

OTHER NATO AND WEST EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

Austria. An Austrian trade delegation visited Sudan in Jan. (Sudan, Feb)

Belgium. The murder of Patrice Lumumba, the first PM of Congo (L), occasioned a number of large-scale demonstrations against "Belgian imperialism" and for the freedom of Congo; the government's Congo policy was also attacked (see p 469 a).

It was reported that because of the Lumumba murder Sudan would not take part in the Brussels International Exhibition [it opened in April]. (Sudan al-Jadid, Feb 27)

In Aug Maj-Gen. Ahmad M. al-Bahāri, the Minister of Communications, paid an official visit to Belgium. He visited industries, including an ammunition factory, as well as dock-yards. (S. Daily, Aug 27)

On Sept 27 an aviation agreement between Switzerland and Sudan was signed in Khartoum. (Ra'y al-Amm, Sept 28)

YUGOSLAVIA

Economic Aid, Technical Cooperation, Trade. In Jan a Yugoslav economic delegation headed by Sery Kragjer, the Minister of Foreign Trade, conducted talks in Khartoum (Tanyug, Jan 7 [EE 9]). Sudan and Yugoslavia signed a trade and economic cooperation agreement and a payments agreement; they exchanged notes on an understanding regarding the credit agreement and the agreement on scientific and technical cooperation signed in 1959. (S. Daily, Jan 4, 16; Tanyug, Jan 7, 18 [EE 9, 19])

Yugoslavia supplied the plans, machinery and experts for the establishment of a cardboard factory at Aroma in the Gash area. The agreement was signed in 1959. The factory, with an annual capacity of 4,000 tons, was to start production in 1961. The Sudanese personnel would be trained in Yugoslavia. (Sudan, Feb)

Yugoslavia assisted in the preliminary work for establishing a tannery envisaged by the Sudanese government and designed to enable Sudan to dispense with leather imports. (R. Umdurman, March 27 [W 30])

A first shipment of 2,000 tons of Sudanese iron ore left for Yugoslavia in March. [This was Sudan's first commercial export of iron ore.] (R. Umdurman, March 3 [W 9])

Yugoslavia played a major part in establishing a Sudanese shipping line. The Sudanese authorities consulted Yugoslav experts on shipping questions, maritime laws to be enacted, the building of harbours, etc. The two countries established a joint shipping line, the Sudan Maritime Lines, with a capital of £280,000 equally shared by the two countries. Two ships were built in Yugoslavia at a cost of £51.5 million; the money was provided by the Yugoslav government as a loan repayable over eight years. The first ship, Sennar, was launched in Sept. The Sudanese crews were to be trained in Yugoslavia. (Sudan News, June 1, Oct 11; S. Daily, June 5; Sudan, Oct)

YUGOSLAVIA

In June three Sudanese officials left for Yugoslavia for a course in farming techniques. (R. Umdurman, June 13 [16])

During Sept Maj.-Gen. Ahmad Majdhûb al-Bahâri, Minister of Communications, visited Yugoslavia "to discuss further expansion of economic cooperation." A "cultural agreement" [yearly working plan?] was signed in Khartoum on June 19. Yugoslavia enlarged the number of scholarships offered to 20, while Sudan offered two for studies in Arabic and the history of

Sudan at Khartoum University. (Ra'y al-Amm, June 20)

Four Yugoslav students arrived in Khartoum in Oct. (Ra'y al-Amm, Oct 20)

On Nov 17 the corner-stone was laid of the Abbud Cultural Hall [centre] in Umdurman; it was planned with the assistance of the Yugoslav Ministry of Education and was to be built under the supervision of a Yugoslav architect. (S. Daily, Nov 21)

Military Aid: In Nov Admiral Mate Jerkovic, Commander of the Yugoslav Navy, attended the inauguration ceremonies of the Sudanese navy at Port-Sudan. Four patrol vessels were delivered. One of these vessels was donated by Yugoslavia and the rest were built with the help of Yugoslav experts. Their crews were trained in Yugoslavia. (S. Daily, Nov 16, 22)

THE ARAB REPUBLIC OF SYRIA

(Al-Jumhuriyah al-Arabiyyah as-Suriyah)

SYNOPSIS

INTERNAL AFFAIRS AND FOREIGN RELATIONS

On Sept 28 Syria was reestablished as an independent state by a military coup d'état which effected Syria's secession from the United Arab Republic, three years and eight months after Syria and Egypt had established the union. (On the coup d'état and its background, see synopses, pp 605 ff.)

Syrian politics during the following period were influenced by three principal factors:

1) The real power remained in the hands of the military who had reestablished Syria's independence and appointed its first government. The army conceived it their political task to act as the guiding spirit of the nation and arbitrator behind the scenes, and did not participate in the government. They opposed the revival of political parties, and advocated national unity. The officers were, however, divided among themselves; less than 2 months after the coup, one of its leaders, Lieut.-Col. Haydar al-Kuzbari, was arrested by his fellow officers.

2) A potentially explosive division developed between the left and the right. The coup d'état was a reaction to both what the Syrians called "Egyptian domination" and to the policy of "Arab socialism." Though the left too had opposed the perpetuation of the union in the form that it had taken, the coup was essentially a reaction by the right. On the other hand, the left had been considerably strengthened under the union. Indeed, among the workers, the peasants and the lower middle classes pro-Nasser sentiments were thought to have remained strong after the secession, primarily because they had begun to enjoy or had been given hope of enjoying new benefits through such measures as the agrarian reform and the July decrees (see p 601). The left intended to safeguard these benefits, and to expand them; the right wished to rescind or amend some of these measures and reestablish a free economy. The only hope for a stable government thus lay in an accommodation between the left and the right, which was insisted upon by the army. The transitional government endeavoured to steer such a course, significantly calling it "Arab socialism," for, it declared, it recognized socialism as the dominant trend. But the general elections in December, which were conducted on the pre-union system, returned to Parliament a large rightist majority which thereafter showed much less inclination to compromise with the left.

3) The question of Arab unity continued to occupy the Syrians. The Syrians had long prided themselves as the vanguard in the struggle for Arab union. Under the UAR local Syrian nationalism had grown, but Arab nationalism had remained strong. Now that Syria had broken up the union, many Syrians clearly had a bad conscience. Also, as already mentioned, many Syrians retained strong sympathy for Abdel Nasser who in spite of the setback he had suffered remained the foremost Arab leader, and who manifested the utmost hostility to the Syrian "secessionist" regime. Thus, as before the union, Syria's internal politics were liable to be strongly affected by questions of Arab nationalism, and Syria's orientation within the framework of inter-Arab relations.

No dominant personality emerged on the Syrian scene. The affairs of state were in the hands of the politicians of the former republic, and the army junta, composed of officers ranking from major to brigadier, who remained for the most part anonymous.

Chronologically, events unfolded as follows:

By noon of September 28 the majority of the military and civilian authorities in Syria had expressed their adherence to the insurgent officers (who called themselves the Supreme Arab Revolutionary Command of the Armed Forces). Aleppo Command and Latakia garrison remained loyal to the UAR throughout the day, but before midnight they too joined the insurgents. In Damascus there were apparently anti-UAR demonstrations in the morning, and pro-UAR demonstrations in the afternoon, when communique No. 9 of the insurgents conveyed the impression that the revolt was being ended and unity preserved. Palestinian refugees were reportedly conspicuous among the pro-UAR demonstrators.

On the morning of September 29 the Revolutionary Command announced that it had charged Dr Ma'mun al-Kuzbari to form a government that would restore constitutional conditions. Kuzbari was regarded as a moderate rightist; he had family connections with a partner in the "Company of Five," Syria's foremost industrial concern which had been recently nationalized. Prominent among the ministers were conservatives—former members of the Watani and Sha'ab parties as well as bankers.

The government quickly restored the symbols of independence, giving the republic its name and restoring its former flag and anthem. On Oct 1, three days after the coup, the Revolutionary Command announced the appointment of Maj.-Gen. Zahr ad-Din, a Druze, as C-in-C of the Armed Forces. At that time and during the next few days new chiefs were appointed to the security services and police.

On September 29, immediately after the establishment of the provisional government, the Syrian Republic was recognized by two of its neighbours, Jordan and Turkey. President Abdel Nasser reacted by breaking off diplomatic relations with these two countries, thereby instituting a diplomatic blockade of the new Republic. In a speech on October 5, however, Abdel Nasser lifted the blockade, and soon recognition followed by the world powers—Soviet Russia preceding the US—and Arab as well as other countries. On October 13 Syria was readmitted to the United Nations and on October 28 to the Arab League.

Some unrest continued for a few days after the coup. There were apparently pro- and anti-UAR demonstrations, and clashes with armed terror bands. Peasants in the Hauran were also reported to have resorted to fighting in defence of the UAR; in all other pro-UAR manifestations "foreign mercenaries"—probably a reference to the Palestinian refugees—were again said to have been prominent. The government closed the schools and the universities, among other security precautions. A week after the coup, however, the country had calmed down, and on October 4 the night curfew, imposed on September 28, was lifted. (The schools stayed closed for several weeks, the universities until mid-December.) Summing up the situation some days later, a foreign observer described the atmosphere as one of "relief rather than rejoicing."

The support of the parties for the revolution was practically unanimous. While the parties were not allowed to reestablish themselves, their leaders could now envisage their return to power from which they had been barred under the UAR. On October 2, 16 prominent politicians signed a statement in support of the revolution. They included all the Syrian ministers present in the country who had signed the union document in 1958, and represented all the parties except for the Communists and the Nationalist Social Party (PPS), who, however, also vigorously supported the secession from the UAR. Only inside the Ba'ath party was opposition to the secession reported, though the document was signed by two of its most prominent leaders, Bitar and Hurani. Expressions of support were also heard from the Alawi and Druze communities, Kurds, religious functionaries and various organizations. The attitude of organized labour to the new regime, on the other hand, was rather lukewarm.

The policies of the new regime were outlined in statements by the government (September 29 and October 17) and the Revolutionary Command (October 2): The statement of October 17 sought to establish a doctrine of "Arab Socialism." There was to be "true socialism," "true democracy" and "true and comprehensive Arab unity," in contrast to the allegedly falsified concepts propagated under the UAR; elections to a constituent assembly were to be held in four months; the rights and benefits enjoyed by workers, peasants and the lower income groups in general would be protected and extended; agrarian reform would be continued but the owners compensated fairly and injustices redressed; a system of "controlled economic freedom" would be established; private enterprise would be encouraged for the benefit of the economy, and free currency convertibility introduced. In the face of the general opinion that the government was rightist, and Cairo's violent attacks on Syrian "reaction", both the government and the army took care to reassure the workers and peasants that they meant to protect their rights. They also took practical steps to demonstrate their concern. Ownership certificates in the framework of the agrarian reform were distributed in Now, and various means of assistance were extended to the peasantry which had been severely hit by three consecutive years of drought. Decrees were issued providing for a representative each of workers and employees on the boards of directors of joint stock companies (similar to the UAR July decrees), and granting workers various benefits. At the same time the government took various steps towards a liberalization of the economy, notably the lifting of import restrictions. The nationalizations effected under the UAR, were not, however, rescinded. The confidence of the economic circles in the new regime was apparent in a pronounced rise in bank deposits, attributed to the return of Syrian capital, and in a marked appreciation in the Syrian pound.

In the sphere of Arab nationalism, the government presented a project for a loose Arab federation, two weeks after the coup. The plan was generally thought to have been prompted by considerations of internal politics. Cairo's reaction was hostile, other Arab countries were non-committal, and soon the issue faded out.

On November 9 the government's middle of the road approach was formally endorsed by some 60 leading politicians—representing all parties save for the Communists and the Nationalist Social Party—who, under the prodding of the army, signed a "National Charter." The charter was to serve as the basis for both an agreed election programme and a temporary constitution. It endorsed the project for an Arab federation, but otherwise concentrated upon economic and social questions, thus reflecting the main issue in Syrian politics, namely, the conflict between the left and the right. The charter detailed policies which would protect and enhance the rights and benefits of the workers and peasants, and at the same time reestablish a liberal economy, encourage private enterprise and protect and compensate landowners. The question of nationalization was not mentioned.

The signing of the charter set the stage for the promulgation of the temporary constitution (November 15). The constitution provided for a Constituent and Parliamentary Assembly to be established by general elections, and for a President of the Republic with executive powers, to be elected by the Assembly, and to be assisted by a cabinet. The provisional constitution was to be submitted to a referendum.

The elections and referendum took place on December 1. Ten days earlier a caretaker government for the election period had been formed under Dr. Izzat an-Nus, the former Minister of Education. The elections were conducted according to the law of 1949, with some amendments. The constituencies remained identical with the administrative districts. Christians and Bedouin tribes were again accorded reserved seats. The election campaign was severely restricted in time and scope; propaganda on radio and television was banned and "sincere criticism" only was allowed. The army reaffirmed its neutrality and warned that it would strike with a mailed fist at opportunists using its name in the campaign. The political parties were still banned, but lists combining individual candidates were allowed; in many, if not in most cases, these lists had party undertones. The voting procedure, however, provided for the choice of individual candidates only.

The election campaign and the elections themselves took place for the most part in a calm atmosphere. Two bombs were thrown in Damascus on the eve of the elections; the Syrian authorities attributed the deed to the UAR, which had been conducting an active propaganda campaign against the elections, calling on the Syrian people to boycott them.

The vote in the referendum was public. The temporary constitution was approved by 97.6% of the workers, with 50 to 60 per cent of the electorate having voted, a large percentage for Syria. Western observers thought that in spite of the absence of secrecy these results showed wide support for an independent Syria.

In the general elections, close to 1,900 candidates contested 172 seats. In all opinions the results were an overwhelming victory for the right, though estimates varied in regard to the numerical strength of the various parties, factions and tendencies. A subdivision was thought to exist in the right wing, between the "extremists" who would, if possible, cancel the agrarian reform and the nationalizations, and the "centre" or "moderate conservatives" who would accept the established socialist meatures, but no more, and carry on with a limited amount of economic planning. From the party point of view the composition of the Assembly resembled the pre-union one, elected in 1954; the Sha'ab party remained the strongest faction, followed by the Watani party; after these two conservative parties came the nationalist and leftist Ba'ath. A new feature was the success of the Muslim Brethren, who were usually defined as "extreme right" and anti-Nasser. The Bedouin representatives were also classified with the "extreme right."

On the eve of the inauguration of the Assembly, the army again issued a warning: it wished to retire from politics, but could not do so if the politicians tried to exploit it for their own purposes; the politicians should eschew quarrels.

Power now passed exclusively into the hands of the right. Dr. Nāzim al-Qudsi, a leader of the Sha'ab party, was elected President of the Republic by 153 out of 172 members of the Assembly, after his opponent and candidate of the left, Khālid al-Azm, withdrew his candidacy. Dr. Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari was elected President of the Assembly, by 114 votes; the 47 votes cast for Jalāl as-Sayyid, a former member of the Ba'ath, were thought to represent the strength of the left. The new government was formed on December 23 by Dr. Ma'rūf al-Dawālībī of Aleppo, a former leader of the Sha'ab party, who only some days before had made clear his anti-socialist outlook. The government was a right-wing coalition, comprising members of the former Sha'ab and Watani parties, independents and the Constitutional and Islamic Parliamentary blocs. The left was not represented.

Foreign affairs, apart from the question of securing recognition and Arab relations, did not figure predominantly during these months, when Syria was occupied with establishing the regime. The UAR remained extremely hostile and did not extend recognition even after the elections; the clearly did not accept the "separatist regime" as there to stay. Syria charged Cairo with launching a subversive campaign against her from Lebanese territory. This also caused a strain in Syria's relations with Lebanon; by the end of the year, however, relations improved after Lebanon had extended her recognition which she had delayed out of consideration for the susceptibilities of the UAR and internal difficulties. Relations with Jordan were good. Syria concluded an economic agreement with Iraq at the beginning of November, which the two countries proclaimed as the initiation of "real Arab solidarity." As to Syria's non-Arab neighbours, Turkey, as already mentioned, was the second country (after Jordan) to recognise Syria; incidents on the border which traditionally marred relations between the two countries subsided after Syria became independent (though not necessarily for that reason.) On the Israel border sporadic incidents continued much as usual.

The Syrian Communists' praise for the "historic victory" of the secession was widely reported in the Communist countries, including the USSR; otherwise the Soviet attitude to the new regime was non-committal.

With the US Syria negotiated for the purchase of wheat, and a loan; and with West Germany for large-scale assistance in building the Euphrates dam which had already been agreed upon with the UAR, in July.

INTERNAL AFFAIRS

THE FIRST TEN DAYS

INSTITUTIONS OF GOVERNMENT

Dr Kuzbari Appointed Premier; Cabinet Formed. At about 7.30 a.m. (local time) on Sept 29 the Supreme Arab Revolutionary Command of the Armed Forces announced in communiqué No. 17 that "in fulfilment of the pledge which it has made to the people it will place political and administrative affairs in the charge of competent sons of the people." It had charged Dr Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari with the formation of a cabinet which "will run the affairs of the country so as to restore constitutional conditions." Kuzbari had accepted. (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [30].)

At 11 a.m., communiqué No. 18 announced that the Revolutionary Command had invested the premier with the power of naming his ministers.

Shortly afterwards Premier's decree No. 1 gave the composition of the cabinet as follows:

Dr Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari: PM, FM and Minister of Defence. (Muslim; born in Damascus, 1914; studied law at Beirut and Lyons and lectured at Damascus University. He was a member of Shishakli's Arab Liberation Movement (harakat al-tahrir al-arabi) and was elected deputy for Damascus in 1953, speaker of the Chamber of Deputies, Minister of Justice, of Education, of Labour and Social Affairs; "moderate rightist"; son-in-law of Adil al-Khoja, prominent partner in the "Company of Five," and cousin of Lieut-Col. Haydar al-Kuzbari.)

Dr Leon Zamariya: Finance and Supplies (Christian from Aleppo; prominent member of the Watani Party; Minister of Finance in pre-union cabinets.)

Dr Farhān al-Jandālī: Health (Muslim from Hama; former deputy and minister on behalf of the Sha'ab Party).

Dr Izzat an-Nus: Education and National Guidance (Muslim from Damascus; lecturer in History and Geography at Damascus University; independent).

Dr Adnān al-Quwatli: Interior (Muslim from Damascus; former secretary of Lawyers' Union; independent). (An-Nahar of Dec 5 classified him as a Watani Party member.)

Dr Awad Barakāt: Economy and Industry (Christian from Damascus; former deputy-governor of Central Bank, lately chairman of United Banks Co.—sharikat al-masdirif al-muttahidah; independent).

Eng. Amin Nazif: Agriculture and acting Agrarian Reform (Muslim from Damascus; former secretary of Ministry of Agriculture; independent).

Adv. Ahmad Sulṭān: Justice and Waqf (Muslim from Hama; independent).

Eng. Abd ar-Rahmān Hurriyah: Works and Communications (Muslim from Latakia and mayor of this town under Shishakli; independent).

Dr Mu'amin Ashari: Planning, Municipal and Rural Affairs (Muslim from Latakia; former bank manager; independent).

Fu'ad al-Adil: Social Affairs and Labour (Muslim from Aleppo; former city treasurer there; independent).

Dr Mustafa al-Barudi: Minister of State for Propaganda, Broadcasting and Television. (Born 1924; former lecturer of law at Damascus University.) (R. Damascus, Sept 29, 30 [Oct 1, 2]; Jaridah, Sept 30, Oct 1; Anwar, Sept 30; Mid. Mir., Sept 30, Dec 16; Jihad, Oct 1; Akhbar, Egypt, Nov 22)

Powers of the Cabinet, PM—Acting President. On Sept 29, communiqué No. 19 announced that the Revolutionary Command had "empowered the cabinet to issue laws in the transitional period with the proviso that these laws will be submitted to the legislative authority, which will emerge from the people after free elections, at its first meeting." (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [30])

Since there was no provision, so far, for a formal head of state, Legislative Decree No. 19 of Oct 26 laid down that, for the term of office of the transitional government, the Prime Minister should exercise the prerogatives of the President of the Republic. (R. Damascus, Oct 26 [28])

C-in-C Appointed. [Three days had passed since the revolution when] on the morning of Oct 1, the Revolutionary Command announced that it had appointed Maj-Gen. Abd al-Karim Zahr ad-Din C-in-C of the Armed Forces as from Sept 28. Zahr ad-Din, a Druze born in 1915, had previously been Director of Equipment and Supply of the 1st [Syrian] Army. (R. Damascus-IMB, Oct 1; Jaridah, Oct 3; Mid. Mir., Oct 1, Kul Shay, Oct 7)

Senior Appointments Made. At that time, four other senior appointments were made which were of prime significance during the period of consolidation of the new regime:

Maj-Gen. Fathi Baqir, as Asst. SG for Security and Police in the Ministry of Interior in place of Maj-Gen. Muhammad al-Jarrâh who was dismissed on Sept 30 (R. Damascus, Sept 30 [Oct 3]; Jaridah, Oct 1);

Dr Atif al-Barqawi, as Director-General of Propaganda and Information in place of Mutasim Sayfi, on Oct 2 (Jaridah, Oct 3);

Col. Muhammad Hishâm as-Samân (formerly Director-General of the Grain Office) as Director of General Security, in place of Brig. Ahmad al-Bayluni, who was appointed Chief of Police in Aleppo, on Oct 7. (ANA, Oct 7 [10]; Jaridah, Oct 8);

Brig. Izz ad-Din Karamân's appointment as Inspector-General of Police was confirmed. (INA, Oct 4)

Symbols of Sovereignty Restored or Emphasized. [One of the first concerns of the government was to underline Syrian independence by restoring the attributes of sovereignty.] On Sept 30 Dr Kuzbari as FM informed the UN and the Arab League of the establishment of the sovereign and independent "Syrian Arab Republic" (al-jumhuriyah al-arabiyyah as-suriyyah). This name had appeared first on Sept 29 in the announcement of the formation of the Cabinet. (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [Oct 1]; Hayat, Oct 1)

On Sept 30 Legislative Decree No. 2 restored Syria's former flag, emblem and anthem. (R. Damascus, Sept 30 [Oct 3])

The Minister of the Interior ordered the designation "Syrian-Arab" to be included in forms and registers under the heading "nationality," thus reverting to pre-Union practice according to the Syrian News Agency. (SNA, Oct 2)

On Oct 9 Abu al-Yusuf al-Abidin, former mufti of Syria, followed up his personal declaration of support (see below) by broadcasting a legal opinion (fatwa) releasing Syrians from their allegiance to Abdel Nasser (Manar, Jordan, Oct 2). (Abidin was subsequently reinstated in his former post.) (ANA, Oct 29 [31])

PROGRAMMES AND TRENDS

The Government Programme. On Sept 29, the day of its constitution, the Kuzbari government issued a policy statement. It declared the following aims: "stable constitutional conditions to be established within four months"; restoration of "all the individual and general freedoms," in particular freedom of press and opinion; strengthening the army to enable it to protect the borders and "carry out its anticipated role in the realization of the aims of Arab nationalism"; [cf. the Revolutionary Command statement below, according to which the army should confine itself to the protection of the country]; protecting the workers, guarding and further expanding their acquired rights and supporting the trade union movement; applying the agrarian reform laws "in such a manner as to achieve prosperity and ease (idihâr wa-rakhâ) for the peasant and the agricultural worker; also guaranteeing agricultural workers' organizations"; promoting economic activity by "encouraging savings, investment, industrialization, legal profit making and restoring normality"; inviting foreign, especially Arab, capital; the government to "confine itself to implementing economic projects connected with public utilities, projects which individuals cannot or do not wish to implement, and to projects required by the national defence; a balanced budget, free currency convertibility, 'safeguarding Syria's reputation abroad by fulfilling its obligations'; 'a true and comprehensive Arab unity (wahdah arabiyah haqiqiyah shâmilah) based on freedom and equality," participation in the Arab struggle in Palestine and Algeria; observing international agreements and the UN charter.

The statement concluded as follows: "the government... emanates from the desires of the people with all its groups; and, while thanking its brave army... for their blessed revolution, affirms that it will always be at war with imperialism... It will march words with deeds." (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [Oct 2]; Narr, Oct 1)

Revolutionary Command: "The Principles of the People"; "True Socialism." In addition to the government programme the Revolutionary Command formulated the "principles and aims of the people" on Oct 2 as follows: 1. the protection of the sanctities of Arab nationalism; 2. the realization of a true socialism; 3. the establishment of a true democracy; 4. "full discipline and respect for the sanctity of regulations in a strong army, an army which clings to its fundamental duties—namely, to protect the neutrality of the country." (R. Damascus, Oct 2 [4]; Hayat, Oct 3)

Social and Economic Policy. The social and economic aims of the government were further elaborated by Dr Awad Barakât, the Minister of Economy, as follows: to restore public confidence and to safeguard civil rights; to encourage individual savings and productive investments; to set up development projects in order to increase production and national income; to work for a better distribution of the national income amongst all producers, especially workers and peasants.

Dr Barakat added that the government had adopted the principles of "true socialism" as suited to Syrian reality, and not a "false theoretical" socialism which took away as much as it gave, and gave an assurance that whatever advantages small earners had derived from the former regime would be preserved. (Jaridah, Oct 6)

Elections Envisaged Within Four Months. The government made it clear from the outset that the "constitutional conditions" envisaged in its programme of Sept 29 presupposed the holding of elections. On Sept 30 Adnan al-Quwatli, the Minister of Interior, announced that the "essential objective" of his ministry was "to secure free and honest elections" as soon as possible. (R. Damascus, Sept 30 [Oct 2])

On Oct 3 and 5 the PM said that general elections for a constituent assembly would take place after four months, that the elections would be held on a personal basis, without party lists, and that the new constitution would be "based on past experience." (Nasir, Oct 4; Hayat, Oct 6)

Government "Conservative." The western press was virtually unanimous in labelling the Kuzbari government conservative; it was widely felt that this orientation might mean "trouble in traditionally volatile Syria." (e.g. Scotsman, Oct 3; New Statesman, Oct 6; Die Welt, Oct 7; Observer; NYT, Oct 8; Financial Times, Oct 10)

[Egyptian sources took their clue from Abdel Nasser in describing the new government as a gathering of traitors serving reaction, whether from greed or weakness—see: The Dissolution of the UAR.]

[The Lebanese press did not publish any opinions on the character and significance of Dr Kuzbari's cabinet; it appears that the subject was banned by the censor, as the newspapers of those days were conspicuous for their blank spaces.]

Workers and Peasants Reassured. [In view of the proclaimed socialism of the former regime, and its own reputation for conservatism, the new regime took care from the first to reassure the working classes.] On Oct 2 the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour requested employers not to discharge workers and to cooperate with trade unions; it also asked the Ministry of Health to appoint doctors to workers' clinics in the provinces according to need. (R. Damascus, Oct 2 [6].) On Oct 7 Maj.-Gen. Zahr ad-Din received representatives of the Federation of Trade Unions (itihād nīqabī al-ummāl) and promised that they would receive their rights—"more than the 25% of profits promised them by Abdel Nasser." He called on them to ignore misleading rumours and not to let "exploiters and opportunists" infiltrate into their ranks. (Jaridah, Oct 8)

On Oct 5, Amin Nazif, Minister of Agriculture and Agrarian Reform, said that the Agrarian Reform Law was still effective and all arrangements were being made to carry out its provisions "within the framework of justice and equality." (Mid. Mir., Oct 7)

THE SECURITY SITUATION; STABILIZING THE REGIME

[While the Syrian authorities desired to present a picture of order and calm throughout the country as soon as possible after the revolution, pro-UAR elements produced some tension, especially during the first week after the coup.

At the same time the authorities aimed at eliminating the traces of Egyptian rule and solving personal problems created by the dissolution.]

Symptoms of Unrest, Security Precautions. On Oct 1 the C-in-C of the armed forces announced that the situation had returned to normal throughout Syria. (Damascus, Oct 1—JMB, Oct 1)

However, on the same day, communiqué No. 21 of the Revolutionary Command warned "subversive elements—non-Syrian mercenaries, foreigners and refugees who were 'penetrating into the demonstrations of jubilation with the purpose of changing [their] character,' that they would be arrested and deported. The same day it was forbidden to carry firearms, which were to be handed in immediately to the nearest police stations. (The deadline was later extended to Oct 10)

The universities of Damascus and Aleppo, and all schools were closed, "in order that opportunistic elements might not be given the opportunity to distort the demonstrations of support..." (R. Damascus, Oct 1, 8 [3, 10]). At night a bomb was reported thrown at the embassy of Turkey [which had been the second state to recognize independent Syria]. (Guardian, Oct 4)

Cairo Radio quoted reports on clashes "in most of the towns" between the military and the police on the one hand, and "the people," faithful to the UAR, on the other. Such broadcasts continued until Oct 5, [when Abdel Nasser's shift of policy (see p 162) induced restraint]. (R. Cairo, Oct 2, 3, 4, 5 [4, 5, 6])

There was some corroborating evidence for these reports. A Lebanese source spoke of armed terror bands on whom the Egyptians relied for incitement and unrest. They were composed of foreign mercenaries with residence permits in Syria (probably a reference to the Palestinian refugees). The Syrian public had tried to lynch members of these bands when discovered and some had to be rescued by the police in a Damascus market on Oct 1. A number of these groups had been expelled into Jordan. (Jaridah, Oct 3)

At Der'a, near the Jordanian border, it was reported that for five days, "the peasants resisted the deposition of Abdel Nasser as their leader and idol." There was sporadic fighting between civilians and the army. (Times, Oct 6)

On Oct 3, it was reported, Damascus appeared quiet though tanks remained parked at street corners. (Guardian, Oct 6)

On Oct 4 the Revolutionary Command announced the arrest of "saboteurs" who had crossed the frontiers into Syria (R. Damascus, Oct 4 [6]). Also arrested were adherents of Abdallah Rimawi (the Jordanian, dissident, pro-UAR Ba'ath leader who had fled to the UAR) among political refugees in Syria after Rimawi attacked the new Syrian regime over Cairo Radio. (Akhbar al-Ushb', Jordan, Oct 6)

Country Calming Down; Emergency Measures Relaxed. A week after the coup, an Al-Jaridah correspondent in Syria noted after a tour of the country, that recovery from the shock of dissolution had been quick, and absolute quiet reigned everywhere. There had been violence in Damascus and Aleppo, but much less than might have been expected after three-and-a-half years of Egyptian rule, and an even longer period of terror organized by Sarraj. (Jaridah, Lebanon, Oct 5)

[Whilst arrests were still being made, some emergency regulations were relaxed or abolished.] On Oct 1, foreigners were allowed to leave Syria. (R. Damascus, Oct 1 [3])

On Oct 4 it was announced that contrary to certain reports foreign journalists were free to enter Syria and see for themselves the people's support for the government (R. Damascus, Oct 4 [3]). Civilian airports were opened as from Oct 5.

On Oct 4 night curfew was lifted throughout Syria. [The curfew had already been gradually shortened before.]

The same day communiqué No. 25 of the Revolutionary Command announced that the officers of the revolutionary movement, "having carried out their mission," were returning to the posts they had occupied before the uprising (R. Damascus, Oct 4 [6]; Jaridah, Oct 5). On Oct 9 the C-in-C declared that this step had been carried out (R. Damascus, Oct 9 [11])

[The schools, however, remained closed.]

Sarrāj Arrested. Col Abd al-Hamid Sarrāj, Vice-President of the UAR, was put under house arrest at Damascus on Sept 28. He escaped—according to one source by opening fire on the revolutionary forces surrounding his house—and was arrested in a "hide-out" on Oct 1. On Oct 7 Maj.-Gen. Zahr ad-Din denied that Sarrāj had taken any part whatsoever in the revolution. (Jaridah, Sept 30, Oct 8; Jihad, Oct 2; R. Damascus, Oct 2 [3, 4])

Liquidation of UAR Positions: National Union, MENA, Intelligence Cells. The Government liquidated former UAR strongholds.

On Oct 1 all offices and branches of the National Union were closed and their activities suspended. The same measures were applied to the [UAR directed] Middle East News Agency (SNA, Oct 2). Two months later the property of the National Union was transferred to social institutions, such as schools and health centres. (Jaridah, Dec 1)

On Sept 30 Dr Adnān al-Quwatli, the Minister of the Interior, announced the closing-down of "tens of offices out of hundreds, the purpose of which was to spy and corrupt." (Jaridah, Oct 1)

On Oct 8 the Minister of the Interior said that committees "to liquidate intelligence nests" had begun work. Their task was expected to take a long time "because of the great number of these nests throughout Syria." Dr Quwatli had said earlier that about 6,500 persons were working for intelligence during the previous regime (Mid. Mir., Oct 14). School text-books and curricula were purged, by order of the Minister of Education, of "all praise for the individual," as a condition for the reopening of schools. (ANA, Oct 7 [10])

Repatriation of Egyptians. The repatriation of Egyptian army personnel and civilians in Syria started on Oct 1 and was reported completed on Nov 20 (see p 163.)

Financial Stability. [The revolution caused no financial convulsions, largely because of the confidence inspired in business circles in Syria and abroad by the character of the new government.] Within a day of the revolution the exchange rate of the £S rose by 14 piasters on the Beirut money market, and it was traded at only 23 piasters below the £L. (Hayat, Sept 30). [Officially the two currencies were at par.]

Later, Dr Awad Barkāt, Minister of Economy and Industry, said that the Central Bank's gold and foreign currency cover was safe and would not be spent except

"to meet the needs of the . . . Republic." (R. Damascus, Oct 3 [5])

Summing Up. In summing up the general situation ten days after the revolution, The New York Times reported that Syrian independence seemed to be winning general acceptance. People were talking in public with a freedom unknown under the UAR. The atmosphere was one of "relief rather than rejoicing." On the other hand, the workers and lower middle classes were believed still to be pro-Nasser in sentiment (NYT, Oct 8). The Financial Times (Oct 10) assessed the situation as "not immediately explosive," though certainly "highly fluid."

DECLARATIONS OF SUPPORT FOR THE NEW REGIME

The General Public. From Oct 29 Damascus Radio broadcast declarations of support for the revolution and the new regime from a variety of civilian bodies and personalities. A selection of these, as broadcast day by day, is given below:

Sept 29: the executive of the National Union in Damascus; "girl students" at Damascus University; the Patriarch of Antioch; the Imam of Al-Muhajjirin Mosque in Damascus; the inhabitants of the Kurdish quarter of Damascus; the Metal Workers Union and other trade unions; the Lawyers' Association in Damascus. Sept 30: the State Control Council (Majlis taftish ad-dawlah) represented by its head, Dr Mazhar Ahmad al-Azmah. Oct 1: the former Mufti of Syria, Abu al-Yus Abdin; the chambers of commerce, agriculture and industry; the Engineers' Union; a delegation representing the judges; "members of the Trade Unions Federation" (R. Damascus, Sept 29, 30 [Oct 2], Oct 1 [2]). On Oct 2 the support of Aleppo and Damascus University students' unions was announced (Nasr, Oct 2, 4). It was later reported that "the people" had destroyed a statue of Abdel Nasser in Aleppo. (SNA, Oct 8)

No Outright Support by Organized Labour. [The trade union federations expressed no support for the revolution as such and in their public statements adopted a lukewarm attitude towards the new regime.]

The chairman of the Aleppo Trade Union Federation called for support for the government, taking cognizance of the cabinet's "absolute pledge (see above, p 487 b) to safeguard the rights of workers..." (R. Damascus, Sept 30 [Oct 3])

A statement by Tal'at at-Taghlili, president of the Syrian Federation of Trade Unions, stressed that Syrian workers had always believed in "the true unity of the Arab states." Having become aware of "errors and deviations," they had tried to rouse Abdel Nasser's attention, but "these explanations had been wrongly received." They were now presenting Dr Kuzbari with a memorandum (R. Damascus, Oct 2 [4]; Nasr, Oct 3). The Cairo Sawt al-Arab commented: "From your sad tone . . . we understand the situation: guns and tanks. Workers, be patient, stubborn, and unite so that you will triumph." (R. Cairo, Oct 3 [4])

Politicians, Parties' Support. On Oct 2 a statement signed by 16 prominent Syrian politicians hailed the revolution, which had freed Syria from a "regime which aimed at distorting the ideals of Arab nationalism and Arab unity (and) at oppressing political and democratic life" and called on the Egyptian people, now "fettered with chains, to free themselves from the dictatorial rule." The statement demanded early "free and neutral" elections and thanked the army for delivering the country. Following are the signatories (with their party affiliation as given by Al-Jaridah except where in square brackets): Ahmad Kanbar (Sha'ab), Ahmad ash-Sharabati (Watani), As'ad Harun (Watani), Akram al-Hurani (Ba'ath), Bashir al-Armah (indep.), Hani al-Khoja (Watani), Hasan Murad (indep.), Khalid al-Azm (indep., formerly leftist), Rashid Jabri (Sha'ab), Suhayl Khuri (Watani), Sabri al-Asali (Watani), Salah al-Bitar (Ba'ath), Fu'ad Qadri (Sha'ab), Muhammad al-Ayish (indep.), Najib al-Armazi (Watani) and Hani as-Siba'i (Sha'ab).

Al-Jaridah pointed out that the Communist and the Nationalist-Social (PPS) parties alone did not figure in the statement, though their organs in Lebanon had welcomed the revolution. Damascus Radio commented that amongst the signatories were all the Syrian ministers who had signed the union document of Feb 1958, "except those who have died or are away from the country." (R. Damascus, Oct 2 [4]; IMB, Oct 3; Nasr; Jaridah; Hayat, Oct 3)

Shukri al-Quwatly, Syria's last President before the Union and "first citizen" of the UAR) congratulated PM Kuzbari and the army in a phone call from his hospital in Zurich. (Jaridah, Oct 11)

On Oct 3 a meeting of the Sha'ab Party took place at Aleppo, with the participation of Rushdi Kikhya, Abd ar-Rahman al-Kayyali, Muhammad Sa'id az-Za'im, Munir Ghanam, Ali' ad-Din al-Jahiri, Wajih al-Hallaj, Ahmad Abu Salih and Dr Nazim al-Qudsi, supporting the revolution and expressing confidence that the Revolutionary Command would work for Arab unity (wahdah) and restore democratic life. (Jaridah, Oct 4)

On the other hand, Ba'ath support for the revolution was reportedly not unanimous. A pro-Egyptian Lebanese source reported a split in the Syrian Ba'ath leadership over the dissolution of the UAR: Kamal Nasir, a former Ba'ath deputy, had attacked Salah ad-Din al-Bitar and Akram Hurani for their support of the revolution as a deviation from the party's principles and averred that the only way to save the situation in Damascus was to fight for the reconstitution of the union (Hawadith, Oct 6). [Ba'ath criticism of the government was not long in coming. See p 496 h.]

[Communist support was unequivocal.] A statement by the Syrian Communist Party published in Lebanon hailed the revolution as a "historic victory by the Syrian people and army . . . an expression of its hate for Pharaonic tyranny." At the same time the party asked for "a national democratic rule based on free elections," for punishment of "criminals" and the liberation of "detained nationalists." (Nida' Beirut, Oct 4)

[The support of two prominent Syrian exiles was not desired by the new regime.] It was officially denied that [the deposed dictator] Col. Adib ash-Shishakli and [the Communist leader] Khalid Bakdash had returned, or would return, to Syria. If they did so, the gallows awaited them. (R. Damascus, Oct 4, 5 [6])

Minorities: Druzes, Alawis. Damascus Radio mentioned Sultan al-Atrash, [the veteran Druze leader of Jabal Druze] among the first supporters of the Revolutionary Command (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [Oct 2]). Thereupon Kamal Junblat [the Lebanese Druze leader and Minister of Public Works who had expressed his disapproval of the Syrian revolutionaries—see Lebanon] was reported to have sent secret messengers to Atrash to inquire into the latter's attitude to the revolution, and to inform him of his own (Neher, Lebanon, Oct 4). At a press conference at Kraya in the presence of other Druze notables, at which he stressed his support for the Syrian government, Sultan expressly branded all rumours to the contrary as false (SNA, Oct 5). A pro-UAR source alleged that the government had accepted three demands which Atrash had made as a condition for this declaration: Adib ash-Shishakli would not be permitted to return to Syria; the army Chief-of-Staff was to be a Druze; Atrash was not to be expected to attack Abdel Nasser and the UAR. (Kul Shay', Oct 7)

Representatives of another ethnic-religious minority, the Alawis, announced their support for the new regime through Badi' Isma'il from Tartus. (Nasr, Oct 5)

Refugees. On Sept 28 Palestinian refugees in Damascus and Aleppo demonstrated in favour of Abdel Nasser and the union (see p 612 a) and as late as Oct 1 the Revolutionary Command issued a severe warning to "subversive elements penetrating into the demonstrations" who were "foreigners and refugees" (see p 490 h). As the same time, refugee spokesmen and business circles expressed their support for the new regime in guarded terms. Some thirty named notables assured their fellow refugees of the new government's zeal in regard to Palestine, and called upon them "to support the authorities in all matters promoting calm and security" (R. Damascus, Oct 1 [3]). A group of "Palestinian businessmen in Damascus" supported the government, arguing that "what pleased Syria pleased them." (SNA, Oct 4)

THE TRANSITIONAL GOVERNMENT

SECURITY AND INVESTIGATIONS

(October-December)

Further Steps Towards Normalcy. Certain security regulations were eased in mid-Oct. Syrians were again permitted to go abroad upon receiving an exit visa and many availed themselves of this facility. (R. Damascus, Oct 11 [12]; Hayat, Oct 20)

On Oct 21 elementary schools were reopened (Jaridah, Oct 22), followed on Nov 4 by secondary and vocational schools, as well as teachers' colleges. (R. Beirut, Nov 4 [7])

The universities (Damascus and Aleppo) were reopened [only] on Dec 16 [after the elections]. (Jaridah, Dec 17)

Transfers and Appointments. During the first half of Oct there were large-scale dismissals, transfers and appointments of provincial governors and senior police and security officers. (For a list of new governors, see R. Damascus, Oct 14 [16]; for a list of officers—SNA, Oct 11.)

Judicial Council and Investigation Committee. On Oct 16 a legislative decree provided for the establishment of a Judicial Council (majlis adli) for the trial of "everybody who harmed the homeland and the people in the extinct regime . . . particularly those who were in control of power and security affairs and enjoyed the full powers to expend state funds"; an Investigation Committee (lajnat tahqiq) would refer cases to the Judicial Council. Both council and committee would be governed by the existing law and their members would be qualified law officers. There would be no appeal against the verdicts and the sentences of the Judicial Council; death sentences would have to be confirmed by the head of state. Decisions concerning damages would be left to the civil courts. (R. Damascus, Oct 16 [18]; Jaridah, Oct 17)

The establishment of the two institutions was announced on Oct 6. The Judicial Council was headed by Majid al-Ghazi, president of the court of appeal; the Investigation Committee was composed of Tawfiq Abu Ayyash (chairman) with a civilian and a military judge (Jaridah, Oct 27). The first case due to open on Nov 1, before the Investigation Committee, was to be that of Sarraj. (R. Damascus, Oct 30 [Nov 1]) [but in fact the case was referred to the military prosecutor, see below].

By the beginning of Nov 1,500 complaints had been referred to the Investigation Committee by persons who claimed to have suffered at the hands of the intelligence services during the union (Jaridah, Nov 3). [No case was known to have been brought before the Judicial Council by the end of the year.]

Release of Persons Detained Under the UAR. On Oct 18 it was announced that more than 400 people arrested under the former regime "without legal justification" had already been released; "some 71 people" were still detained pending an investigation into their cases (Nasr, Oct 19; Mid. Mir., Oct 21). For this purpose the government formed a committee, which was to conclude its work within four months. (Jaridah, Oct 17)

On Dec 26 the Chairman said that 45 additional detainees had been released and that his committee would complete its work within three days. A week later the number of releases was given as 55. (Jihad, Jordan, Dec 27, 1961, Jan 4, 1962)

Syria Reports Egyptian-Directed Attempts at Sabotage. [On Oct 27 and again on Nov 1 Syrian official sources reported attempts which were repulsed at infiltration into Syria for purposes of sabotage; it was alleged that these attempts were Egyptian-directed. For details see pp 163-4.]

Armenians on Trial for Espionage. (See p 597).

Afil al-Bizri Returns. At the beginning of Feb Afil al-Bizri [Chief of Staff of the Syrian army at the time of the formation of the UAR and a pro-Communist] returned to Syria from Rumania. He was detained for 48 hours for questioning, and requested not to engage in any political activity. He was then placed under house arrest. At the end of Dec he was reported free. (Jihad, Jordan, Dec 3; R. Tunis, Dec 13 [15]; Akhbar al-Ustun, Jordan, Dec 29)

Sarraj Investigation Opens. The investigation of Abd al-Hamid as-Sarraj and his assistants commenced on Oct 9 (Jaridah, Oct 10). A few days later the arrest was reported from Damascus of Lieut. Abd al-Wahhab Khatib, another of Sarraj's subordinates. (Jaridah, Oct 18)

On Nov 1 secret service funds amounting to approximately £52 million, deposited at the Central Syrian Bank and at Miar Bank by Sarraj, were returned to the Syrian treasury. (Ayyam, Oct 31, Nov 2)

The questioning of Sarraj by the investigation committee (see above) began at Damascus on Dec 21 before the Military Prosecutor Lieut.-Col. Nur ad-Din Dasqi, who announced that 240 charges had already been filed against Sarraj. Investigation into his activities and those of his accomplices—20 of whom were still at large —was expected to be completed within a fortnight (Mid. Mir., Dec 23, 30). A pro-Egyptian source reported that Sarraj and Lieut.-Col. Burhan Adham were refusing to give information to their investigators and demanded a public trial. Sarraj, according to this source, had declared his intention to withdraw from politics, if released, and settle abroad or at Aleppo. (Kul Shay', Beirut, Dec 23)

Internal Security Reorganization. On Dec 15 Col. Muhammad Hisham as-Sammam was appointed Commander of Internal Security Forces; this post replaced the post of Assistant SG of Police and Public Security. The Higher Police Council was also replaced by a committee under the chairmanship of Col. as-Sammam, which included the directors-general of police and public security, the control organization, and six police superintendents from the provinces. (Mid. Mir., Dec 16)

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL AFFAIRS

[As Oct advanced, economic and social questions received increasing attention. The new regime definitely tended towards liberalism.]

Tasks and Priorities. The New York Times saw the main problems confronting the new government as social and economic—the decline of exports and the shortage of foreign currency, the difficulty in gaining the confidence of the workers and lower middle classes "among whom pro-Nasser sentiment apparently remained strong." (NYT, Oct 8)

According to Al-Haydt, the "urgent affairs" occupying the attention of the Syrian government at the moment were largely economic. They were: (a) a speedy termination of the transitional period; (b) preparations for general elections; (c) a survey of the administration; (d) an enquiry into the economic legislation of the former regime, and the possibility of revising it at once; (e) a survey of the economic situation in general; (f) the speeding-up of development projects; (g) foreign relations; (h) diplomatic appointments. (Hayat, Oct 17)

Economic and Social Policies. On Oct 17 the government issued a comprehensive statement on social and economic policy under the heading "The Revolution of the New Era and Arab Socialism."

The government declared that it was "imperative to adopt a sound socialist system." It professed to recognize two prominent facts, namely (1) that the socialist trend was steadily spreading to all countries and (2) that the adoption of socialism in different forms in accordance with the particularities of different societies saves it from the pitfalls of dictatorship. The "new era" in Syria strove to establish "Arab socialism" which was a means to attain the aims of Arab nationalism, namely the realization of a free Arab society and the creation of a great Arab civilization. To achieve these aims, socialism must be combined with democracy: the individual could not realize his potential except under socialism, and society could not prosper until the individual enjoyed freedom.

Ar. Economic Policy I. the foremost aim is "a maximum rate of development" in order to raise the standard of living; "we believe in the need for state intervention to ensure a just distribution of the national income"; 2. respect for private ownership and initiative; encouragement of small investors; fight against monopolies; "at the same time the state believes in the principle of agrarian reform"; 3. a system of "controlled economic freedom" capable of "preventing economic activity from being obstructed or running into error"; 4. cooperation with other Arab states, pending the establishment of economic unity; 5. encouragement of foreign capital investment; 6. revision of taxation to "safeguard lawful profits... and ensure equality of sacrifice without killing productive potentialities."

B. The Role of the State in the Economy. Direct commitments: 1. control of all public utilities such as irrigation systems, dams, transport, harbours, electricity; 2. economic projects which private persons are unwilling or unable to undertake—draining marshes, oil prospecting; 3. projects for national defence; 4. projects in the fields of education, health, housing etc.; 5. food and other basic supplies, when "exploitation or corruption is feared"; 6. agricultural and industrial guidance and research, and similar projects.

Indirect commitments: 1. control of currency, banking and insurance; 2. supply of credit facilities for lower income groups; 3. encouragement of saving; 4. control and direction of foreign trade; 5. price control.

C. Social Policies. 1. "the implementation of sound socialist policies... the increase of production... and social justice"; 2. "to ensure and facilitate work"; 3. support of trade unions and protection of workers' rights; 4. participation of workers in administration and profits of enterprises, promotion of harmony between employers and employees; 5. expansion of social and health services for workers; 6. minimum wages; 7. protection of women and children; 8. fight against disease; 9. measures to improve nutrition and housing; 10. rural development—water and electricity, transport, schools and hospitals etc.; 11. aid for private initiative in the social field; 12. encouragement of the cooperative movement; 13. encouragement of sport and scouting activities "for the creation of a mature and strong society which believes in its Arabism"; 14. "equal opportunities" in education.

D. Agrarian Reform. 1. "limitation of large-scale ownership in accordance with sound conditions"; 2. land distribution in plots sufficiently large to ensure a fair living; 3. safeguarding owners' rights as regards valuation of lands and terms of payment; 4. protection of rights already gained by peasants; 5. study of "genuine complaints raised against... the Agrarian Reform Law" and redress of injustices, "without harming peasants"; 6. financial and technical aid and guidance to peasants.

In conclusion the statement stressed the government's intention to repair the mistakes made by the previous regime, including "improvised legislation," which led to "anarchy, corruption... and the crisis of unemployment." (R. Damascus, Oct 17 [19]; Nasr, Oct 17; Mid. Mir., Oct 21)

Towards Economic Liberalization. On Oct 8 it was announced that the cabinet had formed a 13-man committee on economic and financial reform under the chairmanship of Izzat al-Tarabulsi, the former governor of the Central Bank. The committee was to tender its recommendations within one month (R. Damascus, Oct 8 [10]; Jaridah, Oct 10, 14). At the same time, Dr Awad Barakat, the Minister of Economy, said that the government favoured free trade and fair competition. Parliament would deal with the question of whether nationalization should be repealed. (Jaridah, Oct 10)

[Pressure groups exerted their influence.] On Oct 11 the Syrian chambers of commerce and industry met in Damascus to demand the abrogation of the nationalization laws, progressive income tax and currency regulations as being "instruments for the subjection of the Syrian to the Egyptian economy." (Nasr, Oct 13)

Dr Barakat, however, on Oct 21 denied rumours of the impending repeal of nationalization laws; on the other hand, he said, steps had been taken to free foreign trade, and currency and capital transfers (R. Damascus, Oct 21 [24]; Jaridah, Oct 22). A week earlier, on Oct 14, the Central Bank of Syria and the Higher Council for Credit and Currency were re-established—a step which was said to have been regarded in Beirut as auguring the abolition of currency controls. (Financial Times, Oct 16)

The £S continued firm. The price of the US dollar in the Syrian money market had come down to 368 piasters, only eight above the official rate; it had been 445 piasters before the revolution (R. Damascus, Oct 22-IMB, Oct 22; R. Damascus, Oct 24 [W Nov 2]). During Oct the volume of accounts kept with Syrian banks went up by 40% "due to return of confidence in the Syrian economy." The rise was mainly effected by the return of Syrian capital from Lebanon. (Nasr, Nov 26)

In Nov the government lifted limitations on the import of all goods except "luxuries"; according to the Minister of Economy, this step was calculated to encourage the return of Syrian capital from abroad. (BBC in Arabic, Nov 21-IMB, Nov 22; Jaridah, Nov 22)

Agrarian Reform and Cooperation. On Nov 1 Sa'id al-Sayyid was appointed Minister of Agrarian Reform. On the eve of the appointment the Premier, and later the new minister, stated that the Agrarian Reform Law would be amended so as to safeguard peasant interests whilst correcting injustices inflicted on the landowners, especially as regards compensation. Rights acquired by peasants cultivating agrarian reform lands would not be affected. (Mid. Mir., Nov 4; Ayyam, Nov 6; Jundi, Nov 7; R. Damascus, Nov 12 [W 16]; Nasr, Nov 13; Wahdah, Dec 3)

In mid-Nov distributions of ownership certificates took place [apparently for the first time since the revolution] in the provinces of Homs, Hama and Aleppo. (Nasr, Nov 14, 17)

In Dec it was reported that the Ministry of Agriculture would spend £S350,000 out of the current development budget on increasing the number of agricultural cooperative societies, 250 of which were already operating. (Wahdah, Dec 3)

Assistance to Peasants, Drought Relief. At the beginning of Nov the Agrarian Reform Administrative Board decided, in view of the damage caused by drought during 1960, to exempt from rents for the 1960/61 winter season peasants renting state and agrarian reform lands. (R. Damascus, Nov 5 [W 9])

A few days later it was announced that the Agricultural Bank had decided upon a number of measures to assist the peasants in drought areas through: moratoria on debts; seed corn distribution—40,000 tons wheat and 25,000 tons barley; £S5 million were set aside for loans in case of further need; an additional £S5 million were allocated for the assistance of peasants in non-drought areas. Provincial committees headed by the governor and comprising representatives of the Bank and local agricultural institutions were to be established to determine relief priorities. (Nasr, Nov 14)

Labour Affairs; Safeguarding Workers Interests. [The transitional government continued to show its concern for the workers' interests.] On Oct 8 government decree No. 12 ordained that joint stock companies should have on their boards of directors one member representing the company's salaried employees, and one member representing the workers, both to be elected by secret ballot under supervision of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour. (R. Damascus, Oct 8 [10].)

In Oct the General Federation of Trade Unions, in a memorandum to the Minister of Labour, asked for the establishment of a consultative council to assist with the framing of labour laws and to supervise the implementation of price control and labour disputes regulations; this council should be composed of workers, employers and government representatives (Hayat, Oct 24). [No reports were encountered on the establishment of such a council.]

On Nov 7 two decrees were promulgated granting additional benefits to workers: 1. an employer of more than 100 employees had to provide free medical treatment and medicine; if the number of workers exceeded 500, the employer had to bear also the costs of specialized treatment and surgical operations; 2. workers employed in establishments of over 15 employees were to receive half-pay for Fridays [the weekly day of rest] and holidays, which were formerly unpaid. (Nasr, Nov 8; Mid. Mir., Nov 11)

In Dec the Ministry of Communications [sic] banned the employment of factory workers on public holidays and Fridays without permission from the ministry. (Damascus, Dec 4 [W 14].)

Education and Culture, Mass Communication Media. In Oct the authorities established a number of institutions in these fields.

On Oct 9 a decree was published providing for a faculty of Law at Aleppo University in addition to the existing faculties of Engineering and Agriculture (SNA, Oct 10). [The Syrian universities which had been closed after the revolution were not yet open.]

The Minister of Waqf appointed a committee to enquire into waqf laws and the state of religious education and to suggest a programme of improvements. (Nasr, Oct 13)

The formation of a General Administrative Council for Broadcasting and Television was also ordered. The Minister of Information would serve as chairman, with three civil servants, two university teachers and two representatives of the general public as members. (Nasr, Oct 20)

The Minister of Education ordered the establishment of a Supreme Scientific Council (majlis a'la lil-ulum), with himself as chairman and five additional members. (Nasr, Oct 22)

POLITICAL PROSPECTS

[There was much comment after the re-establishment of the Syrian republic on an expected struggle between the Right and Left and the prospects of the regime to steer a middle course acceptable to both.

As recorded in the foregoing chapters the coup was to a considerable degree a rightist reaction against President Abdel Nasser's brand of socialism, and the new regime acquired immediately the label of right-wing conservatism.]

Left Seen Stronger Than Before the Union. The left was thought to have emerged strengthened and the right weakened from the period of the union. Land reform was undermining the old political power of the landowners. Socialist ideas had gained a wider currency among the poorer sections of the community. In so far as the coup had reversed this trend it was only able to do so by cashing in on a popular anti-Egyptian feeling and by exploiting what amounted almost to a power vacuum.

Otherwise the populace would scarcely have acquiesced in the establishment of Dr Kuzbari's regime. (Financial Times, Oct 10)

Similarly it was remarked that in the end Nasserism might appeal more to the politically restless Syrians than the right-wing conservatism of the Kuzbari administration. (Christian Science Monitor, Oct 4)

Another observer thought the [organized] Left—both Communists and Socialists—tolerated Kuzbari only because he gave them a chance to recover ground they had lost over the past three years. (New Statesman, Oct 6)

The Communists. [Attention was given in the western press to a possible strengthening of the Communists, especially in view of the blessing given to the revolution by the Syrian Communist Party (see p 492 a).] It was observed that the breakup of the UAR had been a "long-term aim" of PM Khrushchov and the Arab Communists who wanted a resumption of party activities in Syria, where before 1958 the Communists had had one of their strongest footholds in the M.E. It was thought that, though suppressed under the UAR, the party had managed to preserve underground cells (Christian Science Monitor, Oct 4). It was assumed for certain that the new regime would continue to suppress the Communists but whilst Abdel Nasser also offered a political challenge to the agitators, it was an open question whether the new regime could end the discontent from which Communism sprang. (Scottsman, Oct 3)

Another view was that the potential power of the Communists in Syria was grossly exaggerated. (Letter to the Editor, Daily Telegraph, Oct 5)

Scepticism on Future of Regime. An optimistic view was that Syria might now experience more political stability. In the past Arab unity ranked higher than independence as the goal of Syrian political action. This caused other Arab countries to intervene in Syrian politics and in turn provoked military coups designed to foil union schemes undesirable to the army. If the priorities were now reversed, at least one factor of political instability would be removed. (M. al-Atrash in letter to the editor, Daily Telegraph, Oct 5)

A more sceptical and more general view was that it was only a "pious hope" that the chastening experience of four years' loss of independence and liberty could help to make factions hang together. The numerous political forces which wanted secession in order to regain their liberty were likely to use it to the full (Sunday Times, Oct 1). Thus it was thought, it would take the Syrians "some unforeseen alchemy" to establish a successful democracy. (Manchester Guardian Weekly, Oct 12)

THE ARMY

No Official Political Status. [Right from the beginning the army made it clear that it conceived its political task to act as the guiding spirit of the nation and as arbitrator behind the scenes, whilst it would take no official part in government. Thus no officer participated in the transitional government. But at every stage in the transitional period, the army issued policy statements, which usually included a warning to would-be deviationists. The title "Revolutionary Command" ceased to appear towards the end of Oct and henceforth political statements were issued in the name of the army command or were made by the C-in-C, Gen. Zahar ad-Din. The army's publicly-stated policy was the restoration of parliamentary democracy, an understanding between right and left on the basis of "true socialism" and the independence of Syria, possibly in the framework of a loose Arab federation; no parties were permitted, though there was much obvious party activity which was not suppressed. (Army statements and intervention have been recorded in the context of the general political development.)]

Impact of the Army. An instance of the decisive role which the Syrian army continued to play after the constitution of the provisional government was reported by western correspondents on the spot: in the evening of Oct 5 PM Kuzbari let it be known that he warmly welcomed Abdel Nasser's speech of the same day, lifting his diplomatic boycott of Syria. At midnight an official request was made to the three correspondents who had called this reaction to withdraw their messages. They agreed only to cable an official denial, whereupon they were driven to "the military junta's headquarters, where the Cabinet was still in session. The whole place was floodlit and heavily guarded with machineguns... as if they expected a siege at any minute." The next day PM Kuzbari's official reaction to Abdel Nasser's speech was "markedly less joyful in tone..." (Daily Telegraph, Oct 7). Another correspondent said Kuzbari's "humiliating about-face..." underlined his complete lack of real power. (Daily Herald, Oct 7)

Divisions Between Army and Government, Inside Army. It was remarked that it was not unduly cynical to reject the protestations of the army's determination to stay out of politics. If political developments were not acceptable to the officers' corps or if, as even more likely, it was divided into conflicting factions, the possibility of a further coup became very much on the cards. (Financial Times, Oct 10)

It was also thought that the army's opposition to the revival of political parties was expressive of its intention to retain the real political authority. Such a development could again lead to rival political factions inside the army, as was the case before the union, and to consequent political instability. (Times, Oct 6; see also Economist, Oct 14)

Arrest of Lieut.-Col. Kuzbari. At the beginning of Nov a Cairo source said that two groups were contending for power within the Syrian officers' corps: one, supposed to be the stronger, headed by Lt.-Col. Abd al-Karim al-Nahlawi, Lt.-Col. Nasib Hindi and Lt.-Col. Hisham Abd Rabbah, and the other by Lt.-Col. Haydar al-Kuzbari and Brig. Abd al-Ghani Dahmani (Akhbar, Cairo, Nov 7; for other Cairo versions of such groupings, see pp 614-6.)

Later in the month Kuzbari was arrested. "According to rumour" he had tried to organize support for the election of his kinsman, Ma'mun al-Kuzbari, to the Presidency of the Republic. The Revolutionary Command responded first by enlarging its membership from six to twenty-six, thus swamping Haydar al-Kuzbari and any of his would-be supporters, and then by arresting him (Siyyasah, Nov 24; Nahar, Nov 25, 26). Later Cairo reports said Kuzbari was arrested because he had conspired with King Hussein against the regime in Syria; Col. Faisal Sirri al-Husseini was arrested on the same charge in Jan 1962 (p 614 a).

A Cairo source reported in mid-Dec that Kuzbari had been released from prison, demoted and placed under surveillance (Akhbar, Dec 12). According to An-Nahar the arrest, effected "a few hours" before the resignation of the Kuzbari government [on Nov 20], lasted eleven hours in all. (Nahar, Nov 26)

PARTY POLITICS

[The political parties which had voluntarily dissolved at the time of the merger with Egypt, were not officially permitted to reconstitute themselves. Party activities were to some extent resumed.]

Rightist and Leftist Groupings. A Lebanese observer analyzed party life emerging after the revolution. He found evidence of two groupings: a "bourgeois front" consisting of the former Sha'ah Party and the rightist wing of the Watani Party under Abd ar-Rahman al-Kayyali; this group stood behind the provisional government and would support Dr Kuzbari's candidacy for the office of President of Syria. The other group was leftist and its main leaders were Akram Hurani, Sabri al-Asali and Khalid al-Azm. This group benefited from its record of opposition to the union under the UAR. The Ba'ath Party was in a delicate position between the two groups. [The writer thus differentiated between Hurani—the veteran Ba'ath leader—and the attitude of the Party.] The Communists were cautiously working for a National Front under the cover of which they could enter parliament, but their chances were small. (Jaridah, Oct 11)

Elections Promised—Without Party Lists. As recorded above, PM Kuzbari announced on Oct 3 and 5 that elections for a constituent assembly would be held within four months, on a personal basis and without party lists (Nair, Oct 4; Hayat, Oct 6)

Army Warns Against Party Activities. On Oct 8 a spokesman of the Revolutionary Command stated that anyone who indulged in party activities would be "struck down with an iron hand"; the army desired the people's unity and solidarity towards the true principles of the Arab Revolution, and not "party politics and factions." (Nair, Oct 9; Mid. Mir., Oct 14). In a similar vein, Gen. Zahr ad-Din, C-in-C, said it was not in the national interest to return to party strife at the present "historical stage"; after the inauguration of the legislative assembly the situation might change. (SNA, Oct 11)

The Ba'ath Takes Issue. [The Ba'ath Party was quick to react against this trend.]

In mid-Oct the National Command of the Ba'ath Party [the all-Arab leadership of the party, based in Beirut] issued a statement accusing "Syrian reaction" of trying to divert political life in Syria towards a "military autocratic regime guaranteeing the protection of its economic and capitalist interests" and exposing the country to "great imperialistic risks." Syrian reaction, the statement said, was using the mistakes of the union in order to "strike at every popular action which might enable the progressive movement to restore its role in leading the masses." The weapon against this "reactionary attack" was a broad national front. The statement also took issue with the recent Syrian proposals to establish a decentralized Arab union (p 159 b) "before the people of Syria are able to reconsolidate their strength and express their opinion in a democratic atmosphere"; these proposals constituted "opposition to union in the name of union itself." The Mideast Mirror commented that the statement aroused interest since Ba'ath leaders [Hurani and Bitar] had been amongst the signatories of the joint statement in support of the revolution. (Siyyasah, Oct 17; Mid. Mir., Oct 21)

Pro-Nasser Activity, Illegal Leaflets. On Oct 25 a Cairo source reported that leaflets bearing Abdel Nasser's portrait were distributed in Damascus (MENA, Oct 25 [27]). [This coincided with a reported Egyptian attempt to smuggle sabotage agents into Syria from Lebanon—see p 163 b.]

On Oct 26 the government warned "certain former dissolved parties," on threat of severe penalties not to distribute leaflets harmful to the country and indulge in illegal activity. (R. Damascus, Oct 26 [27]). Syrian newspapers justified the ministry's warning, stressing the country's delicate political situation. (Ayyam; Sawt al-Arab, Oct 27)

The Return of Quwatli. Shukri al-Quwatli, Syria's last President before the merger, arrived back in Damascus on Oct 16 (Nasr, Oct 17). On Oct 23 Quwatli broadcast a statement justifying the break with the UAR (for details, see p 618 b) and called for the support of the new regime. (R. Damascus, Oct 23 [25])

THE NATIONAL CHARTER

[At the end of Oct the government commenced preparations for the holding of general elections (for which see further below). Thereafter political activities connected with the elections became noticeable, within the lines laid down by the army and the government: no party lists and maximum stress on a common programme agreeable to the authorities.]

Al-Jaridah reported contacts among Syrian politicians with a view to the establishment of a "coalition front" with a united list of candidates; a meeting was expected to take place in Damascus in mid-month to formulate a "charter" (covenant—mithaq) establishing the front. (al-Jaridah, Nov 9)

[No formal "coalition front" materialized. Instead, the contacts led, under army prodding, to the signature of a "national charter" serving as the basis for both an agreed election programme and a temporary constitution.]

On Nov 9 about 60 leading politicians met at the Damascus garrison officers' club. After an opening address by Maj.-Gen. Zahr ad-Din and 11 hours of deliberation the participants signed the "National Charter (al-mithaq al-watani) of the Syrian Arab Republic."

The National Charter—Synopsis. [The Charter detailed policies which, in the main, had already been declared by the provisional government, namely: 1. establishment of an Arab Federation (instead of a centralized union on the UAR pattern) which would leave a large measure of independence to the individual countries; 2. an economic and social policy which would at one and the same time (a) serve the interests of the workers and peasants, protect and even enhance the rights and benefits they had acquired under the UAR; (b) re-establish a free economy, encourage private enterprise, protect landowners and compensate those whose land came under agrarian reform. The question of nationalization was not mentioned. Foreign affairs, other than Arab, were only mentioned in passing. The political system—a parliamentary democracy—was dealt with in short beatings only. Thus the Charter, in its concentration upon economic and social questions, bore the imprint of the main issue in Syrian politics, namely the conflict between the right and the left.]

In the preamble, the signatories identified themselves as "being among those working in the national field and for the national cause" and asserted Syria's leading role in the struggle for Arab independence and unity. They noted that "the system of rule" of the UAR had "almost shaken the faith of Arabs in unity." They affirmed their adherence to the principles of the revolution of Sept 28—whether in the framework of Arab unity or within the framework of internal work for achieving Arab socialism and true democracy, in accordance with the following principles:

1. Arab Unity: (a) Formation of a voluntary and comprehensive Arab unity (or union—uwahdah) on a decentralized and constitutional basis in order that this unity may bring equality among the Arab countries and guarantee their cooperation in meeting their "domestic requirements" within a framework of freedom and true democratic principles; (b) the implementation of an Arab spiritual renaissance.

2. Arab Socialism and its Social Bases: The state will (a) implement sound principles of socialism which will secure economic prosperity by increasing productivity and social justice; (b) uphold ownership (property) and protect individual competition within the limits of the law and through fair distribution of products; (c) intervene in matters of supplies and price control and fight exploitation and monopolies so as to prevent the concentration of capital in a way which may lead to domination, and open up opportunities for small investors; (d) a most important duty of the state is to secure work for the citizens; (e) the state will act to protect workers from arbitrary dismissals and safeguard their social gains and trade union freedom; (f) extend aid to labour organizations, promote labour culture (sic), adhere to international labour agreements, and coordinate labour and social legislation with the socialist plan of the state, in order to increase the gains of the workers; (g) the state will "attempt" to secure the participation of workers in management, to give them their share of profits, to create a spirit of cooperation between employers and employees and to follow the principle of tripartite consultations. Pattern of Moderation Seen in Syrian Politics. In a sympathetic comment Al-Jaridah said that the Charter had disproved the forebodings of an old-style political struggle for Syria, deteriorating perhaps into civil war. The government had shown wisdom in its "scientific programme" for Arab unity (p. 159 b), and its safeguarding of socialist gains through a policy of moderation of "not making the rich man poor and not leaving the poor man poor."

The signing of the Charter marked three achievements: 1. the Syrian army was firmly determined to keep out of politics and to underwrite a parliamentary democracy; 2. the political parties and groupings would exercise their right of political freedom in the framework of the Charter without resorting to unethical practices; 3. the extreme Syrian Right was meeting the extreme Left on the need for a moderate socialist policy.

The Charter, Al-Jaridah said, was also expressive of the general will in regard to Arab unity. The Charter embodied the lessons learnt by the Syrian people. (Jaridah, Nov 11)

In another article Al-Jaridah remarked that the National Charter was certain to provide the basis for election programmes and the provisional constitution; the Charter had been signed by representatives of all the parties except the Communists (Jaridah, Nov 11). The Ulanā and the Muslim Brethren, it was noted, also had not signed (Akhbar al-Uṣbu', Jordan, Nov 17). A [pro-Egyptian] newspaper claimed that Salāh al-Bitār's name appeared on the document without his knowledge. (Ha-wadith, Nov 17)

Army Support. On Nov 11 the army command published a statement pledging its support for the Charter and asserting its faith in "parliamentary democratic life" without army interference in politics; it would not let past mistakes recur. (R. Damascus, Nov 11 [14])

Syrian Comments. ANA interviewed various Syrian personalities on the significance of the Charter.

Gen. Zahr ad-Din told ANA that the convention which led to the signing of the Charter was "one of the tasks which the army had taken upon itself" after the revolution. The army was determined not to intervene in politics, to remain impartial and to work only for the good of the country.

Sabri al-Azālī called the Charter a big step towards closing the ranks and expressed his hope that a moderate socialist policy would be followed, reflecting all the trends incorporated in the Charter. (Jaridah, Nov 11)

Akram al-Hurāni stressed that all the principles of the Charter would remain on paper only if the signatories would not work for its implementation; free elections would be the truest guarantee of the Charter. As to Arab unity, the Charter reflected the lesson learned under the UAR, that a future union must be based on "democracy, freedom, homogeneity (takāfu'), equality and constitutional decentralization." The Charter, Hurāni said, had also placed socialism within the framework of parliamentary democracy, the true road towards a future Arab union. (Jaridah, Nov 12)

THE TEMPORARY CONSTITUTION

[With the signing of the National Charter the stage was now set for the promulgation of the temporary constitution.]

The Temporary Constitution (dustūr muwaqqat) published on Nov 15 (Government Decree No. 216 of Nov 12) read as follows:

"Art. 1. The Syrian Arab Republic is an independent sovereign state constituting a part of the great Arab homeland.

"Art. 2. The people shall elect a Constituent and Parliamentary Assembly (majlis ta'isi wa-nayyib) through direct secret ballot. The Assembly term will be four years.

"Art. 3. The Assembly shall convene within ten days after the announcement of the election results, at the invitation of the transitional cabinet.

"Art. 4. The Assembly shall assume the task of preparing a constitution for the Republic within a maximum period of six months, and then it will become a Parliamentary Assembly.

"Art. 5. At its first meeting the Assembly shall elect its president and secretariat members.

"Art. 6. The Assembly shall wield legislative powers during the period required for preparing the Constitution in accordance with the following basis:

(a) Bills shall be proposed by the Government or by at least 10 Deputies.

(b) Laws shall be issued by the President after being approved by the Assembly and shall be published in the Official Gazette.

(c) The President can refer a law back to the Assembly within ten days for reconsideration. If the Assembly insists on the law, the President shall promulgate it.

"Art. 7. The Assembly shall elect a President for the Republic for a period of five years. Two-thirds majority is required during the first voting. If such a majority is not ensured, then an absolute majority will decide the election. If this majority is not obtainable either, then a proportional majority will decide the election during the third vote.

GENERAL ELECTIONS AND REFERENDUM

"Art. 8. (a) The President of the Republic shall assume executive powers, assisted by the Cabinet. (b) Until the publication of the new Constitution, the President of the Republic, the Cabinet, and the ministers shall wield executive powers in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of July 5, 1950." (R. Damascus, Nov 15 [16]; Jaridah Rasmayah, Nov 15)

GENERAL ELECTIONS AND REFERENDUM

PREPARING THE ELECTIONS

[In addition to the elections for a constituent assembly, the government decided in Nov to hold on the same occasion a referendum on the provisional constitution, which it issued as a decree on Nov 15. See below.]

Electoral Law Amended. On Oct 11 Adnān al-Quwatli, the Minister of the Interior, said that he expected elections to take place in Dec 1961 or Jan 1962. (Nasr, Oct 12)

On Oct 29 legislative decree No. 56 provided for an amended election law. The decree cancelled the UAR Presidential Decree No. 139 of May 15, 1959 which amended the 1949 Syrian Law on General Elections (Decree No. 17 of Sept 10, 1949). At the same time the decree amended the 1949 law.

The basic provisions of the 1949 law remained in force: every Syrian national who had reached the age of 18 to have the right to vote; one deputy for every 30,000 voters; separate representation of non-Muslims and Bedouin tribes. Following are the more important amendments: women, who in the 1949 law were accorded active suffrage, provided they held elementary education certificates, were now also given passive suffrage. In constituencies having both Muslim and non-Muslim seats, the vote would be non-valid if the ballot bore the names of candidates of one community only. The government was empowered to adjust the borders of the constituencies which otherwise remained, as in the 1949 law, identical with provincial and district divisions; (PM Kuzbari later assured the politicians that—rumours to the contrary—this stipulation aimed only at correcting situations where the lack of a few eligible voters might deprive citizens of a right to an Assembly seat; Nasr, Nov 12.) The deadline for various pre-election procedures was set for 15 days before election day. Bedouin tribes were allocated five seats (later raised to seven—Mid. Mir., Nov 18). (Jaridah Rasmayah, Oct 30; for 1949 law see: H.M. Davis: Constitutions, Electoral Laws, Treaties of States in the Near and Middle East; Durham, N.C. 1953, p. 434 et seq.)

A central Elections Supervision Board was formed under the chairmanship of Abd al-Salām al-Tarmanīni, mayor of Damascus, with four judges as members. (Nasr, Nov 10)

Civil registrars were empowered to establish the place of residence of nomads for voting purposes. (Nasr, Nov 14)

Elections and Referendum, Date, Arrangements. Government decree No. 231 of Nov 12 defined the forthcoming vote as a dual event—a "plebiscite on the provisional constitution" and "elections to the Constituent and Parliamentary Assembly" and fixed Dec 1 as election day. (Jaridah Rasmayah, Nov 15)

It was later directed that [as provided in the election law] balloting would be extended to Dec 2, if by the time the poll closed on Dec 1 less than 51% of the voters had cast their vote. (ANA, Nov 27 [29])

The deadline for nomination of candidates, originally set to take place between Nov 16 to 20, was later extended to Nov 22. (R. Damascus, Nov 14, 21-IMB, Nov 15, 21)

Constituencies. On Nov 14 the electoral constituencies were announced. There would be a total of 165 deputies, 141 Muslims and 16 non-Muslims. (For their distribution according to constituencies, see table pp 503-5.)

CARETAKER GOVERNMENT OF IZZAT AN-NUS

(November 20)

The government reportedly decided that ministers appearing as candidates in the elections should resign from the cabinet. Dr Kuzbari, the PM, was exempted from this rule "for the good of the country and as he had been the first statesman to cooperate in the revolution" (Hayat, Nov 15). The Minister of the Interior denied this but said that a regulation to this effect had been suggested by some ministers. (Nasr, Nov 16)

Accordingly, the resignation of the following ministers was announced on Nov 18: Leon Zamariya [Finance and Supplies] Farhān al-Jandali [Health], Fu'ād al-Adil [Labour and Social Affairs] and Sa'īd as-Sayyid [Agrarian Reform] who later withdrew his resignation. (ANA, Nov 18 [19])

Izzat an-Nus—Prime Minister. On Nov 20 the government created the post of deputy PM and appointed to it Dr Izzat an-Nus, the Minister of Education.

Thereupon Dr Kuzbari tendered his resignation as PM as he had nominated himself for election, and Dr Nus automatically became Prime Minister. He formed the cabinet as follows: Dr Izzat an-Nus—PM, Defence, Foreign Affairs; Fathallah Asyūn—Social Affairs and Labour; Dr Awad Barakāt—Economy and Industry; Ahmad Sulṭān—Justice, Waqfs; Abd ar-Rahmān Hurriyah—Public Works, Communications and Planning; Dr Nu'mān al-Azhari—Finance and Supply; Dr Mustafa al-Barūdī—Propaganda, Municipal and Village Affairs; Sa'īd as-Sayyid, Agrarian Reform, Agriculture; Dr Ahmad as-Sammān—Education and National Guidance; Abd al-Salām al-Tarmanīni—Interior, Health, Public Relief.

Majid al-Ghazzi was appointed mayor of Damascus in place of Abd al-Salām al-Tarmanīni. (R. Damascus, Nov 21 [22])

On Nov 23 Dr Awad Barakāt, Minister of Economy and Industry, resigned in order to stand for election. The Ministry of Industry was assigned to Fathallah Asyūn, and the Ministry of Economy to Nu'mān al-Azhari. (R. Damascus, Nov 23 [25])

Dr Kuzbari's resignation was ascribed to his desire "to keep neutral and shun partyism."

In a statement of policy, Dr Nus, the new PM, stressed, above all, the transitional character of his government, which had as its main task the holding of elections "at their scheduled time and in an atmosphere of neutrality, impartiality and confidence." (R. Damascus, Nov 21 [23])

THE ELECTION CAMPAIGN

The duration of the election campaign was set for the period Nov 22 to Nov 29, two days before the start of the elections. (Mid. Mir., Nov 25)

Regulations for "Election Charter," Election Campaign Conduct. These were made public by PM Kuzbari on Nov 10 in a speech at a luncheon in honour of the politicians who signed the National Charter. He said he had discussed the question with the government, the army and others.

The regulations were aimed at assuring full freedom: there would be a ban during the election period on anything that might harm the safety of the army or public security or contradict Arab national principles. Sincere criticism was allowed "especially of the government" which was "eager to listen to the word of justice" and to correct deviations, if any.

Propaganda on radio and television was banned. Publication of election material in the press on equal terms would be regulated by neutral committees of three persons, headed by the governor, to be established in "each town" (province). There would be no publication on the first or the last pages, "lest the candidates should object, for example, to having a statement by one candidate on the first page and by another on an inner page." The army had no intention of interfering in politics and should be kept out of the election campaign. (R. Damascus, Nov 10 [13]; Nasr, Nov 12)

According to Al-Hayāt, the above points were incorporated in an "election charter" which was signed by all the signatories to the National Charter. A six-man committee had been appointed to supervise this charter's implementation. (Hayat, Nov 14; see also Mid. Mir., Nov 18.)

Army Confirms Its Neutrality. Three days before the official opening of the campaign on Nov 22, the army command issued a statement asserting its neutrality in the elections as "the faithful guardian of the people's gains and aspirations" and a warning that it would "strike with an iron fist" at opportunists who were trying to use the army's name in the election campaign. The statement said that several candidates were falsely claiming to be army nominees. (R. Damascus, Nov 19 [22])

Lists of Candidates. Al-Jaridah reported activity among political leaders to compile lists "within the framework of the National Charter." (Jaridah, Nov 14)

On Nov 25 the Ministry of the Interior announced that the total number of candidates was 1,697. In the larger towns, 208 candidates had been put up in Damascus, 169 in Aleppo, 105 in Homs, 70 in Hama, 50 in Qamishli, 30 in Deir ez-Zor, 20 in Suweida, 19 in Latakia and 19 in Der'a (Nasr, Nov 26). However, on the eve of the elections the total was given as 1,876, including 11 women. (Mid. Mir., Dec 2, 9)

Lists. [The election lists were ostensibly personal combinations, with several names appearing in more than one list, like those of Kuzbari, Bitar and Khālid al-Azm; however, in many, if not in most cases there were party undertones. The Syrian press gave the lists very limited coverage. Since the voter wrote on the ballot paper the candidate of his choice, and not the list, the significance of the lists lay in the associations they elicited amongst the electorate—insofar as they became aware of them at all.]

Damascus. In Damascus the principal lists that came before the voter on election day were the Coalition List (Mid. Mir., Dec 2), headed by Sabri al-Asali and Dr Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari, apparently identical with the People's List (qā'imāt ash-sha'ab (see below); the People's Struggle List (qā'imāt nidd al-ash-sha'ab) headed by Salāh ad-Dīn al-Bitar [Ba'ath] and Nāsir an-Nābulisi, a trade union leader; an "independent list" with Khālid al-Azm, the former [leftist] PM, and a list of university teachers.

The People's List (according to Al-Jaridah, Nov 30) comprised Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari [Indep.], Adnān al-Quwatli [Indep.], Fu'ād al-Adil [Indep.], Rashād Jabri [Sha'ab], Sabri al-Asali [Watanī], Khālid al-Azm [Indep.], Nassūh Bābil ("for the journalists"), Bashir Ramadan [Mus. Br.] ("for the merchants"), Yassin as-Safadi ("for the industrialists"), Isām al-Attār [Muslim Brethren], Riyād al-Maydāni [Watanī], Mukhtār Diyāb, Nassūh al-Ayyūbi [Indep.], Zāfir al-Qāsimi [Watanī], Dr. Awad Barakāt [Indep.], Hunayn Sahnāwi (industrialist); and Jubrān Kandalaft ("for the Christians") [Liber. Mov.].

During the stage which preceded the final crystallization of election lists, a list presenting Khālid al-Azm and Salāh ad-Dīn al-Bitar was set up, but collapsed after a couple of days. (Nasr, Nov 23-30; Hayat, Nov 23, 24, 25, 28, 29; Jaridah, Nov 29, 30; Siyasah, Nov 30; Mid. Mir., Dec 2)

Aleppo. In Aleppo four lists competed: the Coalition Front (al-jabha al-mu'talafah) headed by Ma'rūf ad-Dawālībī [Sha'ab], Rashād Barnada [Sha'ab] and Alī ad-Dīn al-Jābirī [Sha'ab]; the United Cooperative Front (al-jabha al-ta'dwiniyah-al-muttahidah), headed by Abd al-Fattāh al-Ghudda [said to belong either to the Muslim Brethren or the Sha'ab party]; the Arab Front headed by Wahbi al-Hariri; and a fourth list to be headed by Dr Ihsān ar-Rifā'i [Watanī], chairman of the local medical association. (Nasr, Nov 24)

Homs. In Homs five lists were put up: the "Country" (rif) list headed by Muhammad Ali al-Umar; a list headed by Hāni as-Sibā'i (leftist); a list headed by Fayd al-Atāsi [Sha'ab]; a list headed by Munib Raslān [Indep. or Watanī party]; and a list headed by Muzhir al-Husseini. As-Nasr noted that attempts to set up a united trade union list had failed. (Nasr, Nov 26; Jaridah, Nov 30)

Hama. In Hama two factions keenly contest the elections: that of Akram Hurānī [Ba'ath] and the other headed by Ra'if al-Mulqi (a pre-union minister), Mustafa as-Sayrafi, Na'an Arwānah, Abd ar-Rahman al-Azm and Abdallah al-Barāzi. (Jaridah, Nov 29, 30)

Communist Leader Refused Entry Into Syria. On Nov 19 Khālid Bakdīsh, leader of the illegal Syrian Communist Party, arrived at Damascus airport from Prague, accompanied by two lawyers. They were not allowed to alight, and attempted unsuccessfully to contact the Minister of the Interior. After a four hour stay, the party returned to Prague via Baghdad.

Lebanese Communist circles said that Bakdīsh had intended to nominate himself for the elections. (ANA, Nov 20, 21 [22, 23])

The Election Campaign. The election campaign opened officially on Nov 22, though an election atmosphere became apparent earlier. Officially permitted propaganda was very limited. Each candidate was allowed one statement only, of 63 lines, in morning and evening newspapers, and the statement had to be approved by the election committees.

The Times called the election "one of the strangest in recent times. Candidates adopted a straightjacket in the hope that no passions would be aroused"; "publicity had been controlled and limited." "A few loudspeaker vans sped down the streets [of Damascus] but otherwise the city was quiet." (Times, Nov 30; Mid. Mir., Dec 2)

Conflicting Reports on Mood of Electorate: "Pro-Government"; Pro-UAR. [Conflicting reports on a general pro-government atmosphere and specified anti-government incidents arrived in parallel, the former from Western and independent Lebanese, the latter from UAR and pro-UAR sources.]

In mid-Nov a Western observer reported that Syrians "in their present optimistic mood" believed that they could make democracy work (Guardian, Nov 16). To a Lebanese observer, the general interest in the elections, the great number of candidates and the resignation of the ministers who put themselves up for election, served as evidence of a free and democratic spirit which augured well for the coming Assembly (Jaridah, Nov 22). The campaign was reported to be progressing in a quiet and orderly fashion. (R. Beirut, Nov 25-IMB, Nov 27)

The heads of the Christian communities issued a joint election appeal expressing "joy at the liberation of our homeland from an era which has weighed heavily on all." (Mid. Mir., Nov 25)

[Cairo and pro-UAR sources presented a different picture:] Cairo Radio repeatedly called on the Syrian people, directly and by implication, to boycott the election (e.g. R. Cairo, Nov 30 [Dec 2], Dec 1 [4]). Demonstrations for Arab unity had taken place in Deir'a on Nov 13; demonstrations in Aleppo on Nov 17 had led to clashes between secondary school students and the army. (R. Cairo, Nov 18-IMB, Nov 19)

Students had been arrested in Aleppo and Damascus, and the police raided printing presses after anti-government leaflets signed by "The Syrian People's Organization" had been distributed. (R. Cairo, Nov 19 [21])

A [pro-UAR] Lebanese newspaper reported that leaflets signed by the "People's Revolutionary Organization" (munazzamat ash-sha'ab ath-thawriyah) had been distributed throughout Syria, and especially in Aleppo. The leaflets explained that the organization had been set up by the "Free Nationalist Youths" (ash-shobab al-wataniyyin al-ahdr) to protect "the rights of the people from the separatist reactionary movement." In particular, they warned "free soldiers" not to hurt citizens for the sake of the "ruling clique." (Siyasah, Nov 19)

A week later, on Nov 25, leaflets were distributed in Damascus calling for a boycott of the elections (Nohar, Beirut, Nov 26). The same day Cairo Radio reported the arrest of secondary school pupils following the distribution of such leaflets in Damascus, Aleppo, Latakia and Deir ez-Zor. (R. Cairo, Nov 25 [26])

On the eve of the elections, according to Cairo and [pro-UAR] sources, 300 girl students demonstrated at Damascus University against the "reactionary movement" and were arrested. Pro-UAR leaflets were distributed calling for a boycott of the elections. (R. Cairo, Nov 29 [Dec 1]; Kul Shay, Beirut, Dec 2)

At the same time Egyptian sources kept reporting general public distrust in the approaching elections (e.g. R. Cairo, Nov 24, 25, 26-IMB, Nov 26; R. Cairo, Nov 29-IMB, Nov 30).

On Nov 29 two bombs were thrown in Damascus injuring two people, one at the house of Sabri al-Azali

[leader of the Watani party], the other near the officers' club (ANA, Nov 29 [Dec 1]; BBC in Arabic-IMB, Nov 30). In a press interview, Dr Kuzbari blamed supporters of Abdel Nasser for these incidents. (NYT, Dec 1)

Rightists Versus Leftists; Traditional Groupings. Summing up on the eve of the elections, Al-Jaridah saw two main factions: the rightists who wanted abolition of the socialist measures taken under the union, and the leftists who desired their retention, though both sides avoided plain words and preferred generalizations; on the other hand, all desired a democratic contest. There were also candidates representing splinter groups from the extreme right to the extreme left. The paper foresaw that in Damascus the right would emerge victorious, mainly because of disunity amongst their rivals. On the other hand in Homs and Hama the leftists were stronger because of public sensitivity there to peasant problems. In the Jazirah and the Jabal Druze the family factor was decisive. (Jaridah, Nov 30)

The Arrest of Lt-Col. Kuzbari. Towards the end of Nov it became known that Lt-Col. Haydar al-Kuzbari of the Revolutionary Command had been arrested. "According to rumour" he had tried to canvass support for the election of his kinsman, Ma'mun al-Kuzbari, to the presidency of the Republic; (see p 496 a).

THE ELECTIONS AND THE REFERENDUM

Proceedings. The elections and referendum took place on Dec 1.

In most constituencies more than 51% of the electorate had voted by the close of the poll on Dec 1; in the remaining constituencies polling stations reopened at 5 a.m. on Dec 2. (R. Damascus, Dec 2 [4])

The vote in the referendum was public. The voter had to choose either a green slip marked "I approve of the temporary constitution" or a red slip marked "I disapprove of the temporary constitution," and put the slip of his choice into the ballot box in the presence of an official.

The vote for the Assembly was secret; the elector received an envelope and a blank ballot paper and stepped into a booth. He could then copy on to the ballot paper the names of candidates from his district from a list posted on the wall, or he could use a list he had brought with him.

Dana A. Schmidt, The New York Times correspondent, remarked that as regards the referendum "few voters under the circumstances would ask for a red slip." Thus, its results would have to be evaluated in terms of participation and abstention. At the same time he quoted "some Syrians" as calling the elections "the fairest vote in Syrian history." (NYT, Dec 2)

Calm Atmosphere. The election proceeded in an orderly way and calm atmosphere, according to Syrian, Western and some Lebanese sources. (BBC in Arabic, Dec 1-IMB, Dec 3; NYT; Jaridah, Dec 2)

During the first polling-day Abd as-Salam at-Tarmani, the Minister of the Interior, reported that the elections were proceeding in an atmosphere of peace and order; at Damascus the minister "witnessed a sportsmanlike battle." A judge was present at each Damascus polling station, and a member of the state controller's office investigated complaints at the municipality headquarters. (R. Damascus, Dec 1 [4])

[Cairo's story was different.] The elections were "a contest between feudalists and capitalists." The army was investigating polling stations and compelling undesirable candidates to withdraw. Apathy, abstentions, anti-regime demonstrations and bomb-throwings marked the day. (R. Cairo, Dec 1 [4-IMB, Dec 3])

After the results had been published, the Minister of the Interior and the C-in-C of the armed forces broadcast statements congratulating the public on its behaviour during the elections and asserting that strict impartiality and non-interference had been observed; the C-in-C added that the results proved the futility of any attempt to mislead the Syrian people. (R. Damascus, Dec 5 [7])

On Dec 9 a delegation of religious leaders thanked the government for the fair and neutral attitude it had shown during the elections. (R. Damascus, Dec 9-IMB, Dec 10)

Disturbances in Hama Over Hurānī's Victory. After publication of the election results on Dec 2, there was tension in Hama, which reached the breaking point on Dec 5, when the military opened fire on demonstrators. The background to the troubles was the demarcation of the Hama constituency, which included a majority of village voters, despite previous demands for separate representation. Since the villagers voted in the main for Akram Hurānī's "Socialist List," the conservative town list headed by Abd ar-Rahmān al-Azmī lost the elections, to the dismay of conservative townspeople who considered themselves cheated of their due. Hurānī's victory was reported as having greatly disturbed merchants and capitalists in general, who had hoped for his eclipse. (Jaridah, Dec 3, 6; Nahar; Hayat, Dec 6)

Participation. In the absence of official figures, the electorate was estimated at between 1,000,000 and 1,250,000. (NYT, Dec 2)

According to the Minister of the Interior, participation in the various constituencies ranged from 48% to 84%, "a figure not reached in Syria before" (R. Damascus, Dec 6-IMB, Dec 7). Another official spokesman said participation had been "ideal"; in Damascus for example, participation was 46% as compared with 33% in 1954 (Hayat, Dec 5). [In the last Syrian elections before the merger with Egypt, in Sept-Oct 1954, participation was rather less than 50%. Initial participation was so low that on election day and the reserve election day, only

107 out of the 142 deputies were elected and an extra two days were needed to elect them all.]

Temporary Constitution Approved. On Dec 5 the following results of the referendum were officially announced: Votes—636,586 [50 to 60% of the electorate]; votes in favour of the constitution—617,880 (97.6%); against—18,706.

The constitution came into force with the announcement of the referendum results. (R. Damascus, Dec 5 [7])

Concerning the significance of the referendum, The Guardian, while remarking on the absence of secrecy, nevertheless held that "the efforts made from Cairo to persuade Syrians to abstain from voting seem to have failed" and added, "one can safely assume from the ballot that a majority of Syrians are glad . . . to have been released from . . . the UAR" (Guardian, Dec 7). Another paper calculated that the overall participation in the plebiscite was about 60%; 20% would have abstained for reasons of old age and infirmity, so that not more than another 20% could have abstained to demonstrate their loyalty to Abdel Nasser. (Daily Telegraph, Dec 4)

Election Results According to Party Affiliations; Right and Left Tendencies. [Though there were only independent candidates or non-party lists the election results were interpreted on the basis of party affiliations and of rightist versus leftist tendencies. Since, however, by the time of the elections, the parties had been officially disbanded for almost four years and even beforehand there had been a certain measure of fluidity in party affiliations, the estimates of party strength varied considerably. This was also true of the right versus left estimates because of contradictory tendencies inside the various parties and groupings and because of the large number of independents.]

The most detailed tally, according to party and other affiliations, was attempted by two Lebanese papers, Al-Jaridah and An-Nahar (see accompanying table).

Below, totals are given according to these and other sources. The results of the 1954 general elections, the last before the union with Egypt, are given for comparison. The 1954 House had 142 deputies as compared with 172 in the Constituent Assembly.

² Amongst the "independents" in 1954 there were some supporters of the Liberation movement, the Muslim Brethren and of various leftist trends.

The Economist, writing after the election of Dr Kuzbari as the speaker of the House, thought that the 47 who voted against him and put up a former Ba'athist as their candidate gave "a very rough indication of the left-of-centre's numerical strength." (Economist, Dec 23)

Many Veteran Deputies Re-elected. [At least 56 of the 142 deputies elected to the Chamber in Sept-Oct 1954 were elected to the Assembly. At least 13 Assembly members belonged to families or clans who had others of their members elected to the Chamber in 1954. These figures do not take into account changes in the 1954 Chamber effected through by-elections. It was remarked that the brevity and the limitations imposed on the election campaign favoured the better-known candidates; however, the phenomenon of traditional, regional, family strongholds no doubt also affected these results. See list of deputies.]

The four Damascus candidates who received the greatest number of votes were Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari [the former PM]—16,578, Isām al-Attār [Muslim Brethren]—16,182, Khālid al-Azm [independent, leftist, received the greatest number of votes in the 1954 elections]—15,456, Awad Barakāt [former Minister of Economy and Industry, independent, moderate rightist]—12,999 (R. Damascus, Dec 4-IMB, Dec 4). [Salāh ad-Dīn al-Bitār, the Ba'ath leader, failed to be elected.]

[None of the eleven women candidates were returned.]

Rightists Predominant; Success of Muslim Brethren. It was generally agreed that the results were a victory for the right. The success of the Muslim Brethren usually defined as "extreme right" and "anti-Nasser" was especially noted. (Jaridah, Dec 7; Mid. Mir., Dec 9; Economist, Dec 23; Times, Dec 27)

Three weeks after the elections The Economist summarized the relevance of the customary political terminology as follows: "The extreme Right looks for a full return to the situation before union, and would, if it could, cancel all laws relating to land distribution and nationalisation. The Left would complete the land reform programme and carry on with a limited amount of economic planning. The Centre would accept those socialisation measures that have been put into practice, but probably no more." The paper defined the Centre as "moderate conservative." (Economist, Dec 23)

Al-Jaridah likened the composition of the new Assembly to that of 1954. The Sha'ab Party had remained the strongest faction, which also attracted some of the many independents; the Watani and Ba'ath parties followed; the other groups were insignificant as far as their voting strength was concerned. (Jaridah, Dec 7)

RESULTS OF ELECTIONS TO CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY (CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES)

December 1-2, 1961

Notes. The list below has been compiled as follows: Al-Ayyam, Dec 4, An-Naar, Dec 6, both Damascus papers, and Damascus Radio, Dec 5-BBCM, Dec 7 (with corrections in BBCM, Dec 8) have been used for the basic list and for the spelling of names, the papers for the consonants, the BBC monitoring for the vocal sounds.

Party affiliation has been given according to two Beirut papers: Al-Jaridah, Dec 5, given as (J) after the party name and An-Nahar, Dec 5, given as (N). Al-Jaridah omitted a number of names and both papers misspelled some names to an extent that made identification impossible. Where the two papers made the same identifications, no source has been indicated.

Some designations other than party-affiliations appeared: Bedouin Tribes which had special representatives; "Rural Tribes" (ashkār al-aryāl) employed by An-Nahar only for Kurdish and other settled tribes; ulanā, shaykhs and religious functionaries—employed by Al-Jaridah only. Whilst An-Nahar listed in addition to Ba'ath party members also "Socialists of the [Akram] al-Hūrani Bloc," Al-Jaridah listed "Ba'ath Supporters"; with the exception of one name, these two lists were not identical.

The sign ° shows that the Deputy had won a seat also in the general elections of Sept-Oct 1954.

The sign ° shows that a member of the Deputy's family or clan was elected to the Chamber in Sept-Oct 1954.

Designations have been added in square brackets where those given by the newspapers were inconsistent with the Deputy's otherwise known party affiliation.

POST-ELECTION POLITICS

THE ASSEMBLY AND THE PRESIDENCY

Anti-Left Pronouncements. [Soon after the elections, three prominent rightist politicians, newly elected to the Assembly, made sharply anti-Leftist pronouncements.]

Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari said that Syria would not tolerate Communism, because it opposed Islam and Arab nationalism; however, this attitude did not affect Syria's neutralism in international affairs. (BBC in Arabic, Dec 2-IMB, Dec 3)

Dr Dawālībī [the future PM] was reported attacking socialism as a movement of exploitation leading to dictatorship: "Our regime shall not be socialist, but humane." Dr Leon Zamariya condemned agrarian reform as economic sabotage and stated that the confiscation of lands had been expropriation pure and simple; he also attacked nationalization and directed economy in general. (Hayat, Dec 8)

Assembly Convened, Parliamentary Groupings. The Constituent and Parliamentary Assembly convened on Dec 12.

The day before, Maj.-Gen. Zahr ad-Din, the C-in-C, gave a dinner for the members of the government and the deputies. He promised his guests that the army would remain strong and watchful; it had made good its promise to return to the barracks and it wanted to retire from politics entirely but could not do so if ambitious politicians tried to exploit it for their purposes. He called upon those present to eschew quarrels and to lead the nation in its new epoch and said that it would be best if there were only two to three political groupings. (Nasr, Dec 12)

Parliamentary Blocs. As soon as the Assembly convened, parliamentary groupings or "blobs" (kutal) began to form:

The Country Bloc (kutlat ar-rif) of about 25 tribal and rural delegates, headed by Mut'ib ash-Shalān;

The Islamic Cooperative Bloc (al-kutalah al-islamiyah) of between 15-20 delegates "former Muslim Brethren and supported by the ulamā'" (Jaridah, Dec 12), headed by a committee composed by Isām al-Attār (secretary), and Dr Mustafa az-Zarqā, Abd al-Fattāh Abu-Riddāh and Bashir Ramadān as members;

The Constitutional Bloc (al-kutlah al-dusturiyah) of 25 members;

The Socialist Bloc (al-kutlah al-ihtirakiyah), headed by Akram Hurāni;

The Bloc of Khālid al-Azm;

The Jazirah and Euphrates Bloc and the Damascus Progressive Bloc (al-kutlah al-taqaddumiyyah fi-dimashq), both mentioned in the composition of the Dawālībī cabinet;

The Sha'ab Bloc;

The Watani Bloc.

(Jaridah, Dec 12, 21; Hayat, Dec 16, 23; Mid. Mir., Dec 23)

Struggle Over the Presidency. The time between the elections and the convening of the Assembly was taken up with manoeuvres regarding elections to the presidency of the Republic and the presidency of the Assembly (the speaker).

Prominent candidates mentioned were Nāzīm al-Qudsi or Ruḥdī al-Kikhya [either as nominee of the Sha'ab Party], Kuzbari and Khālid al-Azm. Kikhya, the former President of the Sha'ab Party, categorically refused to become a candidate (he had not put up his candidacy for the Assembly either). The others were active candidates; Akram Hurāni was also reported to be canvassing support [presumably for leftist candidates].

[The outcome of the elections became a foregone conclusion] when a meeting of 100 [rightist] deputies, representing the Sha'ab Party, the Watani Party, the tribes and the Muslim Brethren unanimously decided on the candidacy of Qudsi for President, and of Kuzbari for President of the Assembly. (Jaridah, Dec 7; Manar, Dec 10; Difa, Dec 11; R. Beirut, Dec 11-IMB, Dec 11)

Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari—President of the Assembly. At its first meeting on Dec 12, the Assembly elected Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari as its president by 114 votes of the Sha'ab, Watani, religious and tribal delegates against 47 votes for Jalāl as-Sayyid, who was supported by the Ba'athists and leftists, and 7 votes for Sa'id al-Ghazzi. [Jalāl as-Sayyid had been a member of the Ba'ath until 1955 when he left the party because it opposed a union with Iraq under Nūrī Sa'id.] Rafiq Bashshūr and Abd as-Samad al-Futayih were elected deputy presidents, and Abd al-Latif al-Yūsini and Umar Awdah al-Khatib, secretaries. (R. Damascus, Dec 12 [13, 14]; Jaridah, Dec 13)

This outcome was regarded as another victory of the right over the left. (Financial Times; Times, Dec 15)

Dr Nāzīm al-Qudsi was born in Aleppo in 1905. After studying law at Damascus and Geneva he practised in Aleppo, where he was elected deputy in 1936 and was reelected in 1943, 1947, 1949 and 1954. He joined the National Bloc and later became a leader of the Sha'ab Party, elected in 1948. Between 1945 and 1949 he served as Minister to Washington and in 1949, after the Hīnāwī coup, he became Foreign Minister. From June 1950 to March 1951 he served as PM in predominantly Sha'ab cabinets. Between 1951 and 1958, he was elected four times Speaker of the Chamber of Deputies. During the union with Egypt he was politically inactive and was chairman of the board of directors of the Bank of the Arab World. (Difa, Jordan, Dec 15; Mid. Mir., Dec 16)

In his address to the Assembly, President Qudsi expressed his sorrow that the return of Syria to parliamentary democracy should have been the result of the failure to realize Arab unity and dwelt on Syria's leading role in Arab nationalism. Syria's "dearest aim" was a "unified Arab structure." In the international field Syria was pursuing a policy of non-alignment. The democratic parliamentary system, he said, re-established in response to the people's will, had its shortcomings and entailed hardships and it was for those responsible to see that they were kept to a minimum. The social and economic policy should primarily aim at improving the lot of the individual citizen. Of the development projects to be furthered, the President gave prominence to the Euphrates plan and to oil prospecting. Syria's obligations in regard to Arab problems—Algeria and Palestine and dependent Arab territories—made her economic development particularly urgent. The President warmly thanked the army for having enabled Syria to return to the "path of freedom and honour." (R. Damascus, Dec 14 [15])

THE DAWALIBI GOVERNMENT

Under the provisional constitution, the first task of the Assembly after the election of the President was the formation of the government.

Nus Cabinet Resigns. On Dec 14 Dr Izzat an-Nus handed in the resignation of his transitional government to the President who asked him to continue in office until the formation of a new cabinet. (Nasr, Dec 15)

There was a consensus of opinion that the new cabinet should have the widest possible support of the Assembly. The politicians received by President Qudsi for consultations were Sa'îd al-Ghazzi, Khâlid al-Azm, Sabri al-Asali, Akram al-Hurâni, Ma'rûf ad-Dawâlibi, Leon Zamariya, As'ad Kurâni, Rashid ad-Duqr, Adnân Quwatli and Fu'âd al-Adil. (Jaridah, Dec 17, 19, 20)

On Dec 19 Ma'mûn al-Kuzbari, President of the Assembly, denied that there was a crisis concerning the formation of the cabinet; delays so far were due to the absence of political parties, to the fact that many deputies were new, and to the need for deputies to become acquainted with each other. (BBC in Arabic, Dec 19-IMB, Dec 20)

Dawâlibi Government Formed—"Right Wing Coalition". On Dec 21 President Qudsi entrusted Dr Ma'rûf ad-Dawâlibi with the formation of the government. The next day its composition was published. (R. Damascus, Dec 21, 22 [22, 26])

Dr Dawâlibi was born at Aleppo in 1907; he studied law in Damascus and Paris. He was elected deputy for Aleppo in 1947 and joined the Sha'ab Party. In 1951 he served for a short time as PM and Minister of Defence until he was ousted by Col. Shishakli. In 1954-55 he served again as Minister of Defence [Dr Dawâlibi was out of office since 1955, and politically inactive under the union.] (Mid. Mir., Hayat, Dec 23)

The government represented the former Sha'ab and Watani parties, the Constitutional and Islamic parliamentary blocs and independents. The Socialist Bloc and the bloc headed by Khâlid al-Azm were not represented.

On Dec 22 the composition of the cabinet was published: Dr Ma'rûf ad-Dawâlibi—PM, Foreign Affairs; (Sha'ab); Jalâl as-Sayyid—Deputy PM, Agriculture (Deir ez-Zor); "Ja'irah and Euphrates Bloc" one time Ba'ath; Rashid Barnada—Defence, Education (Aleppo, Sha'ab); Ahmad Qanbar—Interior (Aleppo, Sha'ab); Muhammad ash-Shawwâf—Public Works (Latakia; Sha'ab); Abd ar-Rahmân al-Hunaydi—Industry ("Ja'irah and Euphrates Bloc"—Sha'ab); Dr Mustafa az-Zarqâ—Justice, Awqâf (Aleppo); "Islamic Cooperative Bloc"; Dr Adnân al-Quwatli—Economy ("Damascus Progressive Bloc"—independent); Fu'âd al-Adil—National Guidance and Information ("Damascus Progressive Bloc"—independent); Mahmûd al-Azm—Health (Ghoutah, "Constitutional Bloc"); Na'ûm as-Suyûf—Planning (Aleppo); "Islamic Cooperative Bloc"—Watani; Ahmad Ali Kâmil—Communications (Jebel; "Constitutional Bloc") [Independent]; Dr Suhayr al-Khûri—Municipal and Rural Affairs (Damascus; Constitutional Bloc") [Watani]; Bakri al-Qabbâni—Agrarian Reform (Aleppo; Sha'ab—Jaridah, Watani—Hayat); Dr Rashid ad-Duqr—Finance, Supply ("Damascus Progressive Bloc"—independent); Muhammad Abdin—Social Affairs, Labour (Damascus; "Islamic Front"—Jaridah, "Damascus Progressive Bloc"—Hayat) (Mid. Mir., Jaridah, Hayat, Dec 23)

The following were serving as ministers for the first time: Sayyid, Duqr, Abdin, Suyûf, Qabbâni, Khûri, Kâmil and Azm. (Mid. Mir., Hayat, Jaridah, Dec 23)

"Right Wing Coalition". The Times regarded Dr Dawâlibi's government as a "broad coalition of right-wing elements" and therefore likely to gain a comfortable majority in the parliament "where the right-wing groups are dominant." The left-wingers were reported by the paper as having declined Dawâlibi's invitation to join the cabinet (Times, Dec 27). Le Monde held a similar view, stressing that the new government was bent on a conservative social and economic policy. (Monde, Dec 24)

The Ba'ath and the New Cabinet. [Akram Hurâni, the Ba'ath leader, did not entirely reject the idea of the Ba'ath joining the government.] He stated that the Ba'ath demanded of the government continued freedom for parties and the press, no interference with agrarian reform and nationalization principles, a detailed programme with guarantees of execution. Under these circumstances, the Ba'ath would not hesitate either to join the government, or to support it. President Qudsi, Hurâni added, had agreed to these points. (Nahar, Dec 20)

Economic Liberalization Envisaged; Pressures from Right and Left. [During the remaining days of 1961 the Dawâlibi government did not publish a comprehensive programme, but made it clear that its outlook was liberal in politics as well as in economic affairs.]

At a series of interviews and press conferences, Jalâl as-Sayyid, Ma'mûn al-Kuzbari and other prominent politicians said that the government had decided to restore civil liberties (al-hurriyyât al-ammah) and that the measures to be taken would be announced on Jan 8, 1962 when the government would appear before the Assembly to present its programme and receive its vote of confidence. (Jaridah, Dec 27, 29)

On Dec 27 Dr Dawâlibi told a delegation representing economic interests that his government would encourage economic liberalization, local capital and production (Hayat, Dec 28). [For Dawâlibi's anti-socialism—see p 506 a.]

It was reported that the Employers' Association (itti-hâd arbâb al-amal) had handed a memorandum to the government in which it requested that the Social Insurance Law No. 143/61 not be put into effect at the beginning of 1962, as stipulated in the law. The association objected to the increase in the social insurance contribution from 7% to 14% of the wage by both employer and employee, as provided for by the law; this increase, said the memorandum, did not fit the current economic situation. The government passed the memorandum to the Social Insurance Institute for an opinion. The Federation of Labour Unions was said to insist that the law be carried out as enacted. (Hayat, Dec 29)

Agrarian Reform. Jalâl as-Sayyid, the Deputy PM and Minister of Agriculture, said that the Agrarian Reform Law would remain in force, and that no amendments made would detract from peasant gains; he added that for the peasant the significance of agrarian reform was moral rather than economic (Hayat, Dec 27). At the same time the government decided to allocate £53.7 million in loans to peasants for the purchase of seeds. (Hayat, Dec 28)

The Permanent Constitution. The Constituent Assembly insisted on the immediate drafting of a permanent constitution. This, the Damascus An-Nassr paper said, was prompted by many factors, including the army's pledge to prevent the infiltration of its ranks by politics. An-Nassr said that the 1950 Constitution offered "a ready plan" which merely required some amendments (R. Damascus, Dec 21 [22]). This approach was later confirmed by Dr Kuzbari, President of the Assembly, who said that many deputies favoured it. (Jihad, Jordan, Dec 31)

Dr Kuzbari also announced that a committee of 39 deputies, representing the various trends in the Assembly, would start its work on the draft constitution during "the coming week." (R. Amman, Dec 28-131B, Dec 29)

Outlook for 1962. The overriding problem of Syria in the new year was described as how "with much the same men in charge, the country is to dodge the self-destructive routine of interminable but meaningless change, goaded by constant military intervention." (Economist, Dec 23)

Syria's Return to the UN. On Oct 13 Syria reoccupied her seat in the UN without opposition after Mahmūd Fawzi, the UAR Foreign Minister, had declared that his government would put no obstacles in the way of Syria's return. (Nasr, Oct 15, 17)

COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

USSR-SYRIAN POLITICAL RELATIONS; COMMUNIST VIEWS ON SYRIA

Soviet Recognition of the New Regime. [The USSR was the first of the major powers to recognize the Syrian Republic after Syria's secession from the UAR; recognition came on Oct 7. (Nasr, Oct 8; Izvestia, Oct 10)]

The New York Times Moscow correspondent noted the "unexpected swiftness" of Soviet recognition, and ascribed it to Moscow's desire to "re-establish the close ties with Syria" which had existed in 1958 prior to the union with Egypt. Moscow had decided "to risk straining its relations with Abdel Nasser to seek a foothold quickly in Syria" (NYT, Oct 8). On Oct 17 PM Khrushchov was reported as declaring that he hoped for increased trade between the two countries (Nasr, Oct 18). A few days later an official Syrian source said that Soviet technicians continued to carry out the tasks which had been agreed upon between the two sides [before the Syrian revolution]. (Nasr, Oct 26)

Communist Welcome of Secession Reported in Pravda. While official Soviet sources refrained from commenting upon Syria's break-away from the UAR, statements of the Syrian CP welcoming the event were given publicity in the Soviet press. On Oct 7, the day on which the Soviet Union recognized the new regime in Syria, Pravda reproduced a declaration by the Syrian CP praising the secession as a "historic victory" that had met with "wide response in the Arab East." A summary of the Syrian CP declaration was broadcast from Peking. (Pravda, Oct 7; R. Peking, Oct 14 [FE 17])

As reported in Pravda, Khālid Bakdash, SG of the Syrian CP, said in his speech to the 22nd Congress of the CPSU in Moscow, that Syria's secession reflected "not the break-up of Arab unity, but the bankruptcy of anti-democratic and anti-Communist policies." Events in Syria had again shown that "the path to Arab unity does not lead through annexation, expansion and domination, [nor] through the enslavement of one Arab state by another." (Pravda, Oct 25)

Military Relations. On Oct 3 Amman Radio reported from "reliable sources" in Damascus that the new Syrian Government had asked all Syrian army and air force officers training in the USSR to return home immediately (R. Amman, Oct 3 [W 12]). One week later the Jordanian daily Falastin said that Syria expected the supply of Soviet equipment to the Syrian armed forces to continue. (Falastin, Oct 10)

Appointment of Ambassadors. The USSR Consul-General in Damascus presented his credentials as USSR Ambassador to Syria on Nov 9 (Tass, Nov 9 [SU 11]). The Syrian Ambassador to Moscow presented his credentials on Dec 2. (Izvestia, Dec 4)

Soviet Attitude to New Regime Non-Committal. The refusal of the Syrian authorities to allow Khālid Bakdash to leave his plane when he arrived in Damascus from Prague on Nov 19 (see p 500 b) was reported without comment in Pravda on Nov 22.

[An article in Pravda on the forthcoming Syrian elections contained a cautious and restrained appraisal of the new regime.] Although "the representatives of the left-wing forces" had not been invited to a conference of political leaders in Nov, and although the document that resulted from that conference "basically reflects the demands of the national bourgeoisie," the article noted that "the needs of the workers are also mentioned." "Some Syrians" were deprived of the right to vote or to be elected. The new government had released some political detainees, but "Syrian public opinion" thought that the work of the commission set up to review the cases of those still in prison was taking "longer than is permissible." The article alleged that Western states were trying to exploit Syria's economic difficulties for political ends, but noted that "the Syrians greeted with great satisfaction the announcement by the temporary government that Syria will follow a policy of neutrality and non-participation in military blocs." Referring to Syria's "famous traditions" of liberty and democracy, the article concluded: "Friends of Syria hope that in the future, too, the Syrian Arab Republic will remain faithful to these traditions which originated in the years of dauntless struggle against the imperialists and colonizers." (Pravda, Nov 28; Mizan, Dec)

Bakdash Scores "Right-Wing Camp." [The views of the Syrian CP, reproduced in Soviet and other Communist media, were more outspokenly critical of the new Syrian regime.] In an interview given by Khalid Bakdash to the Italian Communist daily Unita, and reported in Pravda, he declared that "the policy which the right wing is trying to impose is meeting with opposition not only from the popular masses but even from certain circles of the bourgeoisie," and charged that "many students who demanded the restoration of the democratic freedoms" had been imprisoned. On the forthcoming elections Bakdash said that "the representatives of the right-wing camp are doing all they can to prevent the people from expressing their will freely." (Pravda, Nov 24; Mizan, Dec)

Similar criticisms were contained in a lengthy interview with Khalid Bakdash broadcast from Prague. (R. Prague, Nov 23 [EE 24])

Cultural Relations. A communiqué, following talks held in Dec between the Soviet Ambassador A.A. Barkovski and the Syrian Premier Izzat al-Nus, stated that the conclusion of a new cultural cooperation agreement was "indispensable" for the further development of cultural relations between Syria and the USSR. Until the conclusion of such an agreement, all existing provisions regulating cultural relations between the two countries, in particular the cultural cooperation agreement of Aug 20, 1956, would remain in full force. Further talks on cultural relations would be held by representatives of the two countries not later than the end of Feb 1962. (Hayat, Dec 21; Izvestia, Dec 22)

USSR ECONOMIC AND TECHNICAL AID

[Progress was reported on three of the major aid projects covered by the Moscow protocol of Sept 7, 1960 which amended the 1957 USSR-Syrian Aid Agreement (see MER 1960, p 84): the Homs fertilizer plant, the Qamishli-Aleppo-Latakia railway, and the surveying and prospecting programme.] Cairo reported that, in the spring of 1960, the USSR had already stated it would not finance the Euphrates dam project. (Ahram, June 29)

Homs Fertilizer Plant. The cornerstone of the Homs nitrogen fertilizer plant was laid on July 30 in the vicinity of the oil refinery. Construction was planned in two stages: the first to be completed by the end of 1964 would enable production at the rate of 55,000 tons annually; the second, to be completed by early 1968, would bring the capacity to 110,000 tons a year. Total cost was estimated at £$100m., of which £$60m. were earmarked for the import of equipment and machinery from the USSR. (Nasr, July 31; ANA, July 30 [W Aug 8]; MEED, Aug 4)

Qamishli-Aleppo-Latakia Railway. In March a Syrian official source said the cost of this line, including rolling stock and maintenance facilities, was estimated at £$ 400m., of which £$260m. would be expended in Syrian currency and £$140m. in foreign currency. Work was expected to begin in July. (ANA, March 25 [W 30]; Mid. Mir., April 1)

Sixteen Soviet experts arrived in Damascus in Feb to report upon plans drawn up by a Belgian firm for the 765 km. line and to conduct their own surveys (ANA, Feb 5 [W 9]; Ayyam, Feb 10; Nasr, Feb 11; Pravda, March 14). In May an official Syrian source stated that the experts recommended a substantial shortening of the line projected in the original Belgian plan, thus making possible a saving of "tens of millions of Syrian pounds" (ANA, May 31 [W, June 8]; Tass in English, June 1 [SU 5]). In Sept, however, it was reported that a proposal to shorten the line had been abandoned. (MEED, Sept 8)

In Nov it was reported that 30 Soviet railway specialists were expected to arrive in Syria by the end of the month. (Nasr, Nov 11)

Surveying and Prospecting. A team of Soviet surveyors was expected to leave for Syria on Jan to prepare a 1:100,000 topographical map of Syria. It was estimated that the work on the map would take two-and-a-half years (Nasr, Jan 1). In April it was reported that a group of Soviet experts had returned to the Soviet Union after completing work on a geological survey of an area of 138,000 sq. km. in Syria. Soviet aerial photography specialists who were compiling a 1:200,000 topographical map of an area of 126,000 sq. km. were expected to finish their work by the end of the month. (MENA, April 21 [24]; Sawt al-Arab, April 22)

The arrival in the Karachuk area of Soviet oil drilling equipment was reported in Feb (Eg. Gaz., Feb 26). In May it was reported that deep drilling would begin in the Ramilan and Western Karachuk fields, where it was hoped to find deposits of at least 1,000,000 tons. (Nasr, May 13)

In May Damascus Radio quoted the chief Soviet geological expert, Antonenko, on the progress of prospecting carried out by Soviet specialists. He gave details concerning iron ore deposits. Prospecting for phosphorites and for rock salt had begun. (R. Damascus, May 21 [W 25])

Agriculture and Irrigation. In Jan six Soviet agricultural experts toured various regions of Syria in order to acquaint themselves with the state of Syrian agriculture. They were to assist in the drafting of an agricultural research programme, the establishment of laboratories and experimental stations and in the training of local personnel. (Tass in English, Jan 28 [SU 31]; Nasr, Jan 28)

In Feb it was reported that a team of Soviet experts had completed preparations for experiments in the mechanized sowing of cotton, following the methods practiced in the Soviet Union. (Nasr, Feb 23)

Soviet forestry specialists visited Latakia in April in connection with a projected survey of forests in the area and the erection of a forestry research centre. (Wahdah, April 16)

Soviet experts had studied the utilization of the Khaur river for the irrigation of some 120,000 hectares, it was reported in Sept. (MENA, Sept 24 [W 28])

Gift of Hospital Equipment. An eye hospital, with equipment provided as a gift by the Soviet government, was officially opened in Damascus on April 16. (R. Moscow in Arabic, April 17 [SU 19])

BULGARIA

Bulgarian Work on Development Projects. In Jan discussions were held on the possibility of Bulgarian participation in the construction of roads, bridges and railways in Syria. (ANA, Jan 28 [W Feb 2])

On March 23 it was officially announced that the Bulgarian Techno-Impex organization had completed the Rastan dam in the Syrian Region (see also MER 1960, p 86). The dam was designed to irrigate 250,000 dunams of land to operate an electric power station (Mid. Mir., March 25). A Bulgarian Minister was present at the ceremony for the opening of the dam, on Aug 17. (Mid. Mir., Aug 26)

The completion of work by Techno-Impex on the Mubrada dam, a smaller companion project of the Rastan dam, was announced in April. (Mid. Mir., April 25)

In Sept Bulgarian and UAR experts approved plans for the construction of two main irrigation canals in the Ghab project (see also MER 1960, p 86). It was reported that the two canals would be 65 km. long and when completed in June 1962 would irrigate 17,000 hectares of land. Cost was estimated at £820m. (ANA, Sept 21 [W 28])

Bulgaria Recognizes Syria. On Oct 7 Bulgaria recognized Syria and expressed the desire for an exchange of ambassadors. (Nasr, Oct 8)

Bulgarian Mission Visits Syria; Cultural Agreement. An official Bulgarian good-will mission, headed by the Deputy-Chairman of the Bulgarian Council of Ministers, Zhivko Zbivkov, visited Syria in Nov as part of a tour of ME countries. A cultural agreement was signed between the two countries which renewed the agreement of 1956 and provided for the exchange of students, lecturers and specialists. (R. Damascus, Nov 11 [4]; Nasr, Nov 12, 13, 14; R. Damascus, Nov 13, R. Moscow, Nov 14 [W 23])

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Economic and Cultural Relations. In July, the Czechoslovak Consul in Damascus told the press that Czechoslovak trade with Syria had expanded steadily over the preceding five years. In 1960 Syrian exports to Czechoslovakia had totalled £822m. approx. and Syrian imports had reached £816m. (compare pp 82-5). Czechoslovakia was the second largest importer of Syrian cotton, he added. Czechoslovak firms had constructed a number of "giant enterprises" in the Syrian Region, including petroleum refineries in Homs, two sugar factories, one at Hama, currently being enlarged, and one at Der'a, and a timber plant at Latakia. Close on to 30 students and several engineers from the Syrian Region were studying in Czechoslovakia. (Gumhuriyah, July 13)

In March Czechoslovakia was approached concerning an exchange of £8250,000 worth of Syrian tobacco for cigarette-making machinery. (ANA, March 9 [W 16])

Two 150 kw. transmitters were being built by a Czechoslovak company as part of a network of twenty television stations scheduled under the five-year plan. (ANA, March 11 [W 23])

Discussions were held with the Czechoslovak Techno-Export organization on raising the capacity of the new Homs power plant by 15,000 kw. to 45,000 kw. to enable it to supply the projected Homs nitrogen fertilizer factory. (R. Damascus, March 16, April 2 [W March 23, April 6]; MEED, March 24)

Experts of the Czechoslovak Stroj-Export organization prepared plans for the construction of two bridges over the Euphrates at Raqqa and Deir ez-Zor for which international tenders were to be invited as from July 1. A Syrian official discussed the plans with Stroj-Export during a visit to Czechoslovakia in May-June. He also toured railway installations and factories producing railway equipment. (R. Damascus, June 6, ANA, June 5 [W 8]; MEED, Aug 4)

OTHER COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

German Democratic Republic. In June three officials of the Syrian Agrarian Reform Ministry left for a ten-day visit to the GDR. (ANA, June 19 [W 29])

On Oct 7 the GDR recognized Syria and expressed its desire to exchange ambassadors. (Nasr, Oct 11)

In May the UAR granted the GDR mission in Damascus consular status, over West German protests (see p 662 b). In Nov, according to "official information" received in Beirut, the new Syrian regime revoked this step. This was interpreted as reflecting Syria's desire to strengthen relations with West Germany (Hayat, Nov 8). On the following day the official GDR news agency said that the reports had not been confirmed by the Syrian Foreign Ministry. (ADN in Germany, Nov 9 [EE 11])

Hungary. On Feb 3 the Syrian Central Bank was authorized to open a credit of £5250,000 for financing the export of Syrian cotton to Hungary. (Nasr, Feb 4)

In Sept it was reported that Hungary had agreed to grant a credit of £510m, to finance exports to the Syrian region; details had not yet been settled. (MEED, Sept 8)

Poland. Polish agricultural experts arrived in Aleppo in Jan to conduct a survey of flour mills in the area and to draw up recommendations for the acquisition of new equipment. (Ayyam, Jan 15)

In May Polish experts discussed in Damascus the supply of furniture and equipment for the Suweida Hospital scheduled for completion in 1962. (R. Damascus, May 4 [W 11])

In Sept the director of the Polish pavilion at the Eighth Damascus International Fair said that the Syrian Region had a favourable balance of trade with Poland and that there were considerable opportunities for an increase in trade. "Poland which imports cotton, leather and oil seeds from the Syrian Region can export to this Region electrical, technical and industrial equipment, as well as 400 types of industrial products, for scientific laboratories and hospitals, among other goods," the director declared. (Eg. Gaz., Sept 7)

Rumania. In April Rumania invited the Minister of Communications for the Syrian Region to visit Rumania. (MENA, April 3 [W 6])

Trade relations were discussed in Damascus in April. The Rumanian Consul was reported to have declared that his country was interested in exporting timber, tractors and agricultural machinery. (Wahdah, May 1)

Yugoslavia. In Feb a project for a power and irrigation scheme on the Yarmuk river in southern Syria, designed by the Yugoslav firm of Energoprojekt and to be carried out with Yugoslav equipment, was approved in Damascus. It was to consist of four pumping stations to irrigate 22,000 acres of land in the dry season, and in the rainy season to provide water for a hydro-electric plant with a capacity of 12,000 kw. The construction would take about 18 months. (MEED, March 3)

In July it was reported that an agreement had been reached for the Yugoslav firm Pormoskograd, which was carrying out the Tartus southern port development, to enlarge this project. The cost would increase from £532m. to £536m. (MEED, July 7)

Yugoslavia recognized Syria on Nov 8. (Nasr, Nov 9)

OTHER COUNTRIES

NATO COUNTRIES

Denmark. In Feb a Danish delegation visited the Northern Region where they discussed possibilities of technical aid in livestock breeding. (Ayyam, Feb 5, 8)

On March 26 a £58m. contract was signed with a Danish firm, for the building of a cement factory at Hama with a capacity of 100,000 tons per year. (R. Damascus, March 26 [W 30])

Under a technical aid agreement signed on Aug 6, a Danish State Organization was to build a farm in Latakia to breed cattle and other domestic animals, at a cost of £51,600,000. (Wahdah, Aug 7; Mid. Mir., Aug 12)

France. In March it was reported that France had offered 15 scholarships for Syrian public servants in specialised courses. (Ayyam, March 5)

On Oct 13 it was reported that France had recognized Syria (Nasr, Oct 14). [However, by the end of 1961 there was no information on renewal of diplomatic relations between the two countries, which had been cut off in the wake of the Suez campaign, in 1956.]

German Federal Republic. (See also above, under: German Democratic Republic.)

The Euphrates Dam Project: [The feasibility of erecting a major dam on the Euphrates river in Syria had been under consideration for many years.] A preliminary survey of the Euphrates basin was carried out by Soviet experts in 1960 (see MER 1960, p 84) but at the same time the USSR informed the UAR that it would not finance the project. (Ahram, June 29)

On July 5 it was announced that, in the framework of a GFR-UAR economic agreement, the GFR had undertaken to provide a credit of DM 500m. at 3½% interest for the building by German firms of the Euphrates dam, the total cost of which was estimated at DM 1,600m. The credit would be for 20 years, repayable from the end of the sixth year. Were the allocated credit to prove insufficient to cover the project's foreign currency requirements, the GFR, with UAR approval, would set up an international consortium to secure the balance. (Ahram, July 6)

An official Syrian source said the length of the dam would be 4,500 metres and its height 60 metres. The reservoir would hold 25,000 million cubic metres of water and the irrigation network would cover some 750,000 hectares (R. Damascus, July 11 [W 30]; Ayyam, July 12). In Aug it was reported that German experts had already arrived in Damascus to start on the survey work. (Eg. Gaz., Aug 15)

The GFR extended recognition to the Syrian Republic on Oct 9 (Nasr, Oct 10) after consultations with the UAR. (MENA, Oct 9 [I])

Following the recognition, Damascus reported Dr. Adenauer had declared that the GFR would stand by its obligations under the Euphrates project agreement (Nasr, Oct 13). On Oct 13 the first consignment of German equipment, for survey work on the Euphrates, was reported to have arrived in Syria. (ANA, Oct 14 [W 19])

On Oct 18 the Syrian Minister of Public Works declared that the GFR had confirmed its readiness to continue with the plan (Hayat, Oct 19). On the following day, however, the West German Secretary of State of the Economic Ministry said the issue was in doubt. It was yet to be established whether the credit extended to the UAR was transferable to the Republic of Syria under international law. He added that, in any new solution, Iraqi and Turkish reservations had to be considered. (NYT, Oct 21; on the Iraqi stand on this issue, see pp 165 b-166)

Nevertheless, on Oct 24 a German delegation arrived in Syria for high-level consultations on the project (Nasr, Oct 25, 26, 27). On Nov 14 German experts arrived in Syria to start the survey work (ANA, Nov 5 [W 9]; Nasr, Nov 6, 8, 21; Ayyam, Nov 7, 23). In Dec a Syrian delegation went to Bonn for financial talks on the project. (Hayat, Dec 10, 14; Mid. Mir., Dec 16)

Italy. An Italian firm obtained the tender to install oil pipelines between the Homs oil refinery and the oil depots in Damascus, Aleppo and Latakia. In Feb, Italian experts started the survey work. (Eg. Gaz., Feb 8)

Italy recognized the new Syrian regime on Oct 12. (Nasr, Oct 13)

In Dec a contract worth £583,000 was concluded with an Italian company for the planning of Idlib town. At the same time "an agreement was concluded with an Italian company for the preparation of reports and plans for the development and planning of the Barada valleys and the desert." (R. Damascus, Dec 10 [W 14])

Norway. In March, during its tour of the UAR, a Norwegian trade delegation visited the Syrian Region to discuss intensified trade exchange. (Ahram, March 6-8, 10)

The United States. In June the Ford Foundation granted the Ministry of Education for the Syrian Region six scholarships ($250 per month each) for one year, for studying methods in agricultural teaching in the U.S. (Sawt al-Arab, June 28)

On Sept 29 a State Department press officer said that the question of recognizing Syria was "premature." The New York Times held that recognition would be delayed until "readjustments in inter-Arab relations" were cleared. The next day it was reported that "experts believed that the question of general recognition... would depend on the position taken by Moscow." (NYT, Sept 30, Oct 1). On Oct 3 an American spokesman denied rumours published in the Egyptian press that the US had had a hand in the latest events in Syria. UP reported from Washington that an immediate recognition by the US of the new regime might anger the UAR, where the US had already been accused of assisting the Syrian revolution. However, some observers believed that American interests demanded the US recognize before the USSR did so. (Ayyam, Oct 4)

[Recognition came on Oct 10, following on recognition by the USSR and other Communist countries.] On Oct 10 PM Kuzbari received the US Consul-General at Damascus, accompanied by Senator W. Stuart Symington, who informed him of the US recognition of Syria; the Consul-General would be turned into an embassy. (R. Damascus, Oct 10 [12]; Nasr, Oct 11)

The New York Times commented that recognition came eight days after it had been asked for, and a week after the State Department had come to believe that the Syrian government was in full control of the country, in order "to let some Arab nations acknowledge the shift first and to explain the action to Abdel Nasser." The US had consulted Abdel Nasser among other foreign leaders before extending recognition and, according to officials in Washington, had succeeded in preserving cordial relations with him. At the same time it had suggested friendliness from the start for the new Syrian leadership. (NYT, Oct 11)

On Oct 22 P. Talbot, Assistant Secretary of State for Middle Eastern Affairs, arrived at Damascus on a tour of the ME; he was received by PM Kuzbari. (Nasr, Oct 23)

On Nov 9 an agreement was signed between Syria and the US concerning the purchase of 100,000 tons of wheat and flour by Syria; the following day a Syrian delegation was to depart for the US to negotiate terms of payment and a loan. (Nasr, Nov 10)

TURKEY

Claim on Alexandretta-Hatay. The second conference of the UAR General Federation of Students, which took place in Cairo, included in its resolutions the following paragraph: "The Conference announces that the province of Iskenderun [the Turkish province of Hatay] is an integral part of the UAR and denounces the Franco-Turkish plots which led to the isolation of this usurped province. It also announces that the 1937 plebiscite is null and void." (MENA, Feb 11 [14]; compare also MER 1960, p 531)

Charges of Turkish Espionage. On Feb 5 two persons were sentenced in Syria to hard labour for life, and a third to 20 years, on charges of espionage for Turkey. (ANA, Feb 6 [7]; see also MER, 1960, p 332)

On May 9 MENA reported that the Syrian security authorities had "arrested members of a spy-net working for the Turkish intelligence" whom it had been pursuing for over a year. Two members of the Turkish Intelligence had been caught in the act of receiving photostats of documents containing military secrets from a retired Syrian officer. This officer had been approached by the Turkish network in Sept 1959, when he was pensioned off from the army; he had, however, contacted the Syrian authorities and led the alleged Turkish agents into a trap. The two men concerned were reportedly an officer of the Turkish air force, a colonel or a flight-lieutenant according to different UAR sources, by the name of Mehmet Ali Okçu who entered Syria as a diplomatic courier, and Sadi Aktas, of the Turkish Consulate in Damascus. (Cumhuriyet, May 11; Mid. Mir., May 13; Eg. Gaz., Hayat, May 12)

Turkey protested against the arrest of the Turkish diplomats and asked for their immediate release on the basis of diplomatic immunity. (Cumhuriyet, May 11). On May 11 the two diplomats, "having signed confessions, were expelled from the country." The security authorities also arrested a woman, Samihah hint Arslan, who allegedly acted as go-between for the Turks. (Eg. Gaz., May 18). In Sept she was brought to trial before a military court. [No further information was available.] (Ayyam, Sept 3; MENA, Sept 11 [13])

Border Incidents. [Border incidents, mostly connected with smuggling and infiltration, continued unabated until the end of Sept. (Compare MER 1960, p 531). No reports on incidents were however encountered during the last three months of the year. It could not be established whether this was just incidental or perhaps connected with the break-up of the UAR and the establishment of the Syrian Republic, or else with the extreme measures announced by Turkey in Aug in an effort to stop smuggling.]

Following are reported incidents: In March, Turkish forces had killed a Syrian who was attempting to cross the border. (R. Israel, March 9 [11]); three Turkish citizens had been wounded in a mine explosion on the border in the Aleppo region (BBC in Arabic, March 21-IMB, March 22). In April two Syrians had been killed and two injured while removing mines on the border; on the same day a Turkish patrol had shot and wounded a Syrian villager who was removing Turkish mines in the border area. (ANA, April 6 [W 13]; an Arab and a Turk had been killed when two mines exploded in the frontier region. (Mid. Mir., April 15); a Turkish border patrol had wounded one of a group of four Syrian smugglers, all of whom succeeded in escaping. (Cumhuriyet, April 11); a Turkish patrol had shot and killed a Syrian youth in the Isaz border district—the Turkish authorities expressed regret. (ANA, April 15 [18]); two more Syrians had been killed in the frontier area, one by the explosion of a Turkish mine and the other by fire from a Turkish patrol which penetrated, according to the Syrian version, 200 metres inside Syrian territory. (Mid. Mir., April 22). In May the Syrian authorities in Hasake district asked the Turkish authorities for an urgent meeting to discuss the kidnapping by a Turkish patrol of a Syrian farmer. (ANA, May 20 [23]); two Syrians had been "blown up" by a Turkish mine while crossing the border into Turkey near Qamishli. (Cumhuriyet, June 2; Mid. Mir., June 3). In June it was reported that two Turkish jet aircraft had reportedly violated Syrian air space near the border. (ANA, June 1 [3]); seven Turkish infiltrators had been arrested while trying to cross into Syria. (ANA, June 1 [3]); and eight Turkish soldiers had crossed the border near Ras al-Ayn and attacked and robbed some cattle dealers. (MENA, June 27 [29]). In July it was reported that Syrian security forces had clashed with Turkish infiltrators near the border in the Ayn al-Arab region; the infiltrators withdrew across a minefield, one of them was wounded and captured by the Syrians (MENA, July 6 [8]); two Turkish soldiers had entered the Syrian border village of Nasra and kidnapped two women, but had later been caught by Syrian border guards (Mid. Mir., July 15); the Turkish gendarmes had detained several smugglers in the vicinity of Mardin and Nisib (Cumhuriyet, July 10); a Syrian patrol in the Hasake border area had seized a flock of sheep after an armed clash with Turkish smugglers who succeeded in escaping (Mid. Mir., July 22); Turkish soldiers had opened fire at a Syrian patrol north of Aleppo—no casualties were reported (ANA, July 30 [Aug 2]). In Aug it was reported that a Turkish patrol had been engaged in a two-hour exchange of fire with six Syrian smugglers: a Turkish soldier was wounded, the smugglers escaped; in another clash a Turkish patrol killed four smugglers and wounded two (their nationality was not mentioned) (Cumhuriyet, Aug 3, 13); on Aug 18, a Turkish army patrol reportedly penetrated 600 metres inside Syrian territory at Jubb al-Hawsh and seized 24 cows; the Syrian authorities had asked for an urgent meeting with the Turkish border authorities (ANA, Aug 19 [22]). In Sept the Syrian authorities announced the arrest of 23 Turkish infiltrators who had been on their way to work in Lebanon; they were committed to trial (ANA, Sept 11 [13]); also, a Turk was reported killed and two Syrian children injured by a mine explosion when attempting to cross the border into Turkey. (Mid. Mir., Sept 23)

Joint Meeting Measures To Quieten Border; Cooperation in Combating Locusts. In March Syrian and Turkish officials discussed measures to combat locusts on the border. (Mid. Mir., April 1)

In April, the Governor of Idlib (Syria) asked the Governor of Hatay (Turkey) to remove mines along the border north of Idlib (ANA, April 3 [6]). The latter was reported to have said that the Turkish authorities had agreed to the request. (Nasr, April 22)

On May 3-4 a meeting between Syrian and Turkish frontier authorities took place on Turkish territory to discuss frontier problems, including the movements of farmers across the border and the removal of Turkish mines. The Governor of Aleppo told reporters that the Turkish side had shown "some good will," but its true value would be proved by their future actions. (Mid. Mir., April 29, May 6; Cumhuriyet, May 4, 5)

In July it was reported that the Turkish Army was erecting barbed wire fences on the border near Hfrin, north of Aleppo, in order to stop smuggling. (Mid. Mir., July 8)

In Aug it was reported that about 36 Turkish villages on the frontier would be evacuated and the farmers resettled inland as a precaution against the ever-increasing smuggling in this area. (Tanin, Aug 18)

On Nov 9 [after Syria's secession from the UAR] a meeting between Turkish and Syrian border officials was held to discuss border problems. (Nasr, Nov 10)

Turkey's Recognition of Syria. Turkey recognized Syria on Sept 29 (R. Ankara, Sept 29 [Oct 2]). [It was the second country to do so, the first being Jordan.] Consequently Cairo severed diplomatic relations with Turkey (p. 670).

On Oct 1, after Egypt's rupture with Turkey, the Turkish Foreign Ministry issued a statement which based Turkey's recognition on the establishment of full control by the revolutionary forces, on Turkey's need for neighbourly relations with Syria, and on Abdel Nasser's declaration of Sept 29 that unity could not be maintained by force. (R. Ankara, Oct 1 [3])

OTHER NON-ARAB ME COUNTRIES

Cyprus recognized independent Syria on Nov 3. (Nasr, Nov 5)

Ethiopia recognized independent Syria on Oct 16. (R. Damascus, Oct 16 [18])

Iran recognized independent Syria on Oct 2. The official Iranian announcement added its good wishes for the "progress, good fortune and greatness" of the nation and government of Syria (R. Tehran, Oct 2 [3]). [Relations between Iran and the UAR were severed by the latter in 1960. (See MER 1960, p. 216 ff.)] In Nov Tehran Radio sent two correspondents to Damascus to report on Syria's "recent stand for freedom." (R. Tehran, Nov 12 [W 16]). In Dec Tehran Radio broadcast recorded reports from Damascus criticizing Abdel Nasser's "terrorist regime." (BBCM, Dec 6)

Somalia. On Oct 3 the Somali National League-United Somali Party staged demonstrations in support of the unity of the UAR. Demonstrators carried portraits of Abdel Nasser and shouted slogans in his favour and against the Syrian PM, Kuzburi. (R. Hargeisa, Oct 3 [5])

ASIA

Ceylon. On Oct 1 it was reported that Ceylon and Syria would shortly sign an agreement according to which Ceylon would purchase 25,000 tons of gasoline from the Homs refinery, to the value of £25m., while Syria would purchase tea and coconuts from Ceylon. (ANA, Oct 1 [W 5])

Ceylon was among the last states to recognize the new Syrian regime, on Nov 11. (Nasr, Nov 12)

India. According to Cairo, India asked the UAR for a clarification of Abdel Nasser's announcement [of Oct 5] that he would not oppose Syria's admission to the UN. Only afterwards would India decide on the recognition of the new regime. (R. Cairo, Oct 8-10, Oct 9)

On Nov 5 the Indian Consul-General delivered to PM Kuzburi the message of his government recognizing Syria and requesting the exchange of ambassadors (Nasr, Nov 6). The Consul had previously stated that India had not been tardy in recognizing Syria; the Consul-General in Damascus, during the days immediately following the revolution, had addressed its correspondence to the Foreign Ministry of the Syrian Arab Republic, a procedure which amounted to official recognition. The formal announcement had been delayed due to the absence abroad of the President of India. (Ayyam, Oct 23)

In Dec Damascus Radio welcomed the Indian invasion of Goa as heralding a series of uprisings in Asia that would liquidate colonialist territories. (BBCM, Dec 20)

Indonesia. On Oct 21 the Indonesian Consul-General at Damascus called on PM Kuzburi to inform him that Indonesian recognition of Syria was delayed by the absence abroad of the Foreign Minister; the delay was of a purely formal nature. (Ayyam, Oct 22)

On Nov 6 Indonesia extended recognition; a Foreign Ministry statement issued at the same time said that Indonesia continued to support the idea of Arab unity. (Nasr, Nov 7)

LATIN AMERICA, AFRICA

Towards the end of the year it was officially announced that the two countries had decided to raise their diplomatic missions to the rank of embassy. (Nasr, Dec 31)

Japan. In April Wajih as-Sammān, Minister of Industry of the Syrian Region, paid an official visit to Japan, where he reached an agreement in principle on Japanese technical aid to Syrian industrial projects and the training of Syrians in Japanese industries and schools. Guatemala was among the first states to recognize independent Syria, on Oct 1. (Nasr, Oct 2)

AFRICAN COUNTRIES

Guinea. President Sekou Touré was reported by Cairo to have replied to a cable from Dr. Kuzbari requesting Guinea's recognition of Syria: "I do not permit you to address a message to me. I consider you a mutineer and a traitor. We will not have any relations save with the legitimate government in Cairo." (H. Haykal in Ahram, Dec 1)

INTERNAL AFFAIRS

SYNOPSIS AND ECONOMIC SURVEY

SYNOPSIS

In 1961 Turkey experienced the restoration of democratically-elected civilian government, the major aim of the military who carried out the coup d'état on May 27, 1960. Political freedom, however, enabled the re-emergence of the very forces against which that coup had been directed, namely the adherents of the dissolved Democratic Party. The military regime, while keeping faithfully its schedule of establishing the institutions of democratic government, sought to contain these forces, support of which by a large part of the public amounted to a repudiation of the revolution. To this end it also intervened in the formation of the civilian government after the elections.

Political affairs predominated throughout the year, and no progress was made in economic and social affairs. These, however, received considerable attention in the new constitution, with emphasis on comprehensive planning. There was noticeable labour agitation as well as ferment in intellectual circles.

While the government raised civil service salaries and pensions and army pay, labour demands for raising the level of minimum wages were not met. The right to strike and collective bargaining and other labour reforms, which were provided for in the constitution and enjoyed wide support, did not reach the legislative stage. This was also the case with agrarian reform, reduction or abolition of land tax and other measures designed to advance agriculture and better the lot of the peasants.

Of other issues which had occupied attention in 1960, the following developments in 1961 deserve mention. The NUC refused to reinstate the 147 dismissed professors, despite repeated efforts on their behalf by the universities. As to the press, a law was promulgated regulating the distribution of advertisements with a view to eliminating state control through advertising, though some of the newspaper owners argued that the opposite would be the case, and also another law regulating minimum employment conditions for journalists. Some owners closed down their papers in protest. There were a number of temporary newspaper closures by the authorities. In matters of religion, the translation of the Qur'an into Turkish was completed; steps were taken to close down secretly-operating religious schools and to put an end to the activities of the Nurcu sect. The call to prayer (ezan) was not changed from Arabic into Turkish, as Gen. Gürel had advocated. He now said he hoped for such reforms to come from the people themselves; this would be brought about by raising the standards of the religious functionaries, to which end a bill was prepared. The new constitution prohibited the exploitation of religion for political and personal benefit or for "even partially basing" the order of the state on religious dogma.

The Martial Law regime imposed in 1960 was prolonged by the NUC every three months and ended on Nov 30 after the formation of the RPP-JP coalition government.

The year opened with the convening, on Jan 6, of the Constituent Assembly in which the Republican People's Party had a vast majority. On the eve of its meeting, a new government was formed under the auspices of the National Union Committee (NUC). The Assembly's agenda was taken up by the formulation of the constitution and the electoral laws, and the budget.

After the Assembly had commenced work, the government lifted, by stages, the ban on the activities of political parties, but the dissemination of propaganda remained forbidden. Some 20 parties appealed for registration. Only four succeeded in recruiting countrywide support, two established parties, the Republican People's Party (RPP) led by İsmet İnönü and the Republican Peasants' National Party (RPNP) led by Osman Bölükbaşı, and two new ones: the Justice Party (JP) led by Reşit Gümpüşpala and the New Turkey Party (NTP) led by Ekrem Alican. The last three parties competed for the support of the members of the dissolved Democratic Party (DP). Among the leaders and cadres of the two new parties there were many former DP members and the parties set themselves up openly as successors to the DP, especially so the NTP. These activities which set the new parties against the military regime occasioned many warnings by the latter, but no drastic action.

Opposition to the regime from DP partisans also continued to manifest itself in other, partly clandestine, forms as had been the case since almost immediately after the coup. There were many arrests and trials on charges of activities and propaganda against the revolution, and also of plots to overthrow the regime; none of the latter were of serious proportions. In May and June the Government conducted a campaign against leftists and Communists and Communism was said to constitute a serious menace to Turkey; this issue, however, soon faded out. Reports of arrests on political charges became less frequent in the autumn and stopped almost completely by the end of the year.

During the year, a shift occurred in the seat of power among the military, from the NUC to the army command. This issue came to a head in June when Lt-Gen. Tansel, commander of the air force, was transferred from this post and subsequently reinstated, under pressure from the air force. There followed a purge in the air force and changes in the army command, including the resignation of the last two NUC members holding active commands. Thereafter it became even more evident that actual power had passed into the hands of the army command, but there were no more overt signs of a struggle for power among the military. The policy of return to constitutional conditions, as scheduled, remained constant throughout this shift of power. The only known dissenters were the "fourteen radicals" who had been ousted in 1960 and stationed abroad whence some of them now challenged the introduction of the constitutional regime, advocating "social democracy before full democracy."

The new constitution, having been adopted by the Constituent Assembly at the end of May, was given popular approval in a referendum on July 9. The referendum was preceded by a propaganda campaign in which NUC members and political leaders explained the constitution to the people, calling for its confirmation. The JP, however, agitated against the constitution, especially among the peasants, though officially it supported it, and the party was severely reprimanded by PM Gürel for what he maintained were destructive tactics reminiscent of the DP. The referendum was held in a calm atmosphere and the constitution was approved by 6.3m. votes against 3.9 m. The large "No" vote which was especially heavy in western Anatolia, the DP stronghold, was considered as a censure of the military coup.

The new constitution, replacing Atatürk's constitution of 1924, provided for additional checks and balances to safeguard democratic, parliamentary rule; it guaranteed civil rights and liberties in detail, and provided for social rights hitherto unknown in Turkey, such as the rights to collective bargaining, to social security and medical care and also contained a provision for agrarian reform. The state was made responsible for making the social benefits available, in so far as means permitted. In addition to this reservation, it must be remembered that the constitution provided no more than the basis for the implementation of the social rights, as they required special legislation. By the end of the year, this had not yet been introduced.

The constitution provided for a Grand National Assembly consisting of two Houses, a National Assembly (House of Representatives) of 450 members and a Senate of 150 members plus 15 members nominated by the President and 23 members of the NUC as life members. The President was to be elected from among the Assembly members for a term of 7 years.

There remained now three months until the elections to the new Grand National Assembly, a period marked by efforts on the part of the regime to ensure (1) that the sentence passed on the DP regime by the military coup as such be legally approved, and politically endorsed and (2) a smooth transition, with as little political strife as possible, to the future civilian regime.

On Aug 14 the Supreme Court of Justice at Yassıada concluded the trials of the leaders of the former regime and went into recess until Sept 15. This interval was utilized by the regime for convening, on Aug 31, a round-table conference of the political leaders which had been suggested by the press in April. On Sept 3 the leaders of the major political parties—with the exception of the leader of the RPNP which was otherwise represented—in the presence of the NUC and the army chiefs signed a declaration in which they justified the May revolution. They pledged themselves, among other things, not to exploit for political purposes this revolution, religion, the Yassıada trials, the issue of the forests, and Turkish foreign policy; to protect Atatürk's reforms; to oppose extreme leftist and extreme rightist tendencies, and to conduct inter-party relations in a spirit of understanding. They also condemned the fallen DP regime but this section of the declaration was published only after the Yassıada sentences had been pronounced. The press followed up with a similar undertaking of its own.

On Sept 15 the Yassıada court gave its verdict on the case of violation of the Constitution, finding all principal defendants and many others guilty, and passed sentence: 15 of the DP leaders, including Bayar, Menderes, Zorlu and Polatkan, were sentenced to death, 31 to life imprisonment, and 418 to prison terms ranging from six months to 20 years. One hundred twenty-three were acquitted and five cases were dropped for insufficient evidence.

The NUC, supposedly under army pressure and in order to justify the coup, confirmed the death sentences against Adnan Menderes, Fatin Rüştü Zorlu and Hasan Polatkan. Pleas for clemency from abroad and from local political leaders proved of no avail; Polatkan and Zorlu were executed on Sept 16 and Menderes the following day. The country remained outwardly calm, all unofficial reporting and comment having been banned.

A week later, on Sept 24, the election campaign was officially opened. In order to restrict the proliferation of minor parties while keeping to the proportional system, the electoral law passed by the Constituent Assembly in May prescribed that only parties with branches in at least 15 provinces and all their districts were qualified to participate in the elections. This condition was fulfilled by the RPP, the JP, the NTP and the RPNP. The last three parties competed for the former DP vote while the RPP was identified, for better or for worse, with the military regime. The aims for which the latter stood, mainly in continuation of the Atatürk tradition, were also endorsed by the academic youth and, it would seem, the majority of the intellectuals. The party platforms were largely identical. They promised economic and social progress in general and benefits to the peasants in particular. It was remarked that only İnönü, the RPP leader, told the people that they were in for bad times and austerity.

The elections held on Oct 15 were completely fair and free, and no incidents were reported. None of the four contending parties won a majority in both Houses. The RPP won 173 seats in the House, the JP 158, the NTP 65 and the RPNP 54 seats, while in the Senate the JP won 70 seats, the RPP 38, the NTP 28 and the RPNP 16 seats. These results were naturally considered a victory for the dissolved DP and a vote of censure against the revolutionary regime.

The next political tasks were the election of the President of the Republic and the formation of a coalition government. Both were accomplished only with the help of pressure by the army, as the outcome of the elections encouraged the extremists in the three successor parties to the DP to take a strong stand. While there seemed to be wide agreement on Gen. Gürel as the only candidate for the presidency, the strong extremist faction in the JP put up the candidacy of Prof. Bağış, an ardent DP partisan. Moreover, the three parties were said to have contemplated a coalition without the RPP, which observers generally agreed was unthinkable as it would constitute a straight return to the overthrown DP regime. There was also agitation for other measures designed to undo the May revolution. At this point the army intervened. The party leaders were summoned by the army chief on Oct 24 and, in their presence, signed a protocol in which they agreed not to consider the reinstatement of the retired officers or an amnesty for the Yassıada convicts, and to elect Gen. Gürel as President.

On Oct 26 the Assembly elected Gen. Cemal Gürel President of the Republic.

It took another three weeks to form a government. As no progress was made President Gürel, using his constitutional prerogative, appointed RPP leader İnönü as Prime Minister. This appointment made the joining of the coalition by the three other parties no easier as the majority of their followers were İnönü's political enemies. The RPNP categorically refused to join any coalition. The NTP demanded an independent Prime Minister. The JP, the strongest of the three opposition parties, demanded among other things the resignation of İnönü from the RPP leadership and an amnesty for the Yassıada convicts.

Only renewed and very strong pressure from the army command enabled the formation of an RPP-JP coalition on Nov 20 in which the two parties participated on an equal footing. Gümüşpala, the JP leader, declined to enter the government and there was strong opposition inside the JP to the party's step. This was the first coalition government in Turkey's history. On Dec 2 the House gave the government a vote of confidence by 269 votes out of a total 448; four voted against; the others were either absent or abstained. Of the 158 JP Deputies, only 97 voted for the government.

The new government programme emphasized democratic procedure, planned economic development, social benefits, workers' rights, etc. and reemphasized Turkey's loyalty to the western alliance. Both state and private enterprise were to be encouraged.

The programme made reference to efforts to be made towards a "complete healing of the wounds caused by past political strife." This became the standard official reference to the question of an amnesty for the Yassıada convicts, the central political issue in the last month of the year. The NTP and the JP were reported to be preparing legislation for an amnesty. A warning was voiced by a former NUC member that such a measure was liable to cause another military coup, while İnönü said that political tranquillity was essential before an amnesty could be considered.

While the official policy laid down by the military regime thus met with strong opposition from what may be called the conservative camp—comprising the vast majority of the peasants and a good part of the urban population, and well organized in three out of the four major parties—a challenge was posed to it also by the intellectuals, the supporters of the Atatürk tradition. In Dec an influential group, including also former army officers, published a manifesto advocating a "new etatisme," a state socialism designed to overcome economic and social stagnation in terms reminiscent of those employed in certain developing states in Asia and Africa, as well as of the pronouncements of certain of the "14 radicals" who had been ousted from the NUC.

By the end of the year the military had reestablished parliamentary democracy in Turkey but had not found it possible to withdraw from politics. The majority of the electorate gave its vote to the opposition. The new government, comprising mutually antagonistic forces, was established only under military pressure. The political situation thus remained basically unstable, while the continued stagnation and lack of clear direction in the economic and social fields gave rise to new pressures.

ECONOMIC SURVEY

The economic pattern established after the army takeover in May 1960 continued throughout 1961. (Compare MER 1960, pp 444-5.) The anti-inflationary policy introduced by the military regime, combined with another year of poor agricultural harvests and a feeling of insecurity engendered by the political situation, caused a general recession in economic activity.

On the positive side the State Planning Organization, established in Oct 1960, started work on a new five-year plan, and the government succeeded in securing foreign aid needed to cover deficits and for development.

The lack of any marked economic and social progress and the resultant unrest on the part of labour and the intellectuals as yet brought no change in official thinking in these fields. The political problems of transition to a new democratic regime remained predominant. At the end of the year, however, a group of intellectuals and public figures expressed the view that a new form of state socialism (etatisme) was needed (see p 576).

National Accounts. National income increased nominally by 5% from £T46,872m, in 1960 to £T49,274m, in 1961, due to the rise of the price level. Real national income remained constant, and real national income per capita declined by some 3% due to population growth and stood at £190 as compared with £200 in 1958. The main change in the composition of national income was the increase in the share of the public sector.

COMPOSITION OF NATIONAL INCOME IN 1961

Agriculture	40%	Wholesale and
Industry and Mining	16%	Retail Trade	7%
Construction	6%	Government	10%
Transport and Storage	8%	Other Services	13%

The following table summarizes the economic resources that were available to Turkey in 1961 and the use she made of them (in £T m.).

Resources		Uses
Gross National Product	54,023	Private Consumption	40,190
Import Surplus	1,637	Public Consumption	7,728
		Gross Investment	7,742
Total Resources	55,660	Total Use	55,660

The share of public consumption rose from 12.5% in 1960 to 14% in 1961.

Population and Labour. Turkey's population continued to increase at a rate of 3% per annum, reaching 28.6m. At the same time the slackness of economic activity brought about a contraction in existing employment, and unemployment increased considerably. Some three m. agricultural workers were thought to be underemployed. During the year several thousand workers took up employment in West Germany and this movement was on the increase. (On the political and legislative aspects of labour, see pp 531-2.)

Agriculture. Agriculture, contributing 40% of the national income and affording employment to some 70% of the labour force, was adversely affected by bad weather, even more so than in 1960. Cereals failed; the agriculture net product declined by 3%. Only cotton, hazelnut, sultana and fig yields were above the average.

In the underdeveloped eastern provinces there resulted food and fodder shortages, which necessitated government emergency measures. Because of the poor harvest Turkey, which had latterly been a net exporter of grain, had to import in 1961 more than a million tons of wheat (which she acquired from the US under P.L. 480).

There was a certain increase in the number of tractors and in the consumption of fertilizers, but no significant change in the area under cultivation. The main development project in hand was a ten-year plan for the irrigation of 760,000 hectares. (In 1961 the total irrigated area amounted to some 2m. hectares.) This project included the construction of six dams and the supply of drinking water to 1,280 villages. In the 1961/62 budget, the sum of £T350m. (out of a total of £T8,655m.) was allocated for this purpose.

Mining and Industry. The real net product of mining in 1961 was about 3% smaller than in 1960. The number of employees declined by a similar percentage and amounted in 1961 to 65,000.

The output of crude oil was 415,000 tons, i.e. 27% of domestic consumption. Standard Oil of New Jersey announced the failure of its explorations in Turkey during the past five years, and its decision to stop operations.

The real net product of industry did not change in 1961, while that of construction declined by 10%. Steel production rose by 6% and electric energy by 8% while the output of pig iron fell by 24% and of woollen yarn by 23%; paper production also rose.

With the help of US aid counterpart funds, several low-interest credit funds were set up to assist industry, mining and the export of manufactured goods, but the assistance extended was still small-scale. One fund, at the disposal of the Industrial Development Bank, was being used for the purchase of shares—to be resold later—in sound private industrial companies which were in need of additional capital. This scheme was intended as the initiation of a private capital market.

The main new industrial development project was the construction of the steel mill at Ereğli at a total cost of $250m. ($170m. in foreign exchange), which was to reach full capacity of 470,000 tons in 1965. US credits for the project amounted to $129.6m. and there was also an Italian loan of $10m. Another project was the erection of two tire plants by American companies with participation of local capital and a projected joint annual capacity of 400,000 tires.

Public Finance. The budget for fiscal year 1961/62 (beginning March 1) amounted to £T8,665m., exceeding the previous budget by one-sixth, and constituting about 18% of national income. Some £T6,000m. were allocated to current expenditure and £T2,700m. to development projects. Indirect taxes were the principal source of revenue. Nevertheless, compared to the previous year, direct taxes increased by 28%, whereas indirect taxes declined by 4%, reflecting probably more progressive taxation. Two other sources of revenue were aid from the US (see below) and internal loans (£T450m.).

The government continued to practise an anti-inflationary policy. The banking system contracted credits to the private sector, but at the same time expanded credit to the government.

Economic Planning. The newly established State Planning Organization worked on a five-year plan for the period 1963–1967, intended to be the first of three successive five-year plans, with the general objective of raising the rate of economic growth from 5% to 7% per annum. The first five-year plan called for investment of some £T60,000m. ($6,600m.), about two-thirds of it by the government. Meanwhile the Planning Organization prepared an economic programme for the year 1962 for the period of transition into the first five-year plan. This programme called for investment of £T8,436m. ($937m.), i.e. about 16% of the gross national product; 60% of the programme was to be financed by the government and 40% by the private sector. Public investments were to be directed mainly to industry (£T1,750m.) and agriculture (£T1,200m.), while private investment was to concentrate mainly on housing (est. at £T2,100m.).

The coalition government which came to power in Nov emphasized the high importance it attached to planning; but, by the end of the year, had apparently not yet discussed any of the Board's proposals.

Foreign Trade. Turkish foreign trade in 1961 followed generally the same patterns as in the previous year. Exports rose from $317.5m. in 1960 to $347.2m. due to an increase in the sales of tobacco, cotton, nuts and raisins, while export of industrial and mining products decreased slightly. Imports rose from $463.5m. in 1960 to $509.5m. There was an unfavourable change in composition; imports of consumption goods, mainly food, increased, while imports of capital goods slightly decreased.

The deficit in the balance of trade amounting to $162m. represented an increase of 10% over the previous year.

TURKEY: INTERNAL AFFAIRS

For the direction of trade, in which there was no significant change, see tables, p 82 ff.

Turkey continued to negotiate with the European Common Market, with which she conducted a third of her total trade, for an arrangement similar to that achieved by Greece, her main competitor in the European market.

Foreign Aid and External Debt. Foreign aid (both grants and loans) received by Turkey in 1961 sufficed not only to finance the import surplus and the service of the external debt, but also to increase the foreign exchange balances. Turkey succeeded in mobilizing abroad over $400m., more than half of this from the US, and the rest from other Western sources. (For details, see tables, pp 77, 80.)

Turkey's external debt outstanding at the end of 1961 amounted to $1,240m. and annual payments on account of the debt to $125m., i.e. more than one-third of Turkey's total exports.

CURRENT AFFAIRS UNDER THE NUC ADMINISTRATION

THE GOVERNMENT

New Cabinet Before the Opening of the Constituent Assembly. On Jan 4 President Gürsel accepted the resignation of the cabinet. The resignation—officially a matter of form prior to the inauguration of the Constituent Assembly—was believed to be designed to permit the appointment of a new cabinet from members of the House, where the RPP had an overwhelming majority. Sıtkı Ulay, the Minister of Communications and NUC member, had tendered his resignation two days earlier, "in order to enable the Head of State to select a more suitable Minister of Communications from among the members of the Constituent Assembly." (Cumhuriyet; Times, Jan 3, 5)

The NUC also decided that from the date of the formation of the Constituent Assembly, no NUC member would occupy a cabinet post. (R. Ankara, Jan 5 [7])

The new cabinet was formed the day after the resignation, on the eve of the opening of the new Assembly. Gürsel retained the premiership. The new cabinet included 18 ministers, of whom 12 had been members of the former government and continued to occupy their former posts (see table of government). Of the six new ministers, four were members of the Assembly: Prof. Turhan Feyzioğlu (RPP)—Education; Cihat Baban (RPP)—Press, Broadcasting and Tourism, which had again become a Ministry (see MER 1960 pp 427, 442); Ahmet Tahtakılıç (RNP)—Labour; and Orhan Mersinli (independent)—Communications. The other two new ministers were Ekrem Tüzemen, judge of the Supreme Court of Appeal, as Minister of Justice, and Lt-Gen. Muzafer Alankuş, as Minister of Defence. No NUC member was in the new cabinet except Gürsel, and the post of Deputy PM, previously occupied by NUC member Fahri Ördilek, remained vacant. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 6)

Minister of Reconstruction Replaced. Prof. Fehmi Yavuz, the Minister of Reconstruction and Settlement, who had been a member of the cabinet since the May revolution, resigned on Feb 2, "in order to be free to deal with basic and important problems of the whole country." [He returned to the university of Ankara as professor of town-planning.] (Cumhuriyet, Feb 3)

On Feb 6 Rüstü Özal was appointed in his place. Özal, an engineer, a former mayor of Konya, served as a DP deputy from 1954 to 1957. On the eve of the 1957 general elections he left the DP and joined the RPP. From 1957, he served as SG of the Association of the Chambers of Architects and Engineers. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 7)

Resignation of Feyzioğlu. Prof. Turhan Feyzioğlu, the new Minister of Education, resigned on Feb 6, reportedly because of the reluctance of the NUC to take any positive steps to solve the problem of the 147 dismissed university professors (see p 524 b). Ahmet Tahtakılıç, the Minister of Labour, was appointed acting Minister of Education. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 7)

Appointment and Resignation of Kızıloğlu. On Feb 4 Gen. Gürsel appointed Muharrem İhsan Kızıloğlu, Minister of the Interior since the May revolution, as Deputy PM and Minister of State. Nâzir Zeytinoğlu, Minister of State, became Minister of the Interior. [Kızıloğlu was the only army officer (retired in Aug 1960) who took part in the May coup and entered Gürsel's first cabinet without being a member of the NUC.] (Cumhuriyet, Feb 5; Times, Feb 6)

On Feb 28 Kızıloğlu resigned from the cabinet. It was reported that his resignation had been generally expected in spite of his recent new appointments. He had been involved in a number of controversial statements and, it was believed, had incurred the displeasure of influential NUC members and in particular of some of the senior officers surrounding Gürsel. He had also been in conflict with leading RPP figures in the Constituent Assembly (Cumhuriyet; Times; NYT, March 1). Kızıloğlu was later appointed Ambassador to the Vatican. (Cumhuriyet, April 16)

Ördilek, Ulay, Talas Return to Cabinet. On March 2 Gürsel announced the reappointment of NUC member

* This was again turned into Ministry in Jan 1961.

 Also holds other portfolio(s).

Fahri Özdilek as Deputy PM and Minister of State and of NUC member Sıtkı Ulay as Minister of State; the two had been cabinet members until Jan 4. Ahmet Tah-taklı, the Minister of Labour and acting Minister of Education, was appointed Minister of Education. As Minister of Labour, Gürsel appointed Prof. Cahit Talas, a founding member of the NTP, who had occupied the same post in Gürsel's first cabinet until Aug 1960 (MİR 1960, pp 441-2). (Cumhuriyet, March 3, 4)

Resignation of the Minister of Industry. On April 14 the Minister of Industry, Şahap Kocatopçuoğlu, resigned and was appointed managing director of the new steel plant (Cumhuriyet, April 15). The post was offered to Behçet Osman Ağaoglu, vice-president of the Istanbul Chamber of Commerce, but he declined on the ground of his existing obligations (Cumhuriyet, April 22). On May 2 İhsan Soyak, managing director of the Ereğli coal mines, was appointed Minister of Industry. (Cumhuriyet, May 3)

Resignation of Minister of Defence. Muzaffer Alankus, the Minister of Defence, resigned on June 27, in the wake of the Madanoğlu affair (for which see pp 555-6). His place was taken by Fahri Özdilek, the Deputy PM. Sıtkı Ulay became Deputy PM. (Cumhuriyet, June 28)

Minister of Justice Resigns. On Aug 15 Ekrem Tüzemen, the Minister of Justice, resigned on the grounds of fatigue.

The following day Gürsel appointed in his place Kemal Türkdoğan, a public notary of Istanbul and a member of the House of Representatives, on behalf of the NUC; Türkdoğan stated that his outlook was completely non-political and that he would return to his private affairs after the elections. (Ulus, Aug 16, 17; Times, Aug 16)

Minister of Public Works Resigns. Mukbil Gökdoğan, the Minister of Public Works, resigned on Aug 21, officially because of a heart condition. Sıtkı Ulay, Deputy PM, was put in charge of the Ministry. (Hür Vatan, Aug 21, 22)

Resignation of Mumcuoğlu. Hayri Mumcuoğlu, Minister of State, resigned on Aug 23. On Aug 23 Prof. Adnan Erzi, former professor of history at Ankara University and vice-chairman of the Department of Religious Affairs, was appointed in his place. Mumcuoğlu joined the NTP two days before his resignation. (Ulus, Öncü, Aug 24, 26)

Resignation of Cihat Baban. The Minister of Press, Radio and Tourism resigned on Aug 29, on the grounds of his election to the RPP central executive council and his desire to continue political activity. Several papers alleged that he had been "excluded from office" by Gen. Gürsel as he had improperly allocated a sum of £430,000. Another paper wrote that he had rarely seen eye to eye with the NUC and the Director General of his own department. The paper welcomed his resignation, as his ministry controlled the radio and it was essential that on the eve of the elections the radio should be under non-partisan control.

However, Baban's replacement, Sahir Kurutluoğlu, a lawyer, was also a member of the RPP executive. Kurutluoğlu, it was reported, was known for his brilliant defence of many of the journalists who had been brought to trial by the former regime. (Öncü; Kudret; Ulus, Aug 30, Sept 3; Milliyet, Aug 30)

Cabinet Resignation Withdrawn. On Sept 18 the whole cabinet tendered its resignation but withdrew it the following day. The resignation was believed to have been directly related to the executions of Menderes, Zorlu and Polatkan which had taken place on the two previous days. Cumhuriyet, however, reported that the resignation was intended to make way, on the eve of the elections, for the formation of a Cabinet of independents. Gen. Gürsel told the press that on the eve of the elections his colleagues had wanted to give him a free hand to form a cabinet on which he could rely. He had told them however that he relied on them entirely, and they had withdrawn their resignation. (Cumhuriyet; Öncü; NYT, Sept 19, 20; Times, Sept 19)

The Future of the Revolutionary Government Ministers. The impending handing-over of power to civil authorities gave rise to the question of the future of those ministers who had served under the NUC, insofar as they did not join political parties or were not elected to the Assembly. It was suggested in Aug that they be awarded the highest possible pension, but this was widely opposed in the Constituent Assembly (Cumhuriyet, Aug 12). The solution was found in foreign service appointments.

On Oct 25 it was reported that two former ministers, Mehmet Baydur and Fethi Aşkin, had been appointed ambassadors to Bonn and Mexico City respectively. (Hürriyet, Oct 3; Milliyet, Oct 26)

The Transfer to Civilian Government. Following the election of Gen. Gürsel as President of the Republic on Oct 26, Gen. Fahri Özdilek, the Deputy PM, was nominated acting PM. The new civilian government headed by İnönü was formed on Nov 20. For particulars, see pp 571 ff.

THE ARMY

NUC Improves Service Conditions. On March 1 a law came into force increasing the salaries of army personnel. [Figures on the old salaries were not available.]

The new monthly basic salaries for officers ranged from £T400 for a 2nd lieutenant to £T2,000 for generals. Colonels would reach the top of their grade with a salary of £T2,000 after three years' service. Generals would receive monthly allowances of £T250, £T500 and £T750, according to rank.

NCOs' monthly salaries ranged from £T350 for a sergeant to £T600 for a senior sergeant-major. Senior sergeant-majors would be promoted one grade every three years up to four times, which would provide for a maximum monthly salary of £T1,250 (grade 4), the same as senior major.

The pay of conscripts, who served for two years, was raised from 31 kuruş to £T5 a month; private soldiers were to receive monthly pocket-money of £T10, corporals £T15 and sergeants—£T30.

The Times correspondent wrote on the service conditions of the conscripts: "Though their pay is small, they are fed, clothed, housed, get a packet of cigarettes every two days, have free bus rides, and sometimes are given free cinema tickets. The Turkish soldier usually looks healthy and contented, and is probably in many ways better off than he would be in his village. It is being increasingly recognized, however, that conditions in the army are still somewhat primitive... A campaign was launched two years ago, with American aid, to teach recruits to read and write and 120,000 soldiers—half of the entire annual intake into the army—are being taught in this way." During 1961, 13 new schools for teaching conscripts to read and write were opened in various provinces. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 2, Feb 9, 11, 16, 24; Times,

Feb 17; R. Ankara, Feb 23 [W, March 2]; R. Ankara, Sept 25, 27, 28 [W, Oct 5]

The NUC also decided to establish an insurance institute for army officers, as from March 1961. The officers would pay 10% of their salary to the institute and the money would be used to build army shops and houses for the officers and to finance studies for officers' children. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 6)

Question of the Retired Officers. On Jan 8, it was announced that the appointment of pensioned officers by the NUC would end on Jan 15; after that date, they would have to submit applications directly to the departments concerned. (R. Ankara, Jan 8 [W12])

At the beginning of the year, the officers retired in July-Aug 1960 (see MER 1960, p 443) established the Association of the Retired Officers of the Revolution (Emekli İnkılâp Subayları Derneği, abbreviated: Eminsu).

On April 4, a delegation of Eminsu was received by PM Gürsel and Cen. Özdelek, Deputy PM. The head of the delegation later said they had told Gen. Gürsel that they were ready to serve if the state and army were in need of them (Cumhuriyet, April 5). Some days later, NUC spokesmen made it clear that there were no prospects of such reinstatement. (Cumhuriyet, April 8)

In April the Eminsu branch in Izmir denounced the retired officers in Istanbul who had accepted jobs as foremen, asking whether they were in such dire need that they had to take such employment. (Cumhuriyet, April 14)

On April 16 the association opened its first general congress in Ankara. On April 26 its new directorate published a communiqué stressing that Eminsu was determined to continue its efforts to ensure the reinstatement of those officers who wanted it (Cumhuriyet, April 17, 19, 21, 27). In another communiqué, in Aug, reiterating this demand, Eminsu said that the retired officers were awaiting the elections and felt certain that the new government would restore their rights (Son Havadis, Aug 19). This communiqué was the cause of the closure of the Eminsu Ankara branch by court order on Sept 6. Maj-Gen. Sıtkı Ulay, Minister of State, told the press that the Martial Law authorities must have had some reason for this step. "It is their concern. We do not interfere with the decision of any Court of Law."

The independent Milliyet commented that although the official aim of Eminsu was mutual assistance, the association had resorted to all possible measures in order to have the Army Rejuvenation Law revoked. In normal times, the paper said, this would perhaps have gained sympathy but immediately prior to the general elections, when the political parties and press were endeavouring to forestall unpleasantness, the association should have acted accordingly. (Cumhuriyet; Ulus; Kudret; Milliyet, Sept 7, 8)

The Ankara Eminsu branch was permitted to resume activities as from Sept 13. (Cumhuriyet, Sept 14)

In Oct lots were drawn for the distribution of 956 newly-built flats for retired officers. The latter contributed £T20m. ($2.2m.) and the Estate Credit Bank £T16m. towards the project. (R. Ankara, Oct 9 [W12])

New Key Appointments to General Staff. In Jan following the appointment of Gen. Muzafer Alankus, C-in-C Land Forces, as Minister of Defence, the following appointments were announced: Lt-Gen. Celâl Alkoç—C-in-C Land Forces; Lt-Gen. Muhtit Onur—Second CCS; Lt-Gen. Refik Yılmaz—GOC Third Army, and Lt-Gen. Şefik İter—GOC Second Army. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 18)

On June 19, following the reinstatement of Lt-Gen. Tansel (see the Madanoğlu-Tansel Affair) and the retirement of several high-ranking officers, the following appointments were made: Lt-Gen. Şefik İter—member of the Supreme Advisory Council of National Defence; Lt-Gen. Muhtit Onur—GOC Second Army and acting C-in-C Land Forces; Rear-Adm. Necdet Üran—C-in-C Naval Forces. (Cumhuriyet, June 20)

In Aug Maj-Gen. Memduh Taşman was appointed Second CCS, Lt-Gen. Onur—C-in-C Land Forces, and Maj-Gen. Zeki İter—CCS Land Forces. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 6)

Following the promotions of Aug 30, Maj-Gen. Celâl Erikan, representative at CENTO, was retired and Lt-Gen. Ziya Komut appointed in his place. Lt-Gen. Ali Keşkiner, GOC Ankara garrison, was appointed also GOC Second Army. (Türkisch Press, Sept 1, 2)

Agricultural Training in the Army. In Jan the Ministries of Defence and Education introduced a joint programme for agricultural instruction for servicemen. 16 training centres were to be established and courses began on Jan 23 in two centres in Ankara. (R. Ankara, Jan 22 [W 26]; Cumhuriyet, Jan 23)

Promotions of Officers. In Aug a list of new promotion was published. There were reportedly 4,161 officers and 3,898 NCOs awaiting promotions (Cumhuriyet, Aug 15-17; Öncü, Aug 15). 3,675 officers were promoted. Among the 15 Generals promoted—of all three services—were Lt-Gen. Muhtit Onur, C-in-C Land Forces, to the rank of General of the Army; Rear-Adm. Necdet Üran, C-in-C Naval Forces, to the rank of Vice-Adm.; Maj-Gen. Refik Tulga, Governor of Istanbul, to the rank of Lt-Gen.; Brig-Gen. Sıtkı Ulay, Minister of State and member of the NUC, to the rank of Maj-Gen. Other NUC members promoted were: Col. Mücüp Ataklı—to Brig-Gen.; Lt-Colonel Suphi Karaman, Ahmet Yıldız, Refet Aksoyolu, and Emanullah Çelebi (Navy)—to Col.; Maj. Suphi Cürsöytrak, to Lt-Col.; Capt. Kamil Karavelioğlu—to Maj. (Türkisch Press, Aug 26-30)

Women Officers Demobilized. A Defence Ministry statement of Sept 11 said that in view of the legal status and physical conditions of women officers and cadets, and in consideration of Turkey's social structure, women would be posted to auxiliary services and exempted from military exercises, training, and guard duties. Women officers already in the service would be demobilized and become civil servants. Women cadets would continue their education as civilian students on Defence Ministry scholarships. Those who would not accept this arrangement would have to repay the cost of their education.

Commenting, Milliyet stated that one would have wished to see Turkish women fulfilling their patriotic duties in the ranks of the armed forces, as in many modern countries. Though it was natural that women officers would not be given front-line duties, the paper believed that there was a great deal of service that women could give in the rear to a modern, mechanized army. (R. Ankara, Sept 11 [W21]; Milliyet, Sept 14)

The Future of Army Officers in Civil Service. About 120 army officers who had been transferred to civil service, especially in the provinces, after the coup d'état, were asked by the NUC before the general elections if they wished to return to the army or to be pensioned off according to Law No. 42 (see MER 1960, p 443). By Oct 19 the NUC had confirmed the retirement of gene-als in the civil service. Other requests from lower-ranking officers were still under discussion (Cumhuriyet, Oct 20). [No further details were available.]

THE UNIVERSITIES AND ACADEMIC YOUTH

Insufficient Accommodation in Institutions of Higher Learning. [Turkey was facing three inter-linked problems in the field of higher education: (1) insufficient facilities to accommodate the numerous graduates who wished to obtain higher education; this problem became a major issue at the end of 1961; (2) the lack of hostels for students, especially those coming from the provinces, though several provinces had built hostels for their students in the university towns; (3) the growing demands to establish universities in the provinces in order to solve problems one and two and to increase local cultural prestige.]

In Feb popular demands were heard from provincial capitals such as Edirne, Eskişehir, Diyarbakır to establish universities with the assistance of the universities of Ankara and İstanbul. In Diyarbakır [S.E. Anatolia] the university was to bear the name of Ziya Gökalp [b. 1875, Diyarbakır; d. 1924, sociologist and theoretician of Turkish nationalism], in the hope that the Turks would support the establishment of a university bearing this name.

Siddik Sami Onar, Rector of İstanbul University, said that the major problem was not one of more universities but of the emphases in education; the country was in urgent need of physicians, pharmacists, dentists and chemical engineers and these studies he would suggest for Edirne University. There was, however, no need of additional chairs in archaeology, and employment prospects for graduates must also be taken into consideration. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 13, 18, May 17)

During the year the government took several decisions on university expansion. In May, it was decided in principle to establish a university in Edirne, under the auspices of İstanbul University, to open in the following academic year. A faculty of medicine and schools for dentists and chemists were to open first. A chair of economics was also contemplated. (Cumhuriyet, May 17; R. Ankara, Nov 4 [W9])

In Aug the House of Representatives endorsed a bill on the establishment of a school of sciences at the Aegean University [İzmir] (R. Ankara, Aug 16 [W 24]). Other government measures to alleviate the problem of lack of space included the granting of 165 scholarships for studies abroad and permission for 250 students to study abroad at their own expense. (R. Ankara, Sept 2 [W 7])

Yet, when the new academic year opened in Nov, many hundreds of students found the universities closed to them for lack of space. These students held silent demonstrations in Ankara and İstanbul between Nov 2-8, carrying banners which read: "We want to study," "Is this the struggle against ignorance?" "What was the purpose of the revolution?" On Nov 2 the İstanbul demonstrators started on a march to Ankara but the police managed to persuade them to turn back. On Nov 8 they mobbed Prof. Onar, Rector of İstanbul University. Ahmet Tahtakılıç, Minister of Education, stated that every possible measure was being adopted to solve the problem, including the introduction of evening classes at the universities, and the opening of new universities and technical institutes. [There were, however, no reports of any immediate practical steps having been taken to admit more students.] (Cumhuriyet; Hürriyet; Yeni Gün, Nov 3-9; Times, Nov 7, 9)

cided in Feb to encourage private building of hostels (Cumhuriyet, Feb 14) and in Aug the Constituent Assembly endorsed a bill under which loans would be provided for needy students, and modern hostels would be built by the government. (R. Ankara, Aug 10, 16 [W 17, 24]; Yeni Gün, Aug 11)

Students' Organizations, Various Activities, Unification. The two students' organizations: the Turkish National Students' Union (Millî Türk Talebe Birliği) and the National Students Federation of Turkey (Türkiye Millî Talebe Federasyonu) voted for unification at their general congresses, but refrained from implementing this resolution. Efforts in this direction had begun following the May revolution and were supported by the NUC. According to Cumhuriyet, the reasons for this move were the spirit of national unity and the wish to put an end to political exploitation of the organizations.

The Turkish National Students' Union held its 45th general congress in Jan and April in İstanbul. It approved of the merger. The elections were contested by "two cliques": an "anti-idealist clique" defeated "the idealists" and Özer Gürbüz became chairman.

The National Students' Federation of Turkey held its 16th general congress in İstanbul, attended by 130 representatives of six unions, including those of İstanbul and Ankara Universities, and three independent associations. This congress also accepted the merger proposal, but was mainly concerned with the election of a chairman. The two initial candidates, both RPP supporters, failed to obtain the 3/5 majority, as a number of delegates desired a politically-neutral chairman. The congress chairman took the opportunity to warn the political parties against interfering with youth organizations, as was the case under the former regime. Finally, however, Kemal Kunoğlu, the candidate of the Ankara University Students' Union, was elected, although a RPP supporter.

The NUC followed closely the efforts to unite the two organizations. In May and July several students' associations warned the executives of the union and the federation that if they did not bring about the unification they would themselves take the initiative. [Nonetheless, the merger was not carried out during 1961], reportedly owing to differences between the two organizations and to internal dissensions in the Union. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 17-23, Feb 10, March 14, 17, 21, 23, 24, April 18, 19, May 21, 22, July 15)

Activities of the Youth Organization. In April, the Turkish National Youth Organization (Türkiye Millî Gençlik Teşkilatı), held its tenth annual congress in İstanbul. The following youth associations sent delegations to the congress: the National Students' Federation [but not the National Students' Union], the Turkish Women's Union (Türk Kadınlar Birliği), the Boy Scouts' Union of Turkey (Türkiye İtçiler Birliği) and the Turkish Revolutionary Clubs (Türk Devrim Ocakları). (Cumhuriyet, April 24-5)

In June the Organization joined in the campaign for the new Constitution, calling on the public to approve it in the July 9 referendum. (Cumhuriyet, June 26)

During Nov 17-24 a seminar on the role of young women in a changing world was held in İstanbul under the auspices of this organization and of the "World Youth Organization," attended by representatives of 18 countries. (R. Ankara, Nov 12 [W 16]; Cumhuriyet, Nov 18)

The Problem of the 147 Dismissed Professors. [Throughout 1961, efforts continued, but to no avail, to secure reconsideration of the case of the 147 professors who had been dismissed on Oct 27, 1960 in accordance with a special law issued by the NUC (see MER 1960, p 446). The case remained a major issue in the Turkish press throughout the year.]

On Jan 5 it was reported that the NUC was discussing a bill which would enable the 147 to be reinstated, but the next day it was reported that the NUC had decided to delete the bill from its agenda. This report caused disappointment in university circles. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 6, 7)

On Jan 14 this issue was discussed in Istanbul by the rectors of the Turkish universities, Prof. Siddik Sami Onar (Istanbul), Prof. Suut Kemal Yetkin (Ankara), Prof. Fikret Narter (Istanbul Technical University), Prof. Mustafa Uluöz (Izmir) and representatives of the universities' senates. They addressed a memorandum to the Minister of Education, which reportedly emphasized the great need for teachers in the universities and the interruption in scientific research caused by the dismissals and called for a review of said law by the Constituent Assembly. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 15, 17, 18)

The resignation, on Feb 6, of Prof. Turhan Feyzioğlu, Minister of Education, after only one month in office, was believed to have been caused by the reluctance of the NUC to reinstate the 147. (Cumhuriyet; Times; NYHT, Feb 7)

On Feb 18 the 147 published a communiqué, claiming they were suffering from injustice and that there had been no connection between them and the Menderes regime. They expressed their trust that the Constituent Assembly would deal with their problem (Cumhuriyet, Feb 19). The next day students of Ankara University published a communiqué claiming that the law dismissing the 147 had infringed upon the universities' autonomy, [the NUC issued this law and the University Autonomy law on the same day, Oct 27, 1960], calling for guarantees of non-interference with academic freedom. They demanded the revision of the law and so did the National Students' Federation of Turkey, two days later. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 20, 23)

On Feb 20 Deputy PM İhsan Kınaloğlu told the press that only the Constituent Assembly had the power to change the law, but if it did so it would also find itself bound to reconsider the law according to which the army officers had been pensioned off. He said that if mistakes had been made, they must be accepted as one of the risks of the revolution. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 21)

On Feb 24, the matter was discussed in the Constituent Assembly when several deputies, in the debate on the budget of the Ministry of Education, attacked the Ministry for doing nothing to settle it. They stated that the reasons for the dismissals were unknown, that the universities' autonomy had been violated and that the universities were in urgent need of professors. Dr Muammer Aksoy, member of the constitution committee, said that the law dismissing the 147 was anti-democratic, whilst Prof. Bahri Savcı, member of the constitution committee, claimed that the scientific world was "following with suspicion the [developments regarding the] Turkish universities," and added: "Our universities' prestige must be saved and the Turkish nation expects this from you [the government]." The Minister of Education answered: "Our government has taken no decision in principle on this subject... This is true. These are my last words on this subject as Minister of Education of the NUC government. It is the predestination (takdir) of the Assembly not to take a decision in this matter." (Cumhuriyet, Feb 25)

At a press conference on March 2 General Gürsel asked the universities not to regard the problem of the 147 as a question of self-respect, adding that the law was passed by the revolutionary government, a fact impossible to ignore. (Cumhuriyet, March 3)

On March 8 and 9 Prof. Sami Onar and Prof. Fikret Narter told the press that no new appointments would be made to the positions held by the 147, except in the faculty of medicine [Istanbul University]. (Cumhuriyet, March 10)

On March 10 one and a half months before the day on which, according to law, the 147 would be automatically pensioned off, they published a statement demanding that the government make known its attitude and grant them the right of defence in case the law remained in force (Cumhuriyet, March 11). There followed more statements by the Minister of Education as well as by the 147 and a meeting between the rectors of Istanbul University and Istanbul Technical University with Fahri Özdilek, the Deputy PM, but no change in the official attitude was discernible. (Cumhuriyet, March 14, 15, 16)

On March 29, following a request by the 147, Gen. Gürsel received a delegation of their representatives. Later they told the press that Gen. Gürsel had promised to deal with this matter personally. Following upon two more meetings with members of the government and the NUC, the 147 issued a statement expressing the hope that their problems would soon be satisfactorily settled. (Cumhuriyet, March 30, 31)

About this time, Mün Küley, member of the House of Representatives, drafted a bill to permit the reinstatement of the 147. To be submitted, this bill required the signature of one NUC member [which apparently was not forthcoming]. (Cumhuriyet, April 5)

After having discussed the problem of the 147 in the presence of Gen. Gürsel, the NUC issued the following announcement on April 13: "Comments likely to arouse doubts in the public mind about the application of Laws 114 and 115 [the dismissals law and the university autonomy law] are being encountered in the press and in various circles. It has therefore been considered necessary to inform those concerned that the laws in question will be applied as they are." University circles and the 147 reacted sharply, declaring that they would continue their fight until the problem was settled. (Cumhuriyet, April 14, 15, 17)

Meanwhile, a proposal that the 147 establish a private university was supported in the Constituent Assembly by a professor, who demanded that the new constitution permit the opening of private universities in general. (Cumhuriyet, April 19, 22)

In April, 24 of the 147 were appointed to the civil service, four of them to diplomatic posts abroad. (Cumhuriyet, April 25, 26, 28, 29)

In May the Minister of Education told the press that of the 147, 12 had been pensioned off, 42 had been given posts in the Ministry of Education, several had been appointed to other ministries; the government would establish in Istanbul a scientific and technical research centre which would provide employment openings for the others. (Cumhuriyet, May 9)

In Aug the issue came up again when over 100 members of the House of Representatives submitted to the NUC a bill for the revision of the dismissal law (Cumhuriyet, Aug 12). [This bill, too, could not be submitted to the Assembly, as it failed to receive the required signature of one NUC member.]

Following the general elections of Oct 15, it was reported that the government was preparing a bill for the reinstatement of the 147. [By Dec 31, none of the 147 had yet been reinstated, nor had any such bill been submitted to the Assembly.] (Kudret, Nov 4; Cumhuriyet, Nov 5; R. Ankara, Nov 18 [W23]; Ulus, Öncü, Dec 22)

RELIGION—GOVERNMENT MEASURES

Until Oct 1961, when power passed into civilian hands, the NUC and the government continued their efforts to separate religion and politics, to stop any religious activity contrary to the law, to reorganize the Directorate of Religious Affairs and to advance and modernize religious education. The new constitution prohibited the exploitation of religion for political or private benefit.

Courses For Religious Functionaries. Cumhuriyet reported that a Committee established to "save our religion" from functionaries without adequate schooling, had decided to open courses for preachers (khatib and vaiz) and muftis in Ankara, İstanbul, İzmir, Erzurum and Konya. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 25)

Issue of the Call for Prayer in Arabic (see also MER 1960, pp 447-8). At a press conference on March 2, Gen. Gürsel was questioned on the proposal to change the call to prayer (ezan) from Arabic to Turkish, as had been the case under the Republican Party regime. He replied: "This is not the time to discuss this question. The path we are following is such that the day will come when, because of the enlightenment of our people, the demand for the recitation in Turkish of the call for prayer and of the Qur'an will come from below, from the people themselves... We are preparing the relevant organizations and training the necessary elements in such a way as to ensure that our people are trained and prepared in this way." (R. Ankara, March 2 [4]; Cumhuriyet, March 3)

The chairman of the club (fikir kütübü) of the Faculty of Political Science, Ankara, issued a proclamation in support of the statement and the call for prayer in Turkish and called for discussion of this problem in the Constituent Assembly. (Cumhuriyet, March 8)

New Head for Religious Affairs (Diyanet İşleri Başkanı). At the beginning of April, Hasan Hüsnü Erdem was appointed Head of Religious Affairs [a government department] in place of Ömer Nasuhi Bilmen, who retired for health reasons.

Erdem, born in 1889 in Akseki [S.W. Anatolia], was a religious scholar who worked as a teacher of Islam and Turkish in high schools until 1944, when he was appointed member of the Religious Affairs Advisory Committee (Diyanet İşleri Müşavere Kurulu). (Cumhuriyet, April 8)

Following his appointment, he said that he favoured the translation of the Qur'an into Turkish (see MER 1960, p 448), that he would quickly prepare the new Organization Law (see below) and would endeavour to improve the living conditions of religious functionaries. The standard of learning in the Supreme Islamic Institute and the Faculties of Theology and İmam-Hatip schools would be raised and persons of higher education would be appointed to the offices of mufti. (Cumhuriyet, April 10)

NUC Charged with Intent of Religious Reform. During April-May, while the Constituent Assembly discussed the new constitution, several pamphlets and articles were published which discussed an alleged intention on the part of the NUC to carry out religious reform. An article by deputy Kardinian Kalfı caused an uproar in the Assembly; several deputies accused Kalfı of using religion as an instrument of political propaganda and demanded his resignation. To prevent incidents, Kalfı was ushered out by Assembly members.

A 55-page brochure by Osman Nuri Çerman discussed a bill for religious [Islam] reform, allegedly prepared on behalf of the NUC and the Constituent Assembly.

[The NUC and the government reacted by denying any intention of religious reform and stating their support for Islamic institutions.]

On May 17 the Premier's Office issued a statement, which said that freedom of worship was guaranteed; religious training would be given government protection and support, in line with other educational institutions; Muslim functionaries would enjoy the same rights as civil servants; the educational and cultural standards of imam and preachers' schools and other higher theological institutes would be raised; the public could rest assured that the state intended to provide all the necessary facilities for the free functioning of religious institutions.

A spokesman for the NUC again denied on June 23 that a religious reform bill was being prepared or that "our religion would be replaced by Atatürkism, that the call to prayer in Turkish would be made obligatory, that carpets would be removed and rows of seats placed in mosques as in churches, etc. All this is evil, perverted and mendacious propaganda designed to create doubts in the public mind... [and] antipathy against the great Atatürk. Çerman's brochure has been confiscated and he is being prosecuted... previous statements show the sincerity of the NUC, the House of Representatives, and the government on the subject of religion." (Cumhuriyet, May 15, June 24, July 27; R. Ankara, May 18, June 23 [May 20, June 26])

Bill for Reorganization of Religious Affairs Department.

In July the government submitted this bill to the Constituent Assembly. It included the following provisions: (1) the establishment of a supreme council for religion (Yüksek Din Kurulu) under the chairmanship of the head of religious affairs and comprising the following members: four heads of offices in the Religious Affairs Department, Dean of the Faculty of Theology, Ankara University, Director of the Supreme Islamic Institute, representatives of the Universities' Council, of the Ministry of Education, Ministry of Defence and the Armed Forces HQ, head of the personnel department (PM's Office), secretary of the State Development Office, two members to be elected by the Council itself, two advisors. The Council would convene once a year, but the chairman had the right to call extraordinary meetings; (2) the establishment of a council to study problems of Islamic religious law (Şer'i meseleler Danışma Kurulu), to examine problems of worship and belief and the civil law of wills and inheritance; (3) the establishment of a Directorate for Religion and Schools of Theology (Din ve Meshep Müdürlüğü), to prevent differences of opinion and to examine immediately any movement or propaganda under the guise of religion; (4) the grading of the muftis and preachers according to their education; (5) the improvement of working conditions and salaries of religious functionaries; (6) the opening of courses for advanced studies for religious functionaries; (7) the setting-up of a committee for religious services in every province by the local director of waqfs. (Cumhuriyet, June 22-July 8)

Issue of the Çarşaf (see MER 1960, p 448). One of the regulations published in July by the Governor of Istanbul on the behaviour of citizens in the main streets, gardens and other places frequented by tourists, forbade the wearing of the garaf in these localities. (Cumhuriyet, July 25)

Gürel Against Arabic in Islam (see MER 1960, p 449). In an interview with Iraqi and Pakistani journalists in Aug, Gen. Gürel said that for the development of Muslim countries it was essential that the religion of Islam should first be rescued from enslavement to the Arabic language. Islam, he said, was dynamic, but the Muslim peoples were lazy and lethargic, mainly because they were unable to understand the Qur'an in Arabic. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 25)

Translation of the Qur'an (see MER 1960, p 448). In Nov 20,000 copies of a translation of the Qur'an into Turkish were issued in Istanbul; another 30,000 were to follow. The translation was the work of two professors of the Faculty of Theology at Ankara University and was reviewed by a committee of five graduates of the Supreme Islamic Institute in Istanbul. The Arabic text appeared alongside the Turkish text. This was obligatory for any officially-sponsored translation of the Qur'an, since, according to Muslim theology, the Qur'an was communicated verbally from heaven to Muhammad in the Arabic language, and only an Arabic text could be authentic. (Times, Nov 23)

RELIGION—ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES

Secret Religious Schools Closed. Though schools for the study of the Qur'an (mekteb) had been forbidden since the introduction of the secular state by Atatürk, a few continued to operate secretly. These schools had been raided from time to time by the police, even under the Menderes government—which was more favourably inclined towards Islam—but only in Jan 1961, the first time since the days of Atatürk, was a government order issued instructing provincial governors to close these schools "immediately" and to initiate appropriate legal proceedings. (Times, Jan 10)

In March the Konya province authorities closed 48 "schools teaching Arabic" [mekteb] in villages in the Doğanhisar district and registered there for state schools more than 800 pupils aged 8–14. In several villages the citizens attacked the state school teachers and about 150 persons were detained and brought to trial (Cumhuriyet, March 13). At the same time, about 40 such schools and 14 "Qur'an courses" were closed down in the town of Tutugulu [Izmir province] and surrounding villages. (Cumhuriyet, March 15)

Nurcu Sect Activities (see MER 1960, p 439). Cumhuriyet reported from Konya that following the granting of permission to organize political parties, the Nurcu sect was renewing its activities. These were followed closely by the local security authorities. For instance, on Jan 30 15 members of the sect came from various places to Konya to follow the trial of six of its members who had been arrested in Jan 1960. After the trial they held a meeting with local Nurcu members and then left for Antalya. The same day, the Konya authorities arrested a man for making propaganda for the sect in his restaurants and cafés and distributing books by Saidi Nursi, the sect's founder. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 1)

In April, 13 persons were arrested in a village in Denizli province for performing the Nurcu âyin [rite]; books and pamphlets by the sect's founder were found in their houses. (Cumhuriyet, April 18)

The sect continued clandestine activity, distributing Nursi's writings and propaganda pamphlets, while its leaders kept in touch with each other and met to co-ordinate activities.

In Aug the government launched a major campaign against the sect. Large-scale arrests of its members took place in the following provinces: Ankara, Istanbul, Kütahya, Eskişehir, Afyon, Urfa, Gaziantep, Isparta, Konya, Adana, Diyarbakır, Erzurum, Balıkesir, Kayseri, İnönü, Nazilli, Maraş and Antalya.

Fifty to eighty of the detainees were said to belong to the sect's leadership. Searches in private homes and bookshops produced large quantities of books and pamphlets, a printing press and a tape-recorder with records of meetings of the sect's leaders. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 3, 5, 6, 7)

On Sept 8, 11 members of the sect were arrested in Istanbul. (Cumhuriyet, Sept 9)

Sentences For Utilizing Religion as Political Instrument. On Feb 25 an Istanbul court sentenced the owner of the magazine Hür Adam to three years' imprisonment and one of its managers to one and a half years' imprisonment for publishing political propaganda in their magazine and using religious affairs as an instrument in this propaganda. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 26)

Society for Promotion of a Religious Regime. The Martial Law authorities revealed on Aug 8 that they had arrested in Çengelköy [Istanbul] 13 persons who had established a secret society which aimed at basing the state's political, social and judicial systems on religious [Islamic] principles. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 9, 10; Kudret, Aug 9)

Nakşibendi Sect Activities. In Feb it was revealed that two months after the May 27 revolution, a Nakşibendi [Sufi mystic sect] Shaykh from Konya had smuggled ten children, aged 12–15, from villages in the Konya area over to Syria [for Islamic studies?]. The Shaykh was supported by a former DP member of the Grand National Assembly for Konya, who had studied in Al-Azhar and whose father was a mürîd [disciple in an order of dervishes] of the Shaykh. The children returned from Syria after having been discovered by the Turkish Consul there. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 27)

Cumhuriyet reported on March 24 on a trial held in Istanbul of several members of the Nakşibendi sect, accused of performing the âyin [rite] of the sect in a house in Eyüp [Istanbul]. (Cumhuriyet, March 24)

On the night of June 19, 42 members of the sect were arrested while performing the Nakşibendi âyin in a private house in Eyüp [Istanbul]. (Cumhuriyet, June 21)

Other Sufi Sects' Activities. On July 16, ten persons belonging to the Halveti Tarîqah [a Sufi order] were arrested in Arnavutköy [Istanbul] for performing the Halveti âyin [rite] in a private house which they had turned into a Dervish monastery (tekke). Among those arrested was Mehmet Emin Güvener, who claimed to be the Shaykh of the Tarîqah. (Cumhuriyet, July 18)

THE RURAL POPULATION

Adult Education. In 1960 the Ministry of Education, within the framework of the campaign against illiteracy, opened adult schools in the provinces; they were attended by 24,876 pupils according to official figures. In Jan such schools were opened in villages in the Erzurum province. The number of such schools in Istanbul province was expected to reach 423 by Feb 15, 238 of them in villages.

The governor of Konya, the local director of education and the teachers jointly decided to convert [sic] the town's coffee houses—some 150—into evening People's Schools (Halk derhanehi) as of March 20. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 1, 16, 28, March 13)

The Turkish Cultural Society. In Dec the first congress of the Turkish Cultural Society, founded in Aug 1960, was held in Ankara in the presence of President Gürel and PM İnönü. The Central Committee reported that it had established 76 branches (Cumhuriyet, Dec 3). (In Nov 1960, it was stated that 115 branches had already been formed; an aim of the Society was "to take the Turkish Intellectual to the Turkish village." See MER 1960, p 449.)

The Deported Ağas (see MER 1960, p 450). On Jan 20 it was reported that investigations against one of the Ağas who had been resettled in Denizli were completed and he was sent to prison. [No more details were available.] (Cumhuriyet, Jan 21)

In Aug it was reported that lands owned by the 55 deported Ağas in the provinces of Mug, Mardin and Erzurum, would be distributed among the peasants evacuated from the southern border areas which had been mined to check smuggling. (Milliyet, Aug 23)

On Nov 6 Talât Ögüz, RNP deputy from Mardin, told the press that he had prepared a bill calling, in the name of democracy, for the abolishment of the Law of Compulsory Settlement, according to which the 55 Ağas had been deported. An independent daily commented that it was a joke to speak of the freedom of the individual when the peasant was still a vassal of the Ağa in the feudal East. "Democracy becomes the tool of exploiters when a man such as Mahmut Makal, who gave a true picture of Turkish villages in his book 'Our Village,' (Zaim Köy, İstanbul 1950; A Village in Anatolia, London 1954) is denied a passport to travel to England, but a Deputy and Ağa is allowed to hold a press conference in defence of feudal conditions." (Milliyet, Nov 7, 8)

In Dec it was reported that about 100 deputies from the four political parties had joined Ögüz in preparing his bill. In view of this development, the PM's office had ordered the completion of all legal procedures against the 55 Ağas [no further details were available]. (Cumhuriyet, Dec 9). Milliyet again attacked the proposed bill. (Milliyet, Dec 11)

Various Plans For Agricultural Progress. In Jan the students of the Agriculture Faculty, Ankara University said they had submitted questions to their teachers on how to advance Turkey's agriculture, and from the answers they had prepared a report which they had sent to the NUC and the Ministry of Agriculture. The main points in the report were: (1) all peasants to be taught to read and write; (2) the system of agricultural credits to be reformed; (3) the country to be divided into agricultural zones; (4) agricultural products to be enabled to compete abroad; (5) "producing organizations" to remain non-political; (6) sufficient "agricultural technicians" to be prepared; (7) soil erosion to be prevented; (8) the army to be employed in afforestation; (9) a land reform to provide every peasant family with land sufficient for its subsistence and ensure the employment of modern agricultural methods. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 10)

On Feb 24 the Agricultural Engineers' Chamber said they had prepared a basic agricultural programme which also discussed the urgent need for land reform, and a reform in agricultural methods in order to ensure the food supply for Turkey's growing population. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 25)

[All political parties advocated the advancement of the peasants and improvement of agricultural methods. See also the proposal for a "new Etatisme," p 576.]

The Question of Agrarian Reform. Article 37 of the new Constitution made it obligatory for the government to adopt measures for efficient utilization of land, to provide land for farmers with no or insufficient land, and to assist farmers in acquiring agricultural implements. Article 38 gave the state the right to expropriate lands—for distribution to peasants and other purposes—for which payment in instalments with interest must not exceed ten years. Payment for land expropriated, worked by the farmer himself and indispensable for his upkeep, must be made in advance. (For sources, see: The Constitution.)

On June 1 Cumhuriyet reported that an agrarian reform bill had been completed and would be submitted to the House of Representatives on June 15. The bill had been in preparation since the revolution. The bill, to be implemented with American aid, provided for the distribution of land to 600,000 farmers who would pay for it in instalments over ten to twenty years. £21,000 millions yearly would be allocated in the budget for the implementation of this bill (Cumhuriyet, June 1). [No such bill had been discussed in the Assembly by the end of the year.]

On June 19 Cumhuriyet reported that the Ministry of Reconstruction and Settlement was speeding up the inventory of treasury lands—at first in the eastern and south-eastern provinces—which would be allocated to farmers with no or insufficient land. Land distribution had been stopped pending the completion of the inventory. The Minister said that the government land distribution—in accordance with the Land Law of 1945—had not yielded the results expected. According to the new Agrarian Reform Bill, every farmer would receive land producing at least ten tons of wheat or an equivalent crop. (Cumhuriyet, June 19)

Question Of Taxes on Peasants. (On the question of income taxes on peasants see MER 1960, p 441.)

[In the election campaign all political parties called for the reduction or abolition of the land tax.]

In Nov eight RPP deputies drafted a bill for the abolishment of the Land Tax on the basis of the argument that such a measure would greatly increase the farmers' purchasing power (Ulus, Öncü, Nov 5). The abolition of land tax for agricultural land was included in the İnönü government programme published on Nov 27. (Cumhuriyet, Nov 28)

THE PRESS

Suspension of Newspapers. On Dec 30, 1960 the political magazine Oy was banned indefinitely, its contents having been found to be "prejudicial to the national interest." Proprietor Ali Duran, editor-in-chief İlhan Bardakçı and two editors were taken into custody. (R. Ankara, Dec 30, 1960 [Jan 2, 1961])

On March 23 the Ankara daily Öncü was suspended indefinitely for distorting Gen. Gürel's answer at a press conference on March 22, with the aim of creating an atmosphere of unrest in the country. It represented Gürel as saying that the officers retired from the army in Aug 1960 and the 147 university professors dismissed from their posts in Oct 1960, were among the subversive elements which the NUC had purged. Gürel denied this personally. This was the second time that Öncü, which was closely linked with the New Turkey Party, had been closed down since the May revolution (see MER 1960, p. 459). (R. Ankara, March 23 [25]; Cumhuriyet; Times, March 25)

Öncü was to resume publication from April 7. (Cumhuriyet; Times, April 6)

The Ankara daily Yaman was suspended for seven days from July 29, for publishing on July 24, 25, 26, a series of articles with banner headlines: "Illegal Wealth and Gains Revealed," "The Position of the State Radio" and "Incorrect Accounts Will be Found Out Sooner or Later," which caused harm to the national interest. (Cumhuriyet, July 29)

On Nov 10 and 14 three newspapers were suspended: the Istanbul daily Son Havadis (an unofficial organ of the extreme pro-Menderes wing of the Justice Party), the Ankara daily Öncü (a supporter of the NTP) and the Ankara Weekly Zafer Miletindir (a supporter of the JP), for publishing articles against the national interest [no details were given].

The Times correspondent wrote that the rest of the press, which in the days of Menderes was highly sensitive to the suspension, even for a few days, of the most insignificant journal, had made almost no mention of the indefinite closing down of these papers. Following the formation of İnönü's government on Nov 20 the papers were permitted to reappear. Kamuran Evliyaoğlu, the new Minister of Press, Radio and Tourism, told the press that he disapproved of the closing down of newspapers. (Cumhuriyet; Uluş, Nov 11, 15, 21, 22; Times, Nov 11, 16)

Trials of Journalists. On Feb 25 the owner and manager of the Hür Adam magazine were sentenced to three years and one and a half years' imprisonment respectively, for using religion as a tool in their political articles. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 26)

(On the trial of the editor and a journalist of the Istanbul daily Tanin, see p 545 b.)

New Press Laws. (On press laws enacted by the NUC, see also MER 1960, p. 452.) On Jan 4, two days before the convention of the Constituent Assembly, the NUC issued two new press laws which were published on Jan 10 in the Official Gazette.

The Intellectual Workers Law (Fikir İşçisi İş Kanunu) laid down minimum employment conditions for working journalists and stipulated that henceforth employment contracts were to specify the work and pay and provide for seniority allowances. The law provided for payment of compensation in the event of cancellation of contract, and other stipulations protected the workers' rights in the event of sickness and termination of appointment through suspension of publication. Journalists also became entitled to paid leaves and holidays, overtime pay, regular promotion and the settlement of their disputes by labour courts.

The Advertisement Law (Başın Reklam Kanunu) provided for the establishment of a 32-man steering board consisting of 15 journalists, eight independents (professors and lawyers) and nine government representatives to control distribution to the press. State advertisements were to be distributed only via the board; private advertisers could resort to the board if they so wished. The board would receive a commission of 10% on official and 15% on private advertisements and give not less than 5% of its profits to the newspaper trade unions. The board was empowered to suspend or withhold advertising for three months if it considered the standard of the paper's contents unsuitable.

The owners of nine Istanbul daily newspapers suspended publication for three days from Jan 11 in protest against these laws. On Jan 10, eight of these papers—Akşam, Cumhuriyet, Dünya, Hürriyet, Milliyet, Tercüman, Yeni İstanbul and Yeni Sabah—published a joint declaration, in which they argued that the advertisement law was undemocratic because it effected a type of state control of the press through the steering board, while the workers' law was unnecessary and would only serve to confuse employer-employee relationships and create mistrust. The new laws, the owners claimed, would "undermine basic press rights and liberties."

A spokesman for the NUC said that the owners had declined repeated invitations to discuss the new laws while they were in preparation. The Ankara Radio commentator added that the state's right to control the press has been entirely eliminated, as proved by the composition of the advertisement steering board.

Other Turkish newspapers, including the whole of the Ankara Press, condemned the action taken by the nine owners. The Federation of the Journalists' Trade Unions of Turkey, the Ankara Journalists' Trade Union and the Ankara Newspaper Publishers' Association cabled the nine owners as follows: "The fact that you have decided to stage a three-day boycott upon the enactment of the law ensuring the rights of the intellectual workers who are employed in your establishments, and from whose labour you have made fortunes, while you did not resort to any similar action even in the days of the ousted rulers who gambled with the fate of the country... has merely revealed to the public your psychological decline and your domineering mentality... your clamour that the press is being placed under tutelage is due to the legal recognition of the rights of the intellectual workers who until now were doomed to your exploitation... we hope your common sense will triumph over your commercial mentality..."

The intellectual workers staged silent demonstrations on Jan 10 in Ankara, Istanbul and İzmir in support of the NUC and the new laws. Students in Istanbul bought a number of newspapers which they tore in pieces and burned. Debates on the new laws continued in the press and at workers' meetings for some days and then the issue began to fade out of the news. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 8; Turkish Press Jan 10-15; R. Ankara, Jan 9, 10 [11, 12]; Times, Jan 11-13)

The steering board was established in May and was to start distribution of advertisements on June 1. Private advertising would be uncontrolled. (R. Ankara, May 25 [26])

At the end of June, the board stopped the distribution of official advertisements to four Ankara daily papers (İnkılâp, Karar, Medeniyet and Mücadele) because they had not complied with the advertisement law. The four newspapers appeared on July 1, with the decision in banner headlines, and were distributed gratis. (Cumhuriyet, July 2)

Ahmet Emin Yalman. On Jan 31 Yalman left Vatan which he had edited for 21 years, having been outvoted at a stockholders' meeting, after prolonged struggle for control of the paper (Cumhuriyet, Feb 1; Times, Feb 2). [Later, with some members of the Vatan staff he opened a new paper in Istanbul called Hür Vatan.]

[Ahmet Emin Yalman, one of the best-known Turkish journalists and author of books on modern Turkey, was born in 1889, studied at the Istanbul Law School and Columbia University where he obtained the Ph.D., and began his career as a reporter in 1907. He also served as associate professor of sociology at Istanbul University. In 1940 he became part-proprietor and editor of Vatan. As a protagonist of the freedom of the press, he went to gaol or into exile five times for this cause.]

On May 28 the International Federation of Newspaper and Magazine Publishers awarded the first "Golden Pen of Freedom" to Yalman. The Federation president, Tommaso Astarita, said that Yalman appeared in the eyes of the world as a symbol of the suffering which the Turkish press had to endure in its fight for freedom. WORKERS AND TRADE UNIONS

In 1961 there were in Turkey 483 trade unions with 418,300 members.

293 unions with 204,883 members were affiliated to the Confederation of the Workers' Trade Unions of Turkey (Türkiye İşçi Sendikaları Konfederasyonu, abbreviated: Türk-İş). The Confederation was composed of (1) 11 trade federations (Mesleki Federasyonlar), which comprised 181 unions with 135,791 members; (2) 11 regional associations [of various trades] (Makallı Birlikler) which comprised 100 unions with 48,832 members; (3) two "type trade unions" (Tipi Sendikalar), one of oil workers and the other of miners with 12,000 members; (4) ten unions affiliated directly to the Confederation, with 8,269 members. (Türkiye Yılı, 1962)

Unions Promote Study of Kemalism. The Eskişehir Turkish Revolutionary Club [such clubs were established in 1952 to safeguard Atatürk's reforms] and the local trade unions jointly organized a series of seminars in the town. At the first of them, the Atatürk seminar held on Jan 8, professors and trade union leaders lectured on Kemalism. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 9)

Support For Constitution. The Türk-İş Confederation decided on April 21 to vote "Yes" in the referendum on the Constitution as it guaranteed collective contracts and the right to strike. (Cumhuriyet, April 22)

Workers Support the Regime; Demonstration Against Subversive Activities. On May 20 the Federation of the State Railways Workers' Unions organized a meeting in Eskişehir, attended by thousands of workers, to protest against subversive activities. Banners displayed inscriptions such as: "Our principles are food, peace and freedom," "welfare, freedom from fear and liberty for the workers," "the workers who built the homeland are the army which defends it" "their beads were crushed, let us crush their tails" [Kuyruk, meaning DP partisans]. Union leaders expressed the workers' support for the government and their wish for freedom and democracy, denounced subversive activities by DP partisans and also expressed themselves against totalitarianism, Communism and reaction. (Cumhuriyet, May 21)

Protest Gatherings Against Dismissal of Workers. [On the rising unemployment, see p 518 b.] The Istanbul Workers' Unions Association (Istanbul İşçi Sendikaları Birliği) held a protest meeting on Jan 15 against the dismissal of workers by many factories and institutions during the previous six months. The workers' representatives in the House participated. Banners on the walls proclaimed: "Employees, don't encourage unemployment," "there is no unemployment insurance and the worker's lot will be misery," "permanent work—not promises and advice." Speakers demanded the right to strike. A deputy promised that the workers' representatives in the Assembly would endeavour to incorporate guarantees for the workers in the new constitution. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 16)

More protest meetings were held on Jan 22 in Istanbul by 300 glass workers, who had been dismissed, and in Izmir by the Trade Unions' Association against the dismissals, and on March 1 by 450 workers dismissed by Ankara municipality. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 23, March 2)

Civil Service Salaries Raised. On Jan 20 the government approved a 35% rise in salary for civil servants, of which 20% would be paid as from March 1, 1961 and 15% as from Feb 1, 1962. (On pay increases in the armed forces, see p 522 b.) The increase was provided for in the 1961-62 budget. Pensioned civil servants were to get a 25% increase by stages during 1961. The Assembly, however, decided to raise the pensions also by 35%. The new rates came into force as of March 1. The lowest grade (14) now received £T360 as compared with £T300 before, and the highest grade (1) £T2,400, as compared with £T2,000 (Cumhuriyet, Jan 21, 24, 26, Feb 4, 17, 18, 21, 27)

In June the government decided to amend the Pension Fund Law in favour of the civil servants. (For particulars, see Cumhuriyet, June 16.) [No further reports were seen on this topic.]

Demand For Higher Wages. In Jan agitation began for higher wages, encouraged by the forthcoming increase in civil service pay. [The Ministry of Labour was empowered by the Labour Law to establish minimum wages.]

The General Congress of the State Railways Workers' Unions held in Eskişehir on Jan 29 was dominated by this issue. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 30)

In Feb Bilâl Şimşek, SG of the Textile Workers' Federation, pointed out that as of March 1 the lowest salary of a civil servant would be £T360 a month as compared with minimum wages of about £T180-240 a month for workers, and there were workers who received only £T100 a month (Cumhuriyet, Feb 26). In March the Federation asked the government to raise the wages of all workers by 25%. (Cumhuriyet, March 10)

On March 23, at a press conference, representatives of the Ankara Workers' Trade Unions Association demanded a 50% increase in wages, 20% of which would be deducted for savings bonds. [Such deductions from wages had been made for some time.] They sharply criticized the authorities for deduction from the workers' wages for savings bonds without raising wages. (Cumhuriyet, March 24)

Two days later there was a meeting on this issue of representatives of the Istanbul Workers' Trade Union Association, with the participation of the governor of Istanbul, Refik Tulga, and union representatives in the Constituent Assembly. The latter were attacked for inactivity on this subject. (Cumhuriyet, March 26)

On April 8 the chairman of the State Railways Workers' Federation told the press, that the workers demanded a minimum increase of 40%. (Cumhuriyet, April 9)

On April 16 the chairman of Municipal Workers Trade Unions Federation told the press that the 60,000 municipalities workers demanded a 30% salary increase. (Cumhuriyet, April 17)

Government Non-committal. On April 20 Prof. Cahit Talas, Minister of Labour, told a correspondent that the raising of the people's standard of living was a main object of the revolutionary government, which was giving priority to a review of the minimum wages frozen since 1957. He added, however, that economic considerations, the state of unemployment and the views of the employers must be taken into account. (Cumhuriyet, April 21)

On June 24 the Minister of Industry declared that prices would be lowered and industrial wages raised. (Cumhuriyet, June 25)

The Arbitration Council; Resignation Workers' Representative. [In May?] Halil Tunç, SG of the Türk-İş Confederation, resigned from the Supreme Arbitration Council (Yüksek Hakem Kurulu). [Arbitration of labour disputes was compulsory under laws passed before the May revolution. Disputes not settled by direct negotiations were referred to provincial arbitration boards and, on appeal, to the Supreme Arbitration Council composed of two representatives each of employers and employees, a representative of the Ministry of Labour and a judge of the Court of Appeal.]

Tunç said he resigned because the Minister of Labour was attempting to influence the Council which was an independent institution. "My sole wish," he said, "is that our teacher, Prof. Cahit Talas, put into practice as a Minister what he has taught us as a teacher." (Cumhuriyet, June 5)

Earlier, on May 30, Talas in a press interview denied that the resignation would make the Council suspect. He said that the council was completely independent. One hundred thirty eight work disputes had been submitted to it since the beginning of 1960; in 98 cases, the final decision was in favour of the workers and on 92 occasions the decision had been unanimous. (Cumhuriyet, May 31)

Talas on Social Justice, Unemployment. Speaking on social justice in the above-mentioned interview, the Minister of Labour said it meant the prevention of poverty, an equitable distribution of the national income, "between the human and material factors of production," and the establishment of reasonable work conditions in accordance with human dignity and honour. "The need of the day is to socialize the state, i.e. to protect the economically weak." Therefore, he said, the state "is obliged if necessary" to intervene in the economic and social life of the masses in order to establish amongst them "freedom from anxiety, harmony, social peace and understanding." "Social justice," he added, "is the base of this peace."

Unemployment. The Minister said, was temporary. Social progress was closely connected with economic realities. The revolutionary regime had stabilized prices and undertaken to secure the true value of wages. The 1961 budget, the largest in Turkey's history, would help to secure work for everyone by granting money to various development schemes. (Cumhuriyet, May 31; R. Ankara, May 31 [W, June 8]; R. Ankara, June 6 [8, W 15])

Labour Legislation. [Following the Assembly approval of the new constitution, which included provisions for labour rights including the rights to strike and to collective bargaining (see p 549 b), the government began to prepare appropriate bills, but none of them reached the discussion stage in the Assembly by the end of the year.]

Labour agitated mainly for laws granting the rights to strike and to collective bargaining. There was also to be an amendment of the basic Labour Law of 1936 (Law

No. 3008 of June 8, 1936, as amended by Laws No. 3516 of June 28, 1938, and No. 5518 of Jan 25, 1950.)

In April the Minister of Labour said that his Ministry was preparing several labour bills in line with the provisions in the constitution, to be submitted to the Assembly after the referendum on the constitution: a bill on the right to strike; a trade union bill which would correct many points which had been the subject of complaint and enable the unions to develop democratic organization; and an amendment of the Maritime Labour Law [No. 6379 of March 10, 1954] in favour of the crews. (Cumhuriyet, April 21)

On June 2 the government submitted to the Constituent Assembly the Trade Unions' Bill, amending the law of 1947 [No. 5018 and Law No. 5518 of Jan 1950.] It was reported that the Assembly would debate the bill on June 8 [but by the end of the year, it had not yet done so.] (Cumhuriyet, June 3)

On June 9 the Minister of Labour told the Istanbul Chamber of Industry: "The employers must know this: within two years, the workers will be granted the right to strike and there will be collective bargaining." (Cumhuriyet, June 10)

Bill on the Right to Strike. In mid-July Cumhuriyet reported that the bill on the right to strike had been drafted. Strikes and lockouts would be forbidden in the civil service, municipalities and state enterprises, in time of mobilization or state emergency, under martial law, in works controlled by the Ministry of Defence, in communication services, the information service, radio and television, medical services, life- and property-saving occupations, water, electricity and gas works, flour mills and bakeries. If a strike or a lockout was liable to threaten state security, health, the economy or social order, representatives of government, workers and employers would meet to discuss the matter, and report their conclusions within 20 days to the PM; within 15 days, the government would decide whether the strike or lockout may continue, or be suspended or prohibited.

A decision to strike would have to be approved in secret vote by at least 75% of the workers in the place of work concerned, and to be reported to the local labour official and the Ministry of Labour; a strike or lockout decision could be implemented only 30 days after these reports were made; during this period the Ministry and the Supreme Arbitration Council would endeavour to prevent their taking effect. (Cumhuriyet, July 15)

Several trade unions rejected the draft bill claiming that the constitutional right to strike should be unconditional and accorded to all workers in every place of work. (Cumhuriyet, July 19)

[The bill had not been submitted to the Assembly by the end of the year.]

Workers' Requests from the New Government. On Nov 23 the Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions of Turkey issued a communiqué containing ten requests to the İnönü government: (1) all state and municipal employees who had been dismissed since the revolution without reason, as well as those who had been transferred to different fields of employment, should be returned to their former positions; (2) the new trade unions law should be the first item on the government's agenda; (3) the law on the rights to strike and collective bargaining should be passed immediately; (4) the Labour Law should be revised; (5) agricultural workers should come under the Labour Law; (6) an unemployment insurance scheme should be established; (7) retirement pay should be raised; (8) the granting of housing facilities for workers should be seriously considered; (9) the Ministry of Labour should be provided with funds for social assistance; (10) deduction from wages for savings bonds should be stopped and sums hitherto deducted should be repaid. (Ulus, Nov 24)

In Ankara, Izmir and Zonguldak workers' demonstrations took place, especially of workers employed in state enterprises. They complained that wages were low and often held back and demanded the right to strike and collective bargaining. (Milliyet, Dec 4)

The new Labour Minister, Bülent Ecevit (RPP), told the press on Dec 3 that laws on the right to strike and collective bargaining would be submitted to the Assembly, and the Trade Unions' Law and Labour Law would be amended. The Ministry, he said, must be reorganized in keeping with economic and social change and its budgets increased. He also said the government would improve and supervise standards of occupational safety throughout the country and had decided to exempt workers from the obligation to buy savings bonds. He assured the workers that the government believed in social justice strongly enough to consider these matters without having to be reminded of them by various demonstrations. (Ulus; Öncü, Dec 4)

Miners' Wages Increased. On Dec 27 the government decided to raise the wages of some 40,000 miners as from Jan 1, 1962. The daily wage of miners working underground was to be raised from £T6. to £T8.5 and of those working above ground from £T6 to £T7.5 (Cumhuriyet, Dec 28)

Workers' Mass Protest Meeting. On Dec 31 workers from Istanbul and neighbouring provinces held a mass meeting in Taksim Square in Istanbul; estimates of the number of participants varied from 25,000 to 100,000. The speakers and the banners called for social justice, and the right to strike, and collective bargaining. One speaker stressed that the workers fully supported the new Minister of Labour, Bülent Ecevit.

The labour leaders originally asked for permission for a silent march after the meeting, but this was refused. The authorities took security precautions, including the transfer of army units to Istanbul, but the meeting was conducted in an orderly manner. (Milliyet, Dec 21; Cumhuriyet, Dec 26-31; Turkish Press, Jan 1, 1962)

Turkish Workers to West Germany. In autumn 1960, the German Federal Republic began to recruit workers in Turkey for German industry. At first, the German Consulate in Istanbul dealt with the applications, but when the number of applications grew, a German government commission was set up in Istanbul.

On Oct 30 Turkey and the GFR signed an agreement providing that the Turkish workers would receive the same conditions and benefits as the Germans. The Turkish Minister of Labour said that the supply of workers to Germany would eventually provide Turkish industry with well-trained manpower. Before the agreement was signed, about 7,000 workers had already gone to Germany. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 26, June 13, July 17, Aug 13, Nov 1, 2; Times, July 3)

POLITICAL PARTIES

POLITICAL PARTIES AUTHORIZED; NEW PARTIES ESTABLISHED

Political Parties Allowed; Appearance of New Parties. The ban on party activities dating from the day of the coup (May 27, 1960) was partially abolished as from Jan 13, 1961. It was permitted to establish new parties and to alter existing party statutes.

The parties were allowed to set up branches at provincial and district levels but neither in villages nor in sub-districts, as had been provided in a law of July 8, 1960 (see MER, p 444). Party statutes would have to be submitted to the authorities within one month. Propaganda was forbidden. (R. Ankara, Jan 12 [14]; Ulus, Jan 13)

Up to Feb 13, 20 parties applied for registration. The party programmes were not published, being considered political propaganda. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 16)

Parties Registered. Below is a list of the parties which registered with the authorities. Only the first four, however, actually participated in the ensuing political struggle. Details on internal developments in these four, as well as in some other parties, are given under separate headings below:

1. The Republican People's Party, led by İsmet İnönü;
2. The Republican Peasants' National Party, led by Osman Bölükbaşı;
3. The Justice Party, a new party, led by Rağıp Gü-müşpala;
4. The New Turkey Party, a new party, led by Ekrem Alican;

5. The Homeland Party;
6. The Republican Professional Improvements' Party (Cumhuriyetçi Mesleki İslahat Partisi), led by Salih Adil Başaran, economist, who said that he had considered the formation of this party whilst on diplomatic service in India in 1948; Ahmet Süer, retired Col. vice-chairman; Muhiittin Salur, retired Gen., SG;
7. The Labour Party, headed by Bedrettin Ertenmo-y;
8. The Turkish Workers' and Farmers' Party (Türk İşçi ve Çiftçi Partisi);
9. The Moderate Liberal Party (Mutedil Liberal Partisi);
10. The Workers' Party, headed by trade union leaders;
11. The Principle Party (Düstur Partisi), led by Tarcan, a retired Col;
12. The Confidence Party (Güven Partisi);
13. The Service to the Nation Party (Millete Hizmet Partisi). Among the founders of the last two parties there were retired military and civil servants, journalists and merchants;
14. The Conservative Party (Muhafazakâr Parti), led by Yaşar Yurtöven, businessman; Ekrem Yurtöven and Fahri Sezen. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 12-15, 18; Times, Feb 13; Birmingham Post, Feb 23)

Gürsel Meets Party Leaders. In the second half of Feb and during March, President Gürsel met the following party leaders, as he said, in order to learn their ideas: İsmet İnönü (RPP) and Ekrem Alican (NTP), Gümüşpala (JP), Akif İyidoğan and Necmi Akyıldız (Homeland Party), Osman Bölükbaşı (RPNP) and İsmail Rüştü Aksal

(RPP). (Cumhuriyet, Feb 18, 20, 23, March 5, 23, 29, 30)

In May Gürsel met. Yaşar Yurtöven, leader of the Conservative Party. (Cumhuriyet, May 31)

More Restrictions on Party Activities Lifted. A further extension of party activities as from April 1 was permitted by a presidential decree issued on March 27. This legalized organizational activities in general and indoor political meetings, but propaganda was still forbidden (and was permitted only on the eve of the elections, in Sept.).

Gen. Gürsel answered in the negative to a press question as to whether state funds should not be allocated to prevent parties from coming under the influence of certain wealthy persons who were financing newly-formed political parties. He added that if wealthy people thought that they could serve their interests through party influence, they were mistaken. "We shall not let this happen." (R. Ankara, March 25 [28]; Cumhuriyet, March 26, 28)

The parties now began to prepare the holding of provincial and district congresses. (Cumhuriyet, March 28, April 3)

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY VOTE

Parties Solicit DP Vote. [The newly-established Justice Party and New Turkey Party and later also the Republican Peasants' National Party competed for the former DP vote. To this end, they enlisted former DP officials who in turn endeavored to recruit the former DP rank and file.] It was observed in March that especially the JP and NTP were making "remarkably uninhibited attempts to attract the former DP vote estimated at nearly half the total electorate." Speeches and articles openly justifying many aspects of the fallen Menderes regime had appeared. (Times, March 13)

At the beginning of April it was reported that DP supporters, through their daily newspaper, Son Havadis, were constantly urging the NTP, the JP and the RFPN to unite in order to preserve the former DP vote intact and keep RPP out of power. (Times, April 4)

Gürsel Warns the Parties. In an address to the Constituent Assembly on March 10 Gürsel warned the parties on the subject of the DP vote. He said that those who would raise the DP from its grave, who were opposing the constitution and were courting by devious methods honest and innocent former Democratic citizens, didn't know how dangerous was the fire with which they were playing. "They will never, never succeed." (Cumhuriyet, March 11)

The Turkish press in general approved of Gen. Gürsel's statement. So did the leaders of the RPP and the RFPN, who pointed out that the former DP members were joining the new parties. The leaders of the JP and the NTP, on the other hand, suggested that Gürsel's remarks must have been intended for persons other than themselves. (Turkish Press, March 11-13; Times, March 13)

On May 12 Gen. Gürsel gave what he called "my last warning" to the political parties. Warning former DP members to stop their subversive activities (see p 544 a), he said that some of them, who were more patient and cautious, had joined the new parties, and were trying to re-establish the DP under a new name. These were the men who, especially after 1957, had served as DP officials and participated in the unlawful activities of the government. The public conscience had condemned them as criminals and they must not be allowed a voice in national affairs. Some of the new parties thought that they could win votes by making use of the influence of such men. In fact, the vast majority of former DP members were honest and patriotic people, regarded these men as criminals and hated them. Some people were so audacious as to say: "We are former Democrats. We shall come to power and take our revenge." Gürsel stated that, of the new parties, the Homeland Party in particular had refrained from taking this course. For the time being this party had not grown very much, but its honest attitude constituted a proper guarantee both for its members and for the future of the country. (R. Ankara, May 12 [15]; Cumhuriyet, May 13)

NTP, JP Intransigent. While the RPP and the Homeland Party welcomed the President's statement, Ekrem Alican, the NTP leader, and Ragıp Gümüşpala, the JP leader, declined to comment upon it. Their parties, however, issued general statements in support of it as well as of the arrests of former DP members charged with subversive activities. (Cumhuriyet, May 13, 14, 15)

When Cumhuriyet reported that the new parties in Istanbul were now planning to purge their ranks of former DP members, the NTP secretary said this was not the case as far as his own party was concerned but might be true of the JP. (Cumhuriyet, May 16, 17)

The JP issued an additional statement on May 21, the gist of which was that former RPP members who had founded the DP and later left it to found the Freedom Party and [when this party failed in the 1957 elections] rejoined the RPP, were now serving as deputies and in official positions of responsibility and power [whereas former DP members now joining the JP were regarded as criminals]. The statement concluded: "Every day produces new evidence of the leftist and socialist tendencies of our adversaries." (Cumhuriyet, May 22)

The authorities immediately interrogated the JP central executive council members on this statement; Gümüşpala reportedly claimed that it was not directed at any institution or person. (Cumhuriyet, May 25, 29)

THE REPUBLICAN PEOPLE'S PARTY

(Cumhuriyet Halk Partisi)

This party, established by Kemal Atatürk and, since his death in 1938, led by İsmet İnönü, began its reorganization by reopening its centre in Istanbul and modifying its regulations which were submitted to the authorities (Cumhuriyet, Jan 17, 18, Feb 8; on further RPP organization, see Cumhuriyet, Jan 22, 24, 25, 28, 29, Feb 7, 10). [The party's organ was the Ankara daily Ulus. The party had a vast majority in the Constituent Assembly which had not been popularly elected.]

Attracting Officers, Academic Circles, Students, Youth. Following a concentrated effort by the party to enlist into its ranks officers pensioned off after the May revolution, 57 such officers joined the party in Istanbul in Feb. Fourteen professors of the 147 dismissed in Oct 1960 (MER 1960, p 466) also joined.

At the beginning of Feb the party began to open youth branches. In March, following the first reading in the House of a bill granting suffrage to citizens from the age of 18 [which in the end was not passed], the party started a campaign to attract youth, especially students. On March 22 a group of 116 students at the Istanbul universities joined the party. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 7, 9, 10; March 23)

In April the party established a youth branch directorate, with Erol Unal, former chairman of the Students'

Federation, as chairman, and Beşir Hamidi, former chairman of the Students' Union, as SG. The directorate organized youth branches in the provinces (Cumhuriyet, April 6). The first provincial congress of an RPP youth branch was held in Eskişehir on April 8. During April and May, youth congresses as well as women's congresses were held in other provinces. (Cumhuriyet, April 9, 16, 23, 24, 30, May 1, 5, 8, 15, 22, June 5, Aug 3)

Meeting with Minorities. In June the RPP Istanbul Executive, it was reported, held a secret meeting with a delegation of the chairmen of the pious foundations [awqâf] of the minorities. They listened to complaints and received certain promises. (Cumhuriyet, June 8)

An RPNP Leader Joins the Party. On July 27 Deputy Kcnaan Esengün, a retired General and a leader of the RPNP, joined the RPP. (Cumhuriyet, July 28; see also the RPNP.)

Kasım Gülek's Bid for Power. [Gülek, b. 1910, an intellectual and a landowner in Adana province, represented this province in the Assembly from 1940 onwards. He was minister in the RPP government in the years 1947-49 and, following the RPP defeat in the 1950 elections, was elected SG of the party, a post which he held until Oct 1959. He successfully reorganized the party in the critical period after the loss of power and built up a strong personal following, but also alienated a powerful opposition nucleus. In 1959 he resigned his post because of differences of opinion with several leading members of the party, including İnönü. He immediately began regrouping his forces for an attempted comeback but was stopped by the May revolution, when all political activity was banned.]

When party activities were resumed, Gülek renewed his efforts to regain his position as party SG at the party congress due to be held in Aug. To this end, he organized a group of supporters in the Istanbul branch, who prepared to capture the branch at the forthcoming elections. He also published a newspaper named Tania as from March 1 (on this paper, see also p 545 b). Gülek's activities caused the RPP Istanbul provincial executive to demand that he be brought before the party's court of honour and ousted from the party; it accused him of creating a faction within the party and of various other disruptive activities.

In the party's central executive, a strong group supported the expulsion of Gülek, in order to settle this problem before the RPP came into power. They claimed that such a step had already been planned in 1959 when Gülek resigned, but had not been carried through at the time for fear of weakening the party under the DP regime. Another strong group opposed this measure, claiming that Gülek, as SG, had strengthened the party in its critical period, and could not be simply expelled. The issue, they thought, should be brought before the party congress which would request Gülek either to work as a disciplined party member or to leave the party.

Gülek himself said he had many opponents, but if a man had no opponent, he was second-rate. He had served the nation and would continue to serve it.

The party HQ decided to bring the issue before the general congress instead of submitting it to the party court, as demanded by the Istanbul executive. Thereupon the latter's members resigned, cabling the party HQ: "Either Gülek or us." They were, however, prevailed upon to withdraw the resignation.

Gülek's supporters protested against the attitude of the Istanbul executive while his opponents at party HQ endeavoured to weaken his position in Adana province, his main stronghold. Nevertheless, Gülek's supporters captured the provincial branch by an absolute majority at the elections on July 30. (Cumhuriyet, May 22-24, 29, 31, June 1, 5, 9, 10, 19, 26; July 30, 31)

The Istanbul provincial congress, held on Aug 12-13, on the other hand, ended with the victory of Gülek's opponents who were supported by the party HQ. Ali Sohtorik was re-elected chairman of the branch. (Cumhuriyet; Ulus, Aug 13, 14)

RPP Congress Dominated by Gülek Issue. The RPP held its 15th general congress in Ankara from Aug 24-28 with the participation of about 1,300 delegates. In his opening speech İsmet İnönü, the party president, praised the NUC for its decision to hand over power by a process of free elections, and emphasized the need to solve outstanding economic and financial problems and to further education which had always been one of the party's main interests and had been neglected.

The party SG, İsmail Rüştü Akal, said the RPP refused to be associated with the party squabbles and would enter the elections in the spirit of brotherhood of the May revolution.

Gülek, asked to explain his resignation from the post of party SG in 1959, said it had been forced by elements inside the party. He spoke of two incidents. He stated that it had been falsely alleged at the time that the RPP had organized the incident at Geyikli (an attack by peasants on a group of RPP deputies in 1959; at the Yassıada trials, DP members were found responsible for provoking the incident. He also spoke of the immediate cause of his resignation, his letter to Col. Fens at NATO headquarters, which, when published by the Turkish government, created an uproar because of his interference in government affairs and offence given to the Turkish representative at NATO). He said that in this letter he had urged the inclusion of a greater number of opposition members in the Turkish parliamentary delegation. The letter never reached Col. Fens; a Turkish official intercepted it and sent it to the government which in turn published it with alterations.

Gülek also advocated the introduction of the majority election instead of the proportional system which he had supported earlier, as he maintained, the RPP could not win elections under proportional representation.

Some delegates wanted İnönü to explain his side of the resignation, and although the congress voted against this proposal, İnönü took the rostrum. He said that Gülek had lied at the time about the content of his letter to Col. Fens. "There is no place for liars in the party," he said, adding "you cannot force me to do something which I do not want [i.e. accept Gülek as SG]... if you want me to, I can resign from the leadership of the party." A number of newspapers reacted to this declaration by accusing İnönü of anti-democratic behaviour.

İnönü, the only candidate, was re-elected president of the party by 1,164 votes out of 1,309; some of the 145 blank ballots carried the name of Metin Toker, editor of the weekly Aksu and İnönü's son-in-law, an apparent reference to rumours that İnönü was very much under Toker's influence.

Akal was elected SG by 957 votes against 335 votes for Gülek, whom many delegates had in vain tried to persuade not to put up his candidacy. This result was attributed to İnönü's strong support of Akal. All former members of the central executive council were re-elected except five, one of whom had opposed Gülek in Adana.

The congress resolved that as from the 16th congress the SG would be elected by the central executive from among its members instead of by the congress. The congress did not empower the central executive to appoint 10% of the candidates for the Assembly, as requested by İnönü, but only 15 candidates, and on condition that they be workers or small businessmen and be approved by the party council in their election district.

The congress unanimously adopted a declaration of basic aims, which was in the main identical with the party's election platform (see p 565 b). (Cumhuriyet; Ulus, Aug 25-29; Hürriyet, Aug 26; Kudret; Son Havadis, Aug 27, 28; Times, Aug 29)

Kasım Gülek told the press after the conference that he would continue his struggle undeterred, not for personal gain, but for principles and democracy within his party. (Tanin, Aug 29)

Selim Sarper Joins the RPP. In mid-Sept it was reported that Selim Sarper, the Foreign Minister, had joined the RPP and would be a party candidate in İstanbul in the forthcoming elections. Son Havadis, however, reported that Sarper had declared that he had not joined any political party; he was not sure he would enter politics, but if he ever did "the normal thing to do will be my joining the RPP." (Hür Vatan; Son Havadis, Sept 12)

Sarper appeared on the RPP list as candidate for the House (Hürriyet, Sept 22) [and was elected].

THE REPUBLICAN PEASANTS NATIONAL PARTY (Cumhuriyetçi Köylü Millet Partisi)

Synopsis. The Republican Peasants' National Party, traditional and religious, was established in 1937 through the merger of the Republican National Party (founded 1948) and the Peasants' Party (founded 1952) and was led by Osman Bölükbaşı. Following the granting of permission for party activity, the party reorganized itself and endeavoured to recruit former DP members.

A majority of the RPNP Deputies in the Constituent Assembly did not participate in the vote on the constitution.

Bölükbaşı took a firm stand against the military regime. He refused to attend the round-table conference of the party leaders, demanded that there should be no death sentences at Yassıada and continued to comment on the subject in the election campaign, after the death sentences had been carried out, though other prominent politicians abstained from doing so.

The party emerged from the elections as the fourth group in both Houses of the Assembly, winning 13.5% of the votes. The party declined to enter any coalition government and preferred to remain in opposition.

Bölükbaşı's leadership gave rise to a strong opposition inside the party, led by Ahmet Tahtakılıç. An attempt to oust Bölükbaşı in May failed but at the end of the year he resigned. Whether this opposition was prompted by personal considerations, by policy differences or by both, the sources available did not make clear, though at least one source regarded the resignation as a victory for the party's progressives.

The party's unofficial organ was the Ankara daily Kudret.

Former DP Members, Officers Join Party. (On RPNP organizing, see Cumhuriyet, Jan 27, 30, Feb 2, 7, 10, 11, 12.) In April the party began organizing youth branches. (Cumhuriyet, April 9)

The party was joined by a number of former DP deputies who had not been re-elected in 1937; [all DP members of the last Assembly, it will be remembered, were put on trial at Yassıada]. The party also endeavoured to recruit high-ranking officers pensioned off after the May revolution; by Feb 6, two retired generals joined. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 27; Feb 7, 10)

In May Bölükbaşı said that former DP members were joining the party in large numbers. (Cumhuriyet, May 22)

Arrests. On May 31 three RPNP members and ten former DP members were arrested in Polatlı [Ankara province] for propaganda against the revolutionary administration. RPNP spokesmen said that earlier another 12 party members had been arrested; they said they ascribed no importance to these arrests. (Cumhuriyet, June 1)

Attempt to Oust Bölükbaşı. At the beginning of May, while Bölükbaşı lay ill, a group named "The Strugglers" (Mücadeleler), led by Ahmet Tahtakılıç, the Minister of Education (who was formerly, like Bölükbaşı, a prominent member of the Republican National Party), tried to oust him from the leadership. They claimed that the party had made no progress since the May revolution owing to Bölükbaşı's personality, and succeeded in getting a resolution passed in the executive demanding his resignation or at least his de facto retirement until the party congress, leaving the direction of the party to their group. Bölükbaşı refused to comply. He attended the executive meeting on May 5 but, according to his opponents, failed to secure a majority and left the meeting. The executive then reaffirmed its request for his resignation (Cumhuriyet, May 6). This report was not denied, but in a letter to Cumhuriyet, the party SG said that Bölükbaşı was elected president by the party congress and, according to party regulations, could not be forced to resign. (Cumhuriyet, May 7)

New Members and Resignations. In June the members of the JP executive in Konya joined the RPNP. No reason was given. (Cumhuriyet, June 5)

In July Deputy Kenan Eşengün, a retired general, left the party and joined the RPP. (Cumhuriyet, July 20, 28)

At the same time two deputies joined the party: Hüseyin Ataman, who had served as Minister of Defence in Gürsel's second cabinet, and Col. (ret.) Halim Önalp. (Cumhuriyet, July 29)

The Party Congress. The RPNP held its general congress in Ankara on Aug 27-29. In his opening speech, Bölükbaşı said that the new constitution contained all the party was fighting for and that the party stood for honest and effective administration.

Ahmet Tahtakılıç said he would not run for party president and that he was opposed to the creation of factions in the party. Thus, for the time being, a struggle for power within the party leadership was prevented. Bölükbaşı was re-elected president by an overwhelming majority and the congress ended on Aug 29 without adopting resolutions. (Cumhuriyet; Kudret, Aug 28-30)

Bölükbaşı Resigns. On Dec 10 Bölükbaşı submitted to the party executive his resignation from the party leadership. Efforts to persuade him to withdraw his resignation failed. Bölükbaşı described his resignation as a "changing of the guard" and added that it should not be interpreted as a "deviation from my allegiance to the party and to the great masses who have supported me for long years." The press claimed that his resignation was caused by his differences with members of the central executive council and especially Ahmet Tahtakılıç. Hür Vatan described the resignation as the triumph of the progressive members of the RPNP. (Milliyet; Hür Vatan; Tercüman, Dec 14-16)

THE HOMELAND PARTY (Memleketçi Partisi)

Synopsis. The Homeland Party was organized in Jan by former members and supporters of the Freedom Party and the Democratic Party, and retired officers.

The party soon underwent a crisis, apparently on the question of political orientation. First there were attempts to unite it with the JP and the NTP, both of which courted the former DP vote. Then in May the party was praised by Gen. Gürsel for not seeking the DP vote as others were doing. Thereupon the party acquired some prominent new members but, soon afterwards, a number of its leading members left the party and joined either the NTP or the JP (among the latter was the Homeland Party's first president). In July the party changed its president twice. Thus weakened, the party failed to establish branches in 15 provinces, as required by law to enable a party to participate in the general elections. The party, however, continued to exist and Gen. Gürsel appointed one of its members to the Senate.

Founding Members. The Homeland Party was the first party to submit its request for registration. The seven sponsors were: Col. Naci Bozkurt and Maj-Gen. Necmi Akıldız, both retired; Hakkı Ketenöğlu, a former State Attorney-General; Akif Iyidoğan, a former provincial governor and RPP Assembly member; Şakir Zorluoğlu, an industrialist; Nedret Pinar, a lawyer; and Talât Akdoğan. They told the press that there were 120 founding members, among them 16 former Assembly members, 15 physicians, 27 jurists, 15 financiers, 12 engineers, five former provincial governors and 12 army men. They refused to reveal their political programme and only said that they supported economic freedom and social justice within a democratic framework. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 15)

DP Influence. Several former members of the DP and the Freedom Party joined the party, among them Enver Safer Öder, Bayar's defence counsel (Cumhuriyet, Jan 16). The party, and especially Safer Öder, endeavoured to recruit members of the DP. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 10)

Unsuccessful Bids to Unite with Other New Parties. [There were unsuccessful bids to unite the party with two other emerging parties which became in time the successors to the DP vote.] There was an abortive effort at the beginning to unite the party with a group led by Ekrem Alican, which later became the New Turkey Party (Cumhuriyet, Jan 23-31). Three weeks later, after the party had registered, a joint communiqué by Gü müşpala for the Justice Party (see below) and Naci Bozkurt for the Homeland Party announced that the two parties had decided to unite. The next day, however, several founding members of the Homeland Party said that there would be no unification. Bozkurt thereupon stated that he and 11 other party leaders in Ankara had resolved on the unification but the party leaders in Istanbul had refused consent. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 14, 15)

Organization. In Feb the party began to organize its branches. Prominent among the organizers were Hayati Ataker, a former commander of the gendarmerie and Nihat Şu, [who both later left the party and respectively joined the NTP and the JP.] (Cumhuriyet, Feb 6)

On Feb 11 Öder, Hayati Ataker and three other party members submitted the party regulations and programme to the authorities. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 12)

In March the party decided to open branches in 21 [out of 67] provinces, but in July the party president said it had established [only] five and was preparing to set up another 26 (Cumhuriyet, March 27, July 8). In the end, the party failed to establish branches in 15 provinces and all districts thereof, needed to enable it to participate in the elections, as provided by law. (Cumhuriyet, Sept 23)

Party Programme. The president of the party, Akif Iyidoğan, told journalists on March 17 that the party's programme could be summarized in seven words: soul (can), way (yol), water (suy), light (nur), house (ev), village (köy) and work (iş). As to the former DP members, he said "We are in a period of healing wounds, there is no reason to create complexes in vain among former DP members." (Cumhuriyet, March 18)

Ataker Leaves Party. On March 28 Lt-Gen. (ret.) Hayati Ataker, one of the party founders and member of its central committee, left the party. No reason was published. (Cumhuriyet, March 29). [He later joined the NTP.]

Gürsel's Praise Enhances Party's Prestige. President Gürsel's praise for the party in his speech of May 12, for refraining from canvassing the DP vote (see p 553), enhanced its prestige especially among the deputies; party spokesmen claimed that many independents had joined the party but gave no names. According to Cumhuriyet, they included Hayri Mumcuoğlu, the Minister of State; the former Minister of Labour, Mehmet Reşit Beşerler; and three Deputies, Col. (ret.) Halim Onalp, Eşat Çağa and Mahmut Yalay. (Cumhuriyet, May 13, 15)

Party In Crisis, Changes Chairman Twice, New Members and Resignations. On July 4 Gen. (ret.) Fahri Belen, a Deputy and former Minister of Public Works (in a DP cabinet), was elected party president. [Iyidoğan left the party and joined the JP.] In his first public appearance, he broadcast an appeal for the approval of the constitution in the forthcoming referendum (Cumhuriyet, July 5). He told a press conference that Gürsel was his only candidate for the presidency. He revealed that the following deputies had joined the party: Nihat Reşat Belger, Eşat Çağa [who had left the NTP], Gen. (ret.) Enver Adakan [a co-founder of the DP and later of the Freedom Party], Hüseyin Ataman [a retired general and Minister of Defence in Gürsel's second Cabinet who later left the HP and joined the RPNP] and Hulusi Onal. He added that Muharrem İhsan Kınıkçılı would be a party candidate in the coming elections. (Cumhuriyet, July 8)

On July 28 a new party president appeared before the press: Enver Adakan. He said that the party had changed its name to Free Homeland Party (Memleketçi Serbest Partisi) and had adopted a liberal programme, especially in the economic field. [No reason was given for these changes.] Many of its leading members now left the party, among them Nedret Pinar and Enver Safer Öder, both founding members. Fahri Belen became honorary president of the party. He stated that it was natural for these persons to leave the party and join the JP, but it would be easier now to work in the party. (Cumhuriyet, July 28, 29, Aug 9, 11)

Party Leader Appointed Senator. One of the 15 senators appointed by President Gürsel at the end of Oct in accordance with the constitution was a HP member: Eşat Çağrı, the party SG. (Cumhuriyet, Oct 31)

THE JUSTICE PARTY (Adalet Partisi)

The Justice Party was founded in Jan by Gen. (ret.) Ragıp Gümüşpala, first Chief of Staff under the NUC. The party contained three main elements: former officers retired after the May revolution, adherents of the dissolved Democratic Party and former members of the Peasants' Party.

The party soon acquired a reputation as a successor to the DP and clashed with the military regime. Many former DP members who joined the party were active against the revolutionary regime and were arrested and tried. The party was repeatedly warned by the government to refrain from recruiting former DP members and from subversive activities. The most severe warning followed the referendum on the constitution, against which the party agitated.

The former DP members in the party's leadership and in its provincial cadres attracted many former DP votes in the general elections and the party emerged by far the strongest group in the Senate and the second strongest in the House of Representatives, winning about 36% of the votes.

Following the elections, differences of opinion appeared in the party. The extreme right proposed Prof. Bağış, who had become their champion, against Gen. Gürsel for the presidency and refused to enter a coalition with the RPP, while Gümüşpala and his group supported Gürsel and were prepared to enter such a coalition under certain conditions. A middle-of-the-road attitude was taken by a third group (see p 571 b).

Under army pressure, the party entered a coalition government with the RPP, a step that was followed by serious dissension inside the party. By the end of the year, however, it appeared that Gümüşpala had succeeded in restoring unity within the ranks.

The Istanbul daily Son Havadis supported the extremist wing of the party.

Gen. Gümüşpala Founds Party. At the end of Jan Gen. Ragıp Gümüşpala, who was appointed Chief of the General Staff after the May revolution but was retired in Aug 1960 (MER 1960, pp 435, 443), took active steps towards the formation of a party. He left Izmir for Ankara where he met Gen. Gürsel and NUC members as well as founder-members of Alican's NTP (Cumhuriyet, Jan 30, 31). On Jan 31 Lt-Col. (ret.) Şinasi Osma, formerly Gen. Gümüşpala's aide-de-camp, told the press of the founding of the Justice Party under the leadership of Gümüşpala (Cumhuriyet, Feb 1). The party, it was reported, would continue on the road started by Atatürk, would make no concessions to the right or left and would not compromise for the sake of votes; its economic policy would be liberal. Gümüşpala denied that his party had approached former DP deputies. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 4)

Peasants' and Union Parties Incorporated in JP. On Feb 6 the JP and the former Peasants' Party agreed to unite. (The Peasants' Party (Köylü Partisi) was founded in 1952, united with the Republican National Party in 1957 and thus formed the Republican Peasants' National Party. Several leading members of the Peasants' Party who had left the RPNP in 1959-60, now joined the JP.) (Cumhuriyet, Feb 6, 7)

On Feb 8, on Gümüşpala's initiative, they were joined by the Union Party (Birlik Partisi), a small party founded in 1957 in Istanbul with branches in 17 provinces and 30,000 members. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 7, 9)

On Feb 11 Gümüşpala, Necmettin Öktem (a retired general), Şinasi Osma, and three former members of the Peasants' Party, Tahsin Demiryaz, Ethem Menemencioğlu and Muhtar Yazır, submitted the party regulations and programme to the authorities. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 12)

A project to unite the party with the Homeland Party was unsuccessful (see: The Homeland Party).

Former DP Members Enlisted. Party organization concentrated mainly on W. Anatolia (the former DP stronghold), the European parts and Ankara. Gümüşpala himself organized the branches in Izmir and the Aegean regions. The party leaders also went to the other regions to examine the prospects there. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 21). In Izmir the party committee was composed mostly of former DP members of the town council. Retired General Mehmet Ali Aytaç, a DP supporter, was appointed chairman of the committee (Cumhuriyet, Feb 28). The Istanbul committee was chaired by Lt-Gen. (ret.) Enver Akoğlu, a former leading DP member in Ankara. Of the ten members of the Committee, four had belonged to the DP and one to the RPNP. (Cumhuriyet, March 4)

Certain newspapers and part of the public soon called the JP Kıyrcık (tail, satellite) of the DP. In reaction, Gümüşpala declared that the JP had expressed its confidence in the government and the NUC; it was "not a hate party." (Cumhuriyet, March 6)

Arrest and Trial of Mehmet Yorgancıoğlu Causes Crisis Inside Party. On March 15 Yorgancıoğlu, Deputy SG of the JP in charge of organization, and a former DP member, was arrested in Izmir on a charge of conducting propaganda aimed at destroying public order. He had allegedly stated at a party meeting that the JP was a continuation of the DP, and to have referred to the present military leaders as "ignorant men, who thought they could overthrow the legal government of the country and make a revolution." The following day, four members of the JP Izmir province executive, all former DP members, were arrested. (Cumhuriyet, March 16, 17, 30; Times, March 17)

This affair led to the resignation from the party of several leading members of its Istanbul branch and it was reported that Gümüşpala intended to resign from the party leadership. On March 20 Gümüşpala told the press that the JP was striving for unity and fraternity and was a party of law and order. Though ill-intentioned persons might have infiltrated into the party, they would not find their place in it. The JP, he said, was no successor to the DP. Gümüşpala then met President Gürsel. On March 23 the JP Central Committee issued a declaration to the effect that the arrested men had acted in accordance with the principles of the party and the law of the country. (Cumhuriyet, March 18, 21, 24)

Yorgancıoğlu's trial opened on April 29 in Izmir. (The other four JP detainees had been released.) Yorgancıoğlu, who was defended by five lawyers, rejected the charges against him. He denied that he had said: "When I shall be President I shall rescue Members." He added: "I understand the May 27 revolution. A man must be mad to say such words." The trial ended on May 10 and Yorgancıoğlu was set free. (Cumhuriyet, March 30, April 9, 16, 30, May 11). [No more details were available.]

In Sept Yorgancıoğlu was expelled from the JP; he protested that he had not been given the opportunity to defend himself. (Yeni Gün, Sept 1, 5; Cumhuriyet, Sept 3)

Difficulties in Gaziantep. At the end of March Gümüşpala came in person to Gaziantep to organize a party branch, but failed to gather together even a directing committee [no reasons for this were published]. Only when he made a second effort towards the end of April did he succeed in his endeavour. (Cumhuriyet, April 1, 26)

JP Wins Members From, Loses Members To, Other Parties. The JP Edirne Province executive nominated on April 21, and composed mostly of merchants and retired officers, included among others, three former DP members, one RNP member and one RPP member. (Cumhuriyet, April 22)

Later, however, there was a reverse movement. In June all the members of the JP executive in Konya left the party and joined the RNP. No reason was given. In July the NTP announced that JP leaders in the provinces of Aydın, Gaziantep, Kars and Adana had left the party and joined the NTP. This was denied by the JP. (Cumhuriyet, June 5, July 7, 8)

Further Arrests and Trials of DP-JP Members. On March 23 it was reported that Ahmet Gürkan, a former DP deputy, who was the JP organizer in Tokat, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment for giving false evidence, while another former DP deputy, Rifat Öçten, who was accused of "destructive activities" in Tokat, received a warning. (Cumhuriyet, March 24)

On May 27, the anniversary of the revolution, former DP members in the town of Iğdır (near the Russian border) placed DP leaflets against the NUC and the army in the RPP building in that town. Seven persons were arrested, among them the local JP chairman who had served the DP in the same capacity, and three staff members of the local newspaper which belonged to the JP. Tempers in the town began to flare up and army units were moved in to prevent fighting between DP adherents and supporters of the new regime. (Cumhuriyet, May 29; Daily Telegraph, May 30)

On April 29 a member of the JP provincial committee in Trabzon was arrested for disparaging remarks about the government. (Cumhuriyet, April 30)

On June 7 it was revealed that five members of the JP executive who had been arrested some time previously had been released. (Cumhuriyet, June 8)

The Ahmet Çiftçi Affair. On June 26 the Martial Law authorities in Istanbul arrested Ahmet Çiftçi, a 30-year-old former student of philosophy, who was—according to the official statement as well as his own during the trial—a co-founder of the JP and in charge of organizing party branches in Anatolia. He was accused of attempting to organize a counter-revolution and was arrested while distributing pamphlets inciting the people to this end. The pamphlets said that the signal for the overthrow of the military government would be given shortly and continued: "If among the soldiers there are some who use arms against you, do not hesitate. First kill the traitor officer who gives the order, and then kill the soldiers. If we die, we shall be martyrs; if we live we shall be gazi (warriors of the faith)."

A JP spokesman said that following his arrest, Çiftçi was expelled from the party and that since the JP was a new and large party, it was difficult to make a proper scrutiny of all its members. He accused the press of blaming the whole party for the deeds of one person and also revealed that Çiftçi had been a member of the Peasants' Party (see p 535 a).

Çiftçi's trial opened on July 28 before a military court in Istanbul. Çiftçi pleaded not guilty. He said the pamphlet was a call not for revolution but for reform. The court found Çiftçi guilty and on Aug 4 sentenced him to death in accordance with Art. 149 of the Turkish Criminal Code. Çiftçi exercised his right of appeal, while his family tried in vain to secure an audience with Gen. Gürsel. [No further reports on this affair were encountered.]

During the trial, the JP leaders including Ragıp Gümüşpala were interrogated by the Martial Law authorities who said that Gümüşpala had stated that Çiftçi had been a JP member and had worked on the party regulations. (Cumhuriyet, June 28-July 1, 29, 30, Aug 5, 6, 11-13; Times, July 1, Aug 5; Öncü, Ulus, Aug 11-13)

JP Agitation Against Constitution; Gürsel Warns Gümüşpala. The JP called for a rejection of the constitution in the referendum of July 9. On July 14 Gen. Gürsel sent a letter to Gümüşpala, the JP leader, which was published only on July 25, in which he referred to the propaganda methods used by the JP (for details, see p 551). He wrote that such activities would lead the nation to disaster. It was frightening to think how persons employing such tactics might administer the country. As things stood now, no change in the party's conduct was possible, for all its key positions were in the hands of former DP members, who were accustomed to irresponsibility and plundering. Gürsel recalled that he had repeatedly exhorted Gümüşpala to change his ways, but to no avail. He was now definitely informing him that he would not close his eyes to such activities. In conclusion, Gürsel called on Gümüşpala to purge the party, to stop sowing the seeds of revenge and enmity and to direct party efforts towards an honest and democratic regime. (Cumhuriyet, July 25)

Gümüşpala declared that he was preparing a reply to Gen. Gürsel. He claimed that Gürsel had received false information on the JP activities. He pointed out that the NTP and RNP were trying to take the place of the DP and even the RPP had invited many former DP members to join it. Those joining the JP were innocent, otherwise they would have been brought to trial. He said he hoped the party would continue to exist. (Cumhuriyet, July 26)

Gürsel said on July 27 that he had received no reply from Gümüşpala. He said that many of the former DP members were honest patriots but about 80% of them had voted "No" on the constitution. (Cumhuriyet, July 28)

Rumour of Impending Suspension of JP Denied. Following the publication of the above letter as well as the Çiftçi affair which coincided with it, there were rumours that the JP would be suspended. This, however, was denied by Gen. Gürsel and others. RPP leaders also expressed themselves against the suspension of parties. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 1-6, 9, 11, 13)

Differences Inside the Party. In mid-July differences of opinion on organization and preparations for the forthcoming elections were reported between the three groups which had founded the party: the retired officers, the former members of the Peasants' Party and the former

DP members. There was also a division of opinion on the question of unification with the NTP. This was supported by the former DP members and opposed by the other two groups. (Cumhuriyet, July 16)

Prof. Bağıl Emerges as Right-Wing Leader in Party. On Aug 21 Prof. Ali Fuat Bağıl agreed to become an "independent candidate on the JP list" in the coming elections. He said he considered the NTP, the JP and the RPNP as sister organizations (Cumhuriyet; Son Havadis, Aug 22). [Bağıl was regarded as the leader of the extreme right in the JP, though apparently he was not a full-fledged member.]

Earlier, in Jan, Bağıl had been arrested. On Dec 20, 1960 he had published in the Istanbul magazine Dünya ve Türkiye an article entitled: "How Can the Constituent Assembly Function Under Present Conditions in the Country?", which was found by the Istanbul Martial Law command to constitute propaganda in favour of the dissolved DP and an offence under the Penal Code. In Jan the magazine was banned and its owner, as well as Bağıl, was detained (Ulus, Jan 12; R. Ankara, Jan 12 [14]). Their trial opened on March 15 before a military court in Istanbul and at the end of the month they were released on bail. On Aug 11 they were acquitted. (Times, March 17, Aug 12; Cumhuriyet, March 28, June 27, Aug 12)

In May, while his trial was still pending, Bağıl testified at Yassıada in favour of the former regime (see p 560 h).

In Oct, after the elections, Bağıl appeared as a candidate for the presidency in opposition to Gen. Gürel. He was supported by the extremists within the JP, who also wanted him to replace Gümüşpala in the party leadership. Bağıl withdrew his candidacy only after considerable pressure by the regime, and also resigned from the Senate (see p 572).

More Arrests of JP Members; Charge of Plotting Coup. At the end of July a JP member was arrested in Antalya for propaganda against the new Constitution and the Yassıada trials. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 1)

On Aug 5 a JP official was arrested in Rize for saying "We shall obtain power, by bloodshed if necessary." (Cumhuriyet, Aug 6)

On Aug 7 two JP members were arrested in Urla [near Izmir] for praising the former regime and insulting the NUC. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 8)

On Sept 7, 14 persons, most of them JP members, were arrested on a charge of plotting a counter-revolution; they had planned to take over the radio station, the post office and the electric power stations in Istanbul, to release the Yassıada prisoners and to overthrow the revolutionary regime (Cumhuriyet, Sept 8, 9). [No further reports on this affair were encountered.]

THE NEW TURKEY PARTY (Yeni Türkiye Partisi)

Synopsis. The New Turkey Party was established in February by former leaders of the Freedom Party which split off from the DP in 1955 (see MER 1960, pp 424-5). They were joined by a number of prominent DP leaders who had not been elected to the Assembly in 1957 (those who had were all in prison). The party set itself up as a successor to the DP; in its programme (for which see p 565 b) and policy statements, the emphasis was on the DP in its early years, namely on democracy and liberalism; in its tactics, however, the party presented itself as the direct successor to the Menderes regime. In the general elections, the party won close to 14% of the votes and emerged as the third strongest out of the four parties represented in both the House and the Senate; most of the former DP votes, however, went to the JP.

The party's unofficial organ was the Ankara daily Öncü.

Alican Founds Party with Freedom Party and DP Members. Ekrem Alican was Minister of Finance in Gürsel's cabinets until he resigned in Dec 1960 in order to form a political party. He was elected to the Assembly in 1950 as a DP member, was expelled from the DP in 1955 and joined the Freedom Party (FP); after this party's eclipse in the 1957 elections, he became politically independent.

On Jan 13 Alican convened a meeting in Ankara with a number of politicians who decided to form a party; among them were Enver Adakan, a co-founder of the DP and later of the FP; İrfan Aksu, a former FP and later an RPP member, and Esat Çağa, a former RPP member (these two had left the RPP on Jan 13); Fethi Aşkın, the Minister of Customs and Monopolies; Orhan Merinli, the Minister of Communications; Prof. Cahit Talas of Ankara University and Minister of Labour in Gürsel's first cabinet; and Raif Aybar.

Alican also contacted the group which formed the Homeland Party, in an abortive attempt to unite these groups into one party under his leadership. Subsequently, "with persons close to him," he founded the New Turkey Party (NTP). (Cumhuriyet, Jan 14, 15, 17, 21, 23-31; Feb 4)

Alican said there were a number of former DP members among the founders. [The most prominent among them] was Prof. Fahrettin Kerim Gökay, who revealed on Feb 4 that he had joined the NTP, since he was a good friend of Alican, but would not become politically active. Gökay, a physician and diplomat, former governor and mayor of Istanbul, was put on trial at Yassıada on charge of complicity in the anti-Greek riots in Istanbul in Sept 1955 (see MER 1960, p 456) but was acquitted on Jan 5. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 6, Feb 5, 6)

Party Registered. On the eve of the final party registration day, there was a rift in the party, reportedly on the questions of liberalism and state control in the party programme, and three members resigned: Enver Adakan, Mahmut Yalay and Esat Çağa (Cumhuriyet, Feb 14). [All three joined the Homeland Party.]

Thus, only at the last minute, on Feb 13, did the party submit its regulations and programme to the authorities. The following signed as founders: İrfan Aksu, Ekrem Alican, Raif Aybar (member of the Constituent Assembly), Hikmet Bellez (lawyer), Esat Eğilmez (retired General), Hasan Kangal (lawyer), Sırrı Öktem (retired Maj-Gen.), Mithat San (former Deputy), Cahit Talas and Aydın Yalçın (journalist). (Cumhuriyet, Feb 14)

On Feb 19 Alican was elected chairman of the party, Raif Aybar—vice-chairman, İrfan Aksu—SG, İhsan Serel Dura (retired Lt-Gen.), Hasan Kangal and Ertuğrul Altal—assistants to the SG. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 20)

Organization; Former DP Deputies Join the Party. During the last week of Feb the party was joined by 109 persons who have been DP Deputies in the National Assembly before the 1957 elections. Twelve of them were immediately appointed party inspectors in the following provinces: Van, Tunceli, Çankırı, Elazığ, Kastamonu, Sivas, Samsun, Bingöl, Bolu, Urfa and Manisa. [In most of these provinces, the party later won a majority at the general elections.] (Cumhuriyet, March 1)

In the party's organization committee in Istanbul, there were four former DP members. Alican declared that the party would accept as members persons who had been detained after the May revolution, but had been acquitted. He added that his party would not renew the old regime. (Cumhuriyet, March 10, 16)

According to the party secretary, by the end of March the party had organized itself in 33 provinces and 114 former DP deputies had joined it. (Cumhuriyet, March 30)

In April, 26 of the 147 university teachers who had been dismissed by the NUC in Oct 1960 (MER 1960 pp 446-7), joined the NTP. (Cumhuriyet, April 6)

A number of JP members also joined the party (see: The Justice Party).

Gürsel's Brother Temporary Member of NTP. Sırrı Gürsel, President Gürsel's brother, an industrialist, was appointed by the party to organize the Aydın province branch; in May, however, he resigned from the party. (Cumhuriyet, April 6, May 20)

Arrests of DP-NTP Members on Charges of Propaganda Against the Regime. From April to Aug the following arrests were reported:

In April, Süreyya Sofuoğlu, NTP İsmi province chairman, former DP chairman; on April 18, Reşat İker, a former DP member and a co-founder of the NTP, in Burdur (south-west Anatolia); on June 21, the NTP Hani district (Diyarbakır province) chairman, who formerly served the DP in the same capacity and also as mayor of Hani, for propaganda against the government; he had been arrested and deported earlier but was later freed (Cumhuriyet, April 8, 19, June 22); on July 26, four NTP members, formerly DP members in a town in Adana province, for conducting propaganda for their party, although this was forbidden. (Cumhuriyet, July 27)

On July 31, after interrogating İrfan Aksu, a prominent NTP member and a former DP member, on the meaning of the phrase "we shall begin from where we left off" which he had employed in a speech, the Ankara prosecutor decided to bring him to trial. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 1)

Party Claims Adherence of Associations and Cooperatives.

On May 24 the NTP announced that in elections to a drivers' association in Bolu (N W Anatolia), the NTP candidate had defeated the RPP candidate by 157 votes to one, while in the agricultural cooperative elections in Cihanbeyli (Konya province), the NTP won by 174 votes to 71 for the RPP. Cumhuriyet considered this report as typical DP conduct; such associations were non-political according to law and those who involved them in politics ought to be subjected to sanctions (Cumhuriyet, May 25). Later the governor of Cihanbeyli informed Cumhuriyet that the NTP announcement was incorrect and those who had given this information to the NTP would be brought to trial. (Cumhuriyet, June 6)

Alican: NTP Successor to DP. On May 6 Alican told the press that the economic policy of the NTP would be the same as that of the DP until 1954. (Cumhuriyet, May 7)

In his provincial tours during June and July to organize party branches, Alican repeatedly stated: "We have taken the place of the DP!" (Cumhuriyet, July 26). He declared that the NTP had adopted two points of the DP programme of 1946 (a) the task of governing should be entrusted to the political group which won the nation's trust and vote; (b) a bold and dynamic economic policy' (Cumhuriyet, Aug 12). Again, he said that the NTP was following the DP programme of the 1946-54 period, and added: "If this is interpreted as our being a continuation of the DP, then let it be so." (Milîyet, Aug 28)

Party Strength. On Aug 8 the party issued a bulletin giving a detailed account of its organization and its material assets: The party was organized in 57 provinces out of a total of 67, had some one million registered members and an executive and administrative staff of 6,500. The party owned 1,300 cars, 1,240 buses and trucks, 72 small printing presses and 67 local newspapers. (Öncü, Aug 9)

The Case of Yüksel Menderes. On Aug 29 Yüksel Menderes, the eldest son of Adnan Menderes, stated at a press conference in the presence of Ekrem Alican that he had resigned his post in the Foreign Ministry and joined the NTP: he intended to become a candidate for the House of Representatives in Aydın province [his father's former constituency] and thus to "continue to work for the prosperity of the country."

At the same time, relatives of former DP leaders, lawyers defending Menderes and other DP leaders joined the NTP. Among them were the widow of Namık Gedik, the former DP Minister of the Interior, who had committed suicide in prison; Nilüfer Gürsoy, daughter of ex-President Celal Bayar; and Süreyya Ağaçoğlu, sister of Samet Ağaçoğlu, a former DP Minister. They proposed to stand as candidates for Aydın, Bursa and Manisa respectively which had been represented in the DP regime by their respective relatives. (Cumhuriyet; Hürriyet; Ulus, Aug 30, 31, Sept 1)

Burhan Felek in Cumhuriyet and Ahmet Emin Yalman in Hür Vatan condemned the NTP for trying to put up Yüksel Menderes as an heir apparent to his father and thus defying the revolution. (Cumhuriyet; Hür Vatan, Aug 31)

Asked about this development within the NTP, Gen. Gürsel said: "They are overdoing things. They are getting out of hand. At one time the JP was acting that way, but I warned them in a personal letter, and... they mended their ways [and]... became the best party... Young Menderes entering political life is not so important; although he has inherited some of his father's traits he is not like him... he is a passive person." (Hürriyet, Aug 31)

There were reports that the NUC had again warned the NTP and the JP and requested their leaders to purge their ranks of former DP elements. In an official statement, the NUC declared that "the DP mentality" would never be allowed to revive. (R. Ankara, Sept 1 [5]; Yeni Gün, Sept 1; Times, Sept 4)

Following the execution of his father, Yüksel Menderes resigned from the NTP, declaring that for domestic reasons he would not enter active politics and would not be a candidate in the forthcoming elections. NTP leaders said that he had not resigned from the party. There were reports, however, that he would apply again for a post in the Ministry for Foreign Affairs. (Cumhuriyet; Yeni Sabah, Sept 21)

Arrest and Trial of Yalçın. On Sept 1 Aydın Yalçın, a founder member of the NTP and editor of the Ankara daily Öncü, was arrested after stating at the NTP İzmir province convention on Aug 31 that "the DP period in Izmir was a golden period, notwithstanding its mistakes and faults." Alican, who was also in Izmir, told reporters that he knew no details regarding the arrest and that Öncü though sympathetic to the NTP was not the party's official organ. (Cumhuriyet; Öncü; Kudret; Yeni Gün, Sept 2, 3)

Yalçın's appeal against his arrest was rejected on Sept 7 and on Sept 21 he was sentenced by an Izmir court to six month's imprisonment and fined £7500. The execution of the verdict was delayed and Yalçın was released from prison. (Öncü, Sept 8; Cumhuriyet, Sept 22)

THE WORKERS PARTY, THE SOCIALIST PARTY, THE LABOUR PARTY

The Workers Party (İşçi Partisi). Among the party's founders were a number of trade union leaders, including Baki Ersoy and Feridun Şakir, two of the trade union representatives in the Constituent Assembly. Its leadership, elected on Feb 18, included: Avni Erakalin, President of the Istanbul Trade Unions Association—chairman; Kemal Türkler, president of the Mine Workers Union—vice-chairman; Şaban Yıldız, founder of the Workers' Trade Unions Confederation—SG; and Rıza Kuvas, president of the Rubber Workers' Union—Treasurer. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 12-15, 18, 19)

On March 13 the party opened its branch in Ankara. Deputy Şakir said the party would not unite with the Socialist Party (see below). (Cumhuriyet, March 14)

[The party did not succeed in organizing the branches in 15 provinces and all the districts thereof, required by law to enable them to participate as a party in the elections.] On Aug 7 Erakalin stated that the party was fully organized in seven provinces and was continuing its organizational efforts. The party had 6,000 registered members. He said the party advocated the extension of compulsory elementary education from five to seven years and also the freedom to strike. (Cumhuriyet, July 28, Aug 8; Son Havadis, Aug 8)

After the elections, at a meeting of the party's Central Committee in Istanbul on Nov 5, speakers claimed that other parties had "lured" the workers by putting up as many as 30 candidates but had failed to assure the election of even one of them. President Gürsel was criticized for having failed to nominate any trade union leader to the Senate in his quota of 15 nominees. The meeting called upon the TU leaders belonging to other parties to join the party. (Hür Vatan, Nov 6)

The Labour Party (Çalışma Partisi) was headed by Bedrettin Ertensoy, an industrialist. The party was formed in 1950, and suspended in 1958. Ertensoy said his party stood for social justice, raising the standard of living, unemployment and other social insurances, and distribution of land to landless peasants. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 12-15)

The Socialist Party of Turkey (Türkiye Sosyalist Partisi). [Only scant information was available on this party. Its SG was Allettin Tiritioğlu.]

During the first weeks after permission was granted for party activity, the party was reported to have opened branches in Ankara, Bursa, Istanbul, Izmir, Konya and Uşak and to be examining the prospects for opening branches in Adana, Eskişehir, Hatay, Şanlıurfa and Zonguldak. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 21)

The members of the party's central committee had been on trial on charge of political activity and were acquitted on Feb 6. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 7)

[There were no reports on the registration of the party.]

Merger Between Socialist Party and Labour Party. At the beginning of March, the Socialist Party and the Labour Party merged on the initiative of Tiritioğlu, SG of the former. The united party was named the Socialist Party of Turkey; Ertensoy, who was appointed president of the party council, told the press on March 3 that the party's aim was to bring an English and north-European type of socialism to power in Turkey. The party also suggested a merger with the Workers' Party, but this was rejected by the latter. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 24, 25, March 4, 14)

Following the referendum on the new constitution, Tiritioğlu accused the administration in the provinces of preventing his party from organizing branches though Gürsel had declared that the country needed a socialist party. The administration should allow the party to organize branches in order to prevent the growth of Communism in the country. He claimed that the dangers inherent in the administration's policy became clearly apparent when there was a majority of "No" votes in the referendum in the provinces of Bursa, Izmir and Zonguldak in spite of their masses of workers and notwithstanding the rights that were granted them in the constitution. The party had called upon the workers to approve the constitution but, with no branches in these provinces, the party was not effective. (Cumhuriyet, July 15)

INTER-PARTY RELATIONS

RPP Bid For Understanding With Other Parties; Parties' Honeymoon. On April 1 the RPP Istanbul branch gave a cocktail party for the other parties in the city as a gesture of friendship. Representatives of the NTP, RNP and the Homeland Party attended. (Cumhuriyet, April 2)

The following day İsmet İnönü, the RPP leader, made a political statement to the press for the first time since the May revolution. He said that there must be a radical change in the country's political life. The parties, which would be more numerous than in the past because of the introduction of the proportional system, must live together and assist each other, whether they were in power or in opposition. The RPP, though attacked from several quarters, would strive to achieve this new way of democratic life. He also called upon the parties and the citizens to help the NUG in this critical period of transfer of power by maintaining law and order. (Cumhuriyet, April 3)

İnönü's declaration was supported by the leaders of the NTP, RNP and JP. Bökükbasi, the RNP leader, issued a statement in a similar vein (Cumhuriyet, April 4, 7). So did Alican the NTP leader, but he added that the RPP was in danger of becoming short-tempered, "seeing itself already in power and finding that the new parties, and especially the NTP, are growing quickly." (Cumhuriyet, April 10)

Breach in Honeymoon; RPP Altercations with JP, NTP. At the beginning of May the parties' honeymoon was interrupted when Alican, the NTP leader, repeatedly declared that the RPP would not win the forthcoming general elections. These declarations, according to Cumhuriyet, violated the rules authorizing political activities and were resented by the RPP leaders who stressed their belief that the party would return to power. Gümüşpala, the JP leader, joined in the debate by supporting Alican's declarations; he added that the JP would not let the RPP win and would not join any grouping with the RPP. The debate tapered off when an NTP leader from Istanbul said that his party was friendly towards the RPP as well as towards the other parties. (Cumhuriyet, May 7, 10, 12)

An incident occurred between the RPP and the NTP on May 18 in an Anatolian village, when RPP members in the village intercepted NTP members. The NTP leader, Alican, demanded official intervention and the Minister of the Interior informed him that the matter had been submitted to the local court. The RPP SG claimed that before the May revolution, the local NTP chairman had been the local DP chairman and in this capacity had caused a local official to be beaten up and expelled from the village. The injustice had now been corrected, but several villagers became angry when this former DP chairman became NTP chairman. (Cumhuriyet, May 23)

Another similar minor incident occurred in Gaziantep but was given considerable publicity. (Cumhuriyet, June 9)

On June 9 a free-for-all took place between RPP members and NTP members in a town in the province of Siirt; it was suppressed by the police, and 16 NTP members and four RPP members were detained. (Cumhuriyet, June 10)

At provincial conferences held by the RPP in June, Alican, the NTP leader, was repeatedly attacked for his criticism of the RPP and its leader, and was accused of being Menderes' successor. (Cumhuriyet, June 5, 7)

JP-NTP Merger Contemplated. In June and July there were contacts and public discussion on a possible merger between the JP and the NTP. RPP leaders saw in such a possibility an attempt to re-establish the DP. (Cumhuriyet, June 20, July 13)

[The NTP seemed more inclined to favour such a project than the JP.] On July 13 Alican, the NTP leader, asked by a member of an audience "in the name of the DP followers and the whole Turkish nation" to unite his party with the JP, replied, "if all of you want it, there is nothing that is not possible." Gümüşpala, the JP leader, on the other hand, stated earlier (June 19) that unification was impossible because of differences in the parties' programmes.

It was reported that there were differences on the subject than the JP. On July 13 Alican, the NTP leader, DP members advocated unification on the grounds that the JP's prospects in the forthcoming elections were dim, whereas the retired officers and the former Peasants' Party members were of the opposite opinion. On July 17 the JP Central Executive Council stated that a merger was not feasible for legal reasons, as the new united party would be barred from participation in the elections. It expressed the hope that cordial relations between the two parties would continue and that the project would be discussed again after the elections. (Cumhuriyet, June 20, July 13, 15, 16, 18)

Government Calls for Cessation of Propaganda. On July 15 the PM's office requested the parties to cease their propaganda activities while organizing provincial branches and holding congresses there, as this was not yet permitted by law. Heavy punishment awaited the offenders. (Cumhuriyet, July 16)

The following day, in his message on the referendum, Gen. Gürel exhorted the parties to "abandon destructive efforts" to destroy each other and to divide the citizens into hostile camps. (R. Ankara, July 16 [18])

Such warnings continued until the beginning of Aug, but all this time the parties, quite undeterred, continued to attack each other. Only the RPP called upon the parties to ease the tension though it also continued its propaganda. The most outspoken attacks were those of Bölükbaşı on Gümüşpala [his rival in the opposition to the regime]. (Cumhuriyet, July 17, 19-26, 29, Aug 4, 6)

Press Criticism of Political Parties. The Istanbul [independent] paper Akşam wrote that, in various degrees, all parties were on the wrong path. None of them had taken up the country's genuine problems and their leaders were arguing with each other like rivals in a village coffee shop. The new parties had brought nothing new to the country, the old parties had been unable to rid themselves of their traditions, and the people, watching "this struggle of the blind," were becoming pessimistic. The success of the democratic experiment depended on the alteration of this situation. Change, however, could be effected only by going to the roots of the matter, not by closing down a party (Akşam, Aug 7). Ankara radio, which broadcast this article, followed up with comments in similar vein. (BBCM, Aug 16)

In the (pro-JP) Istanbul daily, Son Havadis, Gökhan Evliyaoğlu, similarly expressing dismay at the prevailing political atmosphere, suggested a "four-power meeting" between Gümüşpala, Alican, Bölükbaşı and İnönü whose responsibility encompassed not only their own parties but the affairs of the country as a whole. (Son Havadis, Aug 10)

OPPOSITION AND SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

NOTE: Opposition and subversive activities attributed to members of a legitimate political party are recorded under the headings of the respective parties. All other such activities as well as arrests and trials and other government countermeasures are recorded hereunder.

OPPOSITION ACTIVITIES AND ARRESTS

Arrests on Charges of Propaganda and Other Activities Against the Revolution. Following is a list of such arrests during Jan-Feb:

the most prominent person to be arrested during the period was Prof. Ali Fuat Bağış (Jan 11) [for his case, see p 539 a];

other arrests made: three persons in Lapseki (Dardanelles) on a charge of tearing up Atatürk's pictures in village schools (Cumhuriyet, Jan 3); on Jan 4 a tax collector and a coffee-maker in Eskişehir for writing under Atatürk's statue "Menderes forgive us"; they told their interrogators that they wanted to provoke a new revolution and the return of the DP; the offence was denounced by the town's revolutionary organizations (İnkılapçı Cemiyeti, Eskişehir Türk Devrim Ocağı) as well as by three trade union federations and the local youth association and education society. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 6, 7);

on Jan 30 ten workers at a power station near Istanbul; no reason was given [perhaps in connection with the Silahlaraga affair—see below]; also seven former DP members in Gaziantep, for subverting public order (Times, Feb 1);

on Feb 5 seven former DP members in a village near Aydin, for sending to the village schoolmaster threatening letters protesting against a theatrical play "Tails (Kuyraklar) Seeking a Head" performed by the school. [After the May revolution "Kuyraklar" was a popular nickname for DP partisans]; six were released; the letterwriter was imprisoned;

on Feb 6, 13 former DP members in the towns of Tire and Degirmendere near Izmir; among them the former DP District Committee chairman, the former Mayor of Tire, and a preacher (vaii), who had been previously under arrest for exploiting religion for political purposes; pamphlets and arms were found in their houses. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 6, 7)

The Kirdar Funeral Demonstrations. On Feb 19 demonstrations took place in Istanbul during the funeral of Dr Lütfi Kirdar, a former governor of Istanbul and Minister in the Menderes government, who died of a heart attack on Feb 17 while giving evidence at the Yassiada Court. The crowd which followed the funeral from the Mosque—mostly former DP members—cried "Freedom, Freedom," intoned the Tekbir (Allahu ekber), banned from recital in public by Atatürk's secular laws, and tried to seize the coffin. Gen. Refik Tulga, military governor of Istanbul who appeared in the midst of the demonstrators, was booed. About 25 persons, most of them former DP members, were arrested; seven were soon released.

The Istanbul University Students' Union called for strict measures against persons violating Atatürk's ideals and laws.

The authorities were said to have taken "an exceptionally grave view" of the incident because it showed the strong support the fallen Menderes government continued to enjoy. On Feb 21 the government issued a statement condemning the incident as running counter "to our laws and traditions" and warning that the revolution would "not allow its noble ideals to be harmed... The Turkish nation and government, which, in the light of Atatürk's ideals and in the fresh spirit and beliefs ushered in by the May 27 revolution, have undertaken great tasks, are determined to crush immediately any attempt to harm the fatherland..."

The governor of Istanbul followed this up with a warning of his own: "We shall crush those who exploit religion for political purposes." (Cumhuriyet, Feb 20-23; Times, Feb 20, 22, 23; R. Ankara, Feb 21 [23])

Thirty-seven persons were brought to trial before a military court in Istanbul. On June 17, 13 of the defendants were sentenced to prison terms ranging from six months to one year; 18 were transferred to a civil court; six were acquitted. (Cumhuriyet, June 18)

The Silahtaraga Affair: Plot to Liberate Yassiada Prisoners. On Feb 13 and 22, arrests were made in Istanbul in connection with an attempt to sabotage the electric power station at Silahtaraga, Istanbul. The power station was put under military guard. First reports said that about 160 persons had been detained but most of them subsequently released, and that several hundred houses of former DP members had been searched.

The Martial Law authorities opened an inquiry under the direction of the governor of Istanbul. The Minister of the Interior followed the investigations on the spot. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 23-25; Times, Feb 23, 24)

On March 16 it was announced that the investigations had been concluded; 49 persons—whose names were given—had been arrested and would be brought to trial. (Cumhuriyet, March 17)

The trial opened on May 4 before a military court in an army camp near Istanbul. The defendants, all of them former DP members, were mostly workers, drivers and clerks from the power station; there were also three sergeant-majors, a corporal, three private soldiers and two housewives. The indictment said they had plotted, under the leadership of Mehmet Inanli, a former president of the Electric, Gas and Vehicle Transport Workers' Trade Union, to blow up the Silahtaraga electric power station, to take Istanbul with the help of arms which were found in their possession, and to release the DP leaders from Yassiada. (Earlier, on March 25, Gen. Gürsel told the press that even if such a result had been achieved, they would have found at Yassiada "only flesh and bones"—R. Ankara, March 25 [26]; Cumhuriyet, March 26.) They planned to enter Yassiada disguised as soldiers. The defendants pleaded not guilty. The trial continued until Sept.

On Sept 19 the court acquitted 19 of the defendants, and sentenced 28 to prison terms ranging from six months to five years and ten months. One defendant had died and one had been acquitted earlier. (Cumhuriyet, May 5, 9, 16, July 29, 31, Aug 1, 8, 12, 15, Sept 5, 20)

Further Arrests on Charges of Propaganda and Activities Against the Revolution. The following arrests were made during March-April (arrests of members of legitimate parties not included):

on March 3 in the Ereğli coal mines, a pensioned officer, two officials and four workers; also the muhtar of a village near Denizli—all for hostile propaganda;

on March 4, 12 persons in a village near Aydin including the schoolmaster, who was accused of educating children against the revolution; also eight persons in a village in Izmir province, who had assembled before the house of the muhtar to demand his resignation and, when he refused, inveighed against the revolution;

on March 21, an imam in the town of Beyşehir (Konya province), for attacking the revolution and the government in his sermons; also a former DP muhtar of a village in the same province and his brother, for a similar offence; on March 23, 15 persons, among them two former mayors in Orhangazi and Gemlik (Bursa province), for subversive activities—nine of them were released a month later; on March 27 five persons in Istanbul for subversive activities and attempts to revive the dispersed DP;

on March 28 four persons in a village in Izmir province for conducting propaganda against the revolution; the next day, a person in Istanbul for a similar offence;

on March 29 the mufti of Zara (Sivas province) who had declared in his sermon that the defendants in Yassiada were innocent, whereupon the congregation had immediately left the mosque (Cumhuriyet, March 4, 5, 23, 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, April 18);

at the end of March three persons in Istanbul; one on charge of sending threatening letters to the members of the Yassiada court, the Supreme Investigation Committee, and to the Attorney General and his deputies; the others on charge of propaganda against the revolution; on April 1, 14 persons in the province of Bursa for subversive activities, among them a village teacher;

on April 5 a person in Denizli for painting pro-Menderes and anti-Gürsel slogans on traffic signs; also six persons in a tavern in Istanbul for drinking to the health of Adnan Menderes and after clashing with supporters of the new regime; on April 9 five persons in an illegal arms workshop in a village near Bursa; also a person in a café in Tuzla (Adana province) for preventing the guests from listening to the Yassiada radio programme; on April 10 two persons in a village in central Anatolia for tearing up the pictures of Atatürk and Gen. Kâzım Karabekir, [one of Atatürk's earliest supporters] in the village office; also eight persons in Bayındır [near İzmir] for talk at a banquet "against the President of the Republic and the RPP"; on April 12 seven persons in Adana for anti-revolution activities in a textile factory; on April 17 six persons in Bursa for subversive activities; on April 21, a village teacher in Sivas province, for propaganda against the revolution;

on April 25, a former chairman of the DP club in a village near Nazilli for activities against the revolution; the next day, six adherents of the Akifî Tarikatı religious order in a village near Bursa for attacking and destroying a statue of Atatürk; 50 students from Bursa went to the village to talk to the villagers on Atatürk's revolution (Cumhuriyet, April 1, 2, 4, 8, 11, 13, 18, 22, 27, 28);

on May 1 five persons in Kuyucak (SW Anatolia) for tearing down pictures of Atatürk and Gürsel from the walls of a café. (Cumhuriyet, May 2)

Charge of Plot to Reinstate DP Regime. During May 9-11 large-scale arrests were made in İstanbul, İzmit, Bursa and Ankara; 140 according to Gen. Gürsel; 200 according to unofficial reports. The detainees were mostly former DP members, among them several members of the JP. They were accused of armed subversive activities with the aim of reviving the dissolved DP. They had tried to infiltrate into military units and establishments with saboteurs.

Some of those arrested in İstanbul had, according to the military authorities, succumbed to the "subversive influence of foreign ideologies." The Times correspondent wrote that hammer and sickle signs were found painted on walls in İstanbul at the beginning of May.

This affair was described in officially-inspired circles as the most serious challenge yet made to the revolutionary regime.

Students' unions warned the "dark forces" that they would "perish under the strong blows of the Atatürk youth," and the students at Ankara and İstanbul universities staged demonstrations in protest of the reported plot and in support of the NUC.

On May 12 Gen. Gürsel warned the leaders of the new parties who were trying to take the place of the dissolved DP, which thought of nothing but revenge on the military who had overthrown Menderes. He added that such a policy was liable to lead to civil war. Two days later, Gen. Gürsel warned that no quarter would be given to those who sought, through subversive activities, to prevent the holding of elections.

The detainees were interrogated in army camps in İstanbul and Bursa. On May 16 there were 25 more arrests while eight persons were released. (Cumhuriyet, May 10-14, 17; R. Ankara, May 9-11 [12, 13]; Times, May 11-13, 15; Economist, May 13; Sunday Times, May 14; Guardian, May 20)

On June 2 ten persons out of 35 arrested in İzmit were released. On June 7 it was reported that following the conclusion of investigations in Bursa, out of 80 detainees only 13 had remained under arrest. Of these, it was reported later, ten were charged with being Communists and were to be brought to trial before a Criminal Court (Cumhuriyet, June 3, 7, July 13). [No report was found of any trial in connection with the alleged plot.]

More Incidents and Arrests. On May 12 slogans against the "national revolutionary government" were painted on the walls of the school and mosque in Kuyucak; some 30 persons were interrogated. (Cumhuriyet, May 13)

The following arrests were reported from May to Sept, excluding the arrests of members of legitimate parties:

on May 9 a former member of the DP and of the Nurcu order, in a village near Nazilli, for tearing down Gen. Gürsel's picture in a café; on May 14 and 16, eighteen persons in Burdur, including two JP members, after leaflets attacking the revolution and carrying the letters DP (Democratic Party) had been broadcast in the streets (all except the two JP members and a former DP member were released during the following days);

on May 15 a woman in Adana for talking at a bus station against the revolution and in praise of Menderes; also a secondary school teacher in Uşak, for propaganda against the revolution and in favour of the Nurcu order, and a person in Manisa for "activities not in accordance with the national interest"; on May 16 a person in Germeçik (Aydın province) for cursing President Gürsel; on May 21 four persons in two villages near Kuyucak for anti-revolution and pro-Menderes talk and propaganda;

on May 29 four former DP members in towns in Denizli province, for activities against the revolution (Cumhuriyet, May 11, 16, 17, 22, 30);

during the last week of May, some 21 persons in Uşak province for uttering threats against Gen. Gürsel and propaganda against the revolutionary regime; some were caught tearing up photographs of Gen. Gürsel and members of the NUC (Times, June 2); on June 3 a policeman in Ardahan [Kars province] for shooting at a picture of Atatürk in a coffeehouse; on June 7 a former DP member and mayor of Manisa was arrested in Balıkesir, no charges were published; on June 14 three persons from Akpınar [Sivas province] for felling two telephone poles and cutting down the telegraph line; also three persons in Ankara in front of the Defence Ministry while smoking hashish in a taxi and having in their possession a letter [the content of which was not revealed] to Salim Başol, the President of the Yassiada Court (Cumhuriyet, June 5, 8, 15, 16); on July 6 a policeman in Burdur, for propaganda against the regime (Cumhuriyet, July 7); on Aug 6 a person in İstanbul for throwing stones at a statue of Atatürk; also a man in a village near Isparta for insulting the government in a coffeehouse.

On Aug 7 it was reported that a retired General and another person had been detained in Ankara for talking for about six months against the NUC and the revolution but were freed for lack of evidence. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 8)

On Aug 8 it was reported that two men had been arrested while trying to escape, after having attempted to derail the Anatolia Express. (Öncü, Aug 8)

On Aug 12 five arms smugglers were arrested in Ankara. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 13)

On Sept 17 two persons were arrested in İstanbul on a charge of talking in the streets against the revolution. (Cumhuriyet, Sept 18)

TRIALS ON CHARGES OF OPPOSITION AND SUBVERSION

Note: Trials of members of legitimate parties as well as of Communists and Leftists are not included hereunder, but are recorded under the respective headings.

Trial of a Group Charged with Planning Coup. On Jan 26 a trial opened in an Ankara military court of 32 persons accused of attempting to overthrow the government and to release Adnan Menderes and members of his deposed regime. The defendants included a lawyer, two NCOs, three minor clerks, two farmers, six workers, seven craftsmen, seven small merchants, two servants, a taxi owner and a housewife. The two NCOs, the indictment said, were to ensure the cooperation of the armed forces. Twenty one of the defendants were among the group of 62 arrested in Dec 1960 in Ankara (see MER, 1960, p 459; Cumhuriyet, Dec 29, 1960).

Twenty-seven of the defendants were found guilty and, on March 15, sentenced to prison terms ranging from six months to four years; the others were acquitted; twelve of them were released before completing their terms (Cumhuriyet, Jan 27, 28, Feb 1, 3, March 16, 17; Times, Jan 28, March 17). On Aug 2 the Military Supreme Court of Appeal quashed these verdicts on grounds of defective procedure, and acquitted the defendants. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 3)

Trials on Charges of Propaganda and Activities Against the Revolution. On Jan 26 four former DP members were put on trial in Aydin on charges of inciting the people against the revolution. (Monde, Jan 27)

In the first half of April, a former DP member was sentenced to five years' imprisonment by a court in Uşak for activities against the revolution and praising Adnan Menderes. (Times, April 12)

On April 13 two lawyers, one of them a woman, who had been arrested in Ankara in Dec 1960, were sentenced to imprisonment by a military court in Ankara for insulting Gen. Gürsel, the NUC, the government and the army, and for writing anonymous letters and distributing pamphlets against the revolution. Mrs Necla Carpan was sentenced to nine years and two months' imprisonment, and to six years and two months' forced residence in Istanbul after the end of the prison term. The man, Mehmet Emin Akyuz, was sentenced to five years' imprisonment and five years' forced residence in Ankara. Both were former members of the DP. The trial began on Feb 16 (Cumhuriyet, April 14; Times, April 15);

On April 28, 25 clerks and workers of the Sümerbank textile factory in Adana were acquitted of charges of activities against the revolution by a court in Adana and were released. The audience in court shouted: "Long Live Turkish Justice," it was reported, while the eyes of the young prosecutor brimmed with tears. (Cumhuriyet, April 29)

On May 9 Mrs Müjgan Çeren, former President of the DP women's branch in Istanbul province, was sentenced to one year imprisonment by a military court for activities against the leaders of the country. (Cumhuriyet, May 10)

On May 11 a 24-year-old imam from Istanbul, who had preached against the revolution in a mosque in Turgutlu, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a fine of £T600. (Cumhuriyet, May 12)

On July 3 two persons were fined £T500 each by an İzzit court for tearing down posters calling on the people to vote "Yes" in the referendum on the constitution. (Cumhuriyet, July 5)

Trial for 1960 Plot to Overthrow the Regime. On June 15, 11 persons, among them two Air Force NCOs, were brought to trial before a criminal court in Eskişehir on a charge of plotting a rebellion on Oct 29, 1960 with the aim of overthrowing the NUC and returning the DP to power. They had been in contact with Col. Alpaslan Türkeş, then a member of the NUC, and had prepared to recruit a force of 11,000 persons in Eskişehir province. They had planned to occupy the premises of the Eskişehir province administration and municipality, to issue communiqués from there and then to take over the power station and the anti-aircraft unit. [No further reports on this trial were encountered]. (Cumhuriyet, June 16)

LEFTISTS

Trial of Leftist Journalists. On May 18 Aziz Nesin, a journalist, and İhsan Ada, editor of the Istanbul daily Tanin, were arrested in Istanbul. Nesin was charged with writing articles which included pro-Communist propaganda and Ada with publishing them. Tanin was owned by Kasım Gülek, former SG of the RPP and a member of the Constituent Assembly. (Cumhuriyet, May 20)

On July 8 Nesin and Ada were released on bail (Cumhuriyet, July 9) and in Aug tried by a military court in a public trial in Istanbul. In his defence, Nesin said that Turkey's future lay in a leftist orientation and that whilst most Turks claimed they were following the principles of Atatürk, the present trend in Turkey was not the same as in Atatürk's era. He said: "I am a socialist; even in the most capitalistic countries there is a trend towards socialism." He pointed out that in his allegedly offensive articles this was the line he had taken (Yeni Sabah, Aug 23). At the end of Oct, both Nesin and Ada were acquitted of charges of Communist propaganda. (Tanin, Nov 1)

Arrest of Leftist Artist. İbrahim Balaban, one of Turkey's best known young painters, was arrested towards the end of May; no charges were published but it was remarked that Balaban was generally regarded as holding left-wing views, and as his arrest followed that of the two journalists of similar opinions, it was presumed to form part of an "unexpected move by the military authorities against certain leftist personalities... who have presented a new element in the situation" (Times, May 27). Balaban was released but arrested again on July 12. (Cumhuriyet, July 13)

COMMUNISTS

Gürsel said in answer to a press question: "Ours is a very liberal government, but I hardly think it would run to permitting a Communist party. All the same, I personally think it would be a good thing if a Communist party were formed, as it would be on the surface and not conducting subversive activities underground." (Cumhuriyet, March 26; Times, March 27)

Communists Charged with Plotting Against Regime in Collaboration with DP, JP Members. At the beginning of May, when a group composed mostly of former DP members was charged with conspiring to overthrow the regime, it was reported that Communists as well as JP members were among them. In July it was reported that ten of the 13 persons who still remained under arrest at Bursa in connection with this affair were Communists. (See above: Charge of Plot To Reinstall DP Regime.)

Campaign Against Communists. At the end of May, the government opened a campaign against Communism and Communists. It was noted that street banners in Ankara, Istanbul and other cities read: "We do not want Bolshevism in Turkey" though most of the slogans were, as before, directed at "reaction." This was something new, a correspondent noted. (NYHT, June 3-4)

Commencing June 4 Ankara radio broadcast anti-Communist slogans between programmes. Those broadcast on June 5, with the introductory words "Attention, fellow-countrymen," included the following: "The aim of Communism is to infiltrate and turn brother against brother"; "Communism and lie-spreading is considered a fictitious art"; "Water sleeps but Communism does not"; "Communism has several kinds of clothes; if you wash them the enemy you know emerges from them"; "The Communist mixes with you in the guise of Turk and Muslim." (BBCM, June 8)

On June 6, 12 persons, among them two women, were arrested in Eskişehir on charges of collecting some $T10,000 from former DP members, buying arms and inciting women to demonstrate against the regime; some also for encouraging people to listen to "Our Radio," the clandestine Communist radio station. (Cumhuriyet, June 7; Times, June 8)

Charges of Communist Subversion. On June 7 the authorities announced that they had arrested a group of 22 Communists, among them physicians and engineers who had engaged in subversive activities. They had mingled with the citizens and incited them to act against the revolutionary regime, and had prepared acts of sabotage aimed at creating anarchy. (Cumhuriyet, June 8)

The Times correspondent in Istanbul wrote that the operations against the Communists were accompanied by an apparently inspired press campaign. Most of the leading daily newspapers wrote on June 8 under banner headlines, that "a great struggle against Communism" and other forms of subversion against the revolution was now opening while at the same time, somewhat paradoxically, the papers printed statements by Gen. Gürsel and other NUC members apparently designed to reassure the population that such activities presented no serious danger. Gen. Gürsel said on June 7: "Five or ten persons are not important. There is nothing to worry about." The correspondent noted the tendency of recent official pronouncements to represent religious reactionaries and the adherents of Menderes as acting in collaboration with the Communists in opposition to the regime.

Observers were puzzled both by the publicity now being given to the "struggle against Communism," which until a few weeks before was officially regarded as practically non-existent in Turkey, and by the apparent desire of the military authorities at the same time to play down the extent of the police operations. The government had been anxious about the increasing number of listeners to "Our Radio," but this could hardly explain the need for the present campaign. It was believed possible that the revolutionary regime wished to put an end to rumours abroad that it had leftist tendencies which might have adverse effects on Turkey's allies or alternatively, that it wished to have reasons acceptable to public opinion in Turkey for suppressing dangerous elements among adherents of the former government. (Times, June 9)

At the end of June the Minister of the Interior, Nasir Zeytinoglu, was reported to have said that about 400 suspected Communists who had infiltrated into various organizations had recently been arrested. (Times, June 30; NYT, July 1). Zeytinoglu denied that he said this; only three had been arrested. (Cumhuriyet; Guardian, July 1)

More Arrests and a Trial. On Aug 4 it was reported that a group of 24 Communists had been arrested in Istanbul, most of them "intellectuals: doctors and lawyers," led by Dr Şerif Kırkçu. As the names of these persons, it was reported, did not appear in the Security Directorate's lists of Communists they had easily infiltrated into various organizations and had worked for a long time with impunity. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 5)

In Oct, Lamiya Iren, a teacher of English, was sentenced in Istanbul to six years and eight months' imprisonment for Communist propaganda and attacking the country's leaders. "Our Radio" said she had delivered a lecture praising the scientific value of Gagarin's space flight. (Cumhuriyet, Oct 30; Our Radio, Oct 31 [W, Nov 9])

SECURITY MEASURES

Martial Law Prolonged. Ankara and Istanbul remained until Nov 30 under the Martial Law which had been imposed on April 28, 1960 by the Menderes government. It was prolonged every three months. (R. Ankara, Feb 20 [23], May 22 [W, June 1], Aug 16 [W 24])

On July 31 Martial Law was extended to the whole of Turkey on the grounds that negative elements, working against the principles of the May 27 revolution, were trying to sabotage Turkey's movement towards democracy and the holding of general elections. The Times correspondent commented that this measure had been prompted by the many "No" votes in the referendum on the constitution; "the military leaders are clearly nervous about popular reactions during the critical final stages of the Yassıada trials..." (Cumhuriyet; Times, Aug 1)

Public Warnings; Security Decrees. [There were many public warnings to desist from opposition activities. These have been recorded under general developments.]

In April, in a tour of Anatolia, Col. Osman Köksal, an NUC member, told the peasants that if subversive elements among the former Democrats tried to make serious trouble, they would be crushed immediately; plans were ready for putting down a revolt. (Cumhuriyet, April 12; Times, April 15)

On July 15, six days after the referendum on the new constitution, an administrative circular was issued which stressed the following points: (1) polemics likely to confuse the minds of people in regard to the new constitution would not be permitted; (2) as elections were approaching, propaganda likely to spoil the national unity would not be tolerated; (3) apart from the organizing activities permitted to the political parties, no party or election propaganda would be allowed; (4) printing or distributing leaflets on elections and the constitution was contrary to law; (5) public discussions and propaganda on the subjects of the revolution and the Yassıada trials were forbidden; (6) the ban on carrying arms would be rigorously enforced; (7) the administrative authorities should well appreciate their powers and responsibilities and act in a more determined and dynamic manner in regard to disruptive activities which ran counter to the national interest. (R. Ankara, July 15 [18]; Cumhuriyet, July 16)

On Sept 2, as the country entered the critical period leading to the announcement of the Yassıada sentences and the general elections, the Constituent Assembly passed a law which provided for the immediate arrest and trial of persons committing offences detrimental to the state in the period between Sept 2 and two months after the general elections (see also p 564 b).

Martial Law Ended. On Nov 30 at midnight, the Martial Law was lifted after a duration of 19 months and two days. Gen. Cemal Tural, Commander of the Martial Law in Istanbul, said that the Martial Law courts had dealt with 1,013 cases since the revolution; 286 has resulted in convictions and 633 in acquittals, 34 cases were dropped. The remaining 60 cases had been transferred to ordinary courts. (Cumhuriyet; Milliyet, Dec 1)

CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENTS

THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY

Eighteen Members Nominated by NUC. The elections and nominations to the Constituent Assembly were concluded in the last days of 1960 (see MER 1960, p 454) except for the 18 members of the House to be nominated by the NUC whose names were published on Jan 3. Among these were Prof. Hifzi Veldet Velidedeoğlu and Prof. Ragıp Sarica, both members of the constitution committee (see MER 1960, p 453); Col. (ret.) Recip San, the former Director-General of Security; Gen. (ret.) Fahri Belen, a former Minister of Communication; Gen. (ret.) Zekai Okan, brother of the NUC member Sezai Okan and a former Ambassador; and Yakup Kadri Karaosmanoğlu, a leader writer for Ulus and a former ambassador. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 4)

RPP Majority in the House of Representatives. According to Cumhuriyet, the House comprised 222 RPP supporters, 25 RPNP supporters and 25 independents. The paper noted that the law provided that members of the House should represent the Turkish nation alone and not any political or other body which happened to elect them, and may not receive directions from any quarter (see MER 1960, p 453). (Cumhuriyet, Jan 2)

New Government Before Assembly's Opening. On Jan 5, on the eve of the inauguration of the new Constituent Assembly, Gen. Gürsel formed a new government which included six new ministers, four of them members of the Assembly. (For details see: The Government.)

The Opening Session. On Jan 6 the House of Representatives was opened in the new building in Ankara. Fahri Ördilek opened the session in the name of President Gürsel, who was ill. He read a message from Gürsel in which he said that for nearly a century and a half the Turkish people, in quest of science, law, justice and liberty, had made great efforts to establish a stable administration. Their aspirations had not been realized. Democracy in Turkey had failed up to the time of the May revolution because it was not sufficiently prepared for. As a result, the country had drifted into inexperienced and adventurous hands which had endangered Atatürk's reforms. The message concluded: "Today the real aim of the revolutionary government is to establish a democratic order with full safeguards, based on the principles of law, justice, freedom and virtue."

Thereafter the representatives, one by one, took the oath pledging to work with all their might for the "rule of law, democracy and human right" and to hand over power in the shortest possible time to a new elected Assembly.

Outside, in Ankara, students celebrated the events. (Cumhuriyet; Times, Jan 7)

Commenting on the formation of the Constituent Assembly, Abnet Emin Yalman, the prominent Turkish writer and journalist, recalled that on the day of the revolt foreign correspondents insisted that there was no example in history of a secret military committee turning over power to a legal civilian government. Gen. Gürsel had replied: "This is sure to happen this time, and you will witness it." "It has to be admitted," Yalman continued, "that this was a most optimistic prediction." Describing the efforts of the 14 radical officers to frustrate constitutional developments, their exile and the establishment of the Constituent Assembly, Yalman concluded: "This positive result attained in Turkey after a radical military revolt represents one happy development against an infinite number of adverse chances. It seems to be likely that the Turkish nation will prove to have learned something in the course of its intermittent struggles for reforms, lawful government and liberty over the last 150 years..." (Rome Daily American, Jan 10)

Elections of the House Chairman and Committees. On Jan 9 the House elected Gen. (ret.) Kâzım Orbay as President of the House, Lütfi Akatlı and İbrahim Senil as his deputies, and four secretaries.

Orbay, born in 1886, served in the army from 1912 to 1950 when he was pensioned off by the DP government. From 1944 to 1946 he served as Chief of the General Staff. Following his election he declared: "The fact that you have elected an old soldier, ... is a new proof of confidence in the ... armed forces."

The same day, the House elected its two most important committees, each consisting of 20 members: the constitutional committee and the electoral law committee, to prepare the drafts of the new constitution and electoral laws respectively.

Enver Ziya Karal (RPP) was elected chairman of the first and Şefik İnan (RPP), who had served in Gürsel's first cabinet, chairman of the second committee. Both committees included RPP, RPNP and independent members. Five of the members of the constitutional committee were former members of the constitution committee, which had been appointed by Gen. Gürsel immediately after the coup (see MER 1960, p 453)—Professors Aksoy, Sarica, Savcı, Tunay and Velidedeoğlu. Amil Artun, former Minister of Justice, was also on the committee. (For full list, see Cumhuriyet, Jan 10; Ulus, Jan 11.)

THE CONSTITUTION ADOPTED

Work of the Constitutional Committee. On Jan 13 the draft constitution, prepared by the constitution committee which had been established on May 28, 1960 (MER 1960, p 453), was handed to the House of Representatives' constitutional committee. This draft was to form the basis for the committee's work. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 14)

Commencing work, the committee resolved on Jan 20 that the new constitution should be drafted in pure and intelligible Turkish, without employing uncommon terms or new words and without attempting to replace Turkified Arabic words in common use. (R. Ankara, Jan 20 [23])

On March 9 the committee submitted the draft constitution to the House of Representatives. (Cumhuriyet, March 10)

Discussion in the Constituent Assembly. The House began discussions on the draft at a ceremonial session on March 30 (Cumhuriyet, March 31). On May 4, following two readings, the House approved the constitution by a 222-0 vote, with five abstentions (two RNP and three RPP members). The draft was then submitted to the NUC, in its capacity as the Upper House of the Assembly. Various minor changes suggested by the NUC were discussed and mostly accepted by a joint committee of the NUC and the House. The third reading took place at a joint session of the two houses on May 25-27. (For sources, see below.)

Constitution Approved in Assembly. On May 27 the new constitution was approved. Of the 295 members of the two houses of the Assembly, 262 were present, 260 voted in favour, and two abstained—Orhan Köprülü, the son of Prof. Fuat Köprülü (see MER 1960, p. 436) who had been appointed to the Assembly by Gen. Gürsel, and Yekta Karamustafaoğlu, one of the ten representatives of the Chambers of Commerce and Industry. Of the 33 absent, some were preoccupied with affairs of state, others were on leave by permission of the Assembly, or ill; the rest consisted mainly of Osman Bölükbaşı, the RNP leader, and his "close friends." However, on May 30 Bölükbaşı declared that the RNP was supporting the constitution. He added: "It is our most sincere wish that with this constitution a period of freedom and merit will be opened." (Cumhuriyet, April 1, 8, 11-15, 18-22, 26-30, May 1, 2, 4-6, 9-11, 13, 15, 18-21, 29, 31)

QUESTIONS IN DISPUTE

Following are the principal points in the Assembly debate on the constitution:

Article 2: The Terms "Social Justice" and "Nationalist." Article 2 of the new constitution was the cause of a heated debate in the House because of the innovations introduced in it in comparison with Art. 2 of Atatürk's Constitution.

The relevant article in the latter read: "The Turkish state is republican, nationalist, populist, étatist, secular and reformist."

Art. 2 of the draft constitution read: "The Turkish republic is democratic and secular, based on human rights and liberties and on the fundamental principles of work and social justice."

A number of representatives criticized the omission of the words "nationalist," "étatist" and "reformist..." They described the reference to the principles of "work and social justice" as the thin end of the wedge for a possible future Communist regime and equated "social" with socialism and socialism with Communism.

The chief protagonists of the nationalist idea, an observer stated, tended to "be found among traditionalists and representatives of Islamic interest in the country, in what might roughly be called the extreme right wing of Turkish politics." Since about 80% of the representatives were members or supporters of the RPP, he added, the debate on the terms "nationalist" and "social justice" reflected to some extent a latent political division in the RPP between right and left wings. After reconsideration, the constitutional committee suggested the following text: "The Turkish Republic is a judicial, national, democratic, secular and social state, based on human rights."

The new text was again criticized, especially the employment of the term "national" (millî) instead of "nationalist" (milliyetçilik) but this was rejected by the House, and the word "national" was finally adopted.

There was a demand to reinstate the term "social justice." The Assembly, however, decided to include the term among the fundamental principles of the state in the Preamble, with a reference to the latter in Art. 2. (Cumhuriyet, April 1, 8, 11, 27, May 19, 20; Times, April 10, 12, May 13)

Future of the NUC Members. A heated debate was caused by two articles inserted by the NUC to secure the future of its members: Art. 70 providing for life tenure in the Senate for the NUC members, and Transitory Art. 4, providing that in no circumstances could NUC members be brought to trial for their acts and deeds in the period between May 27, 1960 and Jan 6, 1961 (see also: The NUC).

The House did not approve the latter article until a provision was added that the acts and deeds of the NUC during this period might be repealed or modified in the same way as other acts of the republic, though no claim of unconstitutionality could be brought against them. The leaders and members of the House for the RPP, RNP and NTP signed the text of the Article. (Cumhuriyet, May 5)

Proposal to Purge the Judiciary. In the debate on Transitory Art. 8 dealing with the status of the institutions of the former regime, 87 deputies submitted a motion to establish a supreme council of judges to carry out a purge among the judges within four months (i.e. before the new institutions came into being following the elections). The motion was aimed at judges who had supported the dissolved Democratic Party. Only after İnönü intervened in the debate saying that no good could come to the country from a purge, was the motion taken to a vote and rejected. (Cumhuriyet, May 5)

THE CONSTITUTION

Sources: Following is an outline of the new constitution with emphasis on the points in which it differed from the constitution of 1924. The new constitution was published in Official Gazette No. 10,816 of May 31, 1961, and the Turkish text also appeared in Türkiye Yılığ, 1962: English translations: (1) The Middle East Journal, Vol. 16, No. 2, p. 215 ff; (2) The Turkish Constitution, translated by The Week, Ankara, 1961; (3) Constitution of the Turkish Republic, Türk Argus Ajansı, İstanbul, 1961; (4) a précis may be found in Keessing's Contemporary Archives, p. 18,647 et seq. Comparison between the new Constitution and that of 1924 may be found in Türkiye Yılığ, 1962; Times, March 10, May 29; Christian Science Monitor, April 5. (For appreciation by a Turkish authority see: Prof. İsmet Giritli: Some Aspects of the New Turkish Constitution, ME Journal, Vol. 16; No. 1, Winter 1962)

General: The Constitution of the Republic of Turkey (Türkiye Cumhuriyeti Anayasası) was approved by the Constituent Assembly on May 27, published in the Official Gazette on May 31, submitted to a popular referendum on July 9, and following its approval in the referendum was promulgated as Law 334 in the Official Gazette of July 20.

The constitution contained a preamble and six parts divided into 137 articles and eleven transitory articles.

Preamble: The preamble said that the constitution was proclaimed in the name of the Turkish nation, which had lived in freedom and fought for its rights and liberties throughout history; carried out the May 27,

1960, revolution in exercise of its right to resist a power which had lost its legality, inspired by Turkish nationalism; fully conscious of the principle of "Peace at Home, Peace in the World," the spirit of national independence and the reforms of Atatürk, and in order to establish a state of law and democracy which would ensure and protect the social and human rights and liberties, national solidarity, social justice, and the prosperity of the individual and society. [There was no preamble to the 1924 constitution. As to "social justice," see debate on Art. 2, above.]

Part I. General Principles (Articles 1-9) provided that Turkey was a republic and "a national, democratic, secular, and social state" governed by the rule of law, based on human rights and the fundamental tenets set forth in the preamble (Art. 2).

Sovereignty was vested in the nation, would be exercised through the authorized agencies as prescribed in the constitution and could not be delegated. Legislative power was vested in the Grand National Assembly and could not be delegated; executive functions would be exercised by the President of the Republic and the Council of Ministers; and judicial functions would be exercised by independent courts. The Republican form of the state could not be amended nor may any motion therefore be made. [The emphasis on the prescription to delegate powers was new.]

Part II. Fundamental Rights and Duties (Art. 10-62).

[The provisions for the freedoms and the political rights included in this part were much more detailed and more safeguards were provided for them than in the 1924 constitution. The provisions for social rights, including labour rights, and the duties of the state in the economic-social field were, except for free and compulsory primary education, a complete innovation.] The constitution provided that every individual was entitled to such inalienable rights and made it incumbent upon the state to remove all political, economic and social obstacles, restricting them "in such a way as to be irreconcilable with the principles embodied in the rule of law, individual well-being and justice and to prepare the conditions for the development of the individual's material and spiritual existence."

All individuals were "equal before the law irrespective of language, race, sex, political opinion, philosophical views, or religion," and no privileges would be granted to "any individual, family, group, or class."

Articles 14 to 34 provided for the rights of the individual "to improve himself materially and spiritually," to personal freedom, privacy, immunity of domicile, freedom of communications, travel and residence, of thought and propagation of opinions, the right to education, the freedom of the sciences and the arts, the freedom of the press and book publishing, the right of individuals and political parties to avail themselves of public communication facilities, the right of rebuttal, the right of assembly and the forming of associations; protection against unwarranted arrest (24 hours limit of custody without court judgement); the right to seek justice and various kinds of judicial protection.

Art. 19 providing for freedom of faith and worship also prescribed the exploitation of religion for the purpose of political or personal benefit "or for even partially basing the fundamental social, economic, political and legal order of the state on religious dogma." Political parties violating these provisions might be permanently closed down. [This was an innovation.]

Articles 35-53 concerned social and economic rights and duties. They provided for the protection of the family, "the foundation of Turkish society," and the right to ownership and made it incumbent upon the state to provide land for farmers with no or insufficient land, authorized expropriations and nationalization in the public interest and provided for full compensation (see also p 528 b), and provided for the right to and freedom of contract and private enterprise. Economic and social life was to be regulated in a manner consistent with justice and full employment, with the objective of a dignified standard of living for everyone; it was the duty of the state to encourage economic and cultural development by democratic procedure.

Every individual had the right and duty to work. It was incumbent upon the state to protect workers, promote employment and assure decent wages. Children, youth and women were to be accorded special protection; the workers had the right to paid days of rest. Trade unions might be established and the workers would be given the right, by special legislation, to collective bargaining and to strike.

The state was charged with establishing or assisting in establishing a social security system, as well as with ensuring medical care, providing housing for low-income families, providing free (compulsory) elementary education and assuring capable students of higher education, promoting cooperation, protecting agriculture—with special reference to soil erosion—and the farmer and taking measures to provide the people with adequate nourishment.

The state was to carry out the above duties "only insofar as economic development and its financial resources permit."

Political Rights and Duties. (Articles 54-62). This section provided for the right of all citizens, with the usual exceptions, to elect and be elected in free, secret, equal and direct elections. Political parties could be founded without prior permission and operate freely; "whether in power or in opposition, political parties are indispensable entities of democratic political life." Parties were answerable to the Constitutional Court which also could dissolve them if they failed to conform to "the principles of a democratic and secular republic based on human rights and liberties, and of the state's territorial and national integrity." [There was no reference at all to political parties in the 1924 Constitution.]

Part III. The "Basic Organization of the Republic."

Articles 63-75 dealt with the legislature. The Grand National Assembly (GNA) would be composed of the National Assembly (NA) and the Senate of the Republic [formerly the GNA consisted of one chamber only]; the NA to consist of 450 deputies elected for four years by general direct ballot; the Senate to consist of 150 members elected for six years and of an additional 15 members appointed by the President of the Republic; every two years, one-third of the senators would rotate.

GNA members would enjoy the customary immunities. Legislation could be initiated both by the Council of Ministers and the members of the GNA, bills being debated first in the NA and then in the Senate. In case of disagreement between the two houses, the NA could override the senate vote after certain proceedings.

The elections would be held under the direction and control of judicial organs (Art. 75). [This was a major innovation. This task has formerly rested with local administrative authorities.]

The President of the Republic (Articles 95-101) would be elected for seven years from among members of the GNA by secret ballot and by a two-thirds majority, or by an absolute majority in the third ballot. He would not be eligible for re-election and would have to disassociate himself from his party, and his parliamentary membership would terminate upon his election. He would preside over the Council of Ministers whenever he deemed it necessary; ratify and promulgate international conventions and treaties; and exercise the right of reprieve. [Formerly the President was elected for four years and was eligible for re-election. He was not obliged to disassociate himself from his party.]

The Council of Ministers (Articles 102-111). The Prime Minister would be designated by the President from among the members of the GNA, while other Ministers would be nominated by the PM and appointed by the President either from Assembly members or [and this was an innovation] other qualified persons. A new Council of Ministers had to submit its programme to the Assembly for a vote of confidence. If the cabinet had been twice defeated on a non-confidence vote within 18 months, and if another such vote was passed thereafter, the PM might request the President to call new elections, the final decision lying with the President after consultation with the chairmen of the two Houses. Before elections, the Ministers of Justice, the Interior, and Communications must resign, and be replaced by independent members of the GNA. [This provision, as also Art. 75, was introduced as an additional guarantee for free and fair elections.]

The office of Commander-in-Chief would be "integrated in spirit" in the GNA and be "represented" by the President. The cabinet would be responsible to the Assembly "for ensuring national security and preparing the armed forces for war," while the Chief of the General Staff, appointed by the President on the nomination of the Cabinet, would be Commander of the Armed Forces. The National Security Council would consist of Ministers, the CGS and representatives of the armed forces, under the chairmanship of the President.

The articles concerning administration (112-125) provided inter alia [for the innovation] that all administrative acts or procedures would be subject to judicial review. Art. 119 forbade government officials and certain categories of employees in public institutions to join political parties. Art. 120 guaranteed the scientific and administrative autonomy of the universities. [This was not provided for in the former constitution.] University teachers might be party members but must not assume executive functions outside the parties' central organizations.

Art. 121 guaranteed the impartiality of the state broadcasting (radio and television) and news agencies, [another innovation].

Economic and Fiscal Provisions (Articles 126-131). Economic, social and cultural development would be based on a plan [an innovation], the organization and functions of the State Planning Organization [established in Oct 1960] and the preparation, execution, and revision of the plan being regulated by special legislation. The right to explore and exploit natural resources would belong to the state, and participation by private enterprise would be subject to explicit legal permission. Special provision was made for conservation and development of forests, [to cope with the major problems of soil erosion which had reached catastrophic dimensions, partly because for political reasons the peasants had been allowed to devastate the forests.]

The Judiciary (Articles 132-152). This section provided for [two major innovations to ensure] the independence of the judiciary. Judges might not be dismissed, or retired without their consent, except in specially defined cases. Decisions on all personnel matters regarding judges would be entrusted to a Supreme Council of Judges, [similar to the French Conseil Supérieur de la Magistrature] which would also elect the members of the Court of Cassation. All court proceedings would be open. Military courts could try civilians for military offences only. High courts included the Court of Cassation, the Council of State (an administrative court), the Supreme Military Court and the Court of Conflicts (to resolve conflicts of jurisdiction between the ordinary administrative and military courts).

There would also be a Constitutional Court of 15 ordinary and five alternate members, all with judicial qualifications and elected respectively by the Court of Cassation (4), the Council of State (3), the Court of Accounts (1), the NA (3), the Senate (2), the President (2) with the main functions of: (1) reviewing the constitutionality of laws and by-laws passed by the GNA; (2) trying for offences connected with their duties the President, ministers, judges of the Supreme courts, the chief prosecutor, the chief attorney, and its own members; (3) fulfilling the other tasks assigned to it by the constitution, e.g. decisions on the dissolution of political parties. [The court was a major innovation. The lack of it had been generally considered a serious defect and had led to the passage of laws which were now regarded as having been unconstitutional.]

Part IV. Miscellaneous. Art. 153 under the heading: "Protection of the Revolutionary Laws," provided guarantees for the following reforms of Atatürk: (1) the unity of education (1924); (2) the wearing of hats (1925); (3) the prohibition and abolition of dervish monasteries (1925); (4) the principle of civil marriage (1926); (5) the adoption of international numerals (1928); (6) the adoption of the modern Turkish (Latin) characters (1928); (7) the abolition of titles such as Efendi, Bey, Paşa (1934); (8) the ban on wearing certain types of clothes (1934).

Part V comprised provisions for the transition to the institutions elected according to the new constitution and provided guarantees for the NUC—which would cease to exist with the convening of the GNA—for their acts and deeds during the period May 27, 1960-Jan 6, 1961 [the day when the Constituent Assembly began to function].

Part VI. Final Provisions (Articles 155-157) stated, inter alia, that amendments to the constitution required a two-thirds majority in both Houses and that the constitution would come into force following the referendum.

THE REFERENDUM ON THE CONSTITUTION

The Referendum Law. The referendum law was approved by the Constituent Assembly on April 26 and came into force on May 2. Voting rights and administration of the referendum would be the same as in the general elections; voting would be by two ballot papers marked "Yes" and "No"; the new constitution would come into force if over half of the total number of valid votes would be in favour. (Cumhuriyet, Feb 28; Türkiye Yılıgi, 1962)

Propaganda Campaign. On June 3 the NUC decided to hold the referendum on July 9. It also decided on a propaganda campaign as of June 21, to be conducted by its members, members of the cabinet, deputies, political parties and workers' organizations, to explain the constitution to the people. From June 28 to July 4 representatives of political parties gave radio talks, according to a time-table determined by lots at the Supreme Electoral Council. NUC members toured the country explaining the constitution to the people. The campaign ended on July 5 (three days before the referendum) according to law. (Cumhuriyet, June 4, 21, 23, 24, 28, July 1, 3-6; R. Ankara, June 22, 27 [24, 29])

"Steps Towards Democracy; Vote of Confidence in Regime." The Times correspondent commented that the leaders of the revolutionary regime were taking the vote seriously. "Though there had been sardonic allusions in some quarters regarding the practicability of holding a referendum on something so complicated as a constitution in a country like Turkey (where the literacy rate is still only about 35 per cent) the Army leaders, and their associates, clearly consider it an essential step on the road to a Western-type democracy. Its more significant, though less publicized, aspect is that it is also clearly intended as a vote of confidence in the May 27 coup and in the revolutionary regime." (Times, July 7)

Workers, Youth Organizations Support the Constitution. The Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions decided on April 21 to support the new constitution in the referendum, as it gave the right to collective contract and the right to strike. (Cumhuriyet, April 22)

On June 16 the General Congress of the Zonguldak Mine Workers' Union decided unanimously, in the name of its 40,000 workers, to vote "Yes." (Cumhuriyet, June 17)

The National Students' Federation and the National Youth Organization resolved to campaign for the approval of the constitution. (Cumhuriyet, June 19, 26)

"Constitution Favourable to Religion." In a pamphlet calling for support of the constitution, the head of the [government] Religious Affairs Directorate praised the attitude of the regime towards religion and said the constitution was "the most favourable according to our view." (Cumhuriyet, July 2)

Political Parties' Support. All political parties, old and new, large and small, except the Justice Party, expressed their support for the new constitution, even before the campaign began. In provincial and district congresses, broadcasts, bulletins and public meetings, their leaders called upon their members and the citizens in general to participate in the referendum and approve the constitution.

[The RPP leaders endeavoured to counteract the apparently widely-held view that the constitution was something of a private party enterprise.] Prof. Feyzioğlu declared that, although the RPP had a majority in the Constituent Assembly, the new constitution "is not the constitution of the RPP but the constitution of the whole Turkish nation."

Party speakers generally emphasized that the new constitution was an extension of Atatürk's political ideas, pointing out that it contained all necessary safeguards for the fundamental rights and freedoms of the citizen and for his economic and social welfare. (Cumhuriyet, June 2, 5, 9, 20, 26-30, July 1-5)

Opposition by Justice Party. The Justice Party, which, according to Gen. Gürsel, was dominated by members of the dissolved Democratic Party (Cumhuriyet, July 25), was the only legal party to criticize the constitution openly and also to conduct a clandestine propaganda campaign against it. A bulletin issued on June 26 by the JP and signed by its leader Gümüşpala, stated: "We believe in the capacity of the administration but we leave the last and definite decision to the nation." One must look, it continued, for defects in the form and contents of a constitution which had been formulated in a single year and in a revolutionary atmosphere.

This statement was generally regarded as an invitation to JP followers to abstain or even to vote "No." Gen. Gürsel said that he understood it so. A member of the party's executive council, Dr. Mukbil Özyörük, left the party, claiming that after he had explained the new constitution to the party's chairmen in the provinces, Gümüşpala's statement had left him no other recourse. Gümüşpala's statement was immediately condemned in a spate of official declarations and editorials.

The party's public attitude still remained equivocal. On June 29 Gümüşpala stated: "We called upon the people to vote in favour," but the executive council had considered itself unqualified to guide the people as to how to vote, since the party had not had time to convene its congresses and find out the views of the people.

In a broadcast to the people on July 2, Kamuran Evliyaoglu, member of the party's executive council, said that the party had decided to vote "Yes," but warned that the principle of a social state was dangerous and contradicted party principles. Other JP members claimed that a regime of social justice might lead Turkey towards the establishment of a Communist state. (Cumhuriyet, June 27-30, July 3; Times, July 7)

JP Propaganda Campaign; the Story of "Monsieur Referendum." The JP was also accused of spreading rumours against the constitution among the peasants, whose attitude, The Times correspondent wrote, was "as usual, enigmatic." When the hitherto unknown word "referendum" was first introduced, Anatolian peasants were said to have been told that a foreigner named "Monsieur Referendum" was being brought to Turkey by the military government, and that this gentleman proposed to close down all the mosques and abolish the Qur'an. Others were told that "Monsieur Referendum" was really Archbishop Makarios in disguise, and they should have nothing to do with him. (Times, July 7)

On July 7 four JP members, one of them a former DP member, were arrested in Istanbul for calling upon the people to vote against the constitution, though propaganda was banned during the last three days before the referendum. (Cumhuriyet, July 8)

In a letter to Gümüşpala, written after the referendum and condemning the party's policy, Gen. Gürsel listed "what your party has suggested to the nation: do not vote for the constitution and let's hope for the best. Use the red colour (the referendum ballot marked "No" was in red) which is the colour of our banner... If you vote 'Yes'... they will hang Menderes. If you vote 'Yes'... the Communists... will take over the country; they put the word 'social' in for them. In addition, for the strengthening of the party [your party told the voters] we shall re-establish the DP; when the time comes we shall take revenge, we shall save those in Yassıada... Such provocative efforts were exerted amongst innocent villagers." (Cumhuriyet, July 25)

Gürsel's Call; Attacks on the JP. In a broadcast on July 4 Gen. Gürsel called on the nation to affirm the constitution. He said that the parties had praised the new constitution and he called on the citizens to endorse it. "Our scholars, intellectuals, politicians and administrators" had carefully worked on it and it was good and splendid work. Unfortunately there were some wretched people who wished to prevent the nation from reaching this goal and expected to benefit from instability, to which end they were employing lies and rumours. "Do not be deceived by them... Our national interests lie in taking another important step towards achieving a democratic regime by national endorsement of the constitution..." (R. Ankara, July 4 [6])

Two days later at a press conference Gürsel was asked whether any measures were being contemplated against the JP. He answered: "My belief is what all the citizens believe. I think that those who do not know that this party is not following a good path, are those innocent citizens who are the followers of this party and the party leader himself." Gümüspala immediately asked for a meeting with Gürsel, to take place following the referendum, but the following day cancelled this request. (Cumhuriyet, July 7, 8, 9)

Voting Day Procedure. The referendum, the first popular vote of that kind ever to be held in Turkey, was held on July 9.

Voters arriving at the polling stations were given an empty envelope and then entered a curtained booth. In the booth were two piles of paper slips, white ones marked "Yes," and red ones marked "No." The voter put one of the slips into the envelope in private, and then deposited the envelope in a sealed box in the presence of the officials.

During the day, the radio stations called on the citizens to participate in the voting, stressing that it was a national duty. Participation in the voting was larger in the villages of Anatolia than in the big towns.

The vote seemed to have taken place in most areas in a calm atmosphere; no serious incidents were reported. A few persons were detained for conducting propaganda, which was contrary to law. There were some complaints about irregularities, which were immediately corrected, in the voters' lists; it was also reported that some "Yes" slips had been stolen from the booths. (Cumhuriyet, July 10-13; Times, July 10)

Constitution Approved. On July 19 the Supreme Electoral Council published the final results of the referendum, as follows:

registered voters—12,735,009; votes cast—10,322,169 (81%);
invalid votes—39,608; valid votes—10,282,561; "Yes"—6,348,191 (61.7%); "No"—3,934,370 (38.3%).

Thus, according to the law, the constitution was approved. (Cumhuriyet, July 20, 21)

Western Anatolia Voted "No." The majority of the "Yes" votes came from the eastern and southern provinces; in Mardin province they reached 97.7%. Istanbul and Ankara affirmed the constitution by an overwhelming majority. "No" votes were in the majority in W. and N.W. Anatolia, stronghold of the dissolved Democratic Party. In 11 provinces, "No" exceeded "Yes" votes: Adana (Sakarya), Aydin, Bolu, Bursa, Çorum, Denizli, Izmir, Kütahya, Manisa, Samsun and Zonguldak. (Cumhuriyet, July 11-13; R. Ankara, July 11-12 [13]; Times, July 11; for detailed results see table below.)

Reasons for the "No" Vote. Cumhuriyet advanced the following reasons for the considerable "No" vote, on the basis of on-the-spot investigations by its correspondents:

1. increased taxes exacted by the government;
2. "the influence of the coloured paper slips" [the paper does not explain this point further. Perhaps it meant to suggest that the voters, especially the rural population, found the red "No" slip more attractive than the white "Yes" slip. Also, as recorded above, the Justice Party was accused of having told the people to use the red slip; possibly the conspicuous colour made its work easier.]

3. the fact that the parties had not been sufficiently organized to conduct effective propaganda. (A leader of the Socialist Party claimed that if the party had had organized branches in the provinces of Bursa, Izmir and Zonguldak, where there were many workers, it could have prevented the large "No" vote there. The party claimed that the authorities had prevented it from organizing—for details see: The Socialist Party.)

4. the hope that a "No" vote would result in lighter sentences for the former DP leaders who were being tried in Yassıada, whereas a "Yes" vote would result in more severe sentences. [This, it will be recalled, was a feature of the Justice Party propaganda.]

5. strong underground propaganda (Cumhuriyet, July 11-13, 15). On this clandestine campaign, Gen. Gürsel said: "What lies were circulated! What comparisons were drawn! And above all what large amounts of money were spent by clandestine hands! No hesitation was shown in resorting to all sorts of dirty, mean provocations to mislead the citizens..." (R. Ankara, July 16 [18])

6. a vote against the revolutionary regime. Foreign observers remarked that the large "No" vote could be interpreted less as a reflection on the constitution itself than as a criticism of the revolutionary regime in general. Many Turks were not convinced that it had been either necessary or right to overthrow Menderes. The referendum was the first opportunity they had of registering their disapproval of the coup. (Times, July 11; Economist, July 15)

Conversely an Ankara Radio commentator said: "The 'Yes' votes for the constitution could also mean support for the revolutionary government." (BBCM, July 13)

7. the "No" vote was a DP vote—see below.

Democratic Party Versus Republican People's Party. A RPP spokesman claimed that all RPP members and supporters had voted "Yes" and those who voted "No" were all former members of the DP. He pointed to the fact that the results of the 1957 general elections in Kütahya province had been the same as the results of the referendum. Thus, he claimed, DP followers had revived the RPP-DP struggle. (Cumhuriyet, July 11)

A foreign observer remarked that the referendum was in many ways a trial run for the coming elections. The strongest party in the field, the RPP, could not be very happy with the results. It was thought unlikely that the "Yes" votes would go en bloc to the party. (Scotsman, July 21)

Free and Secret Vote; Non-Interference by NUC; The Military As Defenders of Democracy. Foreign correspondents commented that the referendum had evidently been fair and secret; the voters felt able to vote as they pleased—hence the large "No" vote—and the government had apparently attempted neither to tamper with the results, "which could not be very palatable to it," nor to disguise them. (Times, July 11; Economist, July 15; Observer, July 16; Scotsman, July 21)

The Christian Science Monitor commented that the Turkish military class had often provided more reliable defenders of constitutional progress than had the politicians, with few notable exceptions. Those familiar with the rôle played by the officer class in bringing Western ideas into Turkey did not share the concern sometimes expressed about Gen. Gürsel's intentions. Actually, Gen. Gürsel was among those most impatient for a new constitution to take the place of his own military government. (Christian Science Monitor, July 14)

[Such points were naturally emphasized by spokesmen for the regime.] Nowhere else in the world could one find such an example of the evolution of a military administration into a democracy, said an Ankara Radio commentator. (BBCM, July 13)

In a message to the people on July 16, Gen. Gürsel said: "I am addressing you today proud and moved to be a Turk." The participation in the referendum—over 80%—was such as even nations with a long established democratic regime hardly attained. "The Turkish people... have proved how seriously interested they are in their own vital problems..." Some citizens were worried by the large percentage of "No" votes. This attitude was not correct. If some citizens voted "No" as a result of their own views, they should be respected. "If, however, they were misled... and provoked into this decision, we should denounce the instigators and the provocators rather than blame the citizens." Gen. Gürsel went on to describe the clandestine propaganda which had been conducted, but, he said, the Turkish people found the right path.

"My dear people," Gen. Gürsel concluded, "you are a great nation... I bow before the supreme power of your maturity, dignity and perfection, and especially before your patriotism... How happy one must be to call oneself a Turk." (R. Ankara, July 16 [18])

Agitation Against Constitution, Arrests of JP Members, Others. Following the approval of the new constitution, 16 persons, among them former DP members, were arrested in Izmit province for propaganda against the constitution. (Cumhuriyet, July 15)

On July 13 a large-scale brawl took place in a village in Siirt province between those who had approved and those who had voted against the constitution; several persons were injured. (Cumhuriyet, July 15)

On July 14 ten JP members in Denizli province were arrested for declaring that "those who voted in favour of the constitution are Communists"; nine of them were later released. (Cumhuriyet, July 15)

In mid-July, a former DP chairman in a village near Izmir was arrested for propaganda against the government at the time of the referendum. (Cumhuriyet, July 20)

On July 23, 15 persons were arrested in Istanbul for acting in opposition to the rules issued on July 15 banning all public discussion of the referendum, the Yasa trials or the forthcoming elections. (Cumhuriyet, July 25)

THE ARMY IN POLITICS

THE "FOURTEEN RADICALS"

More on The Fourteen Before Their Ouster. (Compare MER 1960, pp 436-9.) In Jan, Ahmet Emin Yalman [the well-known writer and journalist], writing in a foreign paper, said that Gen. Gürsel's declaration on the day of the coup that the army would turn over power to a legal civilian government, had been "most optimistic" and was hardly supported by history, particularly in this part of the world.

"The committee was working secretly and was soon surrounded by a large group of irresponsible persons—assistants, experts, flatterers, denouncers." In this "gloomy atmosphere" it was easy for a group of "activist, ambitious young officers" within the committee, led by Col. Türke, "a potential Turkish Abdel Nasser," to gain the initiative. In public speeches throughout the country, they expounded the view that Turkey was a retarded country and that slow progress was insufficient. Their programme for a more dynamic course was "a totalitarian regime in the form of a revolutionary national socialism and racism. They made no secret that they considered the free and independent universities and the free press as obstacles." Their primary way of action was to incite students and ambitious young members of the faculties against the senior members, and to create a conflict in the press by promising young journalists a "socialized" press, in which they would be the bosses.

"They tried to capture the... masses by spreading hatred against the well-to-do classes and appealing to the feelings of fanaticism and ignorance—in opposition to the modern and rational spirit created by the reforms of Kemal Atatürk. An underground of dissenters was formed, where partisans of the fallen DP, religious fanatics, racists, Communists, all sorts of ambitious and impatient elements were amalgamated..."

The moderate members of the NUC endeavoured to avoid an open conflict and urged the activists to respect their military oath to turn over power to a civilian government. At the same time, the NUC became convinced that it would be too dangerous to keep in its own hands the entire responsibility for running the government and preparing the constitution and electoral law. It therefore prepared to establish a Constituent Assembly (see MER 1960, p 453).

"As this move tended to frustrate the wish of the activists to retain the power in their own hands, they immediately plotted to seize power and arrest their opponents. They were found out and, on Nov 13, 1960 arrested and exiled... The reason for their mild treatment was the desire to avoid further controversy on the eve of the inauguration of the Constituent Assembly." (Rome Daily American, Italy, Jan 10)

In Nov, Senator Suphi Karaman, a former NUC member, declared that the 14 had been in favour of a referendum to determine whether the NUC should remain in power for a period of four years, during which time social reforms could be realized. They had not wanted a military dictatorship. (Ulus, Nov 2)

Şefik Soyuyüce Welcomes Establishment of Assembly. Soyuyüce, one of the 14, who had been posted to the Turkish Embassy in Copenhagen, conveyed his congratulations to his "friends, the members of the NUC" on the establishment of the Constituent Assembly which would bring safety and stability within the democratic system to the nation. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 6)

The Question of the Future of the 14. [The question of the future of the 14 and especially their return to Turkey was repeatedly raised.] On March 2 Gen. Gürsel said at a press conference that the government to be established after the elections would have to decide on this question (Cumhuriyet, March 3). Two months later [when it became clear that the NUC members would be constitutionally assured of immunity against possible prosecution on political charges in the future—see p. 548 h] Gürsel was asked at a press conference what would be the "security guarantees" for the 14 after the general elections. He answered: "Such a question... seems strange to me. The main thing is not the security of persons but the security and safety of the country..." (R. Ankara, May 13 [16]; Cumhuriyet, May 14).

In mid-June, at the time of the Madanoğlu-Tansel affair (see below), rumours spread that several NUC members were considering the return of the 14, as Lt-Gen. Madanoğlu, their chief opponent, had resigned from the NUC (Times, June 14). This was denied on June 15 by Gen. Gürsel (Cumhuriyet, June 16). When the rumours persisted, there were more denials by the NUC spokesmen during July and Aug. (Cumhuriyet, July 29, Aug. 1, 2).

In mid-Aug a spokesman for the NUC criticized the press for making an issue out of the 14, and said they could not lawfully return. He said they had been pensioned off in accordance with Law No. 126, had been assigned to their present duties abroad in accordance with Law No. 127 and could not be brought back for at least two years. The names of the 14 did not appear among the names of NUC members listed in Law No. 157 [the Constituent Assembly Organizations Law—see MER 1960, p. 453] and only the latter were, according to the constitution, "natural [i.e. permanent] members" of the Senate. Personal wishes and views had no value in face of the provisions of the law, the spokesman said. (R. Ankara, Aug. 12 [15]; Cumhuriyet, Aug. 13).

NUC Praise for the 14. On Oct 16, following the general elections, the NUC issued a communiqué stressing its pleasure at having kept its promise to hold free elections. It added: "This happy end is the result of the common belief of 38 comrades in the revolution. These 38 friends have equally participated in the preparation and execution of the revolution. But as it is in the nature of revolutions, differences appeared on the methods to be employed afterwards" and the 14 had to be sent abroad. "They have accomplished their duty with success..." (Ulus, Oct 17).

Six of the 14 Challenge the Constitutional Regime. Following the general elections, it was reported that seven of the 14 officers residing in Europe [Mustafa Kaplan, İrfan Solmaz, Dündar Taser, Münir Köseoglu, Şefik Soyuyüce, Orhan Kabibay and Numan Esin; Kabibay had initially been posted to Ottawa] had met at The Hague in mid-Oct for two days (Cumhuriyet, Oct 24). According to another version, the meeting had been held in Brussels with the participation of all the 14. They had charted their future course of action. (Ulus, Oct 31).

On Oct 29 six of the 14—Türkes, Kabibay, Erkanlı, Kaplan, Esin and Solmaz—held a press conference at the office of the Turkish press attaché in Paris. Declining to be quoted as individuals, they declared that the indicative results of the general elections proved that they had been right in opposing a ballot so soon after the revolution. Asked about their plans for returning to Turkey they said: "We are going back as soon as the national interest demands it, and as soon as the situation is favourable." Until they returned, the six said, they would work through their many friends in Turkey in intellectual circles, the army, youth organizations and among the people.

They stated that the present situation in the National Assembly, where no party had a majority, was a vindication of what they had predicted a year ago. It was therefore only natural that they should now make proposals "to our friends in the political parties." They refused to be pinned down on specific points in their programme beyond saying that they felt that "social democracy should be achieved before full democracy can be realized." They said they believed that "the Assembly as presently constituted cannot deal with the grave problems existing in Turkey," and added: "As long as the deep problems which caused the May 1960 Revolution are not solved, our service is not completed."

It was reported that the six came to Paris to attend the receptions on Republic Day, Oct 29. They had asked the press attaché, Aydemir Balkan, to permit them to hold a press conference in his office, and he in turn asked the advice of the embassy. The answer from the embassy was not known (Ulus; Cumhuriyet, Oct 31). Öncü wrote that the press attaché was reported to have told Ankara that he had acted upon instructions from the embassy. The embassy, Öncü continued, would hardly have done so without referring the matter to Ankara; and it was clear that the government must have been acquainted with the matter. (Öncü, Nov 3).

Türkiye: No Hostility Towards Parties; Reform Necessary. On Nov 1 Alpaslan Türkeş, telephoning from Brussels, told Son Havadis, as reported: "We are not hostile to the existing political parties... We believe that the armed forces... are the sacred trust of our nation. We also believe that Communism presents the greatest danger to our country" and must be fought. "Ideological activities, the strengthening of national customs and morals and social and economic measures to end poverty are necessary," he said. He also denied that they opposed the holding of elections. (Son Havadis, Nov 2).

Intimations of Legal Action Against the 14 Fail to Materialize. On Oct 31 the government empowered the Foreign Ministry to conduct an investigation into the position of the six. They could be charged with making a political statement in their capacity as civil servants, which was contrary to law. President Gürsel indicated that legal action would be taken. [However, by the end of the year, there was no report of any action taken against the six.] (Ulus, Nov 1-3). On Nov 3 it was reported that the Foreign Ministry had asked them to return to their duties (Yeni Sabah, Nov 3). Another report said they were now in Rome (Öncü, Nov 3). Kızıloğlu, ambassador to the Vatican, who arrived in Ankara on Nov 7, denied that he had come to submit a file on the six to President Gürsel. (Ulus; Öncü, Nov 8).

Other Official and Army Reactions. On Nov 1 President Gürsel told the press: "[The 14] are just ordinary people with no superior qualities whatsoever. It is you, the journalists, who play them up as heroes by writing something about them daily."

Gen. Cevdet Sunay, the CGS, questioned regarding the possibility that the 14 enjoyed some support in the army, replied that they no longer belonged to the army. He was convinced of their patriotism; however, the Second Republic was now established, so what else could they want? He could not believe that they would try to put the army to the test and "anyway the army is not so unrealistic and glib that it will acquiesce in becoming a puppet." (Yeni Gün, Nov 3)

THE MADANOĞLU — TANSEL AFFAIR

(June)

The Tansel Affair. On June 3 a brief announcement, which failed to make the front pages, stated that Lt-Gen. İrfan Tansel, commander of the Air Force, had been transferred to head the military mission in Washington; Maj-Gen. Süleyman Tulgan had been appointed acting commander. (R. Ankara, June 3 [W 8]; Cumhuriyet, June 4)

Five days later, on June 8, Lt-Gen. Tansel was returned to his command "to the satisfaction of all air force personnel," while Maj-Gen. Tulgan retired. An order to this effect was issued on the same day by Gen. Cevdet Sunay, the CGS. (Cumhuriyet, June 9)

Changes in the High Command; Purge in the Air Force. The same day, drastic changes were reported in the high command. Two NUC members who were in command of army units were reported to have resigned their posts. They were Lt-Gen. Cemal Madanoğlu, commander of Ankara garrison, and Col. Osman Köksal, commander of the presidential guard. [The first in fact resigned; the resignation of the latter was officially confirmed only two months later; see below.] Lt-Gen. Celâl Alkoç, commander of the land forces, and Col. Agasi Sen, President Gürsel's chief aide-de-camp, retired. It was reported that Muzaffer Alanus, the Minister of Defence, would also resign. Twenty to thirty high-ranking officers were reportedly purged upon the reinstatement of Tansel.

There was no official statement. Asked by journalists about the purge, Gen. Gürsel said: "What are they to you? What was done was done." (Cumhuriyet, June 9-11; Times, June 12, 13)

Atmosphere of Crisis; Madanoğlu Resigns from NUC. On June 9 an atmosphere of crisis engulfed Ankara and jet aircraft repeatedly buzzed over Ankara and Istanbul. This was understood by foreign observers as an act of pressure on the NUC, while NUC members described it as a celebration of Tansel's reinstatement.

The same day, Lt-Gen. Madanoğlu informed the NUC of his decision to resign his membership of the NUC.

The NUC held three meetings during the day. Finally, it issued a communiqué in which it approved the reinstatement of Lt-Gen. Tansel, denied the reports of changes in the high command, accepted Lt-Gen. Madanoğlu's resignation from his command but not his resignation from the NUC and granted him leave, and appointed Lt-Gen. Ali Keskiner commander of Ankara garrison, Maj. Kadri Ertek was appointed President Gürsel's chief aide-de-camp, in place of Col. Agasi Sen, who had retired.

Lt-Gen. Madanoğlu told journalists that he had resigned as he was in need of rest and his resignation was final; the decision to grant him leave was only a jest on the part of his friends in the NUC. (Cumhuriyet, June 10, 11; Times, June 12; NYT, June 16)

Lt-Gen. Madanoğlu was regarded as one of the most powerful figures in the NUC. He was generally supposed to have been the principal rival of Col. Türkeş, leader of the 14 "radical" officers and the prime mover in the elimination of this group. It was believed that he bad acted with the approval and possibly the active support of İnönü, as he was considered a chief advocate inside the NUC of the return to power of İnönü and the RPP (Times, June 12-17). (Compare also MER 1960, pp 436-38; Madanoğlu was thought to be the leader of the "moderates" but in the reports on the election of the 14, his role was overshadowed by that of Col. Çökük.)

The Background: Army Commanders Against NUC. Foreign observers thought that the events described above amounted to a test of strength between senior commanders of the armed forces and the NUC, in which the former had gained the upper hand. The decision to transfer Lt-Gen. Tansel had been taken by Gen. Gürsel and other members of the NUC, presumably including Lt-Gen. Madanoğlu. This was immediately followed by a sort of rebellion in the air force, which caused the NUC to reverse its decision. The air force had also demanded the resignation of Lt-Gen. Madanoğlu from active command and when the NUC acquiesced, Madanoğlu resigned from the NUC. The part played by Gen. Cevdet Sunay, CGS, was enigmatic. It was known that the General Staff had approved the posting of Lt-Gen. Tansel to Washington, and was the first to announce his reinstatement.

These developments signified an apparent shift of power within the ruling group. There had been a growing rift in recent months between the command of the armed forces and the NUC owing to resentment in the forces at the Committee's interference with military appointments and more generally dissatisfaction at the NUC's conduct of national affairs. The removal of the two members of the NUC from command of troops and the appearance of the new and dynamic figure of Lt-Gen. Tansel could mean a strengthening of the leaders of the armed forces outside the NUC, vis-à-vis the NUC.

A senior officer was reported to have told The New York Times correspondent: "So far as I am concerned, there is no Committee. There is only the army. After all it was the army that carried out the revolution. The Committee depends on us, not we on the Committee." (Times, June 12, 13, 17; NYT, June 15, 16)

Postponement of Transfer of Power Rumoured and Denied; Army Chiefs Participate in NUC Deliberations. The crisis gave rise to speculations that the transfer of power to civilian hands would be postponed and a military dictatorship meanwhile established. Gürsel and other NUC members endeavoured to minimize the importance of the crisis and repeatedly promised that the referendum and general elections would be held according to schedule. (Cumhuriyet, June 10, 11; Times, June 12, 13)

On June 11 the NUC held a four-hour meeting. Cevdet Sunay, the CGS, and Lt-Gen. Muhtittin Onur, his deputy, participated in this meeting. This was the first time the army chiefs took part in the NUC meetings [thus affirming the view that a shift of power had taken place in favour of the armed forces.] A statement issued following this meeting noted that "some people, who are acting with concealed aims... are trying to confuse national opinion by attempting to spread untrue reports and propaganda... efforts are being made to exploit some appointments and changes in commands which were made within the authority and responsibility of the armed forces and entirely in accordance with the interests of national unity, and to exploit the report of one resignation from the NUC. These changes have been made because of the joint belief of the C-in-C and of the armed forces that they were necessary... The NUC, headed by its Chairman, Gen. Cemal Gürsel, [and] fully supported by the Turkish armed forces... is firm in its determination to attain democratic and honest elections... during the period pledged... it will most probably be possible to put the new constitution to a public vote on July 9..." [It will be noted that the statement excludes the NUC—though not Gen. Gürsel, its chairman and C-in-C, from responsibility for appointments in the armed forces. On the other hand, the NUC, "supported by the armed forces," remains responsible for the political sphere.] (R. Ankara, June 11 [13]; Cumhuriyet, June 12)

Commanders of the Armed Forces Retired. On June 19 the Ministry of Defence announced the following retirements, in accordance with Law No. 42, [which, inter alia, provided more favourable pension terms, see MER 1960, p. 443]: Lt-Gen. Celâl Aikoç, Commander of the Land Forces [this had been reported already on June 9, see above]; Vice-Adm. Zeki Özak, Commander of the Navy; Rear Adm. Emin İker, Commander of the Fleet; Rear Adm. Muhlis Güreman, Commander of the Straits and Marmara Zone. Lt-Gen. Şefik İter, Commander of the Second Army, was appointed member of the Supreme Advisory Council of National Defence (Millî Savunma Yüksek İstisare Kurulu). Lt-Gen. Muhiittin Onur, Deputy CGS, was appointed Commander of the Second Army and Acting Commander of the Land Forces. Rear Adm. Necdet Uran, Commander of the War Fleet, was appointed Acting Commander of the Navy. Cumhuriyet, which reported these changes a day before the official announcement, also reported the retirement of three staff colonels and two majors of the Air Force. The Times correspondent wrote that these changes were believed to be a further consequence of the crisis described above. (Cumhuriyet, June 18, 20; R. Ankara, June 19 [22]; Times, June 19, 21)

Retirement and Resignation of the Minister of Defence. On June 14 Cumhuriyet reported that Lt-Gen. Muzaffer Alankuş, Minister of Defence, had asked to be retired from the army on the grounds that there were officers of higher rank than his on active service, and his transfer to civilian status would rectify this situation (Cumhuriyet, June 14). Two weeks later, however, Alankuş resigned [as Cumhuriyet had already predicted on June 9—see above]. Fahri Özdilek, the Deputy PM, was appointed Minister of Defence while Sütkü Ulay, Minister of State, became Deputy PM. (Cumhuriyet, June 28, 29; Times, June 29)

Madanoğlu's Final Resignation. During June and July, efforts to reinstate Lt-Gen. Madanoğlu in the NUC were reported. Gen. Gürsel declared that Madanoğlu had resigned "for reasons of fatigue"; this was his fifth resignation. Madanoğlu explained that he had resigned only once before in order to bring about the expulsion of Türkiye; when he achieved his purpose, he returned. Later he had twice threatened to resign, as a warning. Gen. Gürsel met Madanoğlu twice. İnönü declared his hope that Madanoğlu would return to the NUC. (Cumhuriyet, June 11, 21, 22, 23, 29)

On July 20, NUC announced that it had accepted Madanoğlu's resignation from the NUC. Gen. Gürsel expressed his grief and said that "it is not good that so honest, pure and good a soldier is leaving us." (Cumhuriyet, July 21, 22)

Following a meeting with Gen. Gürsel, on Sept 9, Madanoğlu declared that he would neither join any political party, nor would he become a member of the Senate [which NUC members were automatically to become]. He added that he was working for the Ministry of Defence as a member of the Supreme Advisory Council for National Defence. (Cumhuriyet, Sept 10)

The Resignation of Köksal. On Aug 11, two months after the crisis broke out, the NUC announced that it had accepted the resignation of Col. Osman Köksal from his duties as Commander of the Presidential Guards on the grounds that with the freeing of political parties from Sept 10 and the move towards elections and a democratic administration "the duties of the NUC members, which is a legislative organ, have become heavier." (Cumhuriyet, Aug 12)

On this occasion the NUC spokesman again criticized the press. He deplored "the difference between the information released [on Köksal] and the news carried... by the newspapers." "My honourable friends," he told the pressmen, "let us for a while turn our eyes to our friends and foes abroad. More than ever before, we must be united as a nation..." (R. Ankara, Aug 12 [15])

On Sept 9 Köksal handed over his command to his deputy, Lt-Col. Nedim Denizlioğlu. (R. Ankara, Sept 9 [W 14])

New Army Junta Seen. Writing after the general elections in Oct, the Ankara correspondent of The Economist wrote that it had been clear for some months that the real rulers in Turkey were not the junta, "who are powerless and partly discredited, but a secret cabal of some two hundred officers in the armed forces known as the Ordu Şurası (the council of the army)." This "powerful body" was said to include the chiefs of the air and naval staffs and to have the patronage, though not the actual membership, of Gen. Cevdet Sunay, the CGS. Four or five extremist members of the junta were also in it, and it was said to have high-placed civilian members in the ministries. It was primarily Ordu Şurası which insisted on the execution of Menderes, Zorlu and Polatkan and ruled out a government that did not include the Republican Party. (Economist, Oct 21)

NUC Ceases Existence. In accordance with the new constitution, the Constituent Assembly, and with it the NUC as its Upper House, legally ceased to exist with the inauguration of the newly-elected Grand National Assembly on Oct 25.

ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE OF POLITICAL PARTIES

Press Suggestion for Conference Endorsed by Gürsel. On April 28, the first anniversary of the students' demonstrations in Istanbul (MER 1960, p. 429), ten Istanbul newspapers published a joint proposal for an agreement between the political parties. A round-table conference of all parties should be convened under the chairmanship of President Gürsel to reach an overall agreement on Turkey's political future and the conduct of the forthcoming elections. The parties should also agree: (1) to remain loyal to the principles of Atatürk's reforms and to the new constitution; (2) not to follow the reactionary policies of the fallen regime; (3) to accept any sentences which might be passed on the former leaders by the Yassıada Court. Such an undertaking, the papers said, would create an atmosphere of confidence, which was a fundamental condition for the speedy establishment of a democratic regime.

The Times correspondent commented that the reason for this move appeared to be the anxiety felt in some quarters, not least the military junta itself, lest some political parties appeal to the large mass of supporters of the Menderes government, and lest, in free elections, a reactionary government be returned to power. (Cumhuriyet, April 28, 29; Times, May 3)

President Gürsel said the same day that this was "a most patriotic proposal," and that this was in his programme for the future (Cumhuriyet, April 29). When Gürsel was asked later if he intended to convene the conference, he said "after May 27" [the anniversary of the coup]. (Cumhuriyet, May 14)

Reaction of the Parties. This idea was endorsed by İsmail Rüstü Aksal, the RPP Secretary-General, Turhan Feyzioğlu of the RPP central committee, Bedrettin Ertensoy, leader of the Socialist Party, and by the Homeland Party.

Ekrem Alican, the NTP leader, said that his party would support any effort to put an end to political disputes—for the benefit of the state, but not for the benefit of the political parties.

The JP declared, in essence, that though there was no need for it, such a conference was feasible if the national interest required it and the President approved it. However, the party desired to include in the agenda the conduct of several parties which led to tension. (Cumhuriyet, April 29)

Osman Bölükbaşı, the RPNP leader, at first refused comment but on May 10 said that if the President called such a meeting, he would make his attitude public. He added that the party could not agree to the suggestion that the political parties confirm in advance the verdict to be issued at Yassıada and thus assume the status of some strange supreme court of appeal. As to the reforms of Atatürk, they were embodied in the party's programme. (Cumhuriyet, April 30, May 11)

Preparing the Conference. In Aug. [after some delays] an NUC sub-committee opened talks with the party leaders. The talks concentrated mostly on ways and means of guaranteeing completely free elections. The sub-committee, Milliyet wrote, dealt with the question as to whether the NUC should take steps to guarantee the security of elections and the security of the post-election regime. In the present tense atmosphere, the paper said, some security steps were necessary but, if they were imposed by the NUC, some politicians would make the voters believe that the elections had not been fair. To avoid this the politicians at the round table would most probably sign an undertaking to accept the conference decisions as binding. The party leaders also met Gen. Gürsel. (Hürriyet, Aug 18; Tanin, Aug 23; Milliyet, Aug 25; Cumhuriyet, Aug 24, 26)

The Conference; NUC Proposals. The conference took place from Aug 31 to Sept 3 behind closed doors. The parties participating were the RPP, the JP, the RPNP, the NTP and the Free Homeland Party, each represented by its SG and three other prominent members. Nine members of the NUC participated, one of them acting as chairman. The NUC suggested the following 12-point agreement, to be signed by the party leaders:

1-5, 12) The following issues to be kept out of political controversy—the May 27 revolution, the reforms, religion, the Yassıada trials and verdicts, the forestry problem, foreign policy; 6) No suspicion should be cast upon the legality, freedom and fairness of the forthcoming elections under the present regime; 7) The public service should be assured of stability, impartiality and continuity; 8) A common front should be formed, in the NUC spirit, against destructive trends such as revenge, spite, regionalism and separatism; 9) The principles included in the declaration should be adopted and applied by all party members; 10) It should be confirmed that the reestablishment of party branches in the villages would not be advisable for some time; 11) The parties should make it clear that they shared a spirit of common understanding, so that after the elections no political tension would harm the interests of the country.

This proposal was accepted as an agenda by the party representatives.

The first day of the conference was marked by heated exchanges between the parties. The JP and the NTP accused the RPP of trying to create the impression that the May 27 revolution was made by one group for the benefit of another group (presumably the RPP). The RPP representatives replied that the JP and the NTP were trying to sow seeds of dissension among the citizens.

The NUC press office denied any tension in the conference. (Turkish Press, Sept 1-5; R. Ankara, Sept 2 [5]; Times, Sept 4)

Joint Declaration Signed. The final meeting of the conference, on Sept 5, was attended by the party leaders and presided over by Gen. Gürsel. Members of the government, the NUC, the chiefs of staff of the three services, many high officials and members of the press were present.

This meeting had been postponed for two days as the RPNP representatives refused to sign on the grounds that they had not been given full powers by their party, and because Osman Bölükbaşı, the RPNP leader, refused to participate and to sign.

The declaration was signed on behalf of their parties by the following leaders: İsmet İnönü (RPP), Ekrem Alican (NTP), Enver Adakan (Homeland Party), Rağıp Gümüşpala (JP), and by Ahmet Öğüz (RPNP)—according to Ankara Radio, in the name of Bölükbaşı.

The declaration, called by the press a "national pact" (Millî Antlaşma), stated that the conference was convened on NUC initiative for the purposes of eliminating harmful disputes from political life and achieving a democratic state of law—"the noble aim of the May 27 revolution."

Authorized delegations of the parties had debated and unanimously approved the items of the agenda drafted by the NUC. There had been a complete identity of views at the conference. "We have, therefore, decided to sign this declaration in the presence of... Gen. Gürsel... and to proclaim it to the great Turkish nation as a document of undertaking."

The undersigned pledged themselves not to allow the May 27 revolution to be exploited for political purposes, for the Turkish armed forces used "the right of the nation" to resist an illegal government of oppression and tyranny; pledged themselves to protect Atatürk's reforms in accordance with the new constitution; pledged themselves to respect freedom of religion and conscience, not to wage propaganda likely to lead to doubt and hesitation, or to exploit religious feelings in any way;

pledged themselves not to make any statement likely to affect the decisions of the Supreme Court of Justice (Yassıada) nor to allow these decisions to be debated or exploited; expressed the belief that the NUC and the neutral administration would hold free and fair elections;

stated that it was natural to exercise the rights of objection, but unfounded arguments liable to "overcloud" the elections and to create doubt in the minds of the people were acts against the democratic order and national peace; pledged themselves to keep the administration and public services free of partisan interference; pledged themselves to oppose "the extreme Left, Communism, the extreme Right, racialism, and every form of totalitarian mentality, zonal division, separatist activities, animosity, feelings of revenge and subversive movements," as running counter to democratic and lay republican principles; agreed that the creation of a "front of enmity" of one party against another rendered the establishment of democratic order difficult, and created dangers to national unity and existence;

agreed that the question whether the district and sub-district party organizations should be revived or not should be left to the Assembly to be formed after the elections;

pledged themselves to reject any form of pernicious propaganda on the subject of forests;

stated that foreign policy, "which has assumed a national character, should not be the subject of disputes which might prejudice our national interests"; expressed the belief that to prevent political tension damaging to the country both before and after the elections, political parties should act in a civilized and sensible manner and regulate their relations, whether in power or in opposition, in accordance with the principles of democratic understanding; pledged themselves not to tolerate any attempt to violate these principles, which were based on the national interests. (R. Ankara, Sept 5 [8]; Turkish Press, Sept 6-7)

Condemnation of the Democratic Party. A further section of this declaration which condemned the deposed regime was only published by the NUC on Sept 16, the day after the Yassıada verdicts, on the grounds that it might have influenced the verdicts of the Court. In this section, the parties declared that they would not permit political exploitation of the May revolution, staged by the armed forces in compliance with the nation's willingness and right to resist a regime which, (a) after assuming power by free elections, attempted to eliminate political rivals and perpetuate its power at any cost, gradually deviating from the conception of freedom; (b) brought heavy pressure to bear on the press, universities, judiciary and public institutions which ensure democracy; (c) exploited religion for political purposes; (d) paved the way to the rejection of the [Atatürk] reforms, "the foundations of our civilized existence"; (e) caused social deterioration and harmed the country's financial prestige abroad by an inflationist, extravagant and planless policy and abuses; (f) attempted to use the army, "the symbol of our national existence," for its political ends; (g) increasingly prevented the expression of the national will through free elections; (h) employed the state radio and state property for party purposes; and (i) rendered the parliamentary right of control virtually ineffective, thus causing a deterioration into an illegal rule of tyranny and oppression.

"We vehemently reject all forms of behaviour which may tend to represent or sustain the Democratic Party ideology overthrown by the revolution and condemned by the national conscience." (R. Ankara, Sept 16 [19])

Presence of Army Chiefs Noted. The presence of the chiefs of staff of the three services at the signing ceremony was noted. "Few doubt that the politicians, by accepting a declaration so much limiting their activities, must have received a thinly-veiled warning from the military leaders." It was also thought symptomatic of the fact that the army had moved "more into political focus, and has to a large extent taken over the running of the country during the critical period of the trial, verdicts and elections." (Times, Sept 7, 21)

Round-Table Conference of the Press—Self-Censorship for Elections. The Turkish press, which warmly welcomed the results of the round-table conference, decided, at a conference held in Ankara on Sept 6, to undertake self-censorship for the period of the elections. The Minister of Radio, Press and Tourism was present, together with seven NUC members, one of whom presided. The editors signed a declaration in which they undertook: (1) to accept the joint declaration by the political leaders; (2) to criticize infringements of the declaration by party leaders; (3) to observe the 1960 press code of honour (see MER 1960, p 451); (4) to avoid sensational headlines and photographs, prejudicial to the elections; (5) not to publish declarations by political leaders liable to obscure public opinion, or harm democracy or the national interest; (6) to devote more space to economic and social questions; (7) to help in maintaining public order and in "explaining the motives of the revolution"; (8) to promote "national cohesion" and not become instruments of disruptive ideologies.

The Times correspondent wrote that this declaration was apparently considered necessary by the military authorities, though no penalties were provided for those who would infringe this form of self-censorship.

A delegation of editors and an NUC member presented a copy of the declaration to Gen. Gürsel who expressed his satisfaction at the declaration and the conduct of the press in general. (Cumhuriyet; Ulus; Hür Vatan, Sept 7, 8; Times, Sept 7)

Implementation of the Joint Declaration Discussed. On Sept 14, on the eve of the publication of the Yassıada verdicts, and again on Sept 16, Gen. Gürsel held meetings with the party leaders to discuss the implementation of the conference decisions, as well as pre-election topics. Osman Bölükbaşı, the RNP leader, did not participate. He accepted Gen. Gürsel's invitation to the first meeting but did not attend it; to the second meeting he was not invited. (Cumhuriyet; Onca, Sept 15, 17)

Resentment Within the Justice Party. Following the publication of the second part of the joint declaration, there were reports of mounting discord within the JP, especially in the Aegean region, the former stronghold of the DP. JP members there, it was reported, wished to replace Gümüşpala by Prof. Ali Fuat Başgil as leader of the party and called for the resignation of two leaders who had attended the conference, Party SG Şinasi Özma and Vice-President Cevdet Perin. Many JP members had left the party. In the Aegean region they joined the RNP, whose leader, Bölükbaşı, had refused to sign the declaration, in Antalia province, they joined the NTP.

Gümüşpala declared that the rumours of his resignation were unfounded and deplored allegations that he had been "sold out" at the round table conference. Milîyet believed that the reasons for this discontent were indignation at the Yassıada verdicts, since the party HQ had given assurances of a different verdict, and at the condemnation of the DP regime in the declaration.

It was also reported that the JP central executive council insisted on publishing the conference minutes. Gen. Günel said he saw no harm in such a step, though no reason for it either. (Cumhuriyet, Son Havadis; Milîyet, Sept 19, 20, 22)

TRIAL AND EXECUTION OF LEADERS OF OLD REGIME

The trials of DP leaders which opened in Oct 1960 at Yassıada (MER 1960, pp 454-8) continued until Aug 15. The final verdicts and sentences were given on Sept 15. Fifteen defendants were condemned to death. On Sept 16 the NUC confirmed the death sentences on Adnan Menderes, Fatih Zorlu and Hasan Polatkan; the last two were hanged the same day and Menderes the next day.

NOTE: Where, in the cases recorded below, no verdict is mentioned, the court decided to link the verdict to the central case of violation of the constitution, which was tried last.

Case of the Anti-Greek Riots of 1955 (see MER 1960, p 456). This trial ended on Jan 5. The Court withdrew the charge against Bayar and acquitted Prof. Fuat Köprülü (former Deputy PM and Foreign Minister), Prof. Fahrettin Kerim Gökay (former Governor of Istanbul) and all other defendants except Menderes, Zorlu and Kemal Hadımlı (former Governor of Istanbul), who were found guilty.

Irregular Currency Deals—the İpar Case (see MER 1960 p 457). This case was concluded on Jan 19. Zorlu and İpar were found guilty of irregular transactions, and Menderes, Polatkan, Erkem, Ataman and Berk of aiding and approving these transactions.

The Çanakkale (Geyikli) Case (see MER 1960, p 458). On Jan 24 the prosecutor altered the charge to violation of the constitution, on the ground that the incitement to attack opposition (RPP) deputies was part of a policy of suppressing democratic opposition; he asked for the death penalty for Menderes and the other three DP leaders. Menderes attributed the resort to violence on this occasion to the former Minister of the Interior (who, after the May revolution, committed suicide in prison).

On March 10 the court found all the defendants guilty.

Case of Attempt to Murder İnönü (see MER 1960, p 457). On Jan 28 the prosecutor altered the charge from attempted murder (which carried 20 years' imprisonment) to violation of the constitution (which carried the death penalty), on the ground that the alleged plot was part of a policy of suppressing the opposition; he demanded the death penalty for Bayar, Menderes and 13 other defendants, and heavy prison sentences for the remainder.

The accused denied that there had been any such plot and maintained that the crowd had gathered to greet a member of the government who was returning from abroad, and the rioting had reflected prevailing political tension.

Bayar, Menderes, Ethem Yetkiner (former governor of Istanbul), Kemal Aygün (former mayor of Istanbul), and 39 other persons were found guilty (April 17). Seventeen persons, including the former Generals Mecit Tokan and Namık Argüç, were acquitted; the latter, however, remained under detention on other charges.

Case of Menderes' Misuse of PM's Secret Fund (see MER 1960, p 458). On Feb 9 the Court found Menderes and Korur guilty on this count.

The Kayseri Case. On Jan 9 Bayar, Menderes, Ahmet Kinik, the former Governor of Kayseri province, two officials and eight DP deputies from Kayseri were put on trial on charge of violating the constitution by employing troops to prevent İnönü from attending the RPP congress in Kayseri in April 1960 (see MER 1960, p 428).

Kinik stated that Menderes had ordered him to prevent the congress from taking place and İnönü from reaching Kayseri. Menderes contended that Namık Gedik, his Minister of the Interior (who had committed suicide while under arrest), had given the order.

On April 20 the court found Bayar, Menderes, Kinik and the officials guilty. The former deputies were acquitted but remained under detention on other charges.

The "Demokrat İzmir" Case. On Jan 12 Menderes, Hadımlı (former governor of İzmir), Cemal Gökten (former Director-General of Security), İsmail Kuntay (former Assistant Director of Security in Ankara), four former DP deputies and 20 DP members from İzmir were put on trial on charge of inciting a mob on May 2, 1959, to burn down the offices of the opposition newspaper Demokrat İzmir.

All pleaded not guilty. The prosecution demanded the death penalty for 18 of the accused, including Menderes, on the ground that the riot was part of a deliberate policy of destroying the freedom of the press, and therefore constituted a violation of the constitution. On March 11 the court found Menderes, Hadımlı and 13 other persons guilty; 13 persons were acquitted.

The Case of the Student Riots—April 1960. On Feb 2, 117 persons were put on trial and charged with offences in connection with the student demonstrations at Istanbul and Ankara universities on April 28 and 29, 1960, when police used firearms within the university precincts and one student lost his life and others were wounded (see MER 1960, p 420). The defendants included Bayar, Menderes, all the members of the last Menderes Cabinet, the CGS Gen. Rüştü Erdelhan and a number of generals, the governors and mayors of Istanbul and Ankara, the chief of police and police officers and policemen in the two cities, as well as physicians from Istanbul.

Police officers gave evidence that they had been attacked by about 1,000 students and had been obliged to fire into the air for fear of being lynched. Medical witnesses differed on whether the student was killed by a direct shot or by a ricochet; the policeman accused of shooting him maintained that he had fired into the air.

The trial soon ranged widely over the whole political situation during the last months of the Menderes government. A letter written after the demonstrations by Gen. Gürsel, then Commander of the Land Forces, to the Defence Minister (see MER 1960, p 430) was read in court. Menderes and other ministers claimed that they had not seen the letter and beard of it only after the coup. Extracts were read from notes taken by Abdullah Aker, a former minister, during Cabinet meetings on proposals to suppress the opposition. Semi Ergin, former Minister of Communications, told the court that at that time Bayar had headed a faction in the government which wished to suppress the opposition, whereas Menderes had favoured moderation. Bayar, he said, had given orders to suppress the demonstration by "brutal methods" and had also advocated the employment of the army for this purpose. This was denied by Bayar, who added: "I have always been against army intervention in politics, and I am still against this today."

Lütfi Kırdar, former Minister of Health, collapsed and died of heart failure on Feb 17 while being interrogated by the judge.

The prosecutor asked for death sentences for 44 of the 116 remaining defendants, including: Bayar, Menderes, the whole Menderes cabinet and Gen. Erdelhan. On July 27 the court found Bayar, Menderes and 67 other defendants guilty; 47 were acquitted.

Cases of Illegal Expropriation in Istanbul. On April 17 the court heard a new case against Menderes; four of his ministers; Mümtaz Tarhan and Ethem Yetkiner, two former governors of Istanbul; Kemal Aygün, a former mayor of Istanbul, and Kemal Hadimli, former governor of Izmir, who were charged with unlawfully evicting citizens of Istanbul from their homes in order to carry out road improvements, without providing either adequate compensation or alternative accommodation. The defendants pleaded not guilty. All except Menderes contended they had acted on Menderes' instructions. Menderes claimed that the improvements involving the expropriation had been absolutely necessary; he did not know that there had been no compensation.

On June 3 the court found Menderes and Aygün guilty; the others were acquitted, but except for Tarhan remained under detention on other charges.

The "Patriotic Front" Case. On April 27 Menderes, Koraltan and 20 members of the DP Central Executive Council, among them ministers and deputies, were put on trial on the charge of unconstitutionally establishing an organization known as the Patriotic Front (Vatan Cephesi) [a front organization] "with the aim of... annihilating organizations defending democracy... to which end it was granted vast powers and means and exempted from all restrictions and control; and thus an apparatus of oppression was created." The prosecutor said the aim was to bring about absolute DP rule and demanded the death sentences for all defendants except one.

On June 21 Menderes and 18 other persons were found guilty. Three were acquitted but remained under detention on other charges.

The Main Case: Violation of the Constitution. The trial opened on May 11. The defendants, Bayar, Menderes and 396 former ministers and deputies, were charged with violating the constitution and attempting to set up a dictatorial regime. The indictment had been read at the opening session on Oct 14 1960 (see MER 1960, p 455).

Questioned on the confiscation in 1954 of large properties belonging to the RPP, namely the popular education centres known as the People's Houses (Halkokulleri) established under Atatürk, Menderes and others replied that the RPP, when in power, had itself appropriated this property from the state, and violated the constitution. This was rectified by the return of the property to the state.

Questioned on the demotion of Kırşehir province to district status after the province had voted against the DP in the 1954 elections (MER 1960, p 455), Bayar, Menderes and others replied that this decision had been taken for "geographical and psychological" reasons. Menderes did not reply when reminded that he had admitted previously that this measure had been a "political error."

The evidence included notes taken at DP meetings by ministers, deputies and others to prove the party's intention to suppress the opposition and to set up a dictatorial regime. Notes made by Etem Menderes, the former Minister of Defence, quoted Adnan Menderes as saying, "I shall never abandon power even if threatened by force of arms." Adnan Menderes denied having made this statement. Other defendants also denied the accuracy of such notes concerning them. Zorlu admitted having advocated the dissolution of the RPP, but said that this had often been proposed inside the DP ruling group and named two other deputies who, he said, had made the same proposal.

Şevki Erker, a former DP deputy from Erzurum, was released on May 16, after it had been established that he had objected to such proposals at the DP meetings.

Experts on constitutional law were divided as to whether the laws concerning the Committee of Inquiry Into the Activities of the Opposition (MER 1960, pp 428-9) were unconstitutional. The evidence was of the highest importance as these laws were regarded as the principal violation of the constitution by the Menderes regime. Prof. Ali Fuat Başgil held that a law passed by a parliamentary majority could not be unconstitutional, though its subsequent application might be so; he stated that when asked by Bayar and Menderes whether the laws were constitutional, he had replied that they were legally sound but politically unwise, and that the government had better resign. Other professors of law held that some or all of the measures concerned had been unconstitutional. The defendants maintained that the charge could not be considered proven when experts had given conflicting testimony.

Statements by Bayar and Menderes. Speaking in his own defence, ex-President Bayar said: "When I entered public life just before the Young Turks revolution of 1908, I was warned about the risks. I was told I might end up before the firing squad or on the gallows. Both risks I accept." After declaring that "the services I have rendered my country are written in Turkey's history," he recalled his long association with Atatürk and the many high posts, including those of PM and President, which he had held. "Now I am 78," he continued, "I have nothing further to expect in life. I know that revolutions mean that human rights and lives have to be set aside, but if I had thought that this was a revolutionary court I should never have bothered to address it. [The trials were subject to the penal code.] Consult your consciences well and... try to render impartial judgement."

Menderes said that only since Atatürk's death had conditions been favourable for the growth of a democratic regime. He suggested that the elections held in 1946 under İnönü's presidency (the first two-party elections held in Turkey) had been falsified, and asked: "Were there no violations of the constitution before 1950, or was there no constitution?" He denied that he had made any attempt to set up a dictatorship, and said that relations with the army would have made any such attempt impossible, as "we had no contact with the army, from the topmost general to the lowest private."

Defence Statement. A joint statement submitted to the court by 97 of the defence counsel, representing 231 defendants, maintained that the legitimacy of the May 27 revolution derived not from the guilt of the accused, but from the armed forces' obligation to intervene in politics to prevent civil war between the political parties. Thus the fact that the revolution took place did not automatically imply the guilt of the members of the former regime. Speaking of the extraordinary phenomenon of a whole parliamentary majority being put on trial, the document said: "In the history of democracy, many cases have been seen of laws being sent to a constitutional court for annulment, but this is the first time that we have ever seen the legislators themselves sent up in a body for trial"; one of the defence counsel added that this was equivalent to condemning the majority of the electorate.

This trial (for violation of the constitution) ended on Aug 11; the verdict was postponed.

The Concluding Session. On Aug 14 a general session was held in the presence of all the 633 defendants including those who had been previously acquitted. Salim Başol, president of the court, announced that the court had decided to go into recess for a month to consider its verdict and sentences, which would be pronounced on Sept 15. A number of defendants availed themselves of the final opportunity to speak briefly or present written petitions.

In all, 19 separate cases were heard, of which one was dropped—the case of the flour mill deals (MER 1960, p 457). There had been 278 sessions in 203 days, at which 1,068 witnesses had given evidence. The prosecution had asked for 228 death sentences, including death sentences on eight charges for Menderes and on four for Bayar.

Deaths Among the Defendants. During the trials, four defendants died: Lütfi Kırdar, a former minister (on the demonstrations during his funeral, see p 543 a); Gazi Yiğitbaşı, retired General Nuri Yamut and Kenan Yılmaz, all former DP deputies (Türkiye Yılı, 1962). At the end of the year, the former Minister of Public Works, Tefvik İleri, died of cancer. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 1, 1962)

Menderes' Defence Counsel Tried. The two defence counsels for Menderes, Talât Asal and Burhan Apaydın, who had been arrested in Dec 1960 (MER 1960, p 458), were released on bail in Feb and March respectively. In June they were brought to trial, before the Istanbul Martial Law Court together with a journalist who was charged with having aided Apaydın in publishing the pamphlet. Apaydın and the journalist were sentenced to 11 months and 23 days imprisonment; Asal was acquitted. (Cumhuriyet, June 13)

SENTENCES AND EXECUTIONS: POLITICAL REPERCUSSIONS

Comments on Trials Banned. On Aug 21 a statement on the trials by Osman Bölükbaşı, the RNP leader, was censored at the last minute. He was reported to have said that it would be best for Turkey if the bloodless revolution were kept bloodless, and that if the court were to hand down death sentences, the NUC should not confirm them.

The same day, the NUC issued a decree, signed by Gürsel, banning all oral or written comment liable to influence the Yassıada court or excite and confuse public opinion. There ensued, The Times correspondent wrote on Sept 14, "an uncanny silence on the subject."

On Sept 5 the political parties agreed in the round-table conference not to challenge or discuss the forthcoming verdicts and sentences. The following day, the newspapers reached an agreement to the same effect (see p 558 b).

On Sept 13 it was announced that no authority or person was authorized to issue reports on the verdicts except the NUC liaison office. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 22, 23, Sept 6, 7, 14; Times, Aug 22, 23, Sept 14)

Security Measures. Strictest security measures were taken throughout Turkey on the eve of the judgement. (Cumhuriyet; Hür Vatan; Times, Sept 14, 15)

On Sept 15 the NUC warned the public against "certain rumours apt to hurt awareness" and "prejudice the NUC's legal authority"; the communiqué assured the nation that the NUC would "use its lawful authority... without being influenced by any factor save their conscience and in the manner best suited to the interests of the nation." (R. Ankara, Sept 15 [18]; Cumhuriyet, Sept 16)

Appeals From Abroad For Clemency. Before the sentences were announced, the representatives of the majority of the NATO countries, as well as of Sweden, Switzerland and India, informed the Turkish government of their hope that there would be no death sentences. The UK Ambassador handed a personal message to this effect from PM Macmillan to Gen. Gürsel. (Keatings' Contemporary Archives, 1961/2, p 18377A)

Verdict on Case of Violation of Constitution, Death Sentences. On Sept 15 the court announced that 352 defendants out of 398 charged with violation of the constitution had been found guilty.

During the same session, the court announced the sentences.

Bayar, Menderes, Zorlu and Polatkan were unanimously condemned to death; 11 other defendants were condemned to death by a majority of the judges: Refik Koralan, Ağah Erozan and İbrahim Kırakoğlu (former president and vice-presidents of the Assembly respectively); Gen. Rüşü Erdelhan (the former CGS), Emin Kalafat (a former minister and member of the DP executive council), Osman Kavrakoğlu (a former deputy who promoted the formation of the parliamentary investigation committee), Ahmet Hamdi Sancar, Nurettin Kırıçoğlu and Bahadır Dülger (chairman and members of that committee), Zeki Erataman and Baha Akjir (former DP deputies).

Thirty-one defendants were sentenced to life imprisonment with hard labour, including Medeni Berk (the former Deputy PM), Celal Yardımcı, Tevfik İleri, İzzet Akçal (all former ministers), Ethem Yetkiner (the former governor of İstanbul), Kemal Aygün (the former mayor of İstanbul), and former DP deputies and prominent leaders.

Four hundred eighteen defendants received prison terms ranging from six months to 20 years, 123 were acquitted, and five cases were dropped for insufficient evidence.

The highest fine was imposed by the court on Ali İpar, the shipowner, who, in addition to two years' imprisonment, was fined £T 26,790,285. Menderes did not appear in court; he was believed to have taken an overdose of sleeping tablets in an attempt to commit suicide. (Cumhuriyet; Times; NYT, Sept 16)

Death Sentences on Menderes, Zorlu, Polatkan Confirmed by NUC; Executed. The following day, Sept 16, the NUC announced that it had confirmed the death sentences on Bayar, Menderes, Zorlu and Polatkan, but had commuted Bayar's sentence to life imprisonment on account of his age. The other death sentences were also commuted to life imprisonment. (R. Ankara, Sept 16 [18])

Fatın Rüştü Zorlu and Hasan Polatkan were hanged on Sept 16, on the prison island of İmralli, in the Sea of Marmara. The execution of Adnan Menderes was postponed owing to his illness. Meanwhile numerous attempts were made to secure his reprieve. The British and French ambassadors approached the Foreign Minister, Sarper; Pope John XXIII sent an appeal for clemency to Gen. Gürsel; İnönü and other leading public figures also interceded for him at the request of Menderes' wife who had been refused permission to see Gen. Gürsel—but all to no avail. After five doctors had certified that he was in normal health, Menderes was taken to İmralli and hanged on Sept 17. (Türkiye Yılı, 1962; Cumhuriyet, Sept 17-18; Times, Sept 18)

Those sentenced to prison terms were transferred to the prison at Kayseri in central Anatolia. (Cumhuriyet, Sept 18, 23)

Speculation on Motives for Executions; Army Pressure; Justifying the Coup; Warning to Deviators From Path of Reform Movement. There were no comments in Turkey owing to the ban on all public discussions.

The Times correspondent wrote that until only a few days before the sentences it had been thought that a spirit of mercy and moderation was prevailing in the ruling circles, but a sudden hardening seemed to have taken place. It was reliably reported that there was no majority in favour of executions in the NUC, but the army and air force, especially younger officers, reportedly threatened to take direct action if their demands for executions were not met. The NUC was finally obliged to compromise with three executions. The army's attitude was believed to have been due to growing anxiety at recent activities of political parties. The executions were thought to be intended as a warning to "so-called reactionary elements" that subversive activities would not be tolerated. (Times, Sept 19, 21; see also Observer, Sept 24)

The Economist and Dana Adams Schmidt writing in The New York Times thought that the executions as well as the reprieves were a matter of practical political considerations. To commute all sentences could have been considered as a disavowal of the military coup. If on the other hand the committee had shown no mercy at all, it would have been accused by many Turks of carrying out a blood bath. Thus a majority of the NUC arrived at the following compromise: the sentence on President Celal Bayar, aged 78, could be commuted to life imprisonment in view of his age (though the committee had itself abrogated a law which in the past excluded capital punishment for persons over 65—see MER 1960, p 455). Eleven of the others could be spared on the ground that the high court's decisions in their case had not been unanimous. Menderes had to be executed as the principal defendant, the man who had inspired the abuses of power which violated the guarantees given in the Turkish constitution. Zorlu and Polatkan had to be executed because they were prime symbols of corruption, men who had greatly enriched themselves while in office.

The Economist added that the Turks had had only a brief 40 years in which to accept a new identity as a nation-state. There had been no deep yearning for more modern ways except among an educated, westernized minority. "The Turks have had change and reform thrust upon them and they have not always been pleased. Kemal Atatürk tried to propel them forward by administering a series of symbolic shocks, like the abrupt prohibition of the fez. His successors in Gen. Gürsel's military junta staged the Yassıada trials, partly no doubt to justify their own coup, but partly also to teach the Turkish people in the most dramatic possible way how their rulers should not behave." (Economist, Sept 23; NYT, Sept 24)

Government Resigns in Protest? On Sept 18, the day after Menderes' execution, the whole cabinet submitted its resignation but were prevailed upon by Gen. Gürsel to withdraw the resignations on the following day. Officially, the resignation was designed to enable the formation of a transitional government for the election period but unofficially it was reported that this was a protest against the executions. (Cumhuriyet; Times, Sept 19, 20)

Intelligentsia Debates Issue; Menderes Regime. Reporting on Turkish public opinion, D. A. Schmidt distinguished between the reactions of the urban intelligentsia and officers' corps on the one hand and the Turkish peasants on the other. It was only in the two former groups, he wrote, who were the most progressive forces in Turkey, that anything like a debate on the merits of the case had taken place. Legal arguments showing that the defendants were guilty under article 146 of the criminal code providing penalties up to death for "attempting by force to change, replace or abrogate" the Turkish constitution were countered by those who argued that under the constitution the National Assembly, which approved the Menderes regime's actions, was the sole arbiter of what was or was not constitutional.

What the westernized elite in the towns and the armed forces really resented was that the Menderes regime used for its own political purposes the reactionary forces in the country, particularly the forces demanding a return to Islam. This charge was refuted by Menderes supporters who insisted that popular reaction against Kemalist reforms had begun before they took over in 1950 and that a democratic regime must follow the tide of public opinion. (NYT, Sept 24)

Public Reaction in General. The people, The Times correspondent wrote, seemed to be "either stunned or completely unmoved," for the following reasons: (a) "the Turks are an undemonstrative people"; (b) martial law; (c) the ban on all public discussion of the trials, on pain of severe penalties. The people kept their thoughts to themselves. (Times, Sept 19, 21)

The peasants, D. A. Schmidt wrote, conservative if not reactionary, retained a bright image of Menderes as their friend, a man who taxed the townspeople so as to raise the price of wheat. "To them execution of their idol was an offence calling for vengeance, if not physically, in the vendetta tradition, certainly in the political arena." (NYT, Sept 24)

On Nov 7 the Mevlüt [a requiem mass held 40 days after a death] was read in memory of Menderes by DP partisans in the town of Sakarya. Cumhuriyet reported that the Mevlüt had all the aspects of a political demonstration rather than a religious ceremony; crowds unable to find seats in the mosque followed the ceremony in the streets through loud speakers, and local papers advertised the event with banner-headlines.

The [pro-JP] Son Havadis denied that the ceremony had had political overtones. The paper added: "The new regime set up the... [Yassıada] court, and the hangmen executed the three persons who were convicted by this court. We left them on Yassıada, some of us cried, some of us rejoiced and the curtain fell." The dead should be left alone, once and for all. (Cumhuriyet, Nov 8; Son Havadis, Nov 9)

Repercussions in General Elections and Formation of Government, see below.

THE GENERAL ELECTIONS

The general elections took place on Oct 15.

THE ELECTORAL LAWS

Preparation and Approval of the Electoral Laws. The Electoral Law Committee of the Constituent Assembly under the chairmanship of Sefik Inan (see p 547 b), completed its work on Feb 10 and submitted the draft laws to the House. They were:

1. law on the referendum on the constitution (for which see above);
2. law on fundamental provisions of the electoral procedure and the roll of electors (Seçimlerin temel hükümleri ve seçmen kütükleri hakkında kanun), which would be applicable to elections for the Assembly, provincial and municipal councils, and for the councils of elders of town suburbs and villages;
3. law on elections to the Senate. (Cumhuriyet Senatosu üyelerinin seçim kanunu);
4. law on elections to the House (Milletvekili seçim Kanunu).

The House debated the second of these laws between March 8 and April 6. Major subjects in the debate were the minimum voting age and the voting rights of regular army personnel. The law was approved on April 26 and came into force on May 2.

The third and fourth laws were approved on May 27, after a heated debate on the election system, and came into force on May 30. (For sources see below.)

The Minimum Voting Age. The electoral committee proposed a minimum voting age of 18 years as compared with 22 years under the former law. This would have increased the number of eligible voters by about two million and was held likely to work in favour of the RPP since a large proportion of the younger people were expected to vote for that party. The House approved this proposal but the NUC, in its capacity as the Upper House, rejected it and suggested instead a minimum voting age of 21 years; this was accepted. (For sources see below.)

Voting Rights of Regular Army Personnel. Retired officers, members of the House, opposed the proposal that army officers and regular NCOs be granted voting rights; they demanded that the army be kept completely out of politics as in the past. Others rejected the claim that voting would involve the army in politics. On April 6 the House adopted the proposal (Art. 7 of the law No 2 above) by 163 to 38 with four abstentions. The NUC also approved it. Conscripts were denied the right to vote. (For sources, see below.)

Composition of Electoral Council; Elections Under Judicial Control. The new constitution provided that elections would be controlled by the judicial authorities; the Electoral Law provided for the organization of that control. Elections would be conducted by electoral councils headed by the supreme electoral council of judges. Provincial electoral councils would consist of the three highest-ranking judges of the province concerned. District electoral councils would be presided over by judges, and their members would be teachers elected by the teachers of the district. Polling committees (one for every 300-400 electors) would consist of a chairman and four local citizens. The electoral rolls would be prepared by officials under the control of the judges. [In addition to the council members mentioned] political parties participating in the election would have one representative each on each of the provincial and district electoral councils. (For sources, see below.)

Participation of Political Parties in the Elections. The electoral law provided that only political parties, which had organized branches in at least 15 provinces and in all of their districts six months before the election, would be able to appear in the elections. (For sources, see below.)

Elections to the Senate. For the elections of the 150 senators the majority representative system was adopted. Each province would become an election circuit except for Ankara, İstanbul and İzmir, which would be divided into three circuits each. Each province would elect at least one member. As the term of the Senate was six years, one third of the Senators to be elected every two years, the provinces were divided into three groups, each to elect 50 senators. After two years, lots would be drawn between groups A and B, and the losing group would hold new elections. Two years later, lots would be drawn between the two remaining groups.

Proportional System for Election to the House of Representatives. For the elections to the House, the electoral committee suggested proportional representation according to the system evolved by Prof. d'Hondt of Belgium, which had been accepted by several North European countries. A suggestion in Committee to use split ballots was rejected as incompatible with this system. In the debate in the House, some members claimed that the proportional representation system had led to Mussolini's dictatorship and demanded the employment of the small county system. Other members urged the use of the majority system as in the elections to the Senate, possibly, so wrote The Times correspondent, in view of the danger that minority parties, especially those representing supporters of the former DP, might gain too much strength. The Committee members replied that the small county system was unsuitable for Turkey and would give rise to many dangers, and that the majority system also could lead to a dictatorship.

The Assembly adopted the proportional representation system at province level. (Cumhuriyet, Jan 28, Feb 11, 15, March 9, 23, 28, April 6, 7, 8, 13, 22, 27, May 3, 10, 11, 13, 16, 20, 29-31; Türkiye Yılıgi, 1962; Times, March 13, 17, April 10, 12; R. Ankara, Feb 27 [March 1], March 10 [14])

PREPARATIONS

Election Date. On July 21 the Constituent Assembly decided to hold general elections on Oct 15. It had already been reported in March that the NUC and the government had decided on this date. (Cumhuriyet, March 29, July 22)

Preparing the Elections. On May 3 the 11 members of the Supreme Electoral Council were elected from among the members of the Court of Appeal (6) and of the Council of State (5) by the members of these institutions, as prescribed by the electoral law. The next day the council members took the oath and elected Recai Seçkin (President of the Court of Appeal) as their president. (Cumhuriyet, May 4, 5)

On May 6 the Minister of the Interior instructed the province governors to prepare the electoral rolls with the greatest zeal and care. (Cumhuriyet, May 7)

Political Parties Licensed For Elections. In June and July the Supreme Electoral Council confirmed that the RPP, RPNP, JP and the NTP had completed the establishment of their branches in 15 provinces and in all their districts, as prescribed by the electoral law, and therefore were entitled to send representatives to the electoral councils and to appear in the elections. The Council rejected the application of the Free Homeland Party on the ground that the party had not completed the organization of its branches as prescribed by law. (Cumhuriyet, June 8, July 16, 27, Sept 23)

NUC Manoeuvres To Restrict Election Campaign. According to the Electoral Law, the election campaign was to begin 35 days before the election date.

On Aug 11 the House of Representatives decided to reduce the period to 30 days so that the campaign would start only after the Yassıada verdicts which were due to be given on Sept 15. It was also decided to ban discussion of the Yassıada trials during the campaign. (Cumhuriyet, Aug 11, 12)

Two weeks later, on Aug 25, the House reduced the campaign period again, to 21 days. The bill, prepared by the NUC, was passed after a heated debate by 109 votes to 58, with seven abstentions. (Cumhuriyet; Yeni Sabah, Aug 26)

During the same period, there were reports that the NUC was preparing an amendment to the Electoral Law, forbidding mention in the election campaign of "deeds and activities of parties and individuals, prior to Jan 6, 1961." The political parties protested vehemently and there were rumours that several deputies had threatened to resign their mandates. The NUC claimed that it had never prepared such a bill. Finally, Gen. Sıtkı Ulay declared that the parties had "given us their word of honour" that "they are ready to take the test of the elections" and such a law was no longer needed. (Cumhuriyet; Kudret; Milliyet, Aug 16-27)

Security Provisions. On Sept 2 the House passed a law, submitted by five NUC members and seven House members, providing for the immediate arrest and trial of all persons committing offences against the revolutions (of Atatürk and of May 27, 1960), the head of State, the NUC and the Council of Ministers, during the period immediately before and after the forthcoming elections. The law came into immediate effect and was to be in force for two months after the new government resulting from the elections had been installed in power. (Cumhuriyet; Milliyet, Sept 3-4; Times, Sept 4)

On election day (Oct 15) the Martial Law Commander of İstanbul announced that prosecutions in respect to all "election offences" throughout the election campaign until voting ended on the evening of Oct 15 were the province of the public prosecutor's office, thus keeping the armed forces out of political controversy. Thereafter, all violations of public order would be dealt with by the Martial Law Command, as before the election campaign.

The following day the Martial Law Commander of Ankara notified the public that pre-election propaganda activities were at an end and henceforth propaganda, demonstrations and processions likely to disturb the peace were forbidden. (R. Ankara, Oct 15, 16 [18]; Cumhuriyet, Oct 16)

Ensuring Impartiality of the Administration. On Sep 8, the PM's Office sent a circular to all governmental departments and public institutions stating that in order to ensure elections "within the democratic principles" all those concerned should faithfully abide by the laws pertaining to the elections and all civil servants, employees of state economic enterprises and other government and public organizations should refrain from participating in election propaganda in order to preserve impartiality. "Managers of institutions and factories serving the public" were held responsible for ensuring that no propaganda activity took place on their premises. (Milliyet; Cumhuriyet, Sept 9)

An order to the governors, directing them to ensure that all government employees observe strict impartiality, was issued on the eve of the election campaign. (R. Ankara, Sept 23 [26])

THE ELECTION CAMPAIGN

The election campaign was officially opened on Sept 24, twenty one days before the general elections. There were public meetings, radio broadcasts and gatherings in coffee houses, which stayed open all night. On the whole the election campaign was free of incidents. Several JP members were arrested for violating the law. Before the campaign opened the chairman of the National Students' Federation, the Chief of the General Staff and the President—in that order—broadcast messages to the people.

"Students The Chief Protectors of Democratic Order." On Sept 14 the chairman of the National Students' Federation broadcast to the people, stressing the need to abandon feelings of spite and rancour and to prepare for a prosperous future. He expressed his hope that the political parties would remain loyal to their joint declaration and, when in power, would no longer "be able to deviate" from the constitution. He added that the forces which had cooperated in bringing about the revolution, headed by the students, would continue to defend it and the new democratic order. He praised the other revolutionary forces, the press and especially the armed forces, the nation's "last hope."

He called upon the students to follow events with restraint as it appeared that "the heaviest tasks during the coming era will again rest on the... shoulders of the Turkish university students." (R. Ankara, Sept 14 [16])

General Sunay: The Army Restored Democracy. In a broadcast on Sept 19, Gen. Cevdet Sunay, Chief of the General Staff, said that in the May revolution the armed forces had rescued the nation from "the illegal actions of a dictatorial mentality," and opened the way to democracy. The final stage, elections, had now been reached. The armed forces, which made the May 27 revolution together with the nation, its intellectuals, its youth and the press, had never departed from the path leading to a democratic régime, and had supported the NUC and the government to this end. They would continue to perform their duty of protecting the country against internal and external dangers. (R. Ankara, Sept 19 [22]; Öncü, Sept 20)

Cumhuriyet commented that the army had always kept aloof from political ambitions and expressed the hope that the politicians would take to heart the statement that the army would continue to guard against all internal and external dangers: if the people went astray, they would find the armed forces once more on the march. (Cumhuriyet, Sept 21)

Gürel Warns People To Beware of Enemies of Democracy. Gen. Gürel broadcast twice, on Sept 20 and on Sept 23, on the eve of the opening of the election campaign. In his first message Gürel asked the people to beware of "the arch-enemies of our country," agitators who were trying to turn the people against each other and thus delay elections.

In his second broadcast, Gürel called the people to listen to the advice of "a man who thinks of nothing but his country's security" before listening to the speakers of the political parties. He asked the people to "listen to all the speeches with patience, dignity and maturity... even if the speakers tell lies and you do not believe what they say" and not to allow themselves to be provoked. The people should bear in mind that they would be voting for persons who, if elected, "will either destroy or brighten your future as well as that of the nation." The elections would be absolutely fair, and the people should not be misled by rumours.

Gürel called upon the party leaders to refrain from provocative speeches and from exploiting religious sentiments, belittling the reforms, and attempting to deceive the people. He concluded by saying: "The forces of evil, which have exerted every effort to secure a 'No' vote on the constitution, which embodies all the human rights and dignity for the Turkish nation, should not be given a chance to mingle with us..." (R. Ankara, Sept 20, 23, [22, 26]; Hürriyet, Sept 21, 24)

The Party Platforms. On Sept 30 the parties, except for the Justice Party, broadcast their platforms.

Platform of Republican People's Party. İsmet İnönü, leader of the RPP, said the party would enact legislation for the proper functioning of all institutions covered by the new constitution; establish a constitutional court; plan investment and combat inflation; increase investment in the state economic institutions and encourage private enterprise; reform the taxation system in keeping with social justice; plan agricultural development and increase production to raise the peasants' standards; industrialize rapidly and support small artisans and industrialists; remedy the education situation by making the teaching profession more attractive; disseminate the principles of social justice; give attention to "labour problems," reform working conditions, health and social security, reorganize syndicalism in accordance with the new laws; improve communications and transport; seek a favourable foreign trade balance and encourage exports; improve service conditions in the armed forces and equip them with new weapons. In foreign policy, "alliance with the western democracies is our great principle... This is by no means an obstacle to our maintaining good relations with our neighbours." (R. Ankara, Sept 30 [Oct 6])

Platform of Republican Peasants' National Party. Ahmet Ögüz, deputy leader of the RPNP, said the party would keep the administration free of party influence and would govern democratically, improve economic, cultural and scientific standards, respect expert knowledge and scientific development programmes, resist monopolies, prevent waste and combat corruption. In order to encourage economic development, it would seek long-term credits, domestic and foreign, encourage exports, and develop the tourist industry, it would increase agricultural productivity by irrigation works, credits, use of fertilizers, land distribution, crop price policy, writing off some agricultural debts, development of livestock and of the eastern and southern provinces, prevention of livestock smuggling on the southern border and improvement of forests. It would favour free enterprise and seek to hand over state economic enterprise to it, review the commercial activities of the Land Produce Office and the meat-fish establishment and the law tending to protect recalcitrant debtors, abolish taxation of minimum earnings and taxes which hampered trade, review wage levels according to employers' ability to pay and the cost-of-living index. It regarded the right to strike as an essential element of social justice; it favoured a social health scheme but regarded this as a long-term aim and felt that the free practice of medicine should be preserved. [There was no mention of foreign affairs.] (R. Ankara, Sept 30 [Oct 6])

Platform of New Turkey Party. Ekrem Alican, leader of the NTP, said that the party's first duty was to introduce a stable investment policy. A fundamental reform of agriculture was essential. Agricultural investment and productivity must be multiplied. Relations between the state economic sector and private enterprise must be reconciled. Private enterprise was fundamental to the country's economic development and should be encouraged. The flow of foreign capital and technical knowledge into the country must be encouraged. The peasants' standard of living must be raised to increase their consumption and thus provide a basis for economic expansion. The state of education was unsatisfactory since 16,000 villages lacked schools and over 2 million children had no access to elementary education. Freedom of religion and conscience were basic human rights; religion should be separated from politics. [There was no mention of foreign affairs.] (R. Ankara, Sept 30 [Oct 6])

Regarding labour, İhsan Şerif Dura said that the party's aim was the equitable distribution of national income. It would give priority to full employment by diverting at least 15-20% of the national income to investment, extend social insurance to all workers, introduce full health insurance by stages, and adjust old age pensions to the cost of living, provide homes for workers and put agricultural workers under state protection. It would recognize the right to strike. (R. Ankara, Oct 2 [6])

Justice Party. No official JP platform was quoted in the sources available to the editor. Various party spokesmen advocated the re-establishment of democracy, support for private enterprise, ending of discrimination between the urban and the rural sectors, support for the right to work, productive use of manpower, harmony in labour relations, ensuring a high standard of living for all citizens, decentralization of the administration, recognition of the right to strike, introduction of collective labour agreements and unemployment insurance, brotherhood and tolerance among political parties. (R. Ankara, Sept 30-Oct 3 [Oct 6])

Foreign comments stressed the similarity of the various party programmes. They were "not very interesting. They all promise social advance in freedom, reduction of taxes, and a better life for everybody." (Times, Oct 13; see also Daily Telegraph, Oct 13)

Justice Party Members Arrested. During the first two weeks of the election campaign, some 26 persons, apparently mostly or all JP members, were detained for having been too free in their criticism, and for praising the DP leaders and regime. Amongst them were the following JP leaders: Gen. Mehmet Ali Aytaç of İzmir, for stating that "they" had made a martyr of Menderes, that Zorlu and Polatkan were heroes, and that nobody had ever matched the achievements of the DP administration; Muhtetin Güven of İstanbul, for declaring: "Just look at my eyes and you will know what I am trying to convey"; and Nebahat Aslan, also of İstanbul, who spoke to the public "on behalf of the İzmir Democrats." (Kudret; Öncü, Sept 30, Oct 1; NYT, Oct 13)

Tahsin Demiray, deputy leader of the JP, in his broadcast on Oct 1 complained of these detentions and said that JP leaders were being followed and reported on. He indicated that "the methods of the old days still prevail." (R. Ankara, Oct 1 [6])

Bülükbay and the Yassıada Verdicts: His Attacks on Gürsel, Osman Bölükbaş, the RPNP leader, and Ragıp Gümüşpala, the JP leader [who both competed for the Democratic Party vote], conducted a campaign of mutual recriminations (see e.g. Son Havadis; Kudret, Sept 25). Gümüşpala criticized Bölükbaş's refusal to participate in the round-table conference. Bölükbaş answered that he had not attended, as it was against his principles to make a judgement which was liable to influence the verdicts of the Yassıada Court. (R. Ankara, Oct 2 [6]; Yeni Sabah, Oct 3)

On Oct 3 Gen. Gürsel, speaking of "some politicians," said: "The leniency which we show seems to serve them well." He said Bölükbaş had acted "in an unethical manner" and his speech was an abuse of the free radio facilities. He added that he had telephoned [Ankara] "but it was too late. The radio authorities should have made him shut up and thrown him out... It has happened once, it shall not happen again." (Öncü, Oct 4)

The NUC again published the text of the joint declaration, with the comment that as the declaration bore the signature of all party leaders or official representatives, there was no excuse for any of them to violate the promises made. (Cumhuriyet, Oct 4)

Bölükbaş, however, did not retract. In a radio broadcast, he said that as Gümüşpala was an admirer of the RFP, former DP adherents should transfer their allegiance to the RPNP (R. Ankara, Oct 3 [6]). The following day, in Konya, Bölükbaş replied to Gen. Gürsel, saying: "Your recent statements cannot be reconciled with impartiality... There is no legal power that can... throw me out of the radio building... We do not look for kindness from anyone, nor do we fear unfair attacks... We are not among those sham politicians who have arrived on the political scene with encouragement, and conduct politics under protection... There is no power on earth which can stop our party from stating that which is true, just as your statement yesterday will not deter us from our ideals or our path... We are not under anyone's orders. It is only the nation which may judge us." (Kudret, Oct 5)

The NUC answered Bölükbaş in a communiqué on Oct 5: "The political parties which are the necessary elements of a democratic regime, are under protection of the constitution and of no other authority. Within the law, every Turkish citizen has the right to express his ideas freely, bound only by his own concern for our national unity, his respect for our society, his love of our country and his moral obligations." (Milliyet, Oct 6)

Bölükbaş continued to press his attack on President Gürsel, the NUC and other political parties in his speeches in the provinces and declared that he had sent nobody to the round-table conference (Öncü, Oct 7). He also read the text of a letter, dated Aug 20, which he said he had sent to Gen. Gürsel asking him not to confirm death sentences which might be passed on the former DP leaders. [The verdicts were given on Sept 13.] He said the publication of his letter at the time had been prohibited on the grounds that he had asked pardon for the accused and this might affect the verdicts by the Yassıada Court. Yet he had been blamed for not participating in the round-table conference because he had believed it would influence these same verdicts. (Kudret; Yeni Gün, Oct 9)

Bölükbaş was accused by most of the press of ignoring his own party's signature to the joint declaration and trying to appear as the only successor to the DP regime which he had so vehemently opposed; the JP demanded that an end be put to the "regrettable tactics" he employed against the other parties; the authorities investigated whether his speeches violated the law. Bölükbaş, however, was undeterred and whilst he continued to attack the regime, he was not otherwise molested. An NUC member said that Bölükbaş was hoping he would be arrested, "but we do not want to create cheap heroes" (R. Ankara, Oct 2 [6]; Milliyet; Öncü; Hür Vatan, Oct 6). Foreign correspondents were impressed by Bölükbaş's "courageous appearance" and it was thought that he had won the RPNP many supporters. (NYT; Daily Telegraph, Oct 13)

Election Campaign Free. "Tame." Cumhuriyet wrote that the election campaign had been conducted in complete freedom. With some exceptions, the paper continued,

3. No referendum results were available for the provinces of Kars and Artvin.

the politicians had disregarded the joint declaration and had used all the means at their disposal to win the people over to their side, and to fight for the former DP votes. The people, however, appeared to have realized where their real interests lay; they had remained calm, realizing that feelings of revenge and hate could only bring disaster. (Cumhuriyet, Oct 14; see also Tanin, Oct 15)

Foreign correspondents noted that, compared with previous Turkish elections, the campaign had been "oddly tame." Party meetings were orderly, and in most parts of Turkey one would hardly have known that elections were being held. There were no posters and banners in the streets; the only portrait on the walls was of Atatürk. (Times; NYT, Oct 13; Economist; Daily Herald, Oct 14)

The Parties in the Campaign. The Istanbul independent daily Milliyet assessed the attitudes of the parties in the campaign.

The RPP had been faithful to its motto of "friendship, not enmity" and had created the hope that if it gained power, it would make a serious effort to ensure peace and quiet in the country. The RPNP, on the other hand, had shown that it was not fit to bear the responsibilities of the future administration, the paper said.

The DP, which had been supported by millions, should not have been dissolved, but entrusted to new and honest leaders. As it was, the NTP and the JP had been formed as the successors to the DP. The NTP leadership had created a good impression in discussing mostly economic and social questions. If the party did not become the tool of the "fanatical politicians," who had penetrated its lower ranks, it might perform its political duty with success. The JP, on the other hand, "has shown that it wants to come to power in order to continue the past and take revenge. Among the candidates there are the wives, brothers and relatives of people who were convicted at Yassiada. Although Gümüşpala has given the impression that he is a good and moderate leader, he is not strong enough to prevent the development of the obvious intentions of his party." (Milliyet, Oct 14)

Whereas the RPP had its regular supporters, The Times correspondent wrote, the other three parties had to depend on capturing the former DP vote. For these parties, the question was how close to the wind they could sail in convincing the former Democrats that they stood for the same politics as Menderes. The politicians were doing their best, The New York Times correspondent wrote, to attract former DP voters, without involving the names of Menderes or his party.

Of the four political campaigners, the correspondent continued, İnönü was the only one who was telling the Turks they were in for hard times and austerity. Without taking issue directly with İnönü on this point, Bölükbaşı, Alican and Gümüşpala were all committed to reducing or abolishing land taxes, supporting crop prices and assuring other benefits for the peasants, who made up 70-80% of the population. (NYT; Times, Oct 13; Economist; Daily Herald, Oct 14)

THE ELECTIONS: RESULTS AND EVALUATION

The Candidates. Only the RPP put up candidates for all seats in the two Houses, i.e. 450 for the House and 150 for the Senate. The JP had 424 and 146 candidates respectively; the RPNP—353 and 132 and the NTP—353 and 110. There were also 66 independent candidates for the House and 21 for the Senate. The majority of the candidates were lawyers, doctors of medicine, former civil servants and retired officers. (Hürriyet, Sept 22; Cumhuriyet, Oct 1)

Elections in Calm Atmosphere. The elections were held on Oct 15 in a calm and peaceful atmosphere. No incidents were reported. The vote was completely fair and free, according to all observers. For the benefit of illiterate voters, the ballot papers carried the party symbols. Foreign observers noted that there was hardly a sign of the police or the army, and it was difficult to remember that Turkey was still under military rule.

The Times correspondent wrote that the good order was probably largely due to the elections being held under army and not under a party government which the other parties could accuse of rigging the elections. Cumhuriyet gave three reasons for the peaceful atmosphere: (1) the electoral rolls were accurate; (2) the local polling committees were composed of educated and capable people; (3) the voters had shown maturity and refused to be exploited by extremist politicians.

The voting ended at 5 p.m., the ballot boxes were opened and the votes were then counted in public, in the presence of the party delegates. (Turkish Press, Oct 16, 17; Times; NYT, Oct 16; Guardian, Oct 17; Scotsman, Oct 18)

The Results: Victory for the Successors of the Democratic Party. [The elections resulted in a simple majority for the Republican Party in the House, and for the Justice Party in the Senate. The Republicans, however, were in a minority vis-à-vis the three other parties who were jointly regarded as successors to the votes previously given to the dissolved Democratic Party.]

The final results, published by the Supreme Electoral Council on Oct 20, were as follows:

House of Representatives: registered voters—12,925,395; votes cast—10,522,716 (81.41%); valid votes—10,141,243; RPP—3,724,752 (173 seats); JP—3,527,435 (158 seats); NTP—1,391,934 (65 seats); RPNP—1,415,390 (54 seats); Independents (66 candidates)—81,732 (none).

Senate: registered voters—12,926,837; votes cast—10,519,659 (81.37%); valid votes—10,087,039; RPP—3,734,285 (36 seats); JP 3,560,675 (70 seats); NTP—1,401,637 (28 seats); RPNP—1,350,892 (16 seats); Independents (21 candidates)—39,350 (none). [In addition to the 150 elected members the senate would comprise 22 NUC members and 15 senators appointed by the President.] (Türkiye Yalığı, 1962)

The JP won the elections in W. and N.W. Anatolia, former strongholds of the Democratic Party, as well as in certain towns in the south and along the Black Sea coast, and, to everyone's astonishment, in the cotton city of Adana on the Mediterranean shore, a traditional RPP stronghold.

Also unexpectedly, a number of RPP strongholds in the 1937 elections, especially in eastern Anatolia, including Erzurum, had fallen to the recently created NTP. (Times, Oct 17)

"DP Victory." Foreign and local observers pointed out that the majority of the votes had been polled by the three parties, the JP, NTP and RPNP, which were known to have appealed to the supporters of the dissolved DP, and gave the following reasons for the result: (1) the delayed shock of the Yassiada trials and the execution of Menderes and his two colleagues. People in

Ankara were saying: "The winner of the elections is Menderes"; (2) the peasants had been hit hard by a bad harvest and deflation; (3) the hatred of a large part of the population for the RPP [because of its reformist, anti-religious policies] and the identification of this party with the military regime—with, in the words of The Economist "the frustration and sterility of eighteen months of army rule culminating in the executions." (Times, Oct 17, 18; Guardian, Oct 17; Milliyet, Oct 18; Washington Post, Oct 18; Economist, Oct 21)

"A Vote Against Kemalism." The Times correspondent said the elections had proved that half of the voters were out of sympathy with the revolutionary leaders and that this result amounted to "little less than a legal counter-revolution." (Times, Oct 17, 18)

The Economist correspondent thought the vote undermined the basic fact "that Turkey still has a built-in majority that does not accept the reforms of Atatürk which tried to make Turkey into a European nation. This is a fact which made Atatürk himself despair, and which brought Menderes in the end to the gallows because as a Democrat leader he came inevitably to represent the reaction (which in Turkey means the movement away from Atatürk back to Islam and the ways of the East) ... there was nothing else that his party could represent." The JP, NTP and RPP all represented reaction; so, to some extent, did even Atatürk's own Republican Party. The writer pointed out that during the election campaign the name of Atatürk was almost never mentioned, even by the RPP. A highly-educated Turk, a member of the NTP, told him after the elections: "We Turks can never be Europeans. We can only pretend to be Europeans. We must stay Turks and develop our religion of Islam." One of Atatürk's most convinced followers had told him after the May coup: "We shall never be able to impose Atatürk's ideas on our people." The correspondent concluded that the elections had shown that reaction away from Atatürk was stronger than ever in the Turkish people. It was reasonable to suppose that the twin force which had made the May revolution, the army officers and the Kemalist intellectuals who seemed genuinely devoted to a western-type democracy, was still strong enough to impose its will. "But how is Turkey to continue Atatürk's revolution, and combine it with democracy, if what the people want is reaction?" the writer asked. (Economist, Oct 21)

Lack of Social Responsibility. The Istanbul daily Milliyet found The Economist analysis superficial. It wrote: "The crux of the matter is that in Turkey both the intellectuals and the ignorant are competing with each other to cheat the state and get the most out of society while giving the least possible in return. Politics and the elections were exploited for the purpose and even the most intellectual leaders of parties made concessions to the ignorant on religion and reaction in order to preserve their personal gains. The most important question in Turkey at present is whether the individual shall work for himself or for society." Kemalism began by a move towards the second alternative, but soon the trend was completely reversed and there was no ideological movement to counter it. The fight between reaction and progress was only a detail arising from this state of affairs. (Milliyet, Oct 28)

THE NEW CIVILIAN REGIME

THE ASSEMBLY AND THE PRESIDENCY

According to schedule, the new Assembly was to hold its inaugural meeting on Oct 25, the new President was to be elected by the Assembly on Oct 26 and the new government was to be presented to the Assembly on Oct 29.

The Need For a Coalition Government. As none of the political parties had won a majority in the Assembly, the non-party press wrote, a national coalition must be formed with an independent PM. A coalition excluding the RPP or, in other words, dominated by the JP, was deemed out of the question as influential army circles were thought to be determined to stage another coup should former Democrats re-acquire a dominant political position. Gürsel supported a national coalition. (For sources see below.)

Gürsel Candidate for Presidency. At the same time, it was reported, "political circles" stressed that Gen. Gürsel was the best and only candidate for the presidency. On Oct 18 Gürsel announced his candidacy; he told the press he could not leave work half-done. "Although I do not want it and my health is not up to it, I cannot leave my nation under the prevailing conditions." (Cumhuriyet; Yeni Gün; Milliyet; Hürriyet, Oct 16-20; Times, Oct 17, 20; Daily Telegraph, Oct 17)

Party Attitudes. Following are the initial attitudes taken by the parties on the questions of a coalition government and the presidency.

The RPP. In the RPP, many leaders appeared to favour remaining in the opposition, as a show of anger at the election results, and out of concern for the future of the party, on the assumption that if the party came to power now it would continue to lose public support [apparently because it would continue to be identified with the military regime].

Party leader İnönü, however, told the press that no attempt to form a coalition would fail because of the RPP. Gülek also declared that a national coalition would be in the national interest.

The party declared its support for Gürsel's presidency. (For sources see below.)

The JP Divided. Attitudes in the JP were divided according to the different groups which had formed the party.

The retired officers, led by Gümüşpala, the party leader, supported Gürsel for the presidency and would agree to a national coalition, but if the RPP were to form the government, they would support it only with either Prof. Nihat Erin or Kasım Gülek (and not İnönü) as PM.

The former Democrats generally took no definite stand. Some of their leaders, however, wished to remain in opposition until the spring in order to force new elections in which they hoped to win 300-350 seats; others favoured a coalition with the NTP and RPP.

A third group, "the extreme rightists," as they were called in the press, also wanted the party to remain in the opposition or to form a coalition with the NTP and RPP. They claimed that a coalition with the RPP would contravene the raison d'être of the party. In addition they opposed Gen. Gürsel for the presidency and put up the candidacy of Prof. Ali Fuat Başgil. They also wished to oust Gümüşpala from the party leadership and to replace him by Başgil if the latter were not elected to the presidency.

The [pro-JP] Son-Havadis claimed that the JP rank and file supported Başgil's candidacy. This was denied by Gümüşpala who said that he would resign from the party if Başgil were elected president. (For sources see below.)

The NTP supported the formation of a national coalition and refused to join a coalition with either the JP or the RPP alone. The party also decided to vote for Gürsel. (For sources see below.)

The RPNP decided to remain in the opposition and to abstain in the presidential elections. (Cumhuriyet; Dünya; Hürriyet; Hür Vatan; Milliyet; Kudret; Öncü; Son-Havadis, Oct 19-23; Times, Oct 20, 23)

Political Crisis; Army Intervention. A crisis was reached on Oct 23 and 24, on the eve of the inauguration of the Grand National Assembly. There were reports that the JP, NTP and RPNP were endeavouring to form a coalition without the RPP, and that Başgil had agreed to be a candidate for the presidency and that his supporters were canvassing support for him.

On Oct 23 Gen. Gürsel met the four party leaders, İnönü, Gümüşpala, Alican and Bölükbaşı, at his invitation. After the meeting, the leaders said that a solution was in sight. Gürsel then met the armed forces' commanders in the presence of the NUC members. After this meeting, which lasted until the morning of Oct 24, the four party leaders were again summoned to the presidential palace where they met Gürsel in the presence of the army high command.

The party leaders signed a protocol containing the following points: (1) no amnesty would be considered for those condemned by the Yassıada court; (2) the laws concerning the armed forces, issued by the NUC, would not be amended [i.e. the army officers pensioned off by law in Aug 1960 would not be reinstated]; (3) the party leaders were "to make great efforts" to have their respective parliamentary groups vote for Gürsel in the presidential elections.

Many Turkish papers saw in army intervention the only way to solve the problems of the transitional period although this could not be reconciled with democracy. (Akşam; Milliyet; Cumhuriyet, Oct 24, 25; Times, Oct 25, 26.)

In a message issued after the meeting the CGS, Gen. Sunay, said that the Turkish people, Turkish youth and Turkish armed forces—the unshakable guardians of Atatürk's reforms and the spirit of May 27—were confident that the future would bring happiness to the country. He added that there was no difference between the army and the parties as regards the operation of the democratic regime within the framework of the constitution. (R. Ankara, Oct 24 [26])

Başgil Withdraws His Candidacy for President. On Oct 24 Prof. Başgil stated that he was under no obligation to recognize the above-mentioned protocol. "The nation wants me, I shall be a candidate for the presidency," he said. The same day Başgil, accompanied by several JP members, met Deputy PM Özdilek and later called on Gümüşpala and on Bölükbaşı. Early the following day he left Ankara in a hurry for Istanbul from where he submitted his resignation from the Senate "for reasons which make it necessary." Thus automatically, according to the constitution, his candidature was withdrawn. Two days later, he said that the need arose to withdraw his candidacy following his contacts of Oct 24. As he had promised many senators and deputies that he would run for president but could not keep his promise, he had resigned from the Senate.

Gürsel now remained the sole candidate for the presidency. (Cumhuriyet, Oct 25-28)

Assembly Convened. The inaugural meeting of the Grand National Assembly took place on Oct 25 under the chairmanship of the oldest member, İsmet İnönü. Gen. Gürsel and İnönü were warmly welcomed by all sides except for a group of JP deputies and senators who did later join in the applause during Gürsel's opening speech. Only Mrs. Gedik, widow of the DP Minister of the Interior, who had committed suicide (see MER 1960, p 435), and Mrs. Agaoglu, wife of Samet Agaoglu, a former DP Minister serving life imprisonment, stood aside. After the opening speech, the deputies and senators were sworn in.

Two senators resigned: Prof. Başgil, (see above) and Cemal Madanoğlu, the former NUC member (see p 556).

With the opening of the new Assembly, the Constituent Assembly ceased to exist, and with it the NUC which had functioned as its Upper House. (Cumhuriyet; Öncü; Yeni Gün, Oct 26)

Gürsel Elected President. The following day, Oct 26, the two Houses in a joint meeting elected Gen. Gürsel as President of the Republic by 434 votes, thereby exceeding by 30 votes the two-thirds majority required by the constitution. There were 156 abstentions and 17 votes for other candidates. (Cumhuriyet; Times, Oct 27)

Election of the Presidents of the Two Houses. The Senate and the House of Representatives ran into difficulty on Oct 26 in electing their presidents. Each of the four parties proposed its own candidate and none commanded the required majority of over 50%. On Oct 28 the four parties informally agreed on Suat Hayri Urganlı, a JP Senator for Kayseri, as President of the Senate; the JP having a majority in the Senate. Urganlı was a former Ambassador to Washington. He was elected by 140 votes; 25 votes were given to other candidates. Three deputy-presidents were elected, one each from the RPP, the NTP and the RPNP.

The President of the House in which the RPP held a majority was only elected on Nov 1. The JP at first refused to support Fuat Sirmen, the RPP candidate who was nominated by İnönü, and suggested Prof. Nihat Erim, a supporter of Gülek, but in the end a number of JP deputies voted for Sirmen, who was elected by 227 votes, one vote more than the minimum required. Eighty-nine abstained and 23 voted for other candidates. Fuat Sirmen, RPP Deputy from Rize, had been Minister of Economy and Justice in RPP governments in the years 1943-50, and had been responsible as Minister of Justice in 1948 for the preparation of the new liberal electoral law. (Milliyet, Oct 27-31, Nov 1, 2; Times, Oct 30, Nov 2)

THE FORMATION OF THE GOVERNMENT

Deadlock on Formation of Coalition Government; JP Opposed to RPP Premier. At the beginning of Nov, after meeting the CGS, Gen. Sunay, President Gürsel contacted the party leaders on the forming of a national coalition.

Bölükbaşı, the RPNP leader, informed Gürsel that his party was firm in its decision not to join any coalition. JP efforts to persuade the RPNP to change its attitude failed.

Each of the other three parties was reported to be prepared to join a coalition, the JP and the NTP only on condition that all the three parties participate in the government. Each party demanded the premiership for its leader and the JP and the NTP declared their refusal to enter a coalition with a RPP PM. A suggestion by President Gürsel for a rotating premiership was reportedly accepted by the NTP and the RPP; the JP, however, not only opposed it—holding to its policy of not joining a coalition with an RPP Premier—but also sought to persuade the RPNP to reverse its stand. This led to speculation that the JP was planning a coalition without the RPP, whereupon Gürsel told the press that a government without the RPP would lead to renewed national unrest, and the "former ones" might believe they had returned to power; "the inclusion of the RPP is a must!" (Milliyet; Yeni Gün, Nov 3-10; Times, Nov 7)

Gürsel Appoints İnönü Premier; Army Pressure Seen. On Nov 10 President Gürsel summoned the party leaders and the presidents of the Senate and the House and told them that as the parties had failed to reach an agreement on a coalition and owing to the urgent need to form a government, he had decided to use his constitutional right to appoint a PM without further consultations, namely İsmet İnönü. He added that he was appointing İnönü not as the RPP leader but as a national figure.

İnönü declared that he would try to form not a party government, but "one which will aim at national peace and the establishment of democracy."

The Times correspondent claimed that Gürsel's choice of İnönü was made under direct pressure from the army. Milliyet wrote: "The army, which keeps a constant vigil at the doors of the Assembly, will go back to its barracks in peace only if it sees İsmet Paşa [İnönü] at the helm."

Many papers welcomed Gürsel's choice. Öncü [pro-NTP] and Son Havadis [pro-JP], however, attacked the choice of İnönü, claiming that he was a most controversial political figure and not a national figure, having obtained only 38% of the vote. (Cumhuriyet; Milliyet; Hürriyet; Öncü; Son Havadis, Nov 11, 12; Times, Nov 11, 13; NYHT, Dec 2-3)

JP, NTP Conditions for Joining Government. The Times correspondent commented that the JP and the NTP, especially the former, were now in the difficult position that the bulk of their supporters were political enemies of İnönü. If their leaders now agreed to work under İnönü, these voters might consider that they had been betrayed, and the JP in particular would be in danger of disintegration. (Times, Nov 13)

On Nov 12 İnönü had individual meetings with the leaders of the JP, NTP and RPNP. Bölükbaşı, the RPNP leader, reiterated the determination of his party to remain in opposition. Gümüşpala, the JP leader, and Alican, the NTP leader, promised to discuss the matter with their parliamentary groups. The following day, the JP and the NTP submitted to İnönü their conditions for entering a coalition.

The JP made the following conditions: PM İnönü to resign as leader of the RPP; the government programme to contain the following subjects: a general amnesty for members of the former regime; abolition of the compulsory declaration of private assets, no new taxes to be imposed, the tax laws to be modified, the savings bonds system to be abolished; Martial Law to be ended; the JP to have nine ministers.

The NTP demanded an independent PM and equal rights in the coalition. The party proposed Recai Sevinç, President of the Supreme Electoral Council, as PM and alternatively senators Sıtkı Ulay or Fahri Özdilek, both former NUC members.

These conditions were unacceptable to the RPP and to the army leaders. A member of the former NUC said that a general amnesty for the political prisoners would amount to a negation of the May revolution. (Hürriyet; Yeni Gün; Ulus, Nov 13, 14; Times, Nov 16)

Army Pressure; The JP Decides to Enter Coalition. On Nov 14 and 15 the political atmosphere in Ankara became very tense and was relieved only after the JP decided to enter the coalition. The Times correspondent said that the army had thrown all its weight behind İnönü's attempt to form a coalition and the JP deputies, who held the key to İnönü's success in their hands, were kept in no doubt that if they decided not to enter the government, there would be another army takeover. The press had been openly writing that the two most important political figures in Turkey at present were "Mr... Thompson and Mr Sten" [a reference to two makes of submachine guns]. On Nov 14 İnönü had made a cryptic utterance: "If difficulties arise, I shall find other means. That is my custom."

In these circumstances, the JP parliamentary group met on Nov 15 in the Assembly building while at the same time senior army officers met in the HQ nearby and the members of the former NUC, who acted as liaison between the army leaders and the politicians, met in an upper room at the Assembly.

The JP parliamentary group took a ballot vote in which 89 voted for participation in the government, 84 voted against, 14 abstained and two votes were invalid. This vote was declared invalid on the grounds that there had been more ballots than deputies present. A party spokesman told the press that in accordance with party regulations, the final decision would now be taken by the Central Executive Council. The Executive met immediately and decided to enter a coalition with the RPP by a vote of 15 to 6—Şinasi Osma, Tahsin Demiryaz, Kamuran Evliyaoğlu, Mehmet Turgut and Ahmet Gürkan (the name of the sixth was not reported)—who said they were not opposed to a coalition with the RPP, but only to İnönü's leadership. Gümüşpala declared that the decision had been taken "in the higher interests of the nation." (Milliyet; Times, Nov 16)

The Times commented that a coalition without the RPP was unthinkable and so "a shot-gun wedding has been arranged between it and the JP... Only pressure from the army and consciousness of the desperate need for a government could have brought this alliance into being." (Times, Nov 21)

The NTP leader, Alican, welcomed the JP decision and said he thought the new government's programme would not clash with the views of his party. Leading NTP members, however, were reportedly shocked at the JP decision and claimed that the demand they had made for an independent premier had left the door open for further negotiations with them. (Hür Vatan, Nov 16)

Adverse Reaction Inside JP. A large number of JP members and provincial leaders in western Anatolia, the former stronghold of the DP, e.g. the Izmir DP executive, openly protested at the executive's decision. There were reports that several JP provincial leaders had resigned and were forming a new party. This was denied by Gümüşpala. Towards the end of Nov, Gümüşpala visited Izmir in an effort "to prevent disintegration." It was reported that he told JP members that the subject of a political amnesty would be included in the government programme (Milliyet, Nov 17, 25; Kudret, Nov 17; Cumhuriyet, Nov 25). [Towards the end of the year, the opposition inside the party became less apparent.]

Formation of RPP-JP Coalition Government. Representatives of the RPP and JP met on Nov 16 and issued a protocol containing the basic principles for the coalition government: the need to form a stable government quickly and efforts to be made "to heal the wounds of the past" [this became a standard reference to an amnesty for those convicted at Yassıada]; the government to safeguard the democratic regime, to find a way of resolving economic stagnation, cure unemployment, encourage foreign investment, reform agricultural taxation, discontinue deduction for Savings Bonds from workers' wages, continue loyalty to the western alliance. Both parties were determined to protect the country against extreme Leftist and Rightist movements and totalitarianism. (Yeni Gün, Nov 17)

It was agreed that each party would appoint 11 ministers (including İnönü, the PM, on the RPP side), whereupon İnönü nominated the RPP ministers and Gümüşpala the JP ministers. Gümüşpala himself and the party SG, Şinasi Oğma, declined to enter the government.

On Nov 20 the new government was presented to President Gürsel and held its first meeting. (Milliyet, Nov 18-20; Cumhuriyet; Times, Nov 21)

The Government Programme. On Nov 27 PM İnönü presented the government programme to the Assembly in considerable detail. A précis follows:

İnönü first remarked that a coalition government was an innovation in Turkish political life; it had been formed by parties thought to be unable to come together and was proof of the nation's political maturity. The government was agreed on the principles of Atatürk's reforms and of a democratic regime.

The government would work to ensure political tranquillity—the main internal problem; it would eliminate official discrimination because of political differences, though it would take time to achieve this, and work to enhance the efficiency and prestige of the police and the gendarmerie [which would again become responsible for internal security] after the withdrawal of the armed forces.

While speaking of the affairs of the Ministry of Justice, İnönü said that "the establishment of permanent peace throughout the country... as well as the complete healing of the wounds caused by past political strife... will receive our constant... attention, and work toward this end will begin soon." [This was a reference to a contemplated amnesty for those convicted at Yassıada as later stated by İnönü himself. See below: Question of Amnesty.]

The government aimed at "speedy economic development in freedom." To this end there should be the largest possible investments by both the state and private enterprise. There must also be thorough planning to which end the State Planning Organization had been established. Turkey, he said, must not remain "a nation which does not take heed of its future or which does not know how to handle its financial affairs." Development must not be accompanied by inflation. There should be regional planning.

The government would prepare tax reforms, including the abolition of land taxes for agricultural land. The economic burden on "poorly paid workers" would also be alleviated (apparently a reference to the compulsory buying of Savings Bonds).

Organic laws would be drafted, establishing the Supreme Council of Judges and the Constitutional Court. There would be various judicial reforms.

Agricultural development would concentrate on increasing productivity through irrigation, pest control, seed selection, etc., as all arable land was now under cultivation.

Laws to effect land reform would be drafted in conformity with the spirit of the constitution and in a manner compatible with the economic and cultural structure.

Speaking of a public works policy, İnönü mentioned irrigation and drainage, drinking water for villages, hydroelectric power, country roads, railways, airports and harbours. "In the field of public works, the government will consider it a duty to assist the private sector."

İnönü then reviewed trade policy. He said that industry's foremost problem was that it did not work to full capacity. New industries should be carefully planned and private industry encouraged.

At a time of industrial growth, an "important government problem is to protect workers' rights." Measures would be taken to ensure a fair distribution of the benefits and burdens of economic development, to improve the mechanism for determining minimum wages, to provide new work opportunities, to preserve harmonious relations between employers and employees, to prevent discrimination against workers for political reasons, to improve health and safety conditions in work places. Laws would be submitted to the Assembly "regulating workers' collective contracts and their right to strike."

As regards housing in towns and villages, "the state has tasks to perform as guide, model and assistant."

"We regard it as necessary to make experiments in the question of socialization of health services, based on the work of the State Planning Organization."

The broadcasting services would be politically neutral and be converted into an autonomous institution.

Elementary education should be universal in ten years' time. Education in general would be furthered, with emphasis on the technical fields.

"The needs of the Directorate of Religious Affairs will be deemed important and valuable" and it would be provided with sufficient means. Freedom of conscience and religious belief would be protected.

"As far as means permit we shall endeavour to provide for social justice and charity, for which the Waqfs with assets of over £T1,000m. have been established."

As regards international relations, İnönü spoke of Turkey's wish for peace, and her position as a partner of the Western world, and reiterated her adherence to the UN Charter, to NATO, CENTO, and the European Council and her wish to join the EEC. He mentioned her friendly relations with the US, her interest in tranquillity in Cyprus and good relations with Greece. He expressed the desire for improved relations with the USSR in the framework of Turkey's existing international obligations. He said Turkey felt sympathy for "all Near East and ME countries" and singled out Iraq, Syria and Afghanistan for special mention. He also mentioned in this sense Yugoslavia, Latin America, the Far East and especially Japan. Turkey supported a general and internationally-controlled disarmament, termination of nuclear tests, and aid to underdeveloped countries.

The army, beloved by the whole nation, would be kept powerful. Bills on the armed forces, in accordance with the provisions in the constitution, would be submitted to the Assembly.

The government would "regard the control to be exercised by the opposition as an assistance." (R. Ankara, Nov 27 [30]; Turkish Press, Nov 28)

Vote of Confidence. While the Senate and the House of Representatives discussed the government programme, PM İnönü met the JP Parliamentary group in an effort to persuade them to vote for the government. He said an amnesty had been carefully considered in the discussions between the two parties. Of the two ways possible, first peace and then amnesty or amnesty first and peace later, the first was chosen because above everything Turkey needed peace and a stable government. (Öncü, Nov 30)

On Dec 2 the House gave the coalition government a vote of confidence by 269 votes out of 448. The President of the House (RFP) had no vote, according to the constitution. One NTP deputy was evicted from the House, having been found ineligible because of a criminal record. The break-down of the votes was as follows:

	RPP	JP	NTP	RPNP	Total
For	166	97	3	3	269
Against			4		4
Abstention		2	38	38	78
Absent	6	59	19	13	97
Total	172	158	64	54	448

QUESTION OF AMNESTY FOR YASSIADA CONVICTS

(December)

[Though the parties agreed on Oct 25 not to consider an amnesty for the Yassiada convicts and though the coalition agreement gave priority to pacifying the country, the question of amnesty was raised again in mid-Dec.]

NTP-JP Initiative. There were reports that the NTP and the JP Parliamentary groups had both formed committees to prepare an amnesty bill. PM İnönü and Deputy PM İyidoğan endeavoured to persuade the deputies to desist on the grounds that it would be better if the government prepared such a bill. İnönü met Burhan Apaydın [who had been Menderes' defence counsel] and they were reported to have agreed to leave the matter to the government. Apaydın left for Kayseri to visit the convicts in this connection. It was reported, however, that the two party committees continued to work on a bill. (Yeni Gün; Öncü; Milliyet, Dec 13-16)

Warning of a New Military Coup. On Dec 20 Senator Mucip Ataklı, a former NUC member, issued a warning in a press interview that an amnesty might cause another revolution. "There is a tendency to show that those who made the [May] revolution are tyrants and those who were the cause of it are the oppressed. Those who look back with nostalgia to the period of oppression and the administration of gangsters must realize that the forces which carried out the revolution will not hesitate to prepare a more terrifying one for these people." He urged members of the political parties to take drastic action against people campaigning for a political amnesty. (Cumhuriyet; Milliyet, Dec 21)

The Deputy PM, İyidoğan, said the following day: "The government is strong and can punish those who by their acts try to undermine its authority." (Cumhuriyet; Milliyet, Dec 22)

PM İnönü told the Assembly on Dec 25: "We first need tranquillity and once such a state will be reached then an amnesty will become a necessity and a useful thing. The term 'to heal the wounds of the past' appearing in the government programme is a clear promise. But the government should be left alone on this matter." Hinting at Ataklı's statement, he added that the "forces" were under the orders of the government, which was backed by a vote of confidence from the Parliament. (Cumhuriyet, Dec 26)

PUBLIC DISCUSSION OF STATE SOCIALISM

Influential Group Advocates Full State Socialism. A declaration advocating a "new étatisme," signed by 150 Turkish intellectuals and public figures, appeared on Dec 20 in the first issue of an Istanbul political weekly with a socialist trend, named Yön. The paper called upon those in agreement with the views expressed to append their signatures to the declaration.

The authors of the declaration believed that the intellectuals, "who are in a position to give a direction to Turkish society," should agree on the main lines of a certain philosophy of development which they named "new étatisme."

Their principal tenet was that only through rapid economic growth could Turkey attain the aims charted by Atatürk, namely modern civilization, democracy, a high level of education and social justice. Economic growth would advance westernization by changing the social structure; democracy could not co-exist with hunger nor could misery direct the masses towards education; social justice could not be realized by sharing poverty.

Turkey was at present in the throes of a social crisis which had grown out of the economic crisis. A backward agriculture and landlessness led to rapid urbanization, which in turn gave rise to unemployment and slum conditions—all this while population growth was rapid, and a large segment of "this avalanche of children" would be deprived of education and a secure future.

Those in power had not realized the seriousness of these problems nor formed "an applicable philosophy of development"; they overlooked the fact that development could not succeed without basic reforms, and sincerely believed that it could be achieved through an increase in foreign aid and in agricultural exports, and the development of tourism. The State Planning Organization would be of no help without such a philosophy.

As a starting-point for their philosophy, the authors considered it "essential to utilize all our capabilities, to increase investments rapidly, to plan the entire economy, to bring about social justice for the masses, to put an end to exploitation and to make the masses masters of democracy." These goals could be attained through a new concept of étatisme.

The economy would continue as a mixture of private and state enterprise, but development based on private enterprise was slow and expensive, created suffering and in an under-developed country could not be reconciled with social justice. Moreover, it was also undemocratic because political power, to a large extent, would be dominated by economic power. If some existing state enterprises were unprofitable, the cause lay in a failure to apply a systematic and sufficiently extensive policy of étatisme.

The "new étatisme" would take the form of "judicious state intervention": It would help to increase national savings while achieving just taxation. Planning would be accompanied by "the authority and the means to direct economic activity towards the desired goals in due time and in their entirety." Planning required large economic units, to which end cooperation in all economic fields would be established. The basic goal of the new étatisme was to raise the level of the working class; a system which permitted their oppression and allowed speculators to enjoy incomes far superior to those of civil servants and intellectuals "cannot continue to operate in the twentieth century." A land reform would replace the landlords with farmers' organizations and cooperatives.

The authors concluded by calling for a debate on the issue which should lead to an agreed philosophy of development.

The signatories included 36 university teachers, 28 of them of junior rank, as well as journalists, engineers, teachers, experts of the State Planning Organization, trade unionists, politicians (mostly RPP members) and three former NUC members (Senators Sami Küçük, Vehbi Eriş, Suphi Karaman). (Yön, Dec 20; English text in Middle Eastern Affairs Vol. XIV, No. 3, March 1963)

Adverse Press Reaction. Some papers which emphasized the authors' socialist tendencies saw no cause for alarm. Vatan wrote that the most extreme leftist in Turkey was no more extreme than a well-intentioned and liberal Christian Democrat in France or Italy. (Yeni Gün; Öncü; Vatan, Dec 20, 21)

One criticism was that the ideas proclaimed were already outmoded in the West and that private enterprise was needed for Turkey's development. (Hür Vatan, Dec 25)

Cumhuriyet said that the "conscious state intervention" desired by the authors did not suit Turkey's conditions, for the western conception of the state was not yet clearly established in the minds of the people. (Cumhuriyet, Dec 24)

Yeni İstanbul warned the government that Turkey was threatened by Communism and called on it to declare that it would never allow a socialism which inevitably lead to Communism. (Yeni İstanbul, Jan 3, 1962)

THE UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC

(Al-Gumhuriyah al-Arabiyyah al-Muttahidah)

INTERNAL AFFAIRS

SYNOPSIS

1961 witnessed the disintegration of the union between Egypt and Syria, following a Syrian military coup d'état. This event was preceded by the issue of the "revolutionary decrees" in July, a new stage in the introduction of "Arab socialism," and by the unification of the government of the two regions in August. Both these measures were thought to have been contributory factors to the break-up of the union. The Egyptian regime survived the Syrian crisis and President Abdel Nasser, who held that "capitalist reaction" was responsible for the Syrian secession, took drastic measures to deprive the moneyed class in Egypt of most of their remaining wealth and their potential influence.

The National Union (NU), finally established in 1960 to succeed the defunct Liberation Rally as the regime's mass political organization, continued routine activities until the break-up of the union; thereafter, in practice, it ceased to function. An outstanding feature among NU activities was the provincial popular congresses in the Egyptian Region. However, the regional congresses and the second National Congress of the NU, which should have met in June and July respectively, were postponed, and finally did not meet at all.

The NU had failed, President Abdel Nasser said, because it had been infiltrated by "reaction," had become a mere "organizational facade" and had been "unmoved by the forces of the masses and their genuine demands." The NU had failed in its allotted task of activating the masses in providing active organized support for the regime and eliciting participation in building the economy and new society. Disillusionment with the NU on this account had indeed become apparent in 1960 (compare MER 1960, pp 461, 487-8.)

The National Assembly, the second Assembly formed in Egypt after 1952, also ceased to function before it completed its first year of life. (The first one was established in 1957 and dissolved a year later, following the formation of the UAR.) In the two sittings of its second annual session (January-February, April-June), the Assembly elected a constitution drafting committee—which soon ceased to function—and approved the budget. Many issues of general or local significance were brought up by members during the sessions. Among the more important measures passed was a bill for the reorganization of Al-Azhar, which provided for the secularization of this ancient Islamic university and its subjection to complete government control.

The Assembly, however, played no part in the issue of the "July revolutionary decrees" or the unification of the government of the two regions of the UAR. It was later revealed in Cairo that at the time the July decrees were issued it was proposed to purge from the Assembly elements in consonance with the new policy, and the President himself remarked that had the decrees been brought before the Assembly they would have been discussed indefinitely because "interests clash, of course."

Thus, though they were established and supervised by the government, both the National Union and the National Assembly, the two political popular bodies, were found to be wanting before they were a year old.

The "July revolutionary decrees," an official declaration said, were aimed at "completing the construction of the socialist society"; later, they came to be known in the UAR as the "socialist revolution." The decrees constituted indeed a "completion" or, to be more exact, a continuation of a well-established trend, but at the same time, because of their scope and innovations, they also constituted a revolutionary change.

As a result of the decrees, some 400 establishments were partly or wholly nationalized, in industry, communications, public utilities, commerce and finance. The decrees provided for compensation in interest-bearing negotiable government bonds. The private sector was completely eliminated from banking, insurance and the import trade, almost wholly expelled from heavy industry, and reduced to a minor partner in medium industry, transport and the export trade. The public sector of the economy, which had its beginnings in the nationalization of foreign properties in 1956 and which had grown in the following years through the establishment of government development projects and further nationalization, was now invested with a dominant influence over all branches of the economy, with the exception of agriculture, retail trade and real estate.

The agrarian reform law of 1952 was amended by reducing the maximum land ownership to 100 feddan; the former maximum was 200 plus 100 feddan for children. Not affected were the "middle class holdings" of between 50-100 feddans (often owned by families of civil servants and army officers) whose number almost doubled under the first reform. Abdel Nasser said that the agrarian reform was not effectively implemented; some families had managed to retain as much as 3,000 feddans and continued to behave like feudal lords; the landowners had also imposed a land rent on the fellahin much in excess of the official rate. Under the new law, an estimated 380,000 feddan were to become available for distribution in addition to the 500,000 feddan appropriated under the 1952 law. Another decree, aimed to benefit the rural sector, provided that loans by the Agricultural Bank should be interest free.

The July decrees made a complete innovation (in the UAR) by providing the industrial employees and workers with a share in profits and the management of companies: 25% of net profits (10% in cash; 15% to be allocated for social services), and two representatives on the board of directors of any company, the total number of directors being restricted to seven. The working week in industrial establishments was reduced from 48 to 42 hours without a reduction in wages; this measure was primarily aimed at providing additional employment opportunities.

On the other hand, the benefits and positions of influence enjoyed by the moneyed class were drastically reduced. In addition to the nationalization, the decrees stipulated that no person could hold more than one post in public organizations, companies, societies etc., limited the maximum remuneration which a person might receive from any establishment to £E5,000, restricted holdings of any person in all major companies to £E10,000, and drastically increased the rates of the income and buildings taxes.

One consequence of the decrees was the placing of the heavy burden of managing practically the whole economy on the shoulders of a bureaucracy, which, as Abdel Nasser declared later in the year, did not prove equal to all the tasks imposed upon it.

Speaking on the decrees, President Abdel Nasser said that from the beginning the revolution had been both political and social; it had successfully faced its enemies and was now politically consolidated, and the time had come to effect the social revolution. At the same time, Abdel Nasser said, the social revolution would further consolidate the political achievement. The July decrees had two aims: 1) the protection of the revolutionary regime from "feudalism, monopoly and exploiting capitalism" by depriving them of their "weapons," namely lands and capital; 2) the elimination of class contradictions from a society which, when the revolution started in 1952, was composed of two classes, namely the exploited—95% of the people—and the exploiters who owned the country—less than 5% of the people. Hence the redistribution of national wealth and benefits.

Abdel Nasser spoke of a revolution by the working class which he defined as all wage earners from the President of the Republic to the manual labourer. The "capitalist exploiting class" on the other hand, he said, did not comprise all owners but only those who used their wealth to exploit others. The working class, which the President identified with the people, wished to achieve the revolution by peaceful means, "without killing anyone and without bearing malice against anyone"; the new society provided for "private ownership without exploitation, and public ownership without confiscation."

Abdel Nasser enlarged on the duties of work and efficiency, now that the factories were "owned by the people," and warned against bribery and negligence. A law was being drafted making negligence a crime against the state, punishable by hard labour. Referring to the opinion that the expansion of the public sector would lead to mistakes, the President said that these would be fewer than those made by the capitalists. He also said that more nationalization was the remedy for bribery.

Abdel Nasser took issue with "religious fanaticism" and "political sectarianism" which, he said, the enemies of the revolution had used to divide the working class and defend the interests of reaction. He said that socialism was based on the world religions and expounded the view that Islam had established the first socialist state.

Abdel Nasser emphasized that the "July 22 revolution" was no reform movement but aimed at radical change, at the building of a totally new political, economic and social system. He declared that more measures would be taken during the year, for socialism was an "endless road."

After the decrees had been issued, Hasanain Haykal, Abdel Nasser's leading spokesman, published an article on the differences between Arab socialism and Communism.

While the July decrees aroused no significant opposition in Egypt, in Syria they served to intensify the steadily growing disillusionment with the union; (compare MER 1960, pp 462-3). The decrees came on top of a series of measures taken by the government in February-March to tighten control over the Syrian economy; namely, currency control, price control, import restrictions, the Arabization of banks, and the abolition of the currency board. President Abdel Nasser, who was then on his fifth (and, as it turned out, last) visit to Syria under the union, sharply denounced Syria's previous "so-called economic freedom" and emphasized that the government aimed at a controlled economy. The fears and resentment which this policy aroused in the economic circles affected were evident, inter alia, in the flight of capital and the spreading of rumours detrimental to economic activity but they only found their full public expression later, in the coup d'état and after. The Syrian anxieties were heightened by reports that the economies of Egypt and Syria would soon be fully merged under Cairo's control, and by other reports which lent themselves to the interpretation that Syria would be kept as a primarily agricultural country to serve as a market for Egypt's industry, (though the President emphasized that industry in Syria would be encouraged). The dislocation caused to trade, and a grave shortage in foreign currency attributed by the President mainly to the flight of capital, led to serious food shortages. Imports in the first half of 1961 fell drastically.

In August Cairo's tightening control over Syria was extended to the political field. The regional executive councils were abolished, and all executive power concentrated in the central government in Cairo. Two weeks later, the Local Government Law introduced in 1960 in the Egyptian Region was extended to Syria, making the provisional government directly responsible to the President. As early as June, it was later authoritatively reported in Cairo, Abdel Nasser had told Sarraj and a number of Syrian ministers that present conditions in Syria could not continue; each of them had his own men in Syria, and these groups were "splitting the country." A foreign paper remarked that Egypt had resolved to strengthen the union through a "progressive dissolution of the Syrian personality," and Damascus had now been transformed into a provincial capital; that many Syrians shared these sentiments was made clear in and after the coup d'état.

At this juncture, while the public's disaffection with the union was growing apace, the government in Syria itself was seriously weakened by a power struggle between President Abdel Nasser and Abd al-Hamid as-Sarraj. Sarraj, as President of the Syrian executive council and Syrian Minister of the Interior and head of the security service, had accumulated extensive power, and had become the lynch pin of the regime in Damascus; (MER 1960, pp 463, 500). By all accounts, he had also become a much-hated man because of the police terror which he employed as an instrument of rule. For both reasons Abdel Nasser resolved to remove him from Damascus. Thus, under the new government set-up, Sarraj was made Vice-President for Internal Affairs and transferred to Cairo while Field Marshal Amer, the President's most trusted assistant, was assigned to Damascus to supervise the effective unification of the two regions. (Amer and Sarraj, it may be recalled, had previously engaged in a power struggle in 1956-60 when Amer was in Damascus as the President's representative to supervise Syrian affairs; at that time, however, Sarraj gained the upper hand.) In mid-September Sarraj returned to Syria and engaged Amer in a power struggle that ranged over the National Union, the political field, and—most important of all—the security service. Abdel Nasser personally intervened, calling both of them back to Cairo, but to no avail. On September 26 Sarraj submitted his resignation, whereupon Abdel Nasser ordered Amer to return to Damascus immediately. Sarraj lost no time in following Amer there and resuming the struggle. With these events security in Syria deteriorated, the atmosphere became tense and uncertain, demonstrations broke out, and the dissolved political parties showed signs of life, demanding that the question of union be reconsidered. These conditions aided a conspiracy of army officers which had been hatching for a long time, and in the early morning of September 28, a coup d'état was launched in Syria which led before the day was out, to the break-up of the UAR. (A special synopsis on this topic will be found below.)

In Egypt (which retained the name of the United Arab Republic) stability was preserved though there was some unrest. Foreign, mostly unfriendly, sources alleged that the country was on the brink of revolution. In the first fortnight after the Syrian secession, Abdel Nasser later said, "reactionaries" had started to move against the revolution. A number of army officers, reported by Cairo to have been involved in a "grave affair," were arrested. However, no emergency security precautions were reported during this period except for the reinforcement of the guards around the President's home. The President later said that while there was a tendency to "talk and philosophize," he had then come to feel that the country was stable. Indeed, no verifiable evidence was available to the contrary.

For Abdel Nasser and the ruling group this fortnight was a period of stocktaking. In a speech on October 5, Abdel Nasser lifted the diplomatic blockade he had imposed on Syria, and thereafter the emphasis shifted from preoccupation with Syria to a re-evaluation of Egypt's internal situation.

Immediately after the coup Abdel Nasser stated that Egypt would continue to pursue Arab unity. On October 16 the President announced his new internal policy. He said that there were only two alternatives: submission to despair or revolution, and, he proclaimed, "I have made my choice . . . ours is the road of revolution." (Beginning with his speeches on the day of the Syrian coup—and in contrast to his past habit, Abdel Nasser emphasized his personal task and responsibilities in Egyptian and Arab affairs). Abdel Nasser enumerated five errors that, he said, the revolution had made, and outlined remedies: (1) The Syrian secession was a counter-attack on the socialist revolution by reaction, aided by imperialism. This was made possible because the revolution had made peace with reaction. Henceforth reaction would be fought without compromise. (2) The National Union had been allowed to lapse into a mere organizational facade; it must be remade into a revolutionary tool of the masses. (3) Inadequate efforts had been made to mobilize the masses for active participation in the revolution; henceforth they must be inculcated with revolutionary fervor. (4) The administration had proved unequal to the huge revolutionary task imposed upon it and must be reorganized on a revolutionary basis. (5) Opportunism had not completely disappeared; it must be eradicated, and the ideals and morality of society must be reformed. In conclusion, Abdel Nasser assured his audience that he would remain at the head of the revolution "as long as God wills."

The new policies were soon given concrete form. According to Egyptian figures, some 55 persons were detained and the monetary property of some 820 "capitalist reactionaries" was sequestered; foreign sources believed the numbers to have been much higher. Non-Arab names, chiefly Jewish, Greek, American, Lebanese and Syrian—were much in evidence on the sequestration lists; the Egyptians affected were leading families in commerce and industry. In addition to their declared purpose these measures were regarded also as a further advance on the road of Egyptian socialism. They also constituted a practically final step in the Egyptianization of the economy; henceforth not only the ownership but also the management of the big companies would be virtually all Egyptian.

The government was reshuffled, without, however, any significant changes in the key positions. Committees and a technical office were set up for the organization of the administration, under the supervision of Vice-President Abd al-Latif al-Baghaddi. The practical measure that issued from these preparations before the end of the year was the establishment of a Supreme Council for [Economic] Public Organizations, chaired by the President of the Republic. The Council was to supervise 38 public organizations comprising a total of 367 companies. (A decree for the establishment of a similar council, to be headed by Amer, had also been issued in April.)

The remaking of the National Union was launched by the President on November 4 with a declaration on the "reorganization of all national popular powers." The reorganization, the declaration said, must ensure the mobilization of the people; the revolutionary action must be closely linked to a definite plan, and the people itself must steer the revolutionary movement. The following steps would be taken: (1) A Preparatory Committee would be called to examine the question of representation in a National Congress of Popular Powers. (2) Elections to the National Congress would be held in time for it to convene in January 1962; the Congress would debate and finalize a charter for national action presented to it by the President. (3) The charter would serve as the basis for general elections to constituent committees of the National Union in every village and town; from these committees would arise the General Congress of the National Union, the supreme popular authority in the country, which would decide on the drafting of a permanent constitution. The National Assembly was terminated, as already mentioned above.

The Preparatory Committee, comprising 250 members, was appointed by Presidential decrees on November 18, and commenced work on November 25. In his opening address President Abdel Nasser stressed that the "reactionaries," the "enemies of the masses" must be "isolated," as a prerequisite for "full freedom and democracy for the people."

The debate, which was held in open session and in which the President repeatedly intervened, revolved around three main topics: who are the "popular powers" and how are they to be represented in the National Congress?; who are the enemies of the people and how should they be treated?; questions of democracy and the freedoms. Views on these questions differed widely. The chief proponent for the liberal outlook was Khālid Muhammad Khālid, the well-known Islamic modernist; he maintained that the "popular powers" were all the citizens, including the reactionaries, he opposed "isolation" as undemocratic, and he demanded the immediate restoration of democratic liberties. Khālid's principal opponent in the debate was the President himself; he insisted on "political isolation" of the "enemies of the revolution," and reiterated his oft stated view that there was no room in the UAR for a Western-type democracy, with its political parties and implied "dictatorship of capital." A position to the left of Abdel Nasser was represented by Ihsan Abd al-Qudus, who advocated the establishment of a socialist cadre party. The President, however, continued to oppose a one party system on the grounds that it would exclude the majority of the people from the political process.

The Preparatory Committee adopted resolutions on the question of "isolation" and the composition of the National Congress. There were to be two forms of "isolation": (1) "isolation" of the "enemies of the people's socialist revolution"; (2) "exclusion" of "those whose interests are incompatible with the interest of the people at the present stage of socialist reconstruction"; the resolutions went on to define these categories. The National Congress would consist of 1,500 members, with a fixed percentage for eight sectors of the popular powers: farmers (25%), workers (20%), "national capitalists" (10%), professional associations (15%), civil servants (9%), university teachers, students and women—7% each. In each of these sectors fixed allocations were provided for sub-sectors, institutions etc.

The Preparatory Committee completed its task on December 31.

ECONOMIC SURVEY OF THE UAR (EGYPT)

The following survey (apart from the demographic details) is largely based upon the following sources:

- National Bank of Egypt: Economic Bulletin, Vol. XIV, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 1961.
- MEED, Monthly, June 1962: Extracts from the Report of the Board of Directors of the Central Bank of Egypt for the Year 1961.
- Federation of the Industries in the UAR: Year Book, July 1962.
- Central Bank of Egypt: Economic Review, Vol. 1, No. 1, 1961.

GENERAL

In 1961 the Egyptian economy underwent a radical change following the issue and implementation of a long series of nationalization decrees and laws, particularly the "July revolutionary decrees." These decrees invested the public sector with a dominant influence over all branches of the economy with the exception of retail trade and agriculture. The private sector was eliminated completely from many economic branches (banking, insurance, import trade) and reduced to a minor partner of the public sector in others (heavy and medium industry, transport, export trade). The government justified these measures and the general reorganization of the state institutions as necessary to ensure the implementation of the overall plan for economic and social development, the building of a socialist society and the ending of "monopolist exploitation." The property confiscations in October-November, affecting over 800 Egyptian nationals and members of minority groups, were motivated mainly by security and political considerations arising from the implications of the break-up of the UAR. An immediate effect of all these measures was the greatly increased managerial and technical burden placed upon the Egyptian state bureaucracy.

The performance of the Egyptian economy in 1961 was less satisfactory than in 1960. A serious deterioration in agricultural production contributed to an increased trade deficit and renewed pressure upon the balance of payments, resulting in a further decrease in net foreign exchange holdings. The government was forced to rely more heavily upon credit from the banking system to finance greater budget expenditure, both for current needs and for development projects. Dependence upon foreign assistance also increased.

Positive developments included a relatively large increase in industrial production and the continued implementation of the 5-year economic development plan, although at a slower rate than originally envisaged.

DEMOGRAPHY

The population of Egypt in 1961 was estimated at 26,716,000, an increase of 732,000, or 2.8%, over the 1960 census figure of 25,984,000.

Life expectancy at birth for the average Egyptian male and female was estimated at 51.6 and 53.8 years respectively in 1960. This represented a major improvement on the figures for 1955 which were estimated at 35.63 and 41.48 respectively.

The economically active population of Egypt in 1960 was estimated at 7,769,067, of whom 4,402,925 were in agriculture and fishery and 881,576 were in industry and construction. 614,200 were females. Employers and independent workers totalled 2,318,628, while salaried employees and wage earners totalled 3,836,459. Family workers accounted for the bulk of the remaining economically active population.

ECONOMIC LEGISLATION

(March-July)

On March 2 the Miar Organization was established as a public economic organization having an independent entity and attached to the Presidency of the Republic (Rep. Decree No. 249/1961). The capital of the organization was to be formed from Bank Misr capital and its shares in the capital of joint-stock companies, in addition to the capital of other public organizations to be fixed by a Presidential Decree.

Also on March 2, another public organization was established under the name of "Al-Nasr Organization" (Rep. Decree No. 250/1961). The capital of the organization comprised the capital of all companies established by the General Organization for the Execution of the Five-Year Industrial Plan, in addition to other companies and public organizations specified.

The functions of the Misr and Al-Nasr organizations were similar to those of the Economic Development Organization (EDO) set up in 1958, i.e. to lay down investment policy and to supervise the activity of the companies and establishments attached to each organization.

On April 8 a Supreme Council for Currency, Credit and Banking was formed (Rep. Decree No. 317/1961). The Council, headed by the Central Minister of Economy, was to undertake the definition of a general credit policy aimed at meeting the requirements of economic activities, and to take the appropriate measures for stabilizing and stimulating the national economy, to supervise the banking machinery, and to advise the government on financial and currency affairs.

Rep. Decree No. 486/1961 of April 16 provided for the establishment of a Supreme Council for [Economic] Public Organizations which would undertake the formulation of policy for these organizations. The Council was to be headed by Vice-President Abd al-Hakim Amer, with ten Central and Executive Ministers as members. [In December such a council was again established by a decree which made no reference to the above decree. See below.]

On June 6 Law No. 47/1961 was issued for the organization of the business of commercial agencies. All commercial agents were to register with the Ministry of Economy; registration was limited to UAR nationals and to companies entirely owned by UAR nationals. (On July 9 private persons were excluded altogether from agency business. See below.)

On June 22 three laws were promulgated reorganizing the cotton trade. Law No. 69 suspended the Alexandria Futures Market for an indefinite period. Law No. 70 authorized the Egyptian Cotton Commission to purchase the 1961/2 cotton crop, as well as cotton remaining from previous seasons, at prices defined in the schedule attached to the Law. Law No. 71 ruled that any cotton export establishment must assume the form of a UAR joint stock company with capital of not less than £E200,000 in which a public body or organization of economic character should have a share of at least 35%. Law No. 120/1961, issued on July 20, raised the public sector's participation in cotton export firms to 50% and granted a delay of six months to comply with the provision of Laws No. 71 and No. 120. On June 30 Pres. Decree No. 972/1961 was issued defining "The Egyptian Cotton Commission" as a public organization with an independent legal entity and attached to the Ministry of Economy.

Law No. 102/1961, issued on July 5, authorized the Central Bank of Egypt to grant loans from public funds deposited with the Bank to public organizations for projects scheduled under the development budget. Previously these organizations had resorted to grants-in-aid from the development budget.

THE JULY DECREES

The decrees of July, which marked a new stage in the development of the UAR towards a state directed society, were issued in four sets.

The First Set. On July 9 President Abdel Nasser issued five decrees, three of which aimed, according to the official commentary, "to complete the construction of a socialist society on strong and solid foundations and to put an end to all monopoly exploitation or damage to the national interest."

Decree 1174/1961 provided for the reorganization of maritime transport in the Southern R. All maritime transport companies [i.e. the Khedivial Mail Lines, the Alexandria Navigation Company, the Société Misr Navigation Maritime, and the General Navigation Company of Egypt] were to be incorporated into the General Maritime Navigation Company—a government corporation coming under the Southern R. Ministry of Communications. A further law (No. 109/1961) stipulated that the Khedivial Mail Line Co. [owned by Ahmad Abid] was to be nationalized. An explanatory note listed 12 charges of anti-national, anti-social and fraudulent behaviour on the part of Khedivial Mail as reasons for its nationalization.

Law No. 107/1961 restricted the business of commercial agencies to state-owned corporations or companies affiliated to public organizations comprising a governmental participation of at least 25% in their capital. A delay of one year was fixed for its application.

Law No. 110/1961 provided for the transference of the ownership of four cotton pressing enterprises to the state. The law provided for the formation of a General Organization for Cotton Pressing to take over the assets and liabilities of the nationalized firms. The shares of these companies were converted into 15-year 4% state bonds (as amended by Law No. 121 issued on July 20).

Finally a fifth decree [No. not available] laid down that purchases for governmental and public organizations might be effected only through the state-owned corporations concerned, without the invitation of tenders.

Rep. Decree No. 143 of July 12 provided for the conversion of the end-of-service indemnity system into a pensions system as from Jan 1, 1962.

The Second Set. On July 19 several far-reaching laws were promulgated.

Law No. 111/1961 provided for the amendment of the Companies Law No. 26/1954. Companies ready to distribute net profits would do so as follows: 5% for the purchase of government bonds; 75% of the balance to shareholders and 25% to employees and workers. The distribution of this 25% share was to be as follows: (1) 10% in cash upon the distribution of shareholders' dividends; (2) 5% to be appropriated for social services and housing as agreed upon between the company board and the labour syndicate; (3) 10% to be allocated for "central social services" for employees and workers.

Law No. 113/1961 set a £E5,000 p.a. ceiling for the total remuneration which any person might receive from any establishment, private or public.

Law No. 114/1961 stipulated that the number of members of the board of directors of any company or organization should not exceed seven, and that the board would include an employees' representative and a workers' representative. These two representatives would be elected by a secret general ballot for a one-year term of office, starting from July 1.

Law No. 115/1961 amended Law No. 99/1949, the general income tax law. The new law allowed tax exemption on incomes up to £E1,000. Tax rates ranged from 8% for the £E1,000-£1,500 bracket to 90% for all incomes over £E10,000. (A previously imposed defence tax on income was abrogated, as from the 1961 income, by Law No. 131 issued on July 25. The former maximum tax rate was 80% on incomes above £E30,000.)

Law No. 116/1961 provided for the closing of the Cairo and Alexandria stock exchanges for a period of two months as from the date of issue of this law. (The exchanges were reopened at the end of September, but were allowed to deal only with government bonds and shares of companies in which the government had an interest.)

The Third Set. On July 20 three laws were issued providing for a major extension of the public sector.

Law No. 117/1961 provided for the complete nationalization of all banks and insurance companies as well as certain specified companies and establishments. The shares of the companies and the capital of the establishments affected were to be converted into 15-year 4% state nominal negotiable bonds, redeemable wholly or partly after ten years. The price of each bond was fixed according to the last closing quotation of the share at the Cairo stock exchange. The nationalized firms would maintain their legal form and continue their activities and functions. In addition to 25 banks and insurance companies, 50 companies and establishments were affected in the Egyptian R. (as well as 23 in the Syrian R.). Among the more important companies affected, the following may be mentioned: The Delta Trading Co.; Société Misr pour le Commerce Extérieur; The Abu Zaabal and Kafr El Zayat Fertilizer and Chemical Co.; The Egyptian Copper Works Co.; Les Grands Hôtels d'Egypte; The United Egyptian Maritime Shipping Co.

Law No. 118/1961 provided for the participation of the government in the capital of certain companies and establishments. The law stipulated that 83 specified companies in the Egyptian R. as well as 12 in the Syrian R. would assume the form of Arab joint-stock companies with no less than a 50% participation in their capital by one of the public organizations. Compensation would be on the same basis as provided for in law 117. Some of the more important companies affected were: The Industrial & General Enterprises Engineering Co. (Osman Ahmad Osman); The Kafr El Zayat Cotton Co., Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields Co.; Philips Orient Co.; Al-Alamia Trading and Industrial Co.

Law No. 119/1961 limited the holdings of any natural or legal person in 147 specified companies in the Egyptian R. (and 11 in the Syrian R.) to a market value of £E10,000 (or £E100,000). The excess shares were to be transferred to the state against compensation as provided in the two laws above. Among the companies subject to Law No. 119 were: The Delta Engineering Co.; Société Générale de l'Industrie du Papier (RAKTA); The Egyptain Chemical Industries Co. (KIMA); The Egyptian Mining and Manganese Co.

Law No. 122/1961 of July 20 terminated the concession held by the Lebon Co. "for the exploitation (istighlāl) of gas and electricity in Alexandria," and transferred its assets and liabilities in this regard to a new public organization, "The Alexandria Electricity and Gas Organization."

Law No. 123/1961 of July 20 terminated the concession held by the Cairo Tramways Company "for the exploitation of transport by tram and trolley-bus in Cairo" and its property taken over by "The Cairo Public Transport Organization."

Rep. Decree No. 1203/1961, also issued on July 20, stipulated that the government, public authorities and companies with public participation of 25% or more may not, except by a Republican Decree, assign contracts worth more than £E30,000 to companies other than those in which the government or the public sector held no less than 50% of the capital. No single contractor could receive contracts from the public sector worth more than £E30,000 in the course of one year.

Law No. 125/1961 of July 21 stipulated that no person may be appointed to more than one post whether in government, public organizations, companies, societies or other establishments. A delay of one month was allowed for the enforcement of this law.

The Fourth Set. Law No. 127/1961 of July 25 amended the 1952 Agrarian Reform Law by reducing the maximum land ownership to 100 feddans while Law No. 128/1961 reduced the payments by recipients of agrarian reform lands by 50%. (For details, see below: Agrarian Reform.)

Law No. 129/1961 of July 25 provided for a progressive tax on buildings, ranging from 10-40 per cent of annual rent value, (instead of the former 10 per cent.)

Law No. 133/1961 of July 27—to be implemented within one year—provided for a forty-two hour week (excluding breaks) in industrial establishments to be designated by the Minister of Industry. Workers would not be allowed to work in more than one establishment, nor could establishments ask workers to work overtime or engage workers of other firms for part-time work without the permission of the Ministry of Industry. On the same date Law No. 134/1961 was issued authorizing the Minister of Industry to determine the quantity and the number of working shifts for each industrial establishment.

On July 28 and 30 and on August 1 the Minister of Industry published a list of a total of 370 firms—all Egyptian—affected by the decree. These steps were assumed to provide employment for 29,000 additional workers. The Minister also decreed that the reduction in working time would not entail a reduction in wages; this was later provided by Law No. 175/1961 of November 7.

Further Measures. Rep. Decree No. 1250/1961 of August 10 stipulated that loans—in cash or in kind—extended by the Crédit Agricole et Co-opératif to farmers and Cooperatives should be interest-free.

On August 31, a Rep. Decree was issued prohibiting the employment of any person with an annual salary or remuneration of £E1,500 or more in public organizations or in companies to which the state subscribed capital, except by a special Rep. Decree.

A further decree stipulated that old age, disability and death pensions, as well as Rep. Decree No. 143 (see above) would apply also to establishments employing less than five workers.

Steps to Aid Shareholders. On August 11 the following steps were announced to aid shareholders affected by the recent legislation: (1) "small shareholders" whose total holdings did not exceed £E5,000 might cash up to £E1,000 in lieu of bonds; (2) shareholders might obtain up to £E5,000 in bank loans on the security of bonds, at 85% of their value, at 3.25% annual interest; (3) shareholders might obtain up to £E5,000 in bank loans on the security of shares, at 40% of their value and at 5% annual interest.

Economic Legislation after Syrian Secession. Law No. 166/1961 promulgated on October 21 provided for the postponement of the repayment of debts of nationalized companies for a period of six months.

On November 2 two laws were promulgated concerning house-rents. Law No. 168/1961 provided for a reduction of 20% on the rentals of houses built after June 1958. Law No. 169/1961 provided for certain exemptions from the tax on buildings in favour of tenants through deductions from the rent.

In conformity with Presidential Decree No. 1899/1961 promulgated on December 16, a Supreme Council for [Economic] Public Organizations was established under the chairmanship of the President of the Republic, with the vice-presidents and the competent ministers as members. Each minister was made responsible for the supervision of one or more of the public organizations. The Council was to define production targets of public organizations, ensure their inter-coordination, and follow up the progress of work in its various stages. The Council would approve the budget of the public business sector and its final accounts. The public business sector was grouped in 38 public organizations comprising a total of 367 companies. (For full details, see National Bank of Egypt, Economic Bulletin, Vol. XIV, No. 4, 1961.)

Presidential Decree No. 1900/1961, also issued in December, defined the competence and responsibilities of guiding, organizing, controlling and supervising all public organizations within the competence of the respective ministers.

On December 27, Law No. 189/1961 imposed a new tax on exports, with a maximum rate of 20% of their value.

Law No. 190/1961, issued on the same day, provided for the cancellation of the tax imposed on transfers and foreign exchange authorized for travellers abroad.

On December 31, three ministerial decrees were promulgated regarding foreign payments and receipt and repatriation of Egyptian banknotes. The first decree, No. 1492/1961 [sic; 1942?], stipulated that a premium of 20% would be collected or granted upon all payments and receipts. (This was, in fact, an unofficial devaluation of the Egyptian currency.) The second decree, No. 1493 [sic; 1943?], prohibited taking Egyptian banknotes into or out of the country. The third decree, No. 1494, [sic; 1944?], granted a period of grace, ending February 1, 1962, during which Egyptian notes held outside the country could be repatriated through authorized banks.

NATIONAL INCOME

National income (gross value added) at current prices was estimated at £E1,364m. in 1960/61, and at constant prices (1952=100) at £E1,147m. This represented an average annual rate of increase since 1952 of 6.8% at current prices and 4.5% at constant prices.

The following table shows the composition of national income for 1952/3 and 1960/1 at current prices and constant prices (1952/3 prices).

AGRICULTURE AND AGRARIAN REFORM

Agriculture. 1961 was an unsatisfactory year for agriculture. While the area under cotton was increased at the expense of other crops, the average yield per feddan deteriorated by about one third as a result of worm attack. The dislocation caused by the nationalization of cotton trading firms in June also contributed to the crop failure as these firms had previously played an important role in supplying working capital, insecticides and other services to the cotton growers. The wheat crop was reduced in proportion to the smaller area allocated to it, thus necessitating larger imports of wheat, flour and maize (most of which were received from the US under PL 480). Owing to the insufficiency of waters from the previous flood, the area under rice decreased by 24%, providing a quantity hardly sufficient to meet local requirements.

The following table reflects the production trends for main agricultural crops.

		Area (000's feddans)	Production (000's metric tons)	Yield (metric tons/fed)

Agrarian Reform. The most important event in agrarian reform was the promulgation on July 25 of Law No. 127/1961 amending the 1952 Agrarian Reform Law. According to President Abdel Nasser, the 1952 law had not always been effectively implemented; certain families had managed, by devious methods, to retain as much as 3,000 feddans instead of the maximum 200 plus 100 for all the children, as permitted by law; the rents imposed by the landowners on the tenants had been considerably higher than those fixed by law (seven times the annual land tax).

The new law reduced the maximum ownership limit from 200 to 100 feddans. Excess land was to be seized by the government against compensation in the form of 15-year 4% nominal state bonds. As from the agricultural year 1961/2, no individual was allowed together with his wife and minor children, to acquire through rent, seizure or other means more than 50 feddans of agricultural land minus what they already owned. Also on July 25, Law No. 128/1961 was issued providing for a reduction of 50% in the instalments and interests still due on the price of land distributed or to be distributed to beneficiaries in accordance with the Agrarian Reform Law.

The law of 1952 resulted in the government's appropriation of about 500,000 feddans of excess holdings.

By 1961 about 430,000 feddans had been distributed among 160,000 families. Under the new law an estimated 380,000 feddans were to become available for distribution. The following table shows the distribution of land ownership in 1952 before the introduction of agrarian reform, and in 1961. It also gives an estimate for the situation after the distribution of lands in the framework of the new law. The table apparently does not include in the 1961 figures some 80,000 feddans of new lands reclaimed in the period from 1952 to 1961.

 Estimates

 The increase in this category in both the number of owners and the area owned was thought to result mainly from the provisions of the first Agrarian Reform Law, as it authorized the owners of more than 200 feddans to concede 50 feddans to each child, with a maximum of 100 feddans for all the children of each landlord.

THE BUDGET; DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

Expenditure. The 1961/2 budget (July to June) estimated total expenditure at £E778.1m., an increase of £E78.8m. over the estimates for the previous year. The breakdown was as follows:

ESTIMATES OF BUDGET EXPENDITURES

	1960/1 £E m.	1961/2 £E m.
Ordinary Budget (including contribution to UAR unified budget)	301.0	335.0
Development Budget	285.9	320.0
Annexed Independent Budgets (Posts, institutions etc.)	176.9	197.3
	763.8	852.3
Less: Contribution of Ordinary and Development Budgets to Annexed Budgets	63.7	73.4
	700.1	778.9

The preliminary results of the 1960/1 final accounts showed that ordinary expenditures fell short of the estimate by about £E14.8m., whereas ordinary revenues at £E337.6m. fell short by £E33.3m. Actual development budget expenditures amounted to £E198m., while actual revenues of the development budget aggregated £E163m. As a result of these developments, public debt rose by £E66m.

The increase in ordinary expenditure estimates in 1961/2 as compared with the previous year was mainly attributable to the increase in allocations to the armed forces (from £E87m. to £E103m.) and the increase in cost of living and supply subsidies (from £E16.5m. to £E36.5m.).

Revenues. Ordinary budget revenues in 1961/2 were estimated at £E423m. as compared with £E371m. in 1960/1. A newly introduced revenue item was government profits from public organizations (£E40.2m.) which comprised profits accruing to the government from publicly owned and nationalized enterprises. In addition, an increase of £E22.8m. was estimated in the contribution of public organizations with annexed budgets to the development budget (from £E16.9m. to £E39.7m.). Customs receipts estimated at £E130.2m. continued to represent the largest single source of revenue.

Development Budget. As set out above, actual expenditure under the 1960/1 development budget fell considerably short of the estimate. The 1961/2 development budget of £E320m.—representing the second year of the 5-year plan—was to be financed by a £E87m. surplus in the ordinary budget with the balance (£E232.8m.) to be financed from foreign loans and facilities, private savings and bank credit. The original development budget estimate (to which £E5.0m. was added by the National Assembly) was distributed as follows:

Development Projects. (For industrial projects, see above: Industry). Execution of the 1960-1964 5-year development plan continued during the year, although at a considerably slower rate than originally envisaged, as may be seen from the figures of actual expenditure in 1960/1, below.

	£E m.	%
Agriculture	40.3	12.8
Irrigation and drainage	18.2	5.8
High Dam project ¹	13.7	4.3
Industry	93.3	29.6

Security, Justice and Defence	1.4	0.5
Services	27.8	8.8
Miscellaneous	6.6	2.1
Total	315.0	100.0

¹ The total budget allocated to the High Dam project amounted to £E27.3m., but £E13.6m. of this was distributed among other sectors associated with the High Dam project.

Aswan High Dam. The work on the Aswan High Dam project ran behind schedule owing to a number of factors: a shortage of technical personnel, the inexperience of local contracting companies, the delay in the completion of certain preparatory work (roads, electrical installations, housing, warehouses etc.), the unsuitability of certain Soviet mechanical equipment for local conditions and the frequent exchanges of Soviet personnel owing mainly to difficult living conditions at Aswan. Towards the end of the year, Egyptian army units were ordered to contribute personnel (mainly drivers and mechanics for heavy equipment) to help speed up the work. (On the dam, see also p 660.)

Suez Canal. In April the eighth plan for the development of the Suez Canal, allowing for the passage of ships with a 37 ft. draught, was completed. At the same time the implementation of the 10-year Nasser development plan began. The plan was designed to eventually allow the simultaneous passage of ships of 47 ft. draught in both directions.

Other transportation projects included the inauguration of a new international airport at Cairo, the award of a contract for building a major bridge over the Suez Canal at Firdan to a German firm, and the completion of a new oil wharf at Suez allowing two 65,000 ton tankers to berth. The United Arab Airlines ordered another two Comet 4 airliners for delivery in 1962, which would bring their number to seven, and bought three DC 6 aircraft. New air routes opened during the year included links between Cairo and Accra, Lagos, Conakry, Benghazi, and Tripoli, and the renewal of the Cairo-Nicosia route.

Oil Field Discovery. The Compagnie Orientale des Pétroles, an Egyptian-Italian enterprise, discovered in the Gulf of Suez Egypt's first off-shore oil field. In November this company was awarded two new concession areas, in Sinai and in the Delta.

FOREIGN TRADE, BALANCE OF PAYMENTS

Foreign Trade. The Egyptian foreign trade deficit in 1961 was the largest since 1952.

There was relatively little change in the composition of imports. Foodstuffs accounted for £E59.8m., other consumer goods for £E32.5m., raw materials and capital goods for £E144.3m., and other goods for £E2.0m.

Almost all of the net decline of 15.8% in exports was due to the decrease in raw cotton exports from £E134.7m. in 1960 to £E104.6m. in 1961. Exports of rice also decreased from £E9.8m. to £E7.2m. There was little change in industrial exports, the most important of which were cotton yarn and piece goods—£E13.8m., and mineral and chemical products—£E15.5m.

Direction of Trade. The Communist bloc accounted for 24.2% of Egypt's imports and 45.1% of her exports (24.9% and 44.5% respectively in 1960). The countries of the European Common Market accounted for 12.2% of her exports and 19.2% of her imports (12.3% and 27.1% respectively in 1960). The countries of the Arab League accounted for 14.5% and 7.4% of her exports and imports respectively (10.0% and 8.6% in 1960). Countries of Black Africa accounted for 0.2% and 0.7% of her exports and imports respectively (0.7% and 0.6% in 1960). (For details see Tables of Trade pp 82-7 ff.)

Balance of Payments. The 1961 balance of payments showed a deficit of £E39.8m. on current account (£E23.6m. in 1960), which was balanced mainly by US foreign aid and by a further deterioration of the net foreign exchange holdings. Suez Canal revenues continued to play a major role among current receipts. Compensation payments in 1961 (to Sudan and the Suez Canal Co. shareholders) were much smaller than in the previous year, when a large payment to Britain was effected. The previous table presents the detailed position.

Foreign Reserves. According to the International Monetary Fund, Egypt's net foreign reserves (including gold, foreign exchange and short term liabilities) at the end of 1961 amounted to £E27.9m., compared with £E49.4m. at the end of 1960, and £E229.4m. at the end of 1953. Gold reserves remained stable at £E60.6m.; foreign exchange dropped to £E48.8m.; net drawing from the IMF reached £E17.6m.; the residue of £E63.9m. represented other net short term liabilities (mainly bilateral accounts).

Foreign Aid. Egypt continued to receive large scale foreign economic assistance, and several new technical and economic assistance agreements were signed during the year. The most important agreement was that concluded with West Germany in July, providing DM550m. credit for Egyptian development. (For details, see pp 77-9.)

MONETARY DEVELOPMENTS

Total money supply (as defined by the Central Bank of Egypt and not compatible with IMF estimates) expanded from £E653m. at the end of 1960 to £E712m. at the end of 1961, an increase of 9% compared with an increase of 8% during 1960. This expansion was mainly attributable to the rise in the claims on the government by the banking sector as a result of larger deficit spending, and to the expansion of the public sector. Claims on government reached £E397m. at the end of 1961, compared with £E328m. and £E246m. at the end of 1960 and 1959 respectively. Strong pressure was thus created, both upon the external balance of payments and upon internal monetary stability.

The official wholesale price index at the end of 1961 stood at 102, compared with 100 at the end of 1960 (1958 = 100). During the year the National Bank of Egypt began operating as a purely commercial bank, after handing over its issue department to the newly constituted Central Bank of Egypt, which began to undertake all the usual functions of a central bank.

In accordance with the Egyptianization Law affecting banks operating in Egypt, several foreign banks (including banks of Italian, American and Japanese nationality), were absorbed by local Egyptian banks.

EGYPTIAN AID TO AFRICAN COUNTRIES

1961 saw a concerted Egyptian attempt to enhance Egypt's economic relations with the new nations of Africa. In March 1961 an agreement was reached whereby Egypt extended a £E3m. loan to Mali, at 2.5% for a period of seven years. This loan was to be utilized to pay for Egyptian services and goods involved in executing in Mali development projects to be decided upon by the two governments. By the end of the year implementation of these projects had not yet begun. In May Egypt extended a £E6m. loan to Guinea, on similar terms; utilization of this loan had not begun by the end of the year.

CURRENT AFFAIRS BEFORE THE BREAK-UP OF THE UAR

THE NATIONAL UNION

(January-September)

THE NU AT THE GOVERNORATE LEVEL

Organization. On March 20 Kamāl ad-Dīn Husseini, Controller-General of the NU in the Southern R., issued certain amendments to Decree No. 9 of 1959 concerning the organization of the NU. (Compare MER 1960, p 480 and adjacent table.)

The Governorate General Committee would include the executive committees of the districts (marāḳiā), town quarters (aḳḳām) and autonomous sub-districts (banādīr), as well as representatives of public organizations and government departments whose number in the committee was not to exceed that of the elected members. The Governorate Congress would consist of the members of the General Committee and all other NU executive committees in the governorate. The Governorate General Committee was to convene at least once every three months; the Governorate Congress was to convene at least one month before the Regional General Congress.

The chairman of the Governorate Executive Committee would serve as chairman of the Governorate General Committee and Congress. (Ahram, March 21)

On March 21 Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein issued a decree determining the functions of the Governorate Congress: resolutions concerning NU activities and programmes in the governorate; direction of NU governorate committees in accordance with the policies fixed at the national and regional levels; discussion of resolutions taken by the Governorate General Committee. (Ahram, March 22)

On April 4 Hussein appointed rapporteurs (mugarrirīn) to the executive committees at all levels above the village. (Ahram, April 5)

Governorate Congresses and Meetings. The first Governorate Congress took place before the issue of the decree determining its functions, at Buhayra, on March 7 (Ahram, March 8). After the issue of the decree the following governorate congresses took place: at Daqhalīya (Ahram, May 8), Damietta (Ahram, May 9), Qina (Ahram, May 15), Sawhaj (Ahram, May 15), Gharbiya (Ahram, May 24), Cairo (Ahram, July 6). Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein participated in all these congresses. The discussions dealt with local questions; resolutions called for broader government services in the fields of health, education, cooperation, rural industries, and the establishment of tourist facilities; the Cairo congress also passed resolutions on Arab affairs.

[The governorate executive committees, in addition to organizing the governorate congresses, also held joint meetings with local authorities.] Thus, in Feb the Alexandria committee met in joint session with the members of the Governorate Council, the [Alexandria] members of the National Assembly and the "heads of the services" [departmental directors?] to discuss the implementation of the five-year plan in the governorate (Ahram, Feb. 13). Similar meetings took place at Sawhaj in April and at Damietta in May. At Sawhaj it was decided to form 20 social centres and eight village councils; at Damietta NU members took it upon themselves to rebuild the harbour with the aid of the government and the local authorities. (Gumhuriyah, April 4; Ahram, May 9)

Proceedings of Congress Described; People Exhorted to Self-Help; Grievances of Private Economy Sector Aired at Port Said. Following are excerpts from a description of an NU governorate meeting at Port Said at the end of December, 1960. This meeting preceded the series of governorate congresses.

Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein opened the meeting saying that the citizens of Port Said must start exercising self-help, and then they would receive help from the government; if everything was expected from the central authorities there would be no need for local government. A debate developed when Dr Aziz Sidqi, Minister of Industry, blamed local interests for their lack of initiative and cooperation with the authorities in the furtherance of industrial projects. A local NU member explained that, "to be candid," industrial awareness was not developed at Port Said, whose population consisted first and last of traders. Here he was interrupted by Hussein who demanded: "Well, whose fault is that? Mine? Or the minister's? Or the government's?" He put the responsibility on the population, since "there are, after all, committees of consciousness (was'y) and of guidance." The NU member then complained of the bureaucratic entanglements over the allotment of building sites to industrialists. To this Hussein replied: "You have now an independent governorate; do as you see fit." The same NU member told of a privately-owned enterprise for the sorting of citrus fruit which had only just been established when the Ministry of Economy decided to take it over. Dr Sidqi intervened to say that the takeover was not carried out, but the Exports Promotion Council had found it necessary, for the public good, to put the enterprise under its control. Hussein remarked: "You see, nothing has happened after all!" When the NU member replied that the intention to appropriate the firm was there anyway, Hussein said: "Even in that case we should understand that the public and private sectors complement each other. The state and the people are not on opposing sides..." Hussein cited West Germany, which he had visited shortly before, as an example of economic reconstruction achieved primarily by the people themselves; the industrial labourer there had worked for half-pay because he understood that by rebuilding his country he was working for his own interests.

Another NU member brought up the merchants' grievances. After the Suez campaign, the government, recognizing the damage suffered by the merchants, had granted them loans, and it was unjust that repayment should be demanded. Dr Hasan Salāh ad-Dīn, the [Southern R.] Minister of Finance, replied that debtors who could prove their insolvency would not be liable. The announcement roused applause.

There were complaints concerning health conditions at Port Said, lack of doctors and hospital space. Hussein turned sharply on the Director of Health, who promised in each case redress, "God willing."

There were difficulties about the verification of birth certificates, due to the havoc wrought during the Suez campaign. Hussein suggested the transfer of the copies kept at Cairo to Port Said. There was more applause.

Members asked for the suspension, pending repeal by the next NU General Assembly, of an antiquated law which complicated customs procedure. Hussein replied that nobody had the right to disobey a valid law; if the law was bad, it could be changed by the National Assembly.

Mahmūd Yūnis, Chairman of the Suez Canal Authority, was criticized for issuing regulations which prevented Port Said merchants and artisans from trading with passing ships. Yūnis claimed that these regulations were necessary for the smooth functioning of Canal traffic. Hussein then asked Yūnis to give sympathetic attention to a definite proposal to lengthen the stay of ships at Port Said, thus increasing the business of local merchants.

The meeting had lasted seven hours. (Musawwar, Dec 23, 1960)

Positive Effects of Congresses Seen; Education of People in Democratic Procedure; Freedom of Speech Exercised. An article in Al-Akhabr in March extolled the merits of the NU governorate congresses: They brought the people into contact with the authorities. They led on the road to unity. They made the various sections of the public coalesce into the socialist society. They helped create a new leadership. They turned out new ideas. Finally, they instilled into the people a sense of order; e.g. when discussions grew stormy, when disputing groups emerged and disorder broke out, Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein would bang his gavel, all would calm down, and he would say: "Get used to order; get to know your rights and duties, let everyone speak his mind and not interrupt anyone who has something to say and permission to say it!"

The author said the congresses were completely democratic and cited instances of the freedom of speech ruling there. Thus, at Awan the local Director of Municipal Affairs "fearlessly charged the Ministry's representatives at the congress with administrative defects, such as a scarcity of officials. The Cairo representative rejected the charge and quoted figures which the local man rebutted as incorrect. Hussein was compelled to intervene and promised that the quota of officials would be fulfilled. In another instance the local Director of Education told Dr Nagib Hāshim, the Southern R. Minister of Education, that the Awan technical secondary school had no teacher of electricity. The general consternation at this was shared by Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein, who served also as UAR Minister of Education. He asked why the Director had kept silent and had not requested the loan of a teacher from one of the firms working on the High Dam. The Director replied that he had despatched many letters to Cairo asking for a speedy settlement. Hussein cut him short, turned to Hāshim, and demanded that the Cairo official responsible should be disciplined: "this disorder and irresponsibility must be stopped!" Hāshim promised to look personally into the affair upon his return to Cairo. (Akhbar, March 19)

At the Congress of Gharbiya Governorate a fellah complained to Hussein that he had grown a record crop of cotton, and yet the prize had gone to another grower whose yield had been lower. Hussein gave orders to pay the fellah £E100 "by 9 a.m. next morning" and told the man to send him a telegram if he had not received the money by 9.05 a.m. The fellah shouted: "Long live justice! Long live the Revolution! Long live Gamāl Abdel Nasser!" and everyone applauded. (Akhbar al-Yaum, May 27)

Shortcomings of Congresses. An Al-Masā' correspondent, after enlarging on the importance of the governorate congresses as the embodiment of true democracy and the real source of legislation, also enumerated their shortcomings. These were locquacy; vagueness as to the range of subjects which could be treated at these congresses profitably; selfishness (at Tanta a delegate had asked that the NU members be granted free tickets on buses, thereby incurring the wrath of Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein); the absence of women (at Sawhaj the chairman of the NU Women's Committee blamed the [male] delegates of the congress for the inactivity of women in the NU, in answer to Hussein's question.) (Masā', May 26)

Mūsā Sabri, in Al-Gumhuriyah, criticized the congresses on three points: (1) some of the resolutions were "contrary to socialism," e.g., in Qina there had been demands for the return of lands leased by small tenants to their owners; (2) some of the demands were extravagant and could not be satisfied even if the state budget were doubled; (3) "The most important point" was that "the new principles had not so far been spread among the population." (Gumhuriyah, May 17)

OTHER DEVELOPMENTS IN THE NU

NU for Women. In March it was reported that the NU in cooperation with the Ministry of Social Affairs had prepared a plan for the formation of a General Women's [National] Union in the Egyptian R. (ittihād āmm li-anisā' fi al-īqlīm al-miṣri.) This organization would include representatives of the women's union which would be established in the governorates and which would comprise representatives of women's leagues, the rapporteurs of the NU Women's Committee, women students' organizations, working mothers' councils and others. (Ahram, March 24)

The aims of the organization would be to enable women to participate in the building of the socialist democratic cooperative society, to assist in economic development and to establish ties with women's organizations in Asia, Africa and the world at large. (Akhbar al-Yaum, April 22)

In June details were published on the organizational setup of the Women's NU as prepared by the sub-committee for Women's Activities, headed by Fātimah Anān, and as amended by Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein. Every woman of 16 and above would be eligible for membership. (For further details see Ahram, June 21, July 6.) (There were no further developments.)

Activities of Committees. [The Supreme Executive Committee (headed by President Abdel Nasser) apparently did not meet at all.]

In Jan the Executive of the Egyptian R. Executive Committee resolved that ministers should take part in the deliberations of the permanent professional committees dealing with matters pertaining to their ministries (Akhbar, Jan 2), discussed the definition of the [practical] meaning of cooperative democratic socialism in all sectors [of the public] (Gumhuriyah, Jan 9), and agreed to establish a labour-health organization within the NU. (R. Cairo, Jan 11 [W 19])

The Permanent Committee of Suggestions proposed changing the name of the Ministry of the Interior to the Ministry of General Security (al-amn al-amm), "in accordance with its real function" (Ahram, March 2). It devoted a session to the problem of unemployment among university graduates, particularly in arts and commerce; various suggestions were made concerning the creation of posts (Ahram, June 27). It also dealt with the following proposals, among others: To fight obsolete customs, and to allow girls the free choice of a husband; to require worshippers to buy a television receiver for every mosque; to ensure the inviolability of homes and to prevent informers (muhabirin) from harassing people in public; to make obligatory the exposure of immoral houses. (Ahram, April 29)

During the first half of the year reports appeared on sessions of various functional committees discussing the execution of the resolutions taken at the 1960 National Congress and new proposals. (Ahram, Jan 2, April 29, May 14, 17; Ruz al-Yusuf, April 3)

[Reports on the committees ceased to appear after the breakup of the UAR, but] in Dec it was reported that all the institutions of the NU continued to be active. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Dec 18)

NU Vetoes Umdah Candidates. Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein, on behalf of the NU, vetoed 15 candidates out of 200 for 45 posts of village headman (umdaḥ) in Egypt. (Ahram, March 3)

NU Seen to Have Failed at Village Level. Mamdūh Rida of Rūs al-Yūsuf, in a interview with Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein, cited examples of NU shortcomings at the village and district levels. Some committees were completely inactive while others included five members of the same family. There were instances of NU membership being used as a means of intimidation. Hussein replied that the first steps were the hardest and that mistakes were being studied and overcome. (Ruz al-Yusuf, May 29)

A journalist who visited the village of Fawriyah in

Bani Suef Governorate found that the landowners were exploiting the fellah in various ways. Strong ties between the landowners and officials made this situation difficult to correct. The only way was to teach the fellah his rights and how to insist on them. All agreed that this was the task of the NU. The local NU Secretary told the journalist: "I do a lot for the peasants... but I cannot do everything alone." Other NU members told the journalist that they were ready to take part in the effort. "If this is so," the journalist concluded, "what are they waiting for?" (Gumhuriyah, Aug 19)

High Level Congresses Postponed; Regional Committees Abolished. In April, after a meeting with Abd al-Hamid Sarraj, SG of the Syrian R. NU, Kamal ad-Din Hussein announced the postponement to Oct of the regional congresses planned for June, as well as the Second National Congress, planned for July, "to avoid any interference with the dates of the National Assembly meetings." (R. Cairo, April 15 [18])

Asked by a correspondent for the "real reasons" for the postponement, Kamal ad-Din Hussein gave three: (1) the months June-July were the last two of the financial year (sic; the financial year ended on June 30) and it was difficult to inspect the financial records before the close of the year; (2) the new plans of the ministries would not be completed by then; (3) it was the hottest season (Ruc al-Yusuf, May 29). [Another reason might have been the inactivity of the NU in the Syrian R.]

On Sept 19 a Presidential decree abolished the regional executive committees and ordered the formation of a Supreme NU Executive Committee consisting of the President of the NU (i.e. the President of the Republic) and 20 members. The Governorate Committees would be directly responsible to the Supreme Committee. This step was considered complementary to the unification of the government of the two regions in the previous month, and to the abolishment of "regionalism." The NU General Congress was postponed from Oct 1961 to Feb 1962. (Ahram; Gumhuriyah, Sept 20; MENA, Sept 20 [22])

General Criticism; Abdel Nasser; NU Became Mere Facade. Mûsa Sabri in Al-Gumhuriyah argued that Kamal ad-Din Hussein's speeches were not enough. Every citizen, particularly every villager, should know and understand the principles of the NU, and of the socialist cooperative democratic society. NU committees should work, not just talk. (Gumhuriyah, May 17)

Following the break-up of the UAR, President Abdel Nasser, in his speech of Oct 16, said that reaction had infiltrated the NU, paralyzed its revolutionary potential and "turned it into a mere organizational facade, unmoved by the force of the masses and their genuine demands." (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., Oct 17)

THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

(January-November)

SECOND ANNUAL SESSION OF THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY — FIRST SITTING

(January-February)

Second Annual Session. The second annual session of the National Assembly opened on Jan 9 as scheduled (see MER 1960, p 473); its first sitting, in which it passed eight bills, terminated on Feb 8. (Eg. Gaz., Jan 10; Ahram, Feb 9)

Of the 374 questions asked by members of the Assembly during the sitting, 127 were answered; the rest, as well as 35 bills proposed by members, were not dealt with for lack of time and were considered invalidated. (Ahram, Feb 17)

Ministers were questioned, among other subjects, on housing, food supply in the Northern R., the cost of living, reduction of fares between the two regions, the encouragement of fruit exports, the rising prices of text books, the plight of the Cairo homeless. (Ahram, Jan 10, 11, 12, 18)

Among matters debated were higher education (Ahram, Feb 2), agricultural policy in the Southern R., and medical services in the Northern R. One member complained that agricultural production lagged behind planned targets and criticized the Ministry for administrative shortcomings, particularly in the distribution of cotton seed and seed potatoes. The Southern R. Minister of Agriculture replied by explaining the agricultural development plan and quoted results achieved since 1952. (Ahram, Eg. Gaz., Feb 1)

The Constitution Committee. Having returned from the Casablanca conference, Abdel Nasser reported on it to the Assembly on Jan 23. He then asked the Assembly to begin work on the permanent constitution of the UAR in accordance with the provisional constitution of 1958 and also to discuss the ten-year development plan in the light of the six months experience since its inauguration. (Nasser's Speeches, p 12)

Anwar as-Saadât, President of the Assembly, explained that the draft constitution approved by the Assembly would be submitted to a general referendum. He said that it was impossible to estimate how long it would take the Assembly to complete the draft. The first draft would be prepared by a special constitution committee. (Ahram, Jan 24)

Following a debate on the procedures involved, the Assembly decided to elect by ballot a constitution committee of 90 members. The voting took place on Feb 7. There were 123 candidates; Saadât achieved first place with 460 votes. The committee was composed of 27 lawyers, five former ministers, two former civil servants, eight former army officers, seven physicians, one pharmacist, three journalists, five men of religion, one contractor, nine teachers, three workers, six businessmen and two accountants: three members were women. (Eg. Gaz., Jan 31; Ahram, Feb 7, 8, 9)

On April 19 the first meeting of the committee took place. Saadât, its chairman, proposed that the public should be enabled to offer suggestions and appear before the committee: he expressed the hope that the constitution would serve as a model for the entire Arab nation. (MENA, April 19 [21]; Eg. Gaz., April 20)

On April 25 a work plan presented to the Assembly provided for the following four sub-committees within the general constitution committee: principles and basic elements of society; system of government; phrasing; proposals. (Eg. Gaz., April 26)

A session of the committee was called on June 24 and later postponed for one day (Ahram, June 24, 25). [No later reports on the committee were encountered.]

LAST SITTING

The second [and last] sitting of the Assembly opened on April 11 and closed on June 23. Its main business was the annual budget.

On the first day of the sitting, Dr Qaysūni, the Central Minister of Economy and Finance, introduced the 1961/2 budget, which reached the record sum of £E903.4m.—£E774m. for the Southern R. and £S1,151m. for the Northern R. Dr Qaysūni analysed the threefold basis of UAR socialism: "socialism in ownership"—private ownership and enterprise without feudalism, exploitation and monopoly; "socialism in wealth"—development of the country's resources and a "reasonable standard of wealth" for "all who work hard and produce"; "socialism in combined production effort"—cooperation of the public and the private sectors. "Our pattern of socialism may require the public sector to exercise control over certain aspects of activity or perform them itself to ensure economic security," Dr Qaysūni said. Regarding foreign economic relations, Dr Qaysūni outlined a policy of "positive economic neutralism." (Ahram, Eg. Gaz., April 12)

The Assembly submitted the budget to the budget committee which in turn set up nine subcommittees (Ahram, April 13). On June 12 the Assembly began its discussion of the report of the budget committee. The committee suggested an increase in the development budget and Dr Qaysūni informed the Assembly that the Government had agreed. On June 21 the Assembly unanimously passed the amended budget in its final form with total expenditure amounting to £E910m.—£E780m. for the Southern R. and £S1,161m. for the Northern R. (Ahram, June 13, 20, 22; Eg. Gaz., June 22)

Questions and Debates. Questions to ministers concerned the plans for water supply to Syrian villages, high train fares (Ahram, April 25), relations with Muslim peoples and dissemination of Islamic culture (Ahram, April 26), the kidnapping of Eichmann by "Zionist gangs." (Ahram, May 3)

Among the subjects discussed were Algeria (Ahram, April 25), the failure of the government to prevent the slump of onion prices (Ahram, May 4), shortcomings of the railway and PTT services (Ahram, June 2), the harshness of the tax authorities in the Northern R. (Ahram, June 7)

Assembly Approves Al-Azhar Reorganization. In its final meeting on June 22–23, the Assembly approved a law for the reorganization and modernization of Al-Azhar in the face of strong opposition by a number of men of religion and others, among them Fathi Radwan, a former minister. According to the law Al-Azhar would comprise five bodies: the Supreme Council, the Islamic Studies Academy, the Islamic Culture and Missions Department, Al-Azhar University, and Al-Azhar Institutions. The law stipulated the establishment of faculties of Arabic studies, engineering and industries, agriculture, medicine, and administration, in addition to the faculty for Islamic studies. Al-Azhar would be attached to the Presidency of the Republic with a special minister responsible for it; the Rector would be appointed by the President of the Republic from among members of the Islamic Studies Academy. The Academy would be composed of 50 Islamic scholars—of whom 20 at the most might be non-UAR citizens—to be appointed by Presidential decree; it would undertake the "modernization of Islamic culture and the discarding of all forms of intolerance," and assist the University in directing Islamic studies. The Supreme Council which would establish the overall policy of Al-Azhar would be composed of the President of the University, four members of the Academy, the deans of the faculties, the undersecretaries of the ministries of Waqfs, Education, Justice, and Finance and three experts on education. The University's degrees would be made equal to those of other UAR universities. (Ahram, June 23, 24; Eg. Gaz., June 24)

Assembly Dissolved. [The Assembly played no part in the issue of the "socialist decrees" in July or the reorganization of government in Aug. Following the break-up of the UAR the 200 Syrian members resigned their seats. On Nov 7 the Assembly was terminated by a Presidential Decree. Later Abdel Nasser said that had the July decrees been brought before the Assembly, they would still be under discussion because "interests clash, of course." See p 627 b.]

REVOLUTIONARY DECREES AND GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION

THE JULY REVOLUTIONARY DECREES

(July)

From July 9 to July 27 a number of decrees and laws were issued, which aimed at "completing the construction of the socialist society... and putting an end to all monopoly exploitation or damage to the national interest," by large scale nationalizations, further restrictions on landholdings, provisions for workers to share in management and profits of companies, and related measures.

A survey of these laws will be found on pp 581–2. (See also p 601 for the impact of these laws on the Syrian R.) Below are given excerpts from President Abdel Nasser's speeches on this subject, as well as from an article by Muhammad Hassanein Haykal on the subject of Arab socialism versus Communism.

Abdel Nasser on the July Decrees. The July decrees were the main theme in President Abdel Nasser's speeches on the occasion of the revolution anniversary. Following is a précis, including direct quotations, of the major points Abdel Nasser made in his speeches in Cairo on July 22 and in Alexandria on July 26. (His speech of July 27 at Alexandria University was also relevant to the theme. For sources, see below.)

Social Revolution Launched Following Political Consolidation. Abdel Nasser said that from the beginning the revolution had been both political and social. The political revolution came first; the enemies had to be beaten back and a revolutionary political structure had to be established. Now political conditions had been consolidated; "we have therefore decided to put the social revolution into effect."

Abdel Nasser gave two reasons for the new measures: (1) the need to protect the political system which carried out the Socialist revolution from "feudalism, monopoly, and exploiting capitalism"; (2) the elimination of "class contradictions." In this connection he described the society which the revolution had inherited as the product of an alliance between imperialists, feudalists, and exploiting capitalists; it was a society of two classes, namely, the exploited and oppressed, who constituted 95% of the people, and the exploiters, who were less than 5% of the people, but who owned virtually all the country.

The New Society. Abdel Nasser said that during the previous decisive days the features of the new society—whose creation had been the intention of the 1952 Revolution—had been defined. Imperative revolutionary measures were being implemented. The new society provided for "private ownership without exploitation, and public ownership without confiscation"; it was a "society wherein every citizen could exercise his rights without humiliation or fear, a right which derives its prestige from its being a right."

Not Reform but Radical Change. Abdel Nasser said that the July 22 Revolution did not reform things, but was making a "complete change." "If we had said that we would reform society, God knows that we would not have been able to do much. We must change society completely from the base... We must build a totally new state... with a new political system, a new economic system, and a new social system... as a base for justice, just distribution and equal opportunities."

Nationalization to Protect Political Structure of State, Eliminate Class Contradictions. Abdel Nasser said that to protect the political structure of the state, which in turn guaranteed the attainment of the objective of the revolution, it was necessary to destroy "feudalism, monopolies, and the domination of exploiting capital." The feudalists and exploiting capitalists had been waiting for an opportunity to pounce on the revolution and to take over the government again. The weapon of the first was the land and the weapon of the latter was the means of production. The revolution had to deprive them of their weapons; hence the agrarian reform, introduced in 1952, and the nationalizations, which were started in 1956 with British and French properties.

Abdel Nasser said that these enemies of the revolution had used "sectarianism" (or confessionalism—ta'ifiyah) as a means of creating "religious fanaticism" (ta'asub dini). This "political sectarianism" was designed to divide the working class and safeguard the interests of reaction. [The President did not identify the protagonists of "sectarianism" and "religious fanaticism." In connection with the latter, see below—the justification of socialism on religious grounds.]

Failures of Agrarian Reform. Abdel Nasser said that the agrarian reform had not been as fully implemented as intended. The provision that land rent should amount to seven times the annual land tax had never been complied with; the landowners took much more from the fellahin, by fraudulent methods. Nor was feudalism destroyed, as was the aim. The law allowed for the landowner to retain 200 feddan, plus 100 feddan [for all his children]. In fact, families managed through fictitious bequests and sales to retain much more, and there were cases where families owned 3,000 feddans and continued to consider themselves feudal lords of the town and the peasants as their serfs. It was impossible for the revolution to permit this state of affairs to continue. Hence the new limitations on ownership.

Eliminating Class Contradictions without Malice. In the last few days, Abdel Nasser said, 400 establishments had been nationalized and transferred to the public sector. The aim was to eliminate class contradictions, so that ownership would not remain limited to a small group while the people as a whole remained deprived. The intention was not to punish anybody, hence the compensation for the nationalized properties. "We wanted to achieve this by peaceful means, without killing anyone, and without bearing malice against anyone." Abdel Nasser repeatedly emphasized this point, saying that the people, the working classes, in carrying out their revolution, were just yet generous.

Definition of Classes. Abdel Nasser defined the working class as "anyone who gets a wage for his work, from the President of the Republic to the worker using an axe." As to the capitalist exploiting class, it did not comprise all owners; there were those whose wealth was the result of their labour and who did not use their wealth to exploit others. "By the exploiting capitalist class I mean those who use their money to exploit the people and suck their blood." Ownership was a "social function, and when it turns to exploitation it departs from its function."

Duties of Work and Efficiency; Punishment for Negligence. Abdel Nasser enlarged on the duties of work and efficiency: "The way open to us... is to work... The factories are now owned by the people... By work alone shall we reach our goals—justice and sufficiency. Work is the only cause of the honest citizen. Without work he will have no place in society."

Abdel Nasser said that in the socialist cooperative democratic society class differences would, of course, remain; socialism did not mean equal wages. People were paid in accordance with the work they did, and with their efficiency. He said that every individual would have his place in society, but he should also know his duties. Service in the public sector was social service and carelessness in this sector was a crime. Whoever failed to carry out his responsibilities would be punished; negligence of the public interest would be regarded as endangering state security, and the penalty for this crime would be prison; the laws would be amended accordingly. The manager of a new textile mill whose roof collapsed was now in prison. (On July 26 it was announced that a committee had been set up to prepare a draft law making negligence a crime against the state, punishable by hard labour—MENA, July 26 [27].)

Abdel Nasser referred to the opinion of "some" that the expansion of the public sector would lead to mistakes being made. He said it was the reactionaries who were reiterating this. Mistakes were unavoidable, but the public sector made less than the capitalists.

As to bribes, anyone caught involved in a bribe was sent to prison. It had been discovered that private export and contracting companies had paid bribes. Administrative control and investigation would be employed against bribery, but the only real solution was the "nationalization of contracts, so that the public sector deals with the public sector."

"Islam Established First Socialist State." The President said that all religions called for social justice. He said that "the Islamic state was the first socialist state." The prophet had said that three things were common property, namely, water, pasture, and fire. These were the essentials of primitive society, just as factories were the essentials of modern society. "Does nationalization differ from that in any way?" the President asked. The first caliphs, Abu Bakr and Umar, "gave to the poor from the rich," and under Umar "they nationalized land and distributed it among the peasants." Alms were a foundation of socialism at that time. As Islam required alms giving of 1/40 of the funds available at the end of the year, then "in 40 or 50 years one would have paid 100% of these funds." In addition, "there were no poor men, there was no destitution. There was complete social tranquility. There were only some corrupted [religious] shaykhs who, in the service of the feudalists, sometimes issued a fatwa prohibiting ownership; they were serving 'reaction, feudalism, and capitalism.' Abdel Nasser asserted that in the beginning all Muslims worked; 'there was no commerce at all.' Christianity and Judaism, Abdel Nasser added, also ruled that the zakāt was actually a proper application of socialism.

"Socialism an Endless Road"; More Moves Foreseen. The President said that the new socialist measures taken would not be the last; more steps would come "this year"—first among them the gradual introduction of the seven-hour working day. Socialism was "an endless road," a "continuous evolution of society... determined by the needs of society." Some people asked him, the President said, "Where do we stop? Why do you not draw a line...?" He said he could not do it, because there was no end. He gave two examples: The worker would be getting 25% of the profits now, but in "15 years or so" he will say he wants a villa, later a car, and so on. The new cooperative society had inherited from the old the system of usury and interest—which it detested; now the Agricultural Cooperative Credit Bank would lend the peasants money without interest. (Ahram, July 23, 27; R. Cairo, July 22, 26 [25, 28]; Nasser's Speeches, pp 128-172)

Haykal Compares Arab Socialism with Communism. An article on this topic by Muhammad Hassanin Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, appeared on Aug 4, after the issue of the "socialist decrees." Haykal enumerated seven points of difference between Arab socialism and Communism:

- 1) Attitude to classes: "Communism advocates the dictatorship of the proletariat... while Arab socialism advocates the dissolution of class distinctions... within the framework of national unity." "In Communism, the first step is punishment and retaliation, while in Arab socialism it is justice and equity, achieved in a peaceful, bloodless manner."
- 2) Attitude to ownership. "Communism maintains that every owner is an exploiter, and hence must be eliminated. Arab socialism draws a line between exploiting ownership and between ownership which is the result of diligence and honest labour... [It] regards individual ownership as a right which must be promoted and expanded to embrace more and more former paupers so that they may be given the opportunity of a decent equal life." The exploiter should not be killed, but stripped of the means of exploitation and then allowed to re-enter society.

- 3) Confiscation versus compensation. "Communism stands for confiscation while Arab socialism stands for nationalization in return for compensation."

- 4) The role of the individual in society. "While in the Communist system the individual feels that he is a small cog in a vast machine, the individual under Arab socialism feels that his creative faculties are unrestricted..." "Communism regards the individual as a product of history, while Arab socialism believes that the relation between the individual and history is complete and continuous."

- 5) Duty and right of present generation. "The Communist regime, particularly in the time of Stalin, sacrificed generations of human beings..." Arab socialism, on the other hand, was concerned with the present as well as with the future; while it was the duty of the present generations to work for the attainment of mass production, they had also the right to live. "Sacrifice, Arab socialism says, should not exceed the limit, or the sense of freedom and humanity will vanish from the heart of man. We call for work, but we refuse conscription... There is no annual leave for workers in Communist China to this day. Arab socialism has cut down working hours."

- 6) Doctrinaire rigidity versus pragmatism. "The Communist cannot hodge from a fixed ideological framework... The Arab socialist feels that the entire legacy of world thought is laid open before him, but also feels that he is capable of developing and adding to this legacy. While the Communist is a faithful, obedient disciple of all that he has been indoctrinated with, the Arab socialist is a faithful disciple of the history, problems, reality, and aspirations of his nation and homeland."

- 7) Party versus National Union. In Communism, authority was in the hands of the Communist party alone. "According to Communism, democracy is only achieved through the dictatorship of the monolithic Communist party. Arab socialism advocates the National Union, which embraces all the strata of the nation." Haykal added, however, that the idea of the National Union required more explanation and development. (R. Cairo, Aug 4 [8]; Ahram, Aug 4)

[Haykal did not refer to a difference in the attitude to religion.]

UNIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT

(August)

A "New System of Government." On Aug 15 it was announced that President Abdel Nasser had formulated a "new system of government." The UAR would have one cabinet instead of three (one central and two regional) and a number of vice-presidents, each "in charge of a phase of national activity."

Dr Abd al-Qādir Hātīm, Minister of State, defined the purposes of the reorganization as follows: (1) to consolidate the unity of the two regions; (2) to define executive responsibilities clearly; (3) to enable the public sector institutions to fulfil their role in the general framework. [This measure was seen as designed mainly to tighten control over Syria. For details, see pp 601-2.]

The New Cabinet. On Aug 17 the composition of the new unified government was announced. It included seven vice-presidents (two of them Syrian), 36 ministers (14 Syrians), and three deputy ministers. (See table for detailed list, according to Ahram, Aug 17.)

Five ministers were appointed for the first time: Abd al-Muhsin Abu an-Nūr, Sayyid Yūsuf, Salāh ad-Dīn Hīdayat, Ahmad Farag [Egyptians] and Farid Zayn ad-Dīn [Syrian]. (Ahram, Aug 17)

Six departments—Health, Planning, Finance and Economy, Local Government, Supply, Waqfs—had more than one minister; the responsibility and work were to be divided between them.

The following ministries were newly created: High Dam, Scientific Research, Higher Education, Housing and Public Utilities. The Ministry of Agriculture was renamed Ministry of Agriculture and Land Reclamation. The Ministry of Municipal and Rural Affairs was abolished and the Ministry of Housing and Public Utilities established instead. (See MER 1960, pp 475-6; Eg. Gaz., Aug 31.)

The Duties of the Vice-Presidents. On Aug 29 Abdel Nasser issued a decree defining the duties of the vice-presidents as follows: (1) Nūr ad-Dīn Kahālāh, Vice-President for Production. He would supervise and coordinate, in regard to the implementation of the general policy on production, the Ministries of Economy, Finance, Industry, Agrarian Reform, Agriculture, Land Reclamation, Public Works, Communications, Supply and High Dam; (2) Zakariya Muhyi ad-Dīn (Public Organizations) would plan the general policy and supervise and coordinate the work of the public organizations; (3) Hussein ash-Shāfi'i (Public Organizations)—as above; (4)

Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein (Local Government) would supervise the implementation of the [new] local government system as well as supervise and coordinate the implementation of the general policy on public services of the following ministries: Local Government, Health, Labour, Housing and Public Utilities, Culture and National Guidance, Social Affairs, Higher Education, Scientific Research, Waqfs as well as Al-Azhar University; (5) Abd al-Hamid as-Sarrāj (Internal Affairs) would supervise and coordinate internal affairs including the Ministry of the Interior, the Public Prosecutor's Office, the Administrative Supervisor (ar-rikābah al-idāriyah), the State Controller, the Audit Department and the Civil Service Commission.

Regulations prepared by the vice presidents concerning the division of the work between ministries would be subject to the approval of the President.

The following inter-ministerial committees were established at the Presidency of the Republic: (1) Planning, headed by Vice-President Abd al-Latif Baghdādī; (2) Legislation, headed by Vice-President Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein; (3) Executive Affairs, headed by Vice-President Abd al-Hamid Sarrāj; (4) Economy, headed by Vice-President Nūr ad-Dīn Kahālāh. (R. Cairo, Aug 29 [31]; Eg. Gaz., Ahram, Aug 30)

THE UAR GOVERNMENT

NOTE: The UAR government of 1960 (see MER 1960, pp 475-78) continued until August 16, 1961 when the two regional executive councils were abolished and a unified central government established. The only change made before that date was on Feb 13 in the Syrian R. Executive Council when Husni as-Sawwāf, Minister of Economy, was appointed Governor of the Central Bank of Syria and Akram Dayri received the Economy portfolio in his place as an addition to his other portfolios. In the unified government several ministries had more than one minister, who were to divide the responsibility and work between them. Following the Syrian secession (Sept 28) the resignation of the Syrian ministers was officially reported on Oct 7. On Oct 18 the composition of the new government of the UAR-Egypt was announced.

PROVINCIAL ADMINISTRATION AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT

New Governorates Created. On June 5 Abdel Nasser decreed the creation of three new governorates: (1) Matruh—capital, Matruh; (2) Al-Wadi al-Jadid (New Valley), Al-Wahat al-Kharga; (3) Al-Bahr al-Ahmar (Red Sea), Ghardaqa (Ahram, June 6). [The new governorates lie outside the Delta and the Nile Valley—the two former to the west, the last to the east.]

Town Councils Appointed. On June 6 Abdel Nasser nominated 120 heads (ru'asā') of the town councils in the Southern R. On the same day Kamāl ad-Dīn Hussein, in his capacities as Minister of Local Government and SG of the NU, nominated the town councillors from among the active members of the NU (in accordance with the Local Government Law—see MER 1960, p 495: The Town Council). (Ahram, June 2, 7)

Extension of Governor's Authority. On Aug 30 a Republican Decree amended 21 articles of the Local Government Law of March 26, 1960. Mainly, it extended the application of the law to the Syrian region [following the unification of the government of both regions two weeks previously] and enlarged the executive authority of the provincial governors. (Details in Ahram, Aug 31.)

Appointment of Governors. On Nov 13 the governors of nine governorates were replaced, and appointments were made to the three new governorates. Eight of the appointees undertook the office of governor for the first time, while four were transferred from one governorate to another. Following is a list of the changes; otherwise the governors remained as listed in MER 1960, p 496 (which see also for biographical details of the governors transferred).

THE SYRIAN REGION

POLITICAL PARTIES AND SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

[Political parties, it will be remembered, had been disbanded.]

Jan: Alleged Note from Politicians to Abdel Nasser. According to Lebanese newspapers, in mid-Jan Sabri al-Asali [Watani], Akram Hurāni [Ba'ath] and Khālid al-Azm [leftist independent] sent a joint note to Abdel Nasser in which they described the pressure exerted on them by their followers and asked for the restoration of civic freedoms, including that of party activity. A few days later, Rushdi al-Kikbya and Nāsim al-Qudsi (Sha'ab) reportedly expressed their solidarity with the note (Jaridah, Jan 19; L'Orient, Jan 25). During his visit to Syria Abdel Nasser denied, however, reports that he had received a note from a group of former Syrian politicians. (Ayyam, Feb 21, 23)

The Syrian Communist Party. As in 1960 (see MER 1960, p 498), occasional statements appeared in the Syrian press in which the signatory denied that he had any affiliation with the Communist Party. (e.g. Ayyam, Jan 30; Wahdah, Aug 20)

According to charges made by Lebanese Communists, the following prominent Communists were murdered in Syrian gaols: Riyād at-Turk (Nida', May 12, 17); Farajallah al-Hilu, SG of the Lebanese CP (see: Lebanon, Internal Affairs); and Jamāl Isma'il. (Akhbar, Beirut, July 16)

In June it was announced that a Communist hide-out had been uncovered in the Jisr al-Abid quarter of Damascus, containing central committee protocols and propaganda material. (Wahdah, June 7)

(See also below: The Democratic Party of Kurdistan; also: The Sarraj Affair, Party Stirrings.)

The Ba'ath Party. As in the case of the Communist Party, a number of personal announcements appeared in the press, dissociating the signatories from the dissolved Ba'ath Party and professing support for President Abdel Nasser. In Aug and at the beginning of Sept a number of persons from Suweida (Jabal Druze) published such announcements. (Ayyam, June 30, Aug 31, Sept 7)

(See also: The Sarraj Affair, Party Stirrings.)

Islamic Liberation Party. [This extreme Islamic group was founded in Jordan and was illegally active mainly in Jordan and Lebanon; see index]

In Jan the Syrian authorities arrested a number of members of this party following the distribution of leaflets. Party leaflets, typewriters and duplicating machines were discovered in two places in Damascus. Among the detained were 11 Jordanian students and a Saudi Arabian engineer. (Ayyam, Jan 20)

The Democratic Party of Kurdistan; Kurdish Affairs. In Jan a number of Syrian Kurds were tried before the Supreme Military Court for State Security on a charge of establishing in Syria the Kurdish Democratic Party (al-bert) [United Democratic Party of Kurdistan] which aimed to unite the Kurds in one Greater Kurdistan.

According to the prosecutor, the party in Syria was founded by Rashid Hamu, who had withdrawn from the Communist Party with the aim of securing the adherence of Kurds in Syria to the movement for the establishment of a Kurdish state. He was joined by a number of other "scattered remnants" of the Syrian Communist Party: Muhammad Ali Khoja, Khalil Muhammad, Shawkat Hanan Uthman Sabri, Hamzah Nuwayran and Abd al-Hamid Sulayman. A number of soldiers and policemen also joined the party. Nur ad-Din Zaza became its president. The party had a central committee composed of the founders, regional committees in Damascus, Aleppo and the Jazirah, and also local committees. The party acquired printing equipment and disseminated leaflets and literature of a Marxist character, including articles by Mao Tse-tung. It called for a united independent Kurdistan and claimed that this aim could be achieved only by a democratic and progressive mass organization of the Kurds. (Ayyam, Jan 30; no further reports on this affair were available.)

Tashnaq Party Charged with Espionage. On Aug 1 an official Syrian spokesman announced the discovery of an espionage and sabotage network of the [right wing] Armenian Tashnaq Party, working for Israel and other countries. The party, which had been active under cover before the union, had a well-organized hierarchy and its members were subject to military discipline. "Military councils" (majlis arakiyah), divided into "committees" (tijân), obtained arms and equipment and distributed them among "chosen elements" trained in Syria and Lebanon. There were also special, carefully chosen commandos. The espionage activities had benefited from the party's complete authority over its members.

Wireless sets, arms and explosives had been discovered in the party's centres in Damascus, Aleppo, Latakia and Qamishli. They had been smuggled from Lebanon in cars belonging to diplomatic missions in Beirut; the latter also paid the party for information gathered.

The party had covered up its activities with the aid of [Armenian] clubs, schools registered in the names of religious functionaries, and benevolent societies. (Jaridah, Aug 2)

Two weeks later, it was reported that a large quantity of modern arms, including automatic weapons, had been discovered in hiding places in an Armenian Red Cross dispensary in the Maydan quarter of Aleppo. (Ayyam, Aug 13)

The above announcement occasioned a great many declarations by Syrian Armenians, especially the clergy, denouncing these activities and the Tashnaq party in general, and professing loyalty to the UAR (MENA, Aug 2 [4]; R. Cairo, Aug 3 [5]; ANA, Aug 6 [9]; MENA, Aug 7 [9]; Wahdah, Aug 10). Armenian organizations in the Egyptian region in a similar statement pledged their firm allegiance to Arab nationalism and its leader. (MENA, Aug 4 [8])

After the UAR break-up on Nov 6, the military prosecutor submitted to the Supreme Military State Security Court an indictment against 37 members of the Tashnaq Party on charges of spying for Israel and an unnamed foreign power; 16 of the accused were still at large. The trial opened on Nov 25. By then, the charges related to 43 persons, nine of whom were still at large, and believed to have escaped to Lebanon. According to information given by a member of the tribunal outside the courtroom, the ringleader was an Armenian Lebanese Deputy (see below); he also mentioned the USA as one of the "other foreign powers" which the Tashnaq had supplied with information by way of other espionage networks abroad (Mid. Mir., Aug 5, Nov 11, Dec 2). The trial was adjourned until Jan 21, 1962. (Mid. Mir., Jan 27, 1962)

On Nov 8 the Syrian Court announced that Moisa Dirkalusyan [member of the Lebanese Chamber of Deputies and head of the Tashnaq party in Lebanon] was wanted for participation in the espionage activities (Jaridah, Nov 9). In Dec it was reported that Lebanon had refused to comply with a Syrian request for the extradition of Dirkalusyan. (Kul Shay', Aug 19)

Syrian Charges of Jordanian-Organized Terror and Assassination Plots. Syria, which had charged Jordan with organizing terror and assassination plots at the end of 1960, continued to make such charges until mid-March. These activities were allegedly based partly on Lebanon and partly on Jordan itself. (See: Inter-Arab Relations; UAR-Jordan, UAR-Lebanon.)

Sept: Suspicion of Arson. In Sept a Lebanese Communist newspaper expressed doubts whether the recent fire in an industrial undertaking in Damascus had really been due to an accident, as the authorities made out. The paper posed the same question regarding the "increasing number" of fires in Syria of late. (Akhbar, Beirut, Sept 10)

LABOUR AND TRADE UNIONS

The General Federation of Trade Unions. The establishment of the GFTU was completed at the beginning of Jan when it elected its representative bodies. (See MER 1960, p 502; for details of the elections and names, see Ayyam, Jan 9.)

Workers Organized in National Union. On April 13

Abd al-Hamid Sarraj, as SG of the Northern R. NU, published a decree on the formation of a regional National League of Labour and Workers (rabitah qawmiyah lil-samal wa-al-ummah) within the NU, embracing all union members. The regional League would be composed of governorate leagues to be headed by governorate committees.

These committees would deal with local labour problems. Cases of difficulty would be handed over to the Office of Labour and Workers in the NU. A governorate Committee would meet once a month, or when summoned by its president or half its members.

The regional League would be headed by the following bodies:

(1) The General Committee of Labour and Workers, composed of the Minister of Social Affairs and Labour (president), the Director of the Labour and Workers' Office in the NU Secretariat (vice-president), 5 members of the regional [Syrian] GFTU, five members of the National League of Labour and Workers' Council, a representative each of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour, of the Institute of Social Insurance and of workers' institutions in the fields of health, culture and social affairs.

The functions of the General Committee would be:

(1) to examine proposals made by the lower level committees and make suggestions for the amendment of labour legislation; (2) to take part in the shaping of a general labour programme; (3) to supervise social, health and labour services, as well as technical education in accordance with the requirements of the economy; (4) to supervise workers' culture (thaqafah ummalayah); (5) to supervise the execution of all measures affecting labour and workers. The regional committee would meet every four months, or when convened by the president or half its members. (Ayyam, Wahdah, April 14)

(2) The General Committee (al-lajnah al-ammah) of Labour and Workers of the NU Regional Congress, composed of the Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, the Director of the Labour and Workers' Office in the NU Secretariat, the representatives of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour, representatives of the Institute of Social Insurance, of workers' institutions in the fields of health, culture and social affairs, of the ministries of Health, Industry, Economy, Rural and Municipal Affairs, Communications and Public Works and experts in labour affairs. The experts and representatives of the ministries would be chosen by the regional SG of the NU [Sarraj] from among candidates put up by the ministries and the Office of Labour and Workers in the NU. The Committee's task would be general supervision and inspection of labour affairs. (Ayyam, Wahdah, April 14)

July Decree: Workers To Receive 25% of Profits; To Participate in Management: 42-Hour Working Week: See below.

Formation of a Journalists' Union. On Sept 7 Sarraj published the provisional rules which were to be binding on the preparatory committee for a Northern R. Journalists' union established in July. Only NU members might join; no non-union members were to be employed by newspapers; the preparatory committee would have the right to suspend or expel members for infringing the rules; the preparatory committee would dissolve after the election of the union council [no date fixed]. (Ayyam, Sept 8)

On Sept 12 a membership list was published giving 62 names, 47 from Damascus and 15 from Aleppo. Journalists not included were given 15 days to apply for membership. (Ayyam, Sept 12; L'Orient, Sept 13)

GOVERNMENT STRENGTHENS CONTROL OVER ECONOMY

(January-April)

At the end of Jan the UAR government, presided over by Abdel Nasser, reportedly discussed the Syrian economy. The Syrian ministers had advocated economic liberalization in view of the difficult situation in Syria, and in accordance with the findings of the Swedish economist Bent Hansen who had visited the UAR at the invitation of the government to study economic development. (Jaridah, Jan 19, Feb 5; L'Orient, Feb 4; Nida', Beirut, Feb 7)

Resignation of Issat Tarabulsi. Dr. Issat at-Tarabulsi, the Governor of the Syrian Central Bank, resigned at the end of Jan, allegedly in protest against Cairo's refusal to free Syrian assets frozen in Egypt. (Jaridah, Feb 5)

Tarabulsi was said to have recently warned Dr Qaysuni, UAR Minister of Economy, of the economic strain the union was imposing on Syria, and of the danger to the union itself should the plans for nationalization and currency unification be carried out (BAPP, Feb 3). Tarabulsi was described as "the businessmen's hope and disciple of free economy" and his resignation as a sign of impending currency control. (Economist, Feb 18)

Huani as-Sawwāl, the regional Minister of Economy, resigned in order to take over the post of Governor of the Central Bank (Ayyam, Hayat, Feb 7). (Akram Dayri was appointed Minister of Economy, in addition to his post as Minister of Social Affairs and Labour.)

Currency Control. On Feb 5, currency control was imposed. The export from the Northern R. of local and foreign currency of sums over £S100 was forbidden. Trade in foreign currency, in any form, was also forbidden, except in cases to be specified by the Ministry of Economy. Agricultural produce, textiles, leather and glassware could henceforth be exported only against foreign currency (Ayyam, Feb 6, 7). All foreign currency deposits were frozen. All holders of foreign currency (including £E) were required to declare their assets by March 9. (Ayyam, Feb 8, 13, March 2)

The foreign currency declared would be bought by the Currency Office (maktab al-qat') at a special rate of 385 Syrian piasters per $ to prevent losses to persons who had bought their foreign currency at higher rates (Ahram, Eg. Gaz., March 2). The official rate was 358 piasters to the dollar.

Additional regulations dealt in detail with financial transactions connected with foreign trade, with the status of non-resident foreigners and foreign firms, and with Syrians travelling or studying abroad. (Ayyam, Feb 17, 26)

The measure caused a fall of the Syrian pound on the Beirut exchange on Feb 8 by 3 piasters, from P.L. 81 to P.L. 78. Thereafter, the Syrian pound strengthened and stood at P.L. 84 at the beginning of May. The official rate in Damascus was P.S. 113.95 = £L1 (1£S = P.L.86.9). (L'Orient, Feb 8, 9, May 6)

Causes and Consequences. According to an official spokesman, the main aims of this measure were to build up foreign currency reserves for the import of vital consumption goods and the execution of the five-year plan, to keep imports under control and thus prevent the import of luxuries, and to prevent the removal of capital from the country. (Ayyam, Feb 10)

The Economist wrote that currency control had been contemplated and expected for some two years and consequently much capital fled the country; the measure was intended to prevent further capital flight and steady the Syrian pound. The other contributing causes were the impoverishment of the Syrian economy following three years of drought and the crisis in the textile industry which had lost its natural markets in Turkey, Iraq and Jordan through political disagreement. Damascus had had to accept £2m. from Cairo to redress its budget deficit. "And having paid the piper, Cairo called the tune." (Economist, Feb 18)

The Times saw in it a test of the union between Egypt and Syria. Syria, some people said, was beginning to pay the price economically for her political partnership with Egypt; but on the whole the step was seen as a consequence not only of the link with Egypt but also of Syria's own economic situation. (Times, Feb 10)

New Import Restrictions. Currency control was followed by new import restrictions. On Feb 10 it was reported that existing licences were no longer valid; new licences would have to be taken out for all imports, with minor exceptions. A list of commodities, which might be licensed for import, included foodstuffs and drugs, medical, industrial and agricultural equipment and industrial raw materials. (Ayyam, Feb 12, 12)

Price Control Imposed. At the same time the Government informed the public that there were sufficient reserves for the import of vital commodities, and prices must not be raised. Merchants were warned that strict measures would be taken against profiteers. (Ayyam, Feb 9)

Merchants dealing in imported goods were instructed by the Supreme Supply Committee to sell at Sept 1960 prices on pain of punishment. In cases where the Sept 1960 prices entailed profits higher than the legal maximum [fixed by the Ministry of Supply in Dec 1960], they were to be suitably reduced. Sept 1960 was chosen because at that time the Syrian pound was stable, and the profit margin "reasonable." (Ayyam, Feb 12, 20, March 30)

There were subsequent warnings against hoarding and profiteering [which indicated that maximum-price regulations were not generally observed.] (Wahdah, March 24; Ayyam, April 27, 30; see also below: Public Reactions).

Arabization of Banks. On March 4 a presidential decree ordered that all banks in the Northern R. were to become joint-stock companies owned by UAR citizens or cooperative societies. The Economic Organization was to hold 35% of the shares of each bank. The President was empowered to permit non-UAR Arabs to own up to 25%. The minimum paid-up capital of a bank would be £53m. The decree was to become operative on Jan 31, 1962; in the interval, state inspectors were to supervise banking activities (R. Damascus, March 4 [5]; Ayyam, March 5). Of the 19 banks operating in Syria at the time, 6 were UAR-owned, 6 non-UAR Arab and 7 non-Arab. (Hayat, March 5)

Abd al-Mun'im al-Qaysuni, the UAR Minister of Finance, defined the aims of the decrees as follows: (1) to transfer ownership into "national (wataniyah) and faithful" hands; (2) to enable the government to exercise control for the benefit of the people. (Eg. Gaz., Hayat, March 5)

[An immediate decrease in deposits, partially made up during the following weeks, indicated some public uneasiness.] Deposits in Syrian banks amounted to £5348.5 millions on March 3, £5328m. on March 16, and £5336m. on April 23. (Ayyam, April 30)

Central Bank Abolished. On April 8 the Currency and Credit Board (CCB) was abolished by presidential decree, and its functions transferred to the Central Bank. (Bureau des Documentations Syriennes & Arabes, Damascus, 1961—Notes Chronologiques). The CCB was established in May 1953 as "the central monetary authority [with] the task of regulating and coordinating monetary and credit policy." "More questionable... is the fact that one-third of the voting members of the CCB... represent sectional private interests..." (Asfour: Syria, Development and Monetary Policy, Harvard ME Monographs, 1959).

Abdel Nasser Denounces Liberal Economy; Justifies State Control, Socialization. Justification of the economic control measures came in a series of speeches by President Abdel Nasser himself. The President arrived in Syria on his fifth visit there on Feb 20, after currency control had been introduced, and stayed there until March 8. He was thus on the spot when the Arabization of the banks decree was issued.

In reference to the currency control, Abdel Nasser said the people would squander their rights if they allowed money earned in Syria to be invested abroad instead of at home. The "so-called economic freedom" of the past which "they talked about" was in fact economic and social exploitation; it meant domination by 5% of the population and led to the dictatorship of capital. No opportunity would be left to speculators and merchants to play about with the value of the currency or to make illegal profits and exploit the people. Some self-appointed economists who were advocating economic freedom in Syria were not even capitalists, but not being fit to do any other work, they worked for "the exploiters, the bankers, the financiers and other kindred blood-suckers" and naturally defended them.

On the day the decree was issued, Abdel Nasser said, hard currency reserves in the Syrian region were £52m. of which £522-23m. were foreign loans. The real balance was £53m. against which there were import applications for about £550m. The foreign exchange rate for hard currency went up, causing a rise in prices.

The President denied rumours that the Syrian gold reserves had been transferred to the Southern R. On the contrary, as the Northern R. was suffering from consecutive years of drought, the Southern R. had helped it out both in financing the budget and in foreign currency. At the same time, Syria's free economy "or better, the economic anarchy," had allowed currency to find its way abroad.

A planned economy combined with social justice would provide not only a decent living for all but also the elements of power needed, e.g., to liberate Palestine.

Industries would be established in the north, just as they had already been established in the south. The country would be developed on the basis of the official rate of the Syrian pound and if the value of the pound was affected abroad, this would have no effect on the building up of the country.

On the Arabization of banks, he said that banks could be a "terrible weapon if employed against the objectives of the people." The UAR had had to ensure that the investment of the deposits of the people's money served the interests of the people instead of being disposed of from Paris. The President mentioned, e.g., that the capital of the Syria-Lebanon Bank and the National Bank was 100% French. By paying 3% interest and lending against 6.5% interest the banks had also caused a retrenchment in the economy. Loans made available to agriculture and industry had been insufficient. All this would now be rectified.

Regarding trade, the merchants would be given their rights but they could not be allowed to raise prices and exploit the people. As the national income rose through development, trade would expand, but if trade expanded without an increase in production, the national wealth would go abroad and the growth of the national economy would be retarded. Certain merchants had laid in a 3-year supply of imported goods for fear of impending control; this was a waste.

"What we want," the President said, "is simply a controlled economy." He emphasized that he had given orders for the establishment of any kind of industry to be permitted in the Syrian R. even though such an industry might already exist in the Egyptian R. (Nasser's Speeches, pp 14-95)

Adverse Public Reaction, Rumours, Syrian Ministers Reassure Commercial Circles. [There were no open protests against the above-mentioned measures—indignation in economic circles found its public expression after the coup d'état of Sept 28—but there was evidence of apprehension followed by economic repercussions.]

[An indication of public unrest, apprehension and opposition was to be found in the rumours which spread throughout the country.] These were some of the rumours reported: currency control was introduced because Egyptians had been smuggling their capital out of the country by way of the free Syrian exchange (Akhbar al-Yaum, Feb 11); the Cairo authorities intended to raise the value of the £E vis-à-vis the £S; foreign currency earned by Syrian cotton exported through Alexandria was taken by the Egyptians, who paid the Syrians in £S (Gumhuriyah, Feb 20); no foreign currency would be available for vital commodities and the rich were therefore hoarding it (Ruz al-Yusuf, March 6); the prices of sugar and rice would be raised. (Ayyam, April 16)

From Feb to May many merchants, money-changers and chambers of commerce sought clarifications from the economic ministers and senior officials regarding the latest economic measures, or presented specific problems arising from them. (e.g. Ayyam, Feb 7, 9, 10, March 15, 30, 31, April 2, 30, May 2, 7)

Official spokesmen repeatedly referred to the "anxieties" which had beset certain people (e.g. Sarrāj on Feb 15—Ayyam, Feb 16). The Syrian Minister of Economy denounced "criminal interests" for rumour-mongering designed to force up prices and thus enable them to make illegal profits. (Ayyam, Feb 20)

[The Syrian ministers, however, endeavoured in the main to reassure economic circles.]

Following a series of contacts between the money-changers and the authorities, the former with official sanction established a joint stock company to trade in gold and securities. (Ayyam, Feb 7, March 15, May 2, 19)

A meeting of merchants with economic ministers and officials took place in Damascus on March 29 with the participation of 300 merchants headed by Adil Khoja [of the Company of Five], chairman of the Damascus Chamber of Commerce. The meeting was concerned with the imposition of currency control. Akram Dayri, Minister of Economy, promised that import licences for foodstuffs, medical and other vital supplies would be issued within ten days. Jamāl Sūfi, the Minister of Supply, stated that the government did not think that all merchants were aspiring to make exaggerated profits. He also promised to request that charges which had been brought against merchants for violation of price regulations be withdrawn. Commercial circles were quoted after this meeting as saying that the ministers had allayed their apprehensions as regards government policy towards them. (Ayyam, March 30, 31)

More meetings of this kind took place in Aleppo, Damascus, and the Jazīrah, where promises were made of a moratorium on farmers' debts and of additional loans. In May Akram Dayri, the Minister of Economy, told Damascus merchants that the Economic Organization was not intended to supplant the private sector but to complement it in those sectors in which the latter was not active. Repeated assurances were given that all obligations of the Arabized banks would be honoured, and that import licences would be issued for vital commodities; the merchants were asked to cooperate in making the supplies available to the public. (Ayyam, April 2, 30, May 7, June 9)

The Syrian press participated in the effort to calm the population and news such as the rise of the £S on the Beirut exchange was given much publicity. (See Syrian press, Feb to Sept)

Issue of Unification of Syrian and Egyptian Economy. [As will have been seen from the rumours which circulated in Syria and even more from the analyses and the mutual recriminations between Syrians and Egyptians after the secession, Syrians feared or said they feared that Egypt intended to exploit Syria for her own economic interests. News such as the following which appeared in March, in the wake of economic control measures, might have contributed to such apprehensions.]

A report by Dr. Qaysūni, the UAR Minister of Economy, to Abdel Nasser said the Egyptian Economic Organization and Misr Bank would play a considerable part in the industrialization of Syria together with the Syrian Economic Organization, but the supervision of the joint companies would be in the hands of the latter (Akhbar, March 7). M.F. Dandāshi, Director of Programming at the UAR Ministry of Planning, published a study of trade prospects between the two regions, in which he found that 83.9% of Syrian exports to Egypt would consist of foodstuffs and other agricultural produce, while 76.5% of Egyptian exports to Syria would consist of industrial products (VEFRPA, March). Rūs al-Yūsuf reported that within the year the two regions would be fully brought together (taqārūb kāmīl); to this end it had been decided to integrate the economic systems, legislation and financial regulations. The expert committees which had been set up for this purpose had been asked to speed up their work. (Ruz al-Yusuf, March 13)

Food Shortages; Official Action. At the beginning of July the authorities took measures to alleviate food shortages which were becoming acute. On July 1 the Minister of Supply ordered the seizure, against payment at official prices, of grain stored by farmers and merchants, with the exception of grain for seed and domestic consumption. On July 4 it was reported that the government would import a considerable quantity of cattle in order to relieve the meat shortage, since private importers had made no use of the opportunity given them almost a month before (see above: New Import Restrictions). (Ayyam, July 2, 4)

The value of imports in the first half of 1961 dropped to £5319m, as compared with £5384m. during the same period in 1960. Shortages were felt in such commodities as edible oils, drugs, woollens, motorized vehicles and various metal products. (Ayyam, Sept 24)

THE JULY DECREES

(July)

In July President Abdel Nasser promulgated a series of "revolutionary decrees." (See p 581) Of these decrees, the following applied to the Northern R.: workers and employees were to receive a 25% share of profits and be represented on boards of directors; salaries were not to exceed £550,000 per annum; banks, insurance companies and certain other named enterprises were to be nationalized; other named industrial undertakings were to go into equal partnership with the government; no natural or corporate person (except for public institutions) could hold shares of a market value above £5100,000 of certain other named enterprises; undertakings in which the government held at least 25% of the capital could not give contracts to companies in which the government held less than 50% of the capital; payments due from beneficiaries for land distributed under the agrarian reform were to be reduced by half; a general income tax was imposed, [this was the first time a progressive general income tax was levied in Syria]; working hours were reduced from 8 to 7 a day or 42 hours a week with no reduction in wages and overtime work was prohibited. (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., July 20, 26, 29)

Nationalization; "Al-Khumasiyah" Nationalized. On July 20 the list was published of firms to be nationalized. It included, besides the banks and insurance companies, a number of industrial enterprises among them the United Commercial and Industrial Corporation ("The Company of Five"—Al-Khumasiyah). [This was the most prominent Syrian company, founded in 1946. It operated a textile mill in Damascus with some 3,000 employees and derived its name from the five constituent family firms which together exercised a considerable influence on the Syrian economy. This group was later charged by the Egyptians with having played a part in preparing the coup d'état which led to the break-up of the UAR. The five firms were (founders in brackets): Sté Diab Frères (Badr ad-Din Diyab), Sté Mohammad Abdel Khoja et Cie (Muhammad Adil Khoja), Sté Hage Yassine et Fils (Abd al-Hamid Diyab), Sté Rabbath et Dessouki (Abd al-Hadi Rabbat), Sté Anouar el Kotb (Anwar al-Kutb)]. Another list contained twelve firms in which the government would take over half the shares. (R. Cairo, July 20 [22])

The Ministry of Economy immediately forbade trading in the shares of all nationalized insurance companies. It also froze the deposits and securities of the insurance companies, except where a special release was obtained from the minister. The directors of six banks were discharged and new managements appointed to nationalized firms. (R. Damascus, July 21 [W 27]; Wahdah, July 22)

Jādu Iz ad-Din, the Minister of Public Works, Jamāl as-Sūfi, the Minister of Supply, and Tu'mah al-Awdatallah, the Minister of Municipal and Rural Affairs, left for the north to supervise the implementation of the nationalization measures. (Wahdah, July 22)

On Aug 20 the Ministry of Industry required all shareholders of the nationalized and semi-nationalized firms to register their holdings before Sept 30.

Owners of shares up to £550,000 in value (according to the assessment of a valuation committee—see below) could exchange up to £510,000 worth of stock for cash, and the remainder for 4% tax-free government debentures (Wahdah, Aug 20, 22, 23). Shareholders of the Industrial Bank received preferential treatment "in view of their cooperation with the state in development plans"; they were permitted to sell up to 100 shares at their nominal value of £525 for cash or else exchange them for debentures carrying 5% interest. (Wahdah, Aug 9, 20)

On Aug 15 the formation of share evaluation committees was announced; and on Aug 20 their functions and powers were published in detail (Wahdah, Aug 16, 20). During Sept the committees assessed the compensation value of the shares of various firms. (Ayyam, Sept 15, 17, 28)

Public Reactions. Al-Wahdah claimed that the workers of the Northern R. had received the nationalization decrees with enthusiasm. Tal'at at-Taghlabi, SG of the Northern R. General Federation of Trade Unions, sent Abdel Nasser a cable of thanks for "the establishment of true socialism." (Wahdah, July 21)

[There were some indications of the fears aroused in sections of the public]. Soon after the nationalization decree was published, Akram Dayri, the Minister of Economy, denied that the government intended to touch bank deposits; "we are no Communists." He asked bank managers to convince the public that there was no reason for panic and that bank deposits should not be withdrawn (Wahdah, July 22). It was again rumoured that the currency of both regions would shortly be unified. (L'Orient, Aug 5)

In Sept Dr. Qaysuni denied rumours spread amongst "opportunistic circles" that the government intended to tax the debentures issued against shares of nationalized firms. (Ayyam, Sept 26)

Public uneasiness caused a large-scale flight of capital to Lebanon and consequently the £S fell again on the Beirut exchange, from P.L. 83.5 on July 13 [the eve of the July decrees] to P.L. 73 on Sept 27 [the eve of the revolution]. (L'Orient, July 14, Sept 28; Ayyam, Sept 2)

ABOLISHMENT OF SYRIAN CABINET

(August)

On Aug 16 President Abdel Nasser announced the abolition of the regional executive councils and the establishment of a unified government. The composition of the new government was announced the next day. (See pp 593-5)

The Syrian Representation in the New Government. The following Syrians were appointed in the new Government [* member of the previous central government;  member of the abolished northern executive council]:

- (1) Abd al-Hamid Sarraj—Vice President for Internal Affairs
- (2) Nūr ad-Dīn Kahālāh*—Vice President for Production
- (3) Dr. Abd al-Wahhāb Hūmad—Minister of State for Planning

Official Explanation. Abd al-Hamid Sarraj explained at the NU Executive Council of Damascus Governorate that the reorganization was to fulfil the nation's desire for unity, "the constitution of which it firmly guaranteed." The three years and a half since the union was established had shown the need to unite the country under one single regime. (Ayyam, Aug 25; Abdel Nasser made no public statement on the measure)

Background and Comments. [As will be seen below, in the section on the Sarraj affair, President Abdel Nasser had made up his mind, at the latest in June, that "conditions in Syria could not continue as they were," with a number of officers and politicians and their respective cliques "splitting the country." Also, he was resolved to remove Sarraj from Syria. The indignation in Syrian military and political circles over this measure was, according to their own accounts, one of the factors which led to the coup d'état. (See: The Break-up of the UAR Post Mortem.) At the time, however, little attention was given to the issue in the world press and the measure was generally seen as strengthening the structure of the UAR.]

A Times report saw in the reorganization an attempt to establish an administration capable of pushing through the latest measures for state control and remarked that the circumstances in Syria after the 1958 union, which had demanded the retention of a separate Cabinet, were now "obviously regarded as having ended." (Times, Aug 18)

Another western report spoke of a move by President Abdel Nasser to tighten his control over Syria. (NYHT, Aug 18)

[An unfriendly comment in a Beirut paper foreshadowed some themes which were to appear in the post mortem of the union.] Egypt had resolved to strengthen the union through a "progressive dissolution of the Syrian personality"; thus one politician after another, and one party after another, was removed from the scene, and the Syrian character of the army was also changed. The last step had now transformed Damascus into a provincial capital. But this development was good for Syria, as she had demonstrated before the union that she was not fit to govern herself, and incidentally was also beneficial to Lebanon which had served the Syrians as a scapegoat for their internal instability.

Syria's political dismemberment, the comment continued, had made impossible the cutting of her ties with Egypt, and Syria could now rest from her varied activities, both open and secret, aimed either at recovering her individuality or else at orienting herself towards Iraq, "finding the orientation towards Cairo unnatural." Syria was now given the opportunity to direct her energies towards other fields, farming for instance... (Jaridah, Aug 19)

Further Centralization Through Local Government Law. [The unification of government was followed by the application to the Syrian Region of the new Local Government Law, introduced in 1960 in the Southern Region and projected for Syria for 1961 (MER 1960, pp 493-497); on Aug 30, a Republican Decree applied the LG Law of 1960 to the Northern R. with certain amendments.] The division of the Northern R. into 11 governorates was confirmed without any changes.

The status and authority of the government was defined, pending the publication of executive regulations. [They were never published.] The governor would be appointed and dismissed by presidential decree. He represented the executive authority; his task was to see that the government's general policy was implemented, and he was directly accountable to the Minister of the Interior. He would supervise the branches of the ministries in his governorate, unless the law specifically provided otherwise, and he had to receive a copy of all correspondence between the ministries and their branches within the governorate. The governor would preside over a governorate council consisting of elected and nominated members. (Ahram, Aug 31; Ayyam, Sept 1, 14, 15)

Al-Ayyam stated that the application of the LG Law to the Northern R. intended to "provide the governors with wide powers... to build the new society" (Ayyam, Sept 15). The present governors continued in office for the time being. (L'Orient, Sept 5)

THE LAST FORTNIGHT: THE SARRAJ AFFAIR

(September)

Sarraj Resents Removal From Power in Syria. According to Hassanain Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, writing after the break-up of the UAR, Sarraj's "feelings were aroused" after the abolition of the regional cabinets in Aug, when he learned that in his new post as vice-president of the UAR [for Internal Affairs] he was required to establish his seat in Cairo. Sarraj had been a most enthusiastic supporter of the unified government scheme. Haykal said, so long as he imagined that his seat as vice-president would be in Damascus. "All you wanted," Haykal quoted Abdel Nasser as saying later to Sarraj (see below), "was to rule Syria." Already in June, Abdel Nasser recalled, he had met Sarraj and a number of Syrian ministers in Alexandria and told them "in complete frankness" that conditions in Syria could not continue as they were. "Each of you has his own men in the region," he was quoted as saying, and these groups were splitting the country and causing him [Abdel Nasser] more difficulties than the enemies of the union. Thus, Haykal continued, the difficulties created by Sarraj's "lust for power" and his exaggerated police methods made it impossible to keep him as vice-president in Damascus.

Consequently Sarraj was transferred to Cairo while vice-president FM Abd al-Hakim Amer was assigned to Damascus for the period of government unification and the application of the July revolutionary decrees. It was at this point "that the problem started between Sarraj and FM Amer," Haykal said. (Ahram, Nov 24; R. Cairo, Nov 24 [27])

FM Amer arrived in Damascus on Aug 13, on the eve of the announcement of the unification of the government. Sarraj meanwhile remained in Damascus and the two met frequently. On Aug 26 both went to Cairo for a meeting of the cabinet and shortly afterwards returned to Damascus. While Amer stayed there, Sarraj went to Cairo at the beginning of Sept. (R. Damascus, Sept 13 [16]; Ahram, Aug 15, 27, Sept 1)

Sarrāj Returns from Cairo. On Sept 15 Sarrāj suddenly returned from Cairo to Damascus and, in his capacity as SG of the Northern R. NU, summoned its Executive Committee to a meeting the following day.

The next day, it was reported, the first signs of a crisis became apparent when FM Amer declared that Sarrāj had no authority to convene the Committee, as he himself constituted the highest authority in the NU in the Northern R. [as its Inspector-General.] Sarrāj replied that he was the elected SG and would perform his functions until superseded as a result of new elections.

The Committee met and was told by Sarrāj that he had gone to Cairo at the invitation of Abdel Nasser, who had entrusted him with the maintenance of internal security in the whole of the UAR. Once installed in his office, however, he found himself with no duties to perform and failed to secure any response from his subordinate Abhās Radwān, the Minister of the Interior. Sarrāj had then requested an audience with Abdel Nasser who received him after a delay of five days, told him he would inquire into the matter, and asked him to return to his duties. Sarrāj said that he had found himself compelled to bring the matter before the Committee which, in his opinion, constituted the supreme authority in the state. He stressed his loyalty to Abdel Nasser and the union. While the Committee was in session, it was reported, the building was surrounded by police.

The Committee decided to summon all Northern R. committee chairmen to a session on Sept 18. At that session, a heated debate took place during which it was argued that the NU could not interfere with the administration under a presidential regime. No resolutions were passed. (Hayat, Sept 20; L'Orient, Sept 26, 28; Nahar, Sept 28)

Amer-Sarrāj Struggle Over Security Services. [With Sarrāj's return to Syria, a struggle ensued between him and FM Amer over the control of the Syrian security and intelligence services, which for the past years had constituted Sarrāj's principal stronghold. The resulting dialogues were thought to have facilitated the coup d'état of Sept 28.]

Some of Sarrāj's fellow officers, Haykal related later, abandoned their assignments, and contacted "certain elements" in order to instigate disturbances and pressure which would result in Sarrāj's remaining in Syria. Some of these officers were effective in these contacts, and it was deemed fit to remove them from Damascus. Sarrāj accepted a request to assign them to work with him in Cairo, but they procrastinated and continued their activities. (Ahram, Nov 24; R. Cairo, Nov 24 [27])

[During Sept 16-17 Amer took measures to eliminate Sarrāj's influence from the services.] He relieved of his post Marwān as-Sibā'i, the Director of Security who supervised the "Special Bureaus" (al-makātib al-khāssah) which, Haykal later wrote, "assumed the authority to arrest any person and to deal with him as they saw fit on the pretext of security"; in his stead, he appointed Col. Rashid al-Qutayni. Sibā'i had been Sarrāj's direct subordinate and close collaborator until recently, when the latter was Northern R. Minister of the Interior. It was also reported that other senior intelligence officers known to be supporters of Sarrāj had been dismissed or arrested. Twelve had received orders to report to Cairo but two of them disobeyed; one of the latter was Abd al-Wahhāh al-Khatib, director of Sarrāj's office.

On Sept 17 Amer also published a decree forbidding the detention of any person without a warrant issued by the attorney-general's office.

These measures, Haykal later wrote, were regarded by Sarrāj as an insult to him. (Ayyam, Nahr, Sept 18; L'Orient, Sept 23; Nahar, Sept 28; Ahram, Nov 24)

"Immediately thereafter," Cairo sources recounted after the dissolution of the UAR, it was decided to unify the intelligence services of the two regions, thereby abolishing the Syrian service and Special Bureau. According to Haykal, this step was taken after certain intelligence officers had ignored Amer's orders transferring them from their posts. This measure met with opposition from Sarrāj and Syrian intelligence officers. Officers of the General Intelligence (al-mukhabarāt al-ʿammah) were dispatched from Cairo to Syria to effect the unification but they had no opportunity to become familiar with the situation before the coup d'état of Sept 28. (Haykal in Ahram, Oct 14; Akkir Sa'ah, Oct 25)

Tug-of-War in Political Field. Simultaneously with the struggle over the intelligence services, the contest between Amer and Sarrāj also moved into the political sphere.

On Sept 17 Amer published a decree awarding pensions to the former ministers Salāh ad-Dīn al-Bitār, Abd al-Ghani Qannūt, Mustafa Hamdūn [all Ba'ath members] and Sahri al-Asali [Watani Party]. It was thought possible that this was a step towards conciliation between Cairo and the Ba'ath on the basis of the implementation of socialism and the removal of Sarrāj [the enemy of the Ba'ath]. (Ayyam, Sept 18; Hayat, Sept 23)

Amer also met delegations from various circles—merchants, chambers of commerce, the Jazīrah tribes, NU committees—and explained to them Abdel Nasser's policy towards Syria, blaming Sarrāj for shortcomings. (L'Orient, Sept 23, 28)

On Sept 18 Abdel Nasser ordered the merger of the two regional NU executive committees into one central committee of 20 members, to be appointed by presidential decree. The provincial executive committees would be subordinated directly to the central committee. This measure was described as complementary to the unification of government of the two regions but, it was remarked, it also brought to an end the role of Sarrāj as SG of the NU in Syria, and thus resolved the dispute between him and Amer on this point. Abdel Nasser, it was reported in Beirut, also ordered the reorganization of all NU local committees which had shown loyalty to Sarrāj. (Nahr, Ahram, Sept 20; L'Orient, Mid. Mir., Sept 23)

It was reported that on Sept 18 demonstrations took place in Damascus against Abdel Nasser and FM Amer and in support of Sarrāj. Among the demonstrators, there were security officers who had been relieved of their posts. (Nahar, Sept 23)

Abdel Nasser Intervenes; Amer, Sarrāj Recalled to Cairo. On Sept 18 Abd al-Qādir Ḥakīm, UAR Minister of State, arrived in Damascus. According to various reports, he endeavored to mediate between them and delivered messages from Abdel Nasser censuring both of them for various actions, and summoning them to Cairo. The three arrived in Cairo on Sept 20, and were received by Abdel Nasser together as well as separately. (Hayat, Sept 20; Amal, Sept 22; L'Orient, Sept 28; Ahram, Nov 24)

A Lebanese source said Amer was reprimanded for assuming authority over the Northern R. NU, and for dismissing security officials who were under Sarrāj's jurisdiction (Amal, Sept 22). Haykal wrote that Abdel Nasser severely rebuked Sarrāj, whom he accused of ambitions to "remain the sole ruler of Syria," as already recorded above. (Ahram, Nov 24)

On Sept 21 Sarrāj resumed his functions as UAR Vice-President in charge of Internal Affairs, and was appointed by Abdel Nasser to head the ministerial committee for the administrative reform of the UAR. (L'Orient, Sept 24)

Situation in Syria Deteriorates; Political Parties Become Active. On the eve of the departure of Amer and Sarrāj, the security situation in Syria sharply deteriorated according to reports received in Beirut. The atmosphere was reported to be very tense. Ba'athist and Communist students reportedly demonstrated in the streets of Damascus [no mention was made in the report as to what they demonstrated against or for]; they were dispersed by the police. Armoured cars were patrolling the towns, and units had taken up positions at road junctions, etc. (Jaridah, L'Orient, Nahar, Sept 22)

A report was denied that Mahmūd Riyād, political adviser to the President and former Egyptian Ambassador to Damascus, had arrived in Damascus to take over the reigns of government. (Hayat, Sept 22; Nahar, Sept 23)

On Sept 24 it was reported that the atmosphere had become less tense. The armour had disappeared from the streets of Damascus and the army was now guarding key buildings only. There had been some demonstrations but an attempt by Sarrāj supporters to organize a general strike in protest against his removal to Cairo had failed, supposedly because the public held Sarrāj responsible for the police regime. (L'Orient, Jaridah, Sept 24)

It was reported that Shukri al-Quwatli, the last President of Syria before the merger, who was abroad, was expected to return to Damascus on Sept 24, in order to pacify Damascus, but preferred to remain abroad after being requested to pass through Cairo and to meet with Abdel Nasser. (Jaridah, Sept 24, 27)

Sarrāj, Amer Return to Damascus. Sarrāj, it was reported, regarded his appointment to the administration committee as an affront and insisted on the assumption of his proper functions, namely the supervision of internal affairs in both regions; there was no response from the president.

On Sept 25 Sarrāj absented himself from a meeting of the administration committee, ostensibly for reasons of health. The next day Sarrāj submitted his resignation from the vice-presidency of the UAR to Abdel Nasser, who accepted it. The Cairo papers of Sept 27 announced the resignation without comment.

Abdel Nasser ordered Amer to return immediately to Damascus. Amer did so, and Sarrāj arrived four hours after him. It was remarked that while Amer was received at the airport by the Commander of the 1st Army, no official reception was accorded to Sarrāj. (Ahram, Gumhuriyah, L'Orient, Amal, Sept 27; Hayat, Sept 28)

In Damascus, Sarrāj explained that he had resigned because he felt himself unequal to the task with which Abdel Nasser had entrusted him. There were not, and would never be, any differences between himself and Abdel Nasser whom he would always follow as the "pioneer of Arabism." (Hayat, Nahar, Sept 28)

The Last Day of the Union; Party Stirrings. On Sept 27 Amer again took government affairs in his hands and also pensioned off two of Sarrāj's intelligence aides, Marwān as-Sibā'i and Ahd al-Wahhāh al-Khatib. Meanwhile, rumours spread that Sarrāj was planning a military coup.

In Hama [the stronghold of Akram Hurāni and also Sarrāj's hometown], Homs and some other districts, Ba'ath party leaflets were reportedly distributed, calling for a reconsideration of the question of the union and the internal regime in Syria.

The same day, the Communists were reported trying to form a national front in order to fight the union; while the Sha'ath party was reluctant, the proposal was said to have enjoyed some support in the Ba'ath party. (L'Orient, Jaridah, Nahar, Sept 28; Ahram, Oct 14)

[The same day, the army officers who had plotted a coup d'état independently of Sarrāj, had completed their preparations, and the next day, Sept 28, witnessed the break-up of the Egyptian-Syrian union. Of the two antagonists, Ahd al-Hamid as-Sarrāj soon found himself imprisoned, and Amer was on his way back to Cairo some 48 hours after his latest arrival in Damascus.]

Observers Did Not Expect Serious Trouble For Union. [None of a number of political commentaries which appeared on Sept 28, the day of the UAR break-up, actually forecast such an event, though some saw a test ahead for the regime.]

All commentators observed that Sarrāj's resignation completed the evolution of the regime into the complete centralization of power in the hands of President Abdel Nasser. Henceforth, the Syrians were to take orders only from Cairo. Sarrāj, in fact, had been the President's last middleman in Syria, all others having been eliminated earlier. L'Orient (Beirut) remarked that Abdel Nasser's steps showed above all his faith in the loyalty of the Syrian people. It was idle to ask whether this calculation was justified. Al-Hayāt said that with the centralization of power achieved, the regime now had to pass a test. The Times expected a general improvement in the atmosphere to follow Sarrāj's removal, witness Amer's recent ban on arrests without warrant: "... there is no reason to suppose that the latest change will weaken the structure of the UAR." (Hayat, Jaridah, L'Orient, Guardian, Times, Sept 28)

THE BREAK-UP OF THE UAR

NOTES: This section deals with the revolt itself and an evaluation of the event. The establishment of the Syrian Republic is dealt with under that heading. Inter-Arab repercussions are dealt with on pp 159 ff.

Damascus and Cairo local time on Sept 28-29 was three hours in advance of GMT. All times given by the BBC and Itim Mirrah (IMB) monitoring services have been converted accordingly.

SYNOPSIS

The political union between Egypt and Syria, established in 1958, was broken up by a Syrian military coup d'état on September 28.

At about 2 a.m. mobile and armoured units moved from military camps in the vicinity of Damascus towards the capital, where they joined forces with the local garrison. Strategic points in and around the capital were occupied at about 4.30 a.m. The two UAR vice-presidents then in Damascus, Field Marshal Abd al-Hakim Amer and Abd al-Hamid as-Sarrāj as well as the high command of the Syrian Army, and a number of Egyptian and Syrian officers and Syrian ministers were placed under arrest. An early-morning attempt by Egyptian officers to launch a military counter-move with Syrian troops was foiled by Syrian officers.

At 7.25 a.m. the insurgents broadcast their first communiqué to the public, calling themselves the "Supreme Arab Revolutionary Command of the Armed Forces." In this and Communiqué No. 2, broadcast some minutes later, the grievances of the insurgents were made fairly clear: the rising was directed against "corruption and tyranny" and intended to restore the "legitimate rights of the people"; a "power-hungry, oppressive and corrupt clique" had caused the union to fail; the insurgents condemned the "so-called revolutionary decisions," i.e. the "July decrees" (see above: UAR, Internal Affairs); the Syrian army had been purged according to a "vile plan." Neither this nor the communiqué that followed during the day said explicitly whether or not the insurgents intended the union to be preserved.

President Abdel Nasser in Cairo had probably been in contact with Field Marshal Amer in the early morning. At 9 a.m. he broadcast from Cairo Radio station—the broadcast having been announced an hour before. He said that the fate of Arab nationalism was at stake in Syria and declared that under no circumstances would he proclaim the dissolution of the UAR; "I am responsible," he emphasized. He said that only some small units had rebelled and the First (Syrian) Army was now moving on Damascus. He wanted to avoid bloodshed, he claimed. Immediately after the speech the commander of the Egyptian commando units was ordered to prepare for action in Syria.

Meanwhile, talks had been going on in Damascus since 8 a.m. between the insurgents and FM Amer. The insurgents later said they wished to give the authorities an opportunity "to reform the situation." The insurgents reportedly made the following demands: the UAR should be turned into a federal union, with equal status for Syria; the latest socialization measures should be rescinded, the agrarian reform law be amended, and "opportunists" be removed from positions of authority. They also asked that Amer join them in a declaration that the revolt had ended. Amer was reported to have been ready for compromise, but when he was allowed to contact Cairo, Abdel Nasser said that the situation allowed for no "bargaining or a middle of the road solution"; the President clearly refused to condone a situation in which a form of union would be preserved but actual power in Syria would have passed from his hands to those of the Syrian insurgents.

At 1.26 p.m., the insurgents broadcast Communiqué No. 9, which conveyed the impression that the revolt was being ended on the basis of "appropriate measures" taken by Amer. By this time, all armed forces except those in the Aleppo and Latakia regions had adhered to the insurgents and it was thought that they were now confident of their power to resume the revolt at will. Abdel Nasser, however, continued to insist that there must be no give and take. Consequently, the insurgents cancelled Communiqué No. 9, nine hours after the negotiations started, and sent off FM Amer, Gen. Faisal and the Syrian ministers to Cairo.

Close to 7 p.m., while Amer was on his way to Cairo and while Egyptian forces were starting on their move to Syria, Abdel Nasser broadcast for the second time that day, categorically refusing any "bargaining" and calling on the armed forces to do their duty. Fifty minutes later, a Presidential decree was broadcast dismissing from the army six officers who led the revolt. Another hour passed and Damascus Radio opened with a direct attack on Abdel Nasser and his "odious tyranny."

The Egyptian armed intervention hinged on the fact that throughout the day Aleppo Command and the Latakia garrison had remained loyal to the UAR. The Egyptian forces were thus assigned to land on friendly territory, and the question of how they were to restore the situation in Syria at large remained a matter for speculation; initially, in any case, the force had orders not to open fire, according to Egyptian sources. Two thousand parachutists and a considerable sea-borne force embarked for Syria. At 7.30 p.m., when the first wave of transport aircraft started out from Egypt, carrying some 200 officers and men, both Aleppo and Latakia were still loyal to the UAR, but before the force reached the landing area both had been taken over by the insurgents. A landing now was liable to set off a shooting war immediately. Confronted with this possibility, Abdel Nasser called the operation off just before midnight; the first 200 parachutists, among them the commander of the Egyptian commandos, had already landed in the Latakia area, where they soon surrendered.

By midnight the secession of Syria from the UAR was an established fact; and in the morning of September 29 the officers who led the revolt entrusted a civilian, Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari, with the formation of the government. On the same day, the Syrian Arab Republic, as the old-new state was now called, was recognized by two of its neighbours, Turkey and Jordan.

The coup was led by army and air force officers whose exact number could not be established. The names of six of them, two brigadiers and four lieutenant-colonels, became known on the day of the coup when they were publicly dismissed from the Army by President Abdel Nasser. Six others, ranking from Major to Colonel, became known later.

Reliable information on the origins of the conspiracy was scant. Most of the information available came from Cairo—an interested party. It was said to be partly derived from an alleged Syrian bill of indictment issued some months after the coup, which charged Brig. Hussein, a leader of the coup, and others with conspiring with Jordan.

Spokesmen of the insurgents said the revolution was first conceived a year after the formation of the UAR. According to Cairo sources, there were two groups among the insurgent officers: prominent in the one being Lieut.-Col. Kuzbari and Col. Hussein, and in the second Lieut.-Colonels Nahlawi and Dahman. There were family and business connections between these officers and their backers. The brothers of Kuzbari and Hussein, who were among the initiators of the conspiracy, were business partners. The Kuzbari family, in turn, was connected with the "Company of Five," Syria's largest private business concern, Dr Ma'mun al-Kuzbari, the first Premier after the coup, being the son-in-law of a prominent partner in the Company. Col. Hindi, another leader of the coup, was a relative of Lieut.-Col. Nahlawi.

Again according to the Cairo sources, the Kuzbari-Hussein group—connected with "capitalist-reactionary" circles—began forming at the end of 1959 and allegedly established contact with King Hussein, who in turn enlisted the financial aid of King Saud. In Jan 1961 Kuzbari approached Nahlawi and thereafter the conspiracy began to take its final shape. In the Nahlawi group, according to Cairo, there were officers who wished only to "correct mistakes," not to break up the union, and they were responsible for issuing Communiqué No. 9. The Kuzbari-Hussein group, on the other hand, had issued Communiqué No. 2, attacking socialism.

The conspirators held posts which facilitated the execution of the coup. Lieut.-Col. Nahlawi was Director of Officers' Affairs as well as Director of the Office of FM Amer and, according to Egyptian sources, it was he who posted his fellow conspirators to key commands in Qatana, Syria's largest military base, close to Damascus, and elsewhere. Brig. Dahman was Commander of Damascus Garrison and Brig. As'ad Deputy Commander of the Air Force, Northern Region. It was generally agreed that, while Col. Abd al-Hamid Sarraj had no part in the conspiracy, his falling out with President Abdel Nasser aided the coup, in particular by gravely weakening the security services just when the conspiracy was coming to a head (see also pp 602 ff, on the Sarraj crisis).

The reasons for the failure of the union were much commented upon by foreign observers and the two interested parties. While, of course, Egyptians and Syrians differed fundamentally in placing the blame for the failure, there was nevertheless a widespread consensus on the general factors involved. These factors can be usefully grouped under two headings: (1) fundamental weaknesses; (2) actual political causes.

Fundamentally, it was thought, conditions had not been ripe for the union: Arab nationalism proved weaker than "regionalism." The Egyptians themselves admitted that Egypt had been lacking in Arab consciousness. In Syria, on the other hand, the consciousness of being different and separate grew under the union. The behaviour of the Egyptians in Syria had "caused the Arabs to detest unity," the Syrians said. Syria, in an Egyptian view, had not in fact been attracted to a union with Egypt as such, but was attracted by the "Arab hero personality" of Abdel Nasser; this "hero personality," however, could not hold the union together unaided.

Further fundamental weaknesses were thought to have been the differences in economic organization, social development, and political temper and tradition. When the union was established, Egypt was well on the way to a state-owned economy under the banner of the "socialist democratic cooperative society" and power was completely centralized; Syria's was a laissez faire economy, and political power was diffused between the officers corps, traditional and regional groups, interest groups, parties and trade unions, all of which in turn were represented in the army by political-minded officers. Moreover, Syrian politics were traditionally volatile, and the Syrians were hard to govern.

Abdel Nasser said that in 1958 he realized the difficulties involved in the union and would have preferred a gradual approach, but he "submitted to the popular will." There was indeed general agreement that the union had been established at the urgent request of the Syrians; the Egyptians added that the Syrians had been seeking a way out from internal political strife and defence against external dangers, and it had been the desire to help Syria and defend Arab nationalism that had prompted Abdel Nasser to agree to the union despite his misgivings. Another fundamental weakness of the union, it was widely agreed, was the geographical division between the two regions.

The two most potent political factors which actually led to the coup were obviously discontent in the army and among the economic strata adversely affected by the UAR policy of "Arab socialism"—especially by the July decrees. More generally, there was widespread resentment at what was termed "Egyptian domination" of Syria, politically and economically. A major grievance in this connection was the abolition of the Syrian political parties (which had been demanded by Abdel Nasser as a condition for his consent to the union) and, even more so, the barring of the former party leaders from any access to power; the case of the Ba'ath party stood out because of its important role in the formation of the union.

However, Syrians and Egyptians disagreed as to who was responsible for these factors. The Syrians contended that the whole Syrian army had become disaffected by a policy of "mass liquidations" and "Egyptianization"; the Egyptians countered that there were only a few power-hungry and reactionary-minded officers behind the coup. The Syrians charged that the Egyptians, in disregard of the peculiarities of the Syrian economic system, had suppressed free enterprise and endeavoured to turn Syria into an agricultural country to provide a market for Egyptian industry. In the Egyptian view, the "destruction of feudalism and monopoly" had been "the decision of the Syrian people"; the economy and the people at large, the peasants and the workers, had benefited from the union. The Syrians charged that the Egyptians had instituted a regime of Egyptianization, using extreme repressive measures, and had worked to eliminate the local political leadership, thereby disrupting the Syrian body politic. Egyptians posted to Syria had been overbearing and had exploited the country, they declared. These charges were summarily rejected by Abdel Nasser, though Hassanenei Haykal, his spokesman, admitted that such grievances indeed existed, but said they were unfounded.

In the Syrian view, the union should have been a partnership while in fact an Egyptian overlordship had been established. In the opinion of Abdel Nasser, his policies had been right, but they should have been more determinedly and effectively implemented; in particular, there should have been no "reconciliation with reaction," which, in the end, had engineered the coup. Haykal said that the "new power" in Damascus had not exercised genuine authority because Cairo feared the label of tyranny; thus the Syrian politicians had been able to perpetuate a state of non-union, struggling for power against the central authority and each other. The effectiveness of government was also hampered by Cairo's insufficient knowledge of Syria, a point made—in different forms—by both Egyptian and Syrian commentators.

To sum up, in the absence of a partnership on the one hand, and a strongly entrenched Egyptian authority on the other, the government in Damascus lacked a genuine power base. The July decrees and the abolition of the separate Syrian government in August brought Syrian discontent to a head. On the other hand, the Sarraj crisis, itself a consequence of the centralization of government in Cairo, seriously weakened government control in Damascus. Thus, conditions grew ripe for the coup.

A natural cause also contributed to the difficulties of the union; the years of the union were marked by a severe draught, which aggravated the dislocation caused to the economy by the agrarian reform and the "socialist decrees."

THE COUP D'ETAT

THE SEIZURE OF DAMASCUS AND THE FIRST COMMUNIQUE

Zero Hour Determined. The decision to seize Damascus on Thursday, Sept 28 at dawn was reported to have been taken by the officers of the future "Revolutionary Command" either on Tuesday, Sept 26 (M. Amin in Al-Mustawwar, Oct 12) or Sept 27. The timing was said to have been triggered by the rumour that FM Amer was about to decree the deposition of the officers concerned, who had already contacted him at an earlier date on Syrian grievances. (Hayat, Oct 1; Times, Oct 5; see also below: The Antecedents of the Coup.)

The Seizure of Damascus. The insurgents approached Damascus from two directions. The two columns set out from their bases at about 2 a.m. The Desert Guard led by its CO, Lieut.-Col. Haydar al-Kuzbari, moved south from its base at Dumeir, 39 km east of Damascus, and tank units moved north from Qatana [the largest military base in Syria, 17 km SE of Damascus], reportedly led by Brig. Jasim Alwan. [Brig. Alwan was a pro-Nasser officer and was never mentioned later as belonging to the insurgents; it would seem that those of his forces that participated in the coup did so without his knowledge and certainly were not led by him.] Close to 4 a.m. these forces reached the outskirts of Damascus, where they were strengthened by the forces of Damascus garrison, commanded by Col. Abd al-Ghani Dahman, Commander Damascus District. (Hayat, Oct 1; Sunday Pictorial, Oct 8)

At about 4.30 a.m. strategic points in and around the capital were occupied according to a pre-arranged plan. The installations seized were Damascus airport, the wireless station, GHQ Northern Region (i.e., the Syrian Army Command); positions were taken along the main thoroughfares of the city, and the tanks from Qatana patrolled the streets. (Hayat, Sept 29, 30, Oct 1; NYT, Oct 1)

Army Heads, Amer Detained. Lieut.-Gen. Jamāl Faisal (a Syrian) and Maj.-Gen. Anwar al-Qādi (an Egyptian), Commander and Deputy Commander of the 1st (Syrian) Army, were arrested in their homes and taken to GHQ. A further number of senior officers, both Egyptian and Syrian, Syrian ministers of the UAR then in Damascus, and former Vice-President Abd al-Hamid as-Sarrāj were placed under house arrest. (Hayat, Oct 1)

Field Marshal Abd al-Hakim Amer, UAR Vice-President, C-in-C UAR Armed Forces, and special representative of the President in Syria, was soon a prisoner of the revolutionary officers at GHQ. There are two versions as to how this happened. According to Al-Hayat he was arrested in his house in Abu Rumana quarter by the forces of Lieut.-Col. Haydar al-Kuzbari, after an exchange of fire, and taken by armoured car to GHQ "in his pyjamas." (Hayat, Oct 1)

According to the other version, [probably the correct one.] Amer rushed from his residence to GHQ at about 4 a.m., when the first news of unusual activities reached him, and was there apprehended by the insurgents when they occupied the building. Kuzbari laid siege to Amer's residence shortly after his departure, in the belief that he was still there, and the exchange of fire ensued until the surrender of the defenders, whereupon Kuzbari rejoined his colleagues at GHQ. Three of the commandos guarding the residence were killed during the fight. (Sunday Pictorial, Oct 8; Ahram, Dec 1)

Abortive Military Move by Egyptian Officers. At 4 a.m. Maj.-Gen. Anwar al-Qādi contacted an Egyptian brigade-major of the Field Artillery Brigade at Quteifa [40 km NE of Damascus] and ordered him to bring the brigade up to Damascus. [The Syrian statement on this affair does not say where al-Qādi was at the time.] The major, ignoring his Syrian CO who was at that time at home in Damascus, and the protests of the Syrian duty officer, immediately alerted the brigade; Egyptian officers were assembled and put in charge of key command and staff positions in place of the Syrian officers who were off duty and mostly at home; according to Damascus Radio, the "other ranks" in the brigade were told of a Jewish surprise attack which necessitated immediate and unorthodox action. These improvisations completed, the brigade set out for Damascus. Meanwhile, the Syrian NCOs had become suspicious and had sent emissaries to the Syrian officers. The move came to an abrupt end when the brigade column en route met its commanding officer, Lieut.-Col. Ahmad Saif Wāni, who had heard of the events afoot and was rushing back to Quteifa. Soon afterwards, the other Syrian officers arrived. The brigade was ordered back to base and obeyed without demur; the Egyptian officers were arrested, and later joined the general exodus of Egyptian personnel from Syria. (R. Damascus, Oct 3 [4]; Jundi, Oct 5; Mid. Mtr., Oct 7)

Informing the Public, The Damascus Communiqué. After the seizure of Damascus the insurgents addressed themselves to the public and broadcasted a series of communiqués from Damascus from 7.25 a.m. onwards. (IMB, Sept 28). These were issued in the name of "The Supreme Arab Revolutionary Command of the Armed Forces" (al-qiyadah al-arabiyah ath-thawriyah al-ulya lil-quwat al-musallahah). Damascus Radio came on the air under this name instead of the usual "Broadcast of the UAR from Damascus" (Hayat, Sept 29). The communiqués were repeated from time to time and interspersed with military music and songs "from the days of the struggle against the French" (Hayat, Sept 29) as well as messages of support from various units of the armed forces.

Communiqué No. 1: Army "Removing Corruption and Tyranny." Communiqué No. 1 announced that the army, "which has been and will always remain a firm national support in protecting the freedom, safety, and dignity of the homeland," had that morning begun to "remove corruption and tyranny" and restore "the legitimate rights of the people." This "natural uprising" had no connection with any particular person or group, and had come after all efforts to redress the "unlawful situation" had failed. "We shall never benevolently accept anything for Arabism but victory!" (BBCM, Sept 29; Nasr, Sept 29)

Communiqué No. 2: Hails "Sacred Arab Unity," Details Grievances Against Abdel Nasser's Socialism. [The opening paragraph of communiqué No. 2 sought to convey the impression that Egypt too was rising.] It said that "the struggling Arab people in Syria and Egypt, supported by the Arab army in both countries, have carried out with the help of Almighty God an organized Arab revolutionary movement to eradicate the deviators, those who have struck at the heart of the sacred Arab unity..." The communiqué detailed accusations against "the oppressive, corrupt clique"—no names mentioned—which had caused the union between Syria and Egypt to fail. "The clique" had discredited political unity in the Arab countries. Its overriding desire had been for personal power. It had broken pledges and agreements. It had wasted public funds on corruption and bribery "in the form of salaries"; it had spread false propaganda and libels; it had tried to mislead the people by "theatrical behaviour."

[This communiqué also contained the first, implicit, attack on Abdel Nasser's "socialist laws."] The clique had issued "so-called revolutionary decisions from which the revolution dissociates itself, decisions whose outward appearance shows mercy while they hide misery" in order "to deceive... particularly the workers and peasants." It had also followed a "vile plan" to purge the army of officers "in the prime of youth and full strength." The communiqué concluded that "the Arab people [of Syria] are now stretching forth honest and strong hands to take over their sacred right, and to work with loyalty and faith to strengthen the sacred Arab unity... and to preserve agreements... and to adopt any measures which will improve relations with the [Arab] sister states in particular, and with the foreign states in general." (BBCM, Sept 29; Nasr, Sept 29)

Communiqués Nos. 3-4: Insurgents Claim "Full Control." Communiqué No. 3 announced that the Revolutionary Command was "in full control" of the situation. It called upon the population to treat their "brother Egyptians" and foreigners with "generosity, care and sincerity," and declared that it would strike at saboteurs and intriguers "with a mailed fist."

Communiqué No. 4 (8.37 a.m.) announced the closing of all Syrian airports and harbours until further notice. (BBCM, Sept 29)

No further communiqués were issued until 10.40 a.m. local time. Meanwhile President Abdel Nasser broadcast from Cairo, and subsequently talks commenced between the insurgents and FM Amer.

ABDEL NASSER'S FIRST REACTION

Abdel Nasser in Radio Contact with Amer; First Impression, Scope of Revolt Limited. [President Abdel Nasser was probably in contact with Field Marshal Amer in Damascus from the early hours of the morning. The latter may have established communication from HQ perhaps even before it was reached by the insurgents.]

Later, a Syrian claimed that on the morning of Sept 28 he had accidentally intercepted a conversation on a short-wave band between Abdel Nasser and FM Amer. The conversation had indicated that Abdel Nasser was ordering Amer to play for time and then attack Damascus in accordance with a "plan." Amer had said that the insurgent officers were unimportant and had no prestige. (R. Damascus, Oct 3 [5])

At 8.00 a.m. Cairo Radio announced that President Abdel Nasser would shortly broadcast to the nation. No reference by Cairo to the happenings in Syria was monitored before the President's address which commenced at 9.07 a.m.

"Revolt More Serious Than 1956 Aggression." Abdel Nasser opened his address by saying: "Com patriots, I am speaking to you from the radio station in Cairo;" never before had he come to the station, not even when Egypt "faced the British-French-Israeli aggression." Some small army units from Qatana camp had taken over the Damascus Radio station and surrounded army headquarters. This affected national unity and was far more dangerous than foreign aggression; the fate of Arab nationalism itself was at stake, "the major target for which we have struggled."

"I Shall Not Proclaim the Dissolution of the UAR. I am Responsible." Abdel Nasser continued that some people might believe he would now proclaim the dissolution of the UAR but this "is neither in my power nor my nature." The enemies of the Arabs—imperialism and Israel—called for the dissolution of the UAR; Abdel Nasser could not join them. "I am responsible for every Syrian, every Egyptian and every Arab in this homeland... for this Republic... the vanguard of... Arab nationalism." And so was every "individual of the UAR." Abdel Nasser returned to these themes again and again: "I am responsible for this Republic from Qamishli to Aswan"; "Never, under no circumstances, will I... pronounce the dissolution of the UAR."

"Syria Imposed the Union"; Justification of Socialist Measures. The President said that it was Damascus, "the throbbing heart of Arabism," which had "imposed" the union in 1958. He recalled how before the union the Syrian army was torn by political strife and asked what would be the result if such strife were renewed. "The enemies are lying in wait for us on all sides." Referring to Damascus Communiqué No. 2 which attacked the "revolutionary decrees," the President repeatedly said that they had been issued for the sake of the people, the workers and the peasants.

"First Army Moving on Damascus To Stop Mutiny"; "Bloodshed to be Avoided." Asking "what will our attitude be now," Abdel Nasser said: "We want to avoid bloodshed." He stated that the First [Syrian] Army "everywhere" was now marching on Damascus to put an end to the mutiny.

The President concluded with an assurance that the UAR would live on; the Arab people would never consent to a setback to their political and social revolution. (R. Cairo, Sept 28 [29]; Akram, Sept 29)

Abdel Nasser Orders Preparations For Intervention by Egyptian Forces. Speaking on Sept 29 Abdel Nasser said he had taken the decision to send armed forces from Cairo to supply the Aleppo-Latakia area and "to protect the people" "yesterday morning, yesterday lunchtime" (R. Cairo, Sept 29 [Oct 2]). Maj. Huraydi, commander of the Egyptian commandos who paraded at night near Latakia, said that he had received his preliminary orders at about 9.30 a.m., after the President's speech. (For details see below: The Egyptian Armed Intervention.)

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN THE INSURGENTS AND AMER

Negotiations between the insurgents and FM Amer started at 8.00 a.m. and continued until 4.30 p.m. (Hayat, Oct 5)

[During the same time, Syrian forces in the south—the majority of the armed forces—announced their adherence to the revolution, while in Cairo preparations went ahead for armed intervention in the Aleppo-Latakia region where the forces still remained loyal to UAR. This situation later gave rise to mutual accusations that negotiations had taken place only in order to gain time.]

NOTE ON SOURCES: In the following report on the talks, three main sources have been used: Al-Hayât, Sept 30, Oct 1; Abdel Nasser's broadcast on the evening of Sept 28 (Akram, Sept 29; BBCM, Sept 30) referred to below as (Abdel Nasser); and a statement issued by the Syrian "Revolutionary Command" (R. Damascus Oct 2 [4]; Nasr, Oct 3) referred to below as (Syrian Version).

The Negotiations. Having taken Damascus, Al-Hayât wrote, the insurgents resolved that the union between Egypt and Syria was of historical significance and ought to be preserved. They sent a delegation to FM Amer who agreed to exploratory talks, with a view to finding a peaceful solution which would safeguard the continued existence of the union (Hayat, Sept 30). [The insurgents were more explicit: "After their revolution had succeeded, they wanted to give the authorities an opportunity to reform the situation against which they had revolted, knowing that this offer during their revolutionary moves might cost them their lives if the authorities pretended to accept their offer" (Syrian Version). The talks took place at GHQ. [It may be assumed that on the insurgents' side, the participants were the six officers whose deposition Abdel Nasser announced later that day (see p. 614 a).] On the other side were FM Amer, Lieut.-Gen. Faissal, and the Syrian ministers of the UAR: Jädu Izz ad-Din, Ahmad al-Hunaydi, Tu'mah al-Awdat Allah and Akram Dayri (all of them former officers). (Hayat, Sept 30, Oct 1)

The first stage of the talks was charged with tension. The insurgent officers claimed that they were acting neither from personal motives nor from spite against Egypt, nor did they represent partisan interests. It was the general good that dictated their steps; the Syrian situation would have to be remedied if the union was to be saved. The Syrian ministers saw in these allegations an attack on their stewardship of office and mutual recriminations ensued. One of the insurgent officers drew his revolver and shot Akram Dayri [Minister of Finance and Economy] in the thigh. (Hayat, Sept 30, Oct 1; Jihad, Jordan, Oct 2; MENA, Sept 30 [Oct 3])

Insurgents Demand Change to Federation, Retraction of Socialist Measures. When the atmosphere calmed down, it was further reported, the revolutionary officers put forward the following points as a basis for a settlement: (a) the latest socialization measures should be rescinded; (b) the Agrarian Reform Law should be amended, since it was a failure; (c) opportunists should be removed from positions of authority; (d) the UAR should be turned into a federal union, in which Syria would have a status equal to Egypt's (Hayat, Sept 30). [Save for para. (c) there was no direct confirmation that these were the demands put forward, but in the light of the Syrian communiqué and statements as well as subsequent events it is highly probable that these were indeed the insurgents' demands, except perhaps for para. (b).]

Amer Conciliatory. The insurgents' version of Amer's response was as follows: "The Field Marshal promised on his military honour—after we had explained to him the justice of our demands, the nobility of our principles and pointed out to him the mistakes committed by his lackeys—to work for the removal of the causes which led to the revolutionary movement... the FM promised to take measures which would restore to the people their freedom and dignity... He also promised to hold the officials to account for the deterioration in the military and political conditions in the country. When agreement on all these points had been reached, the FM also announced his approval of the holding of a military parade the next day to demonstrate the army's unity. The FM actually began signing orders connected with some of the movement's demands with regard to the army. When the Revolutionary Council asked him at the same time to issue orders which would reform general conditions in the country and restore to the people their freedom and dignity, the FM asked for direct contact with Cairo." (Syrian Version).

According to a neutral source, Amer told the insurgents that it was possible to find a peaceful solution satisfactory to them. He then had a radio conversation with Abdel Nasser and, it was reported, suggested the acceptance of the insurgents' demands. When, however, Amer refused a demand by the insurgents that a joint declaration be issued announcing the end of the revolt (on this point see also Abdel Nasser, below), the insurgents issued Communiqué No. 9 by themselves, at 1.26 p.m. (Hayat, Sept 30, Oct 1)

Communiqué No. 9. [This communiqué conveyed the impression that the issue would be settled on the basis of "appropriate measures" by Amer.] Al-Hayât remarked that the insurgent officers were confident of their power to resume their movement at will [by this time all armed forces, except for some officers in the Aleppo-Latakia area, had adhered to the revolution] and thus had nothing to fear by issuing this communiqué. (Hayat, Oct 30)

Broadcasting Communiqué No. 9, Damascus Radio identified itself again as "Radio Station of the UAR in Damascus."

In the communiqué the Revolutionary Command said that it had been motivated by its concern for Arab unity and declared that it did not intend "to jeopardize the victories accomplished by Arab nationalism." However, it had "felt the presence of subversive, opportunist elements which sought to harm our nationalism, and therefore carried out its blessed movement in response to the desire, hopes, and aims of the Arab people."

"The command also declares that it has submitted the problems and aims of the army to HE the Field Marshal, the Vice-President of the Republic and C-in-C of the Armed Forces, who understood the real affairs of the army and took appropriate measures to solve them in the interest of the unity and strength of the armed forces and the UAR."

"Military matters have returned to their normal course through confidence in the prudence of the C-in-C of the Armed Forces and the Commander of the First Army who realize the aims of the armed forces and the UAR." (R. Damascus, Sept 28 [29])

Abdel Nasser said in the evening that he had contacted Amer after the broadcast of the communiqué and the latter told him that he had not "agreed" to it (Abdel Nasser); the insurgents themselves only said (in Communiqué No. 10; see below) that Amer's "promises" had prompted them to issue it.

Abdel Nasser Adamant: "No Bargaining," Resolves on Armed Intervention. In his radio contacts with Abdel Nasser, Amer told him of the insurgents' attitude; Abdel Nasser strongly opposed any hargaining and when Amer told this to the insurgents, they resolved to carry on with the revolution. (Hayat, Oct 1)

According to the insurgents, they had no need to be informed of the President's attitude as they listened in to the radio contacts. When Amer's request to contact Abdel Nasser was granted, said the insurgents' statement, it became apparent that everything he did was intended to deceive. Abdel Nasser had asked the FM—through coded messages "which your alert army discovered"—to play for time, because measures were being taken to quell the movement; these measures involved the bombardment of Damascus by rocket units and heavy artillery.

"At this point the FM changed his attitude... His going back on his promise... was for no other reason than that he had learned that the paratroopers were being sent to our Arab land to shed Arab blood with Arab blood. It was therefore necessary to put the revolution back on its track, after the FM had hacked down on the demands of the people, as though he had made no promises..."

"Nine hours passed in vain, and the FM refused to broadcast the statement which he had promised to make about realizing the demands of the people and protecting the unity of the army. Then the Revolutionary Council decided to deport the FM to Cairo..." (Syrian Version)

As already mentioned, Abdel Nasser, in his account of the talks, said that Amer had not agreed to Communiqué No. 9. The President also confirmed that the insurgents had demanded of FM Amer "that we should issue a statement saying that the whole situation was settled, but at the same time they placed FM Amer under armed guard. In fact they asked Lieut.-Gen. Jamāl Faisal, Commander of the First Army, to issue a statement saying that the mutiny and this movement had ended, but they at the same time were in control of Command HQ in Damascus. But [he] refused... [for] by doing so he would be deceiving the people. What happened this morning allows for no bargaining or a middle-of-the-road solution. Thus I believe and thus I see my duty in these moments..." [In other words: The President refused to condone a situation whereby a form of union would be preserved but actual control of Syria would have passed from the hands of his appointees to those of the Syrian insurgents.] Abdel Nasser continued: "We can never compromise our Arabism and nationalism, because if we bargained about our Arabism, nationalism, Republic and honour we would at the same time be signing a bond of servitude of this Republic..." (Abdel Nasser)

Breakdown of Talks; Amer Expelled; Communiqué No. 10. When later in the afternoon the insurgent officers asked Amer for the results of his contacts with Abdel Nasser, he told them that he was continuing his efforts and asked for more time. The officers however, afraid of Egyptian armed intervention, told him that further postponement was impossible. Under further pressure, Amer told them of Abdel Nasser's refusal to negotiate. Consequently, nine hours after the negotiations began, the insurgents issued Communiqué No. 10. (Hayat, Sept 30, Oct 1)

The communiqué announced that the revolutionary course had been resumed. Communiqué No. 9 had been issued after FM Amer had promised "to do away with the opportunists and the saboteurs." However, the FM had gone back on his promise, and therefore the Revolutionary Command regarded that communiqué as cancelled; it "has placed its hands on everything, and it pledges to God and the country to protect the nation's security, to preserve its rights and dignity." It called on the people to be vigilant so as to prevent "opportunists and hirelings, if any" from infiltrating into the people's ranks. (R. Damascus, Sept 28 [29])

At the same time, the insurgents escorted Amer, Faisal and the Syrian pro-UAR ministers to the airport, where they took off for Cairo at 5:20 p.m. Twenty-five minutes later Amer's departure was announced over Damascus Radio in Communiqué No. 12. (BBCM, Sept 30)

The Final Break: Abdel Nasser's Broadcast and Dismissal of Insurgents; Damascus Attacks Abdel Nasser. [Whilst Amer was on his way to Cairo and the Egyptian forces were starting on their move to Syria] Abdel Nasser, at 6:55 p.m., broadcast for the second time that day. As already recorded above, he categorically refused to make the unity of the UAR an object of hargaining and called the armed forces to their duty.

This was followed 50 minutes later by the announcement over Cairo Radio of a decree by Abdel Nasser dismissing the six "rebels" from the army, i.e. the officers who led the revolt. (For their names, see p 614 a.)

Damascus reacted to this decree in Communiqué No. 13, saying that Cairo did not realize that the Revolutionary Command was backed by the whole army, and added that the people in Syria alone had the right to determine their future.

An hour later Damascus opened up a direct attack on the "tyrant" Abdel Nasser and "his trumpets." It accused the President of wishing to instigate bloodshed, of turning the "sons of this noble nation" against each other "for the sake of his interest, domination and odious tyranny." (R. Cairo, Damascus, Sept 28 [30]; see this source also for later statements.)

Egyptian Armed Intervention. [The next stage in the course of the coup d'état was the Egyptian parachutists' drop near Latakia. Before dealing with this event, however, it is necessary to record the attitude to the rising taken by the army and the country in general.]

THE ADHERENCE OF THE ARMED FORCES AND THE PUBLIC

Synopsis: By noon of Sept 28, army headquarters in the S., S.W. and E. military areas, as well as those of directorates and arms located in Damascus, had been quoted by Damascus radio as supporting the revolution. There were no subsequent contradictions.

About that time, Aleppo radio announced the continued loyalty to the UAR, of the commanders of the Northern and Coastal commands, and quoted messages of support in the same spirit from civilians—official and semi-official sources—from as far south as Homs, and from the Eastern region.

During the early hours of the night, first the Northern Command (HQ Aleppo) and then the Coastal Command (HQ Latakia) were taken over by forces loyal to Damascus.

By the time the Egyptian parachute descent materialized, all Syria was militarily in the hands of the revolutionaries.

Anti-UAR demonstrations took place in the forenoon and pro-UAR demonstrations in the afternoon. In the latter, apparently, Palestinians were prominent. Though much publicity was given by Abdel Nasser and Cairo broadcasts to reports of public pro-UAR sentiment, there was no evidence that the demonstrations influenced the course of events one way or the other.

Adherence of Armed Forces in the South. At about 9.30 a.m. Damascus Radio started broadcasting messages of support for the Revolutionary Command. By noon, all higher military headquarters in the south had declared their support.

The commander of the Southwestern Command [the Israel border area, where a large part of the army was concentrated] based his declaration of support for the Revolutionary Command on his "wish to prevent bloodshed and guard the borders of the homeland." (R. Damascus, Sept 28 [29]; IMB, Sept 28)

[Damascus Radio did not broadcast the support of non-military bodies or persons by name until the morning of Sept 29, when the formation of the Kuzbari government was announced.]

Adherence of the Armed Forces in the East. The support of the Eastern Command (Deir ez-Zor) was announced by Damascus Radio at 12.15 a.m. (R. Damascus, Sept 28-IMB, Sept 28). This announcement was not denied by other sources; however, for the attitude of the provincial governor, the police commander and Deir ez-Zor broadcasting station—see below.

Aleppo and Coastal Command Loyal to UAR. At about noon, Sept 28, Damascus Radio announced that the Northern (Aleppo) and Coastal (Latakia) commands were supporting the revolution.

At 12.10 p.m., however, Aleppo Radio, which until then had been relaying Damascus Radio, asserted on behalf of Brig. Hikmat Jamil ad-Dayah, Commander of the Northern Command, that the officers and their commands were loyal to the UAR. Brig. Dayah threatened to "strike with a mailed fist at every separatist element" and demanded "the carrying out of necessary reforms to maintain the safety of the situation."

In Latakia the key personality was Col. Kâzim Zaytûnah, Commander of Latakia Garrison and of the Navy, Northern Region. At 12.13 p.m. Aleppo Radio broadcast a cable from him, denying the declaration of support for the revolution imputed to him some minutes earlier by Damascus Radio; the station gave his appointment as Commander of the Coastal Command [also situated at Latakia. (This was a (deliberate?) error. Commander of the Coastal Command, as well as of the 10th Infantry Brigade stationed in that area, was Col. Muhammad Mansûr, one of the leaders of the coup. It later transpired that on the day of the coup Col. Mansûr was in Damascus. Thus Col. Zaytûnah was the senior officer on the spot.]

During the afternoon, Aleppo Radio occasionally relayed Cairo Radio. It also broadcast messages of loyalty to the UAR from dignitaries in the north, including the governors of the provinces of Aleppo, Hama, Latakia and Deir ez-Zor, and Col. Fu'ad Jâbir, police commander of Deir ez-Zor province. Aleppo Radio also broadcast an appeal for a statement by FM Amer and Lieut.-Gen. Jamâl Faïsal, "freely and clearly explaining the situation." (R. Aleppo, Sept 28 [29, 30])

Deir ez-Zor broadcasting station relayed Aleppo Radio and Cairo Radio from 1.10 p.m. till 1.50 p.m.; before and after this, it transmitted in parallel with Damascus Radio. Tartus broadcasting station [south of Latakia, with a small military garrison] broadcast in parallel with Damascus Radio throughout the day. (BBCM, Sept 29, 30)

Aleppo And Latakia Change Sides. [The sources available did not make sufficiently clear the sequence of events in the switch-over of the armed forces from loyalty to the UAR to support for the insurgents. The changeover was effected by stages; the main part in rallying the area to the side of the insurgents was apparently played by Col. Faïsal al-Hasan, Commander of the 2nd Training Centre.]

At 6.10 p.m. Aleppo Radio broadcast a communiqué from HQ, 2nd Training Centre (in Aleppo), announcing that it had been joined by the 20th Armoured Battalion of the 5th Armoured Brigade and by officers of the Reserve College, and that all these forces were "in full control of the situation" [the communiqué did not state whom these forces supported] but 45 minutes later Aleppo Radio still showed itself to be on the side of the UAR by relaying Abdel Nasser's second speech.

At 9.10 p.m., however, Aleppo Radio broadcast the adherence to the "blessed revolution" of the 2nd Training Centre, and added that this unit supported "officers who fully controlled the situation in Aleppo" (R. Aleppo, Sept 28 [30]). What happened, according to a Cairo source, was that Col. Faïsal al-Hasan, Commander of the 2nd Training Centre, at the head of 200 soldiers, had taken over Aleppo broadcasting station after a fight during which eight people were killed; at the same time Brig. Dayah was put under guard and sent to Damascus. (Ahram, Sept 30, Oct 5)

Fifteen minutes later Aleppo broadcast announcements by Col. Hasan supporting the revolution and imposing curfew in Aleppo. (R. Aleppo, Sept 28 [30])

Two more hours passed before Aleppo Radio announced that "all the forces in the city had joined the revolutionary movement"; it specifically mentioned the commando battalion. At the same time, it announced that the governor of Aleppo and the president of the executive council of the National Union there had declared to Col. Hasan their support for the revolution. It was now some time after 11.00 p.m. (R. Aleppo, Sept 28 [30])

Meanwhile in Latakia, during the afternoon, Col. Zaytûnah had been urgently asking Cairo for reinforcements. He repeated his request after the takeover at Aleppo, adding that he feared a march by the insurgents on Latakia, "in which case a clash would be inevitable." "Suddenly the situation changed in the city... and the mutineers were able, by threats, to remove the national [i.e. pro-Egyptian] elements amongst the Latakia troops" (Ahram, Sept 30). According to Al-Hayāt, armoured units had been sent from Aleppo in readiness for the Egyptian airborne intervention (Hayāt, Sept 29). At 11.40 p.m. the adherence of the Coastal Command, as well as the Navy HQ at Latakia, to the revolution was definitively reported by Damascus Radio. (Sept 28-IMB, Sept 29)

Public Demonstrations. In the morning of Sept 28, as soon as the people of Damascus learned of the revolution, demonstrations in its support took place in the capital. Syrian flags were carried and hoisted in public places; UAR flags and pictures of Abdel Nasser were torn and Egyptian institutions stoned. (BBC in Arabic, Sept 28-IMB, Sept 28; Hayāt, Sept 29, Oct 1)

Indirect evidence of public demonstration throughout the forenoon may be found in Communiqués Nos. 3 (7.15 a.m., quoted above), 6 (11.30 a.m.), 7 (12.30 p.m.) and 8 (1.11 p.m.), all of which demanded that there should be no demonstrations and warned that the Revolutionary Command would strike with "a mailed fist" at saboteurs, opportunists and intriguers. The first of these communiqués asked the public to "protect their Egyptian brethren" and the second asked them to "cease expressing collective signs of support" [probably in response to the anti-Nasser demonstrations]; the latter two spoke of demonstrations in general. (R. Damascus, Sept 28 [29]; Nassr, Sept 29)

While Damascus was reported quiet at noon, pro-Nasser demonstrations in which Palestinians were prominent took place in the early afternoon, after the publication of Communiqué No. 9. In a clash near Damascus broadcasting station, two insurgent officers were reported killed. Anti-UAR demonstrations may have been taking place at the same time. The demonstrators were finally dispersed by the army. At about 5.30 p.m. Communiqué No. 11 announced the imposition of curfew from 7 p.m. that night until 5.30 a.m. the following day. (R. Cairo, R. Damascus, Sept 28-IMB, Sept 28; Hayāt, Sept 29; BAPP, Oct 13)

Aleppo Radio, while still in the hands of authorities loyal to the UAR, described demonstrations taking place in the city in support of the UAR (R. Aleppo, Sept 28 [29, 30]). According to an Egyptian source, just after units of the 2nd Training Centre had brought the city over to the revolution, a stormy demonstration of Palestinian refugees from a near-by camp passed through the streets. It was dispersed by armoured troops, which then occupied the camp (Ahram, Oct 5). Curfew was imposed on Aleppo from 9.30 p.m. Early next morning, Damascus Radio exhorted the population of Aleppo to abstain from demonstrations of joy, in order not to give undesirable elements an opportunity for provocation. (R. Damascus, Sept 29-IMB, Sept 29)

EGYPTIAN ARMED INTERVENTION

Abdel Nasser had reached the decision on armed intervention on the morning of Sept 28 (Abdel Nasser's speech of Sept 29; R. Cairo, Sept 29 [Oct 2]; Ahram, Sept 30, henceforth: Abdel Nasser). This was confirmed by the Egyptian Maj. Galāl Huraydi, the officer commanding the commando units (ṣāṭiqah), in his interview with Syrian examining officers later. (Nahar, Beirut, Oct 29, quoting Damascus Television, henceforth: Huraydi)

Abdel Nasser's Decision and Orders: Air and Seaborne Troops to Intervene in Aleppo-Latakia Area. On the basis of reports of continued support for the UAR in the Aleppo-Latakia area, and in particular in response to the appeals of Col. Zaytūnah (see above), Abdel Nasser said he had decided "to supply these areas and protect the people by sending armed forces from Cairo." (Abdel Nasser)

[Abdel Nasser conveyed the impression that the intervention was meant to be massive]: He said that he had issued orders for the despatch of two parachute brigades to Latakia as well as orders "to all the navy forces to move" (which they immediately did) and "all our [merchant] ships to be commandeered for transporting the troops." Soon afterwards these forces were ready to move: 2,000 parachutists were ready to be dropped. (Abdel Nasser)

Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, [and the President's foremost spokesman] later wrote that the navy was transporting to Syria "two divisions"—some 35,000 men as well as armour. "The force was sufficient to take Northern Syria and to move on Damascus" (Ahram, Oct 6). [This no doubt was a vast exaggeration; it was completely impossible for the Egyptians to move a force of such dimensions at such short notice. It seems that Egyptian spokesmen, when praising the decision to call off the intervention, would exaggerate the size of this force in order to emphasize the magnanimity of this decision.]

Question of Participation of Syrian Troops. The parachute force, "which moved yesterday" [i.e. on Sept 28], Abdel Nasser said, included Syrians from the Syrian parachute battalion in Egypt who insisted on going as this was their battle (Abdel Nasser). [The words employed by Nasser would seem to imply that he referred to individual soldiers.] A Syrian source claimed that "Lieut.-Gen. Ali Amer [the UAR Chief-of-Staff]... went to the Syrian paratroop battalion in Cairo and offered money to the officers and soldiers to persuade them to land in Aleppo and occupy its broadcasting station at all costs." The Syrians refused with "scorn and told the Egyptian rulers to their faces: an Arab cannot be bought with money." (R. Damascus, Oct 10 [12])

[No reports were found of Syrians among the 120 officers and men who actually dropped at Latakia.]

Abdel Nasser's Briefing; Says Troops Ordered Not to Shoot. The first troops to be alerted were Maj. Huraydi's commandos.

Huraydi received the alert and preliminary instructions at about 9.30 a.m. and by noon his troops were ready for action; later Huraydi stated that because of pressure of time he had not even inspected his troops before take-off. (Huraydi)

Early in the afternoon Huraydi received an additional briefing from Abdel Nasser to person at GHQ, in the presence of Lieut.-Gen. Ali Amer, the Chief-of-Staff. According to Huraydi, Abdel Nasser told him that there was chaos and looting in Syria. Nobody knew exactly what was happening there and who was behind it all, "the Communists, the socialists, the Ba'athists or the Muslim Brethren." The putsch was the work of "4 or 5 officers without much support, either in the army or among the public." FM Amer had been detained (a fact, Huraydi said, which caused him a great shock as "I love Amer so much as to be his slave").

Despite much prompting by his Syrian army interrogators, Huraydi did not admit—though he did not ex-publicly deny—that he had been ordered to suppress the rising. His impression was that the President thought that he had to deal only with some junior officer who would surrender to a threat. He also said that he had received no orders to establish a bridgehead for additional forces; Abdel Nasser told him that Latakia and Aleppo were "in our hands" [meaning that he understood that he was to drop in a friendly area; hence the questions of shooting or a bridgehead would not arise]. (Huraydi)

Abdel Nasser said that the parachutists were told before leaving "not to open fire either on the people or on the army" (Abdel Nasser). Al-Akram said in addition that Huraydi had been ordered to surrender to Col. Zaytūnah "if he should find himself and his group exposed to military resistance." (Akram, Sept 30)

Huraydi described how Abdel Nasser had ordered Salāh Nasr, Director of Intelligence, to supply him with "all the Syrian money he had," as well as with dollars, pounds sterling and Lebanese money, "but they did not find any dollars and pounds sterling" (Huraydi). When he surrendered Huraydi had in his possession £S and £L 1,000,000." (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [Oct 2])

The Airborne Operation. On Sept 28 at 7.30 p.m. [while Aleppo Radio was still supporting the UAR, and Col. Zaytūnah at Latakia was awaiting Egyptian reinforcements], the first wave of seven transport aircraft started out from Egypt, carrying Maj. Huraydi, 13 officers and 105 other ranks. Huraydi himself dropped at Latakia airport between 11.30 and 11.45 p.m. on Sept 28. The last aircraft arrived over the area at approximately 1.30 a.m. on Sept 29, Huraydi said. [By now Aleppo was firmly in the hands of the insurgents and the adherence of Latakia was just being announced.]

Landings Called Off. After the insurgents had taken over Aleppo, a situation arose, Abdel Nasser said, which "required thought: should one Arab's blood be shed by another... and in the interests of whom do we fight each other while there are enemies lying in wait" (Abdel Nasser). Haykal elaborated on Abdel Nasser's decision: a shooting war would only have deepened the rift and the union would have ceased to appear as an expression of the will of the people. As to the enemies: the US Sixth Fleet was on its way; Turkey, which had well-known "designs on Northern Syria," could have intervened militarily; Israel could have used the opportunity to occupy some part of the Arab homeland—and the Arab reaction in Amman and elsewhere was lying in wait. (Akram, Oct 6)

Thus, just before midnight, Abdel Nasser called off the operation, and issued orders to recall the planes already in the air and the naval forces which were by then near Latakia. However, Huraydi and the men with him had already been dropped. Huraydi was contacted by wireless and ordered in Abdel Nasser's name "not to fire a single bullet and to report to the commander of the naval area of Latakia" (Abdel Nasser, Akram, Sept 30). [This was not corroborated by Huraydi. If he did not omit this accidentally, it is possible that the order was issued but not received by him.]

Huraydi Surrenders. According to Huraydi, some of his men came down quite far from the target area, and he did not succeed in assembling them in the darkness. There were casualties, too, Huraydi and those with him at the airport waited for dawn, when he established contact with the Syrian army. While Huraydi with several of his officers waited at Syrian headquarters in Latakia for his men and their equipment to be collected from the airport, he said, he understood that he was under arrest and he contemplated suicide, "for his failure as a sid'iqah commander and officer." Later the entire group was sent under guard to Homs, which had meanwhile been reached by the parachutists who had missed the target area. From Homs, Huraydi was despatched to Mezze prison, Damascus (Huraydi).

Syrian Sources. Just after midnight on Sept 29 [when Huraydi and his men had long since landed and the main Egyptian force had already been recalled] the "Revolutionary Command" in Damascus announced that it understood Abdel Nasser's speech that evening to mean that he was about to employ his armed forces against the Syrian uprising, and that it had made preparations to meet force with force. (R. Damascus, Sept 28, 21.36 GMT [30])

At 7 a.m. (Syrian time) on Sept 29 Damascus Radio announced that some paratroopers had landed in the Latakia area in a pirate-like operation and had been destroyed. At 1 p.m. Damascus Radio said that 120 soldiers under Huraydi had been sent by Abdel Nasser "to fight their brothers," but they were "forced to capitulate without a single drop of blood shed." (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [30])

[Major Huraydi was returned to Egypt via Lebanon towards the end of Nov.]

The Significance of the Operation. According to Al-Hayāt, the ill-starred airborne operation decided the issue in favour of Syria's complete separation; its impression on the Syrian public had been devastating (Hayat, Oct 1). Damascus Radio jeered at Abdel Nasser for believing that he could occupy Syria with 200 paratroopers (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [30]) and one of the Syrian officers interviewing Huraydi suggested that it was stupid of Abdel Nasser to try and subjugate Syria by force (Huraydi).

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SYRIAN REPUBLIC

[As recorded above, by midnight of Sept 28 all the military and civilian authorities throughout Syria had expressed their adherence to the Revolutionary Command in Damascus.]

At 1 a.m. on Sept 29 all Syrian broadcasting stations closed their programmes with the old Syrian national anthem (BBCM, Sept 30) [the term "UAR" not having been mentioned by Damascus Radio since the morning, except for the abortive episode connected with Communiqué No. 9 recorded above.]

Provisional Government of "Syrian Arab Republic." During the night hours of Sept 28–29, the officers of the Revolutionary Command consulted political leaders of different trends on the establishment of a government. It was agreed that a provisional government should be set up to supervise elections, and it was unanimously decided to entrust this task to Dr Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari, who accepted the assignment. (Hayat, Sept 30; R. Damascus, Nov 10 [13])

At 7.30 a.m. on Sept 29 the Revolutionary Command announced in an unnumbered communiqué that "in fulfilment of the pledge which it had made to the people" it had charged Dr Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari with the formation of a cabinet, "which will run the affairs of the country so as to restore constitutional conditions" (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [30]). Within three hours Damascus

Radio broadcast the composition of the new government, and that night the new Prime Minister read his statement of policy (see pp 486-7).

The new government called itself the "Government of the Syrian Arab Republic" (al-jumhuriyah al-arabiyyah as-suriyah) (Hayat, Oct 1; BBCM, Oct 2) [thus giving the new state its name. Before the establishment of the UAR the state was called the Republic of Syria (al-jumhuriyah as-suriyah).]

On Sept 29, the first day of its existence, the Syrian government was recognized by Jordan and Turkey, while the Prime Minister of a third neighbour, Iraq, delivered a guarded speech which indicated that he viewed the new Syrian regime with goodwill (see p 148 h).

In the afternoon of Sept 29, Abdel Nasser publicly confirmed that he "would not agree to turn unity into a military operation." (R. Cairo, Sept 29 [Oct 2])

[The sequence of events leading to the dissolution of the UAR may be regarded as concluded on Sept 29. Abdel Nasser's address of Oct 5, in which he called off the diplomatic boycott of the Syrian Republic, and the resignation of the Syrian ministers of the UAR, officially reported on Oct 7, merely confirmed the existing situation.]

THE ANTECEDENTS OF THE COUP

Syrian Version: Coup in Making for Two Years; The Leaders of the Revolt. On Oct 4 two of the officers who led the coup told the Press of its antecedents. The officers refused to identify themselves; Al-Hayat said they were Brig. Muwaffaq Asāsah and Brig. Abd al-Ghani Dahmān.

They said the revolution was first conceived one year after the merger with Egypt [i.e. at the beginning of 1959] but "one year was lost in just talking about putting an end to those troubles" [caused by the Egyptians]. Things however went from bad to worse and thus "about a year ago" it was decided to take action. "Secret meetings were held throughout the army on different levels and in small numbers... When they [the leaders of the conspiracy] came to the conclusion that the whole Syrian army was determined, they started to act." (For sources, see below.)

The Officers Leading the Coup. The two brigadiers said that "those who started the revolution were the heads of different armed services all over Syria." They said that the six officers dismissed by Abdel Nasser on Sept 28, the day of the coup, were not the men who led the revolution but among the officers who started it. (Hayat, Oct 5; Mid. Mir., Oct 7) These officers were:

Brig. Abd al-Ghani Dahmān [Commander of Damascus Garrison];

Brig. Muwaffaq Asāsah [Deputy Commander of the Air Force, Northern R., who was in command of the air force on the day of the coup in the absence of the commander. In Abdel Nasser's decree the name was given as Brig. Muwaffaq Asāsah; according to Al-Musawwar of Oct 12 he had served as an intelligence officer until he was transferred by Lieut.-Col. Nahlāwī to the "infantry command." However, there were no later reports on the existence of such an officer nor did an "infantry command" seem to have existed in the Syrian army. Asāsah, on the other hand, became a power behind the Syrian political scene];

Lieut.-Col. Abd al-Karīm an-Nahlāwī [Director of Officers' Affairs; Director of the Office of FM Amer];

Lieut.-Col. Haydar al-Kuzbari [OC Desert Guard, a cousin of Ma'mūn al-Kuzbari, the first Syrian premier after the coup];

Lieut.-Col. Nasīb Hindī [Chief of Staff of the 72nd Brigade, at Qatana camp];

Lieut.-Col. Hishām Abd Rabbūh [a battalion commander in the 72nd Brigade at Qatana camp; according to Abdel Nasser, Abd Rabbūh served as his escort during his stays at Damascus Guest Palace (Ahram, April 27, 1962)].

[Col. Faisal Sirri al-Husseini, Director of Artillery, was another officer prominent among the conspirators; see below.]

Three additional officers mentioned among the leaders of the coup were: Col. Zuhayr Aqil, [Air Force];

Col. Muhammad Mansūr, [Commander of the Coastal Command, and the 10th Infantry Brigade];

Maj. (later Lieut.-Col.) Fā'iz ar-Rifā'i, [a tank officer in Qatana camp].

In Jan 1962 these three met with Abdel Nasser in Cairo where they had gone together with other officers to settle matters outstanding between Egypt and Syria. (Haykal in Ahram, April 20, 27, 1962)

[Lieut.-Col. Fakhri Umar and Maj. Bassām Asali apparently also belonged to the conspirators.]

As to Maj.-Gen. Abd al-Karīm Zahr ad-Dīn, who after the coup became C-in-C of the Syrian armed forces, the two spokesmen said in answer to a question as to whether he was among the officers who engineered the revolution: "Yes and no; he was not fully in the picture when it all started but when we told him we were going to negotiate with Marshal Amer, he agreed." (For sources, see below.)

"Sarrāj Not Connected With The Coup." The two brigadiers said that the dispute between Abdel Nasser and Col. Abd al-Hamid as-Sarrāj, (see pp 602 ff) had no connection with the coup; Sarrāj had been placed under arrest at Damascus [on the day of the coup] but he had broken his word and gone to Hama [this apparently meant that he had been under house arrest only]; there he was arrested again and imprisoned in Damascus. (Hayat, Oct 5; Mid. Mir., Oct 7)

The Kuzbari-Husseini-Jāda Officers' Group; Alleged Contact With Jordan. According to a Cairo source, the conspiracy began to take shape in Jan 1961 when Lieut.-Col. Haydar al-Kuzbari approached Lieut.-Col. Nahlāwī. Kuzbari claimed to be speaking on behalf of a group which was ready to bear any expense for the sake of changing the status quo. (M. Amin in Al-Musawwar, Oct 12)

More detailed information on the group of conspirators to which Lieut.-Col. Kuzbari originally belonged appeared during the first half of 1962. Kuzbari had been arrested some two months after the coup, in Nov 1961, [ostensibly] on charges of interfering in the elections (see p 496 a). In Jan 1962, Brig. Faisal Sirri al-Husseini was arrested [after the coup, he had become Director of Operations] (see e.g. Ahram, Jan 12, 1962; Awadith, Jan 19, 1962). The three Syrian officers who met Abdel Nasser in Cairo in Jan 1962 (see above) reportedly told him that Kuzbari and Hussein were arrested when it was discovered that they had received money from King Hussein. (Ahram, April 27, 1962)

In May 1962 Hassanein Haykal, Al-Ahrâm editor, published what he claimed was a bill of indictment against Brig. Faisal Sirri al-Husseini, retired Lieut-Col. Khâlid Jâda, a major, two sergeants and eleven civilians. The defendants were charged by the Syrian prosecution with conspiring with a foreign country (Jordan) and armed mutiny.

The alleged indictment contained the following story which begins at "the end of 1959" [no further dates are given throughout the "indictment"]. At that time Sharif Islâm, one of the defendants who used to visit relatives and "members of his tribe" in Jordan, met Wasfi Mirza, Jordanian Minister of Interior, who told him that Jordan was ready to extend every aid to a coup in Syria. On his return to Syria Sharif accidentally met Lieut-Col. Khâlid Jâda, a retired officer and professional revolutionary (according to Al-Anwar April 27, 1962, he had participated in the Hînwî coup in 1949) whose means of livelihood had been cut off under the UAR regime. Jâda, having been told by Sharif of his conversation with Mirza, went to Zuhayr al-Husseini, a disaffected merchant, through whom further contacts were established with Brig. Faisal Sirri al-Husseini, Zuhayr's brother; Dr. Khulûsi al-Kuzbari, Zuhayr's business partner and Lieut.-Col. Haydar al-Kuzbari, the latter's brother. Both officers agreed to participate in the conspiracy. Among others who joined the conspirators at this stage were Khâlid Isâ, a retired major who was to train retired soldiers "to act as fidâ'iyyîn in the execution of the coup, and Nash'at Kulunya who promised to secure the participation of Albanians in Marshal Amer's guard and in the units at Qatana.

At the request of Khâlid Jâda, Sharif Islâm again went to Jordan to see Wasfi Mirza; the meeting was attended by Col. Fathi Yasin, King Hussein's aide-de-camp. Mirza wished to meet one of the officers, but the Syrians, fearing discovery, were reluctant. Finally, a meeting took place in Beirut between Mirza and Col. Yasin on the one hand and Khâlid Jâda on the other. It was agreed that Jordan would pay £3300,000 as a contribution to the movement. This sum was actually transferred through Khulûsi al-Kuzbari and Zuhayr al-Husseini; the indictment details the distribution of the money among the conspirators.

Meanwhile the conspirators sought to enlist additional recruits to their ranks and set to work on the operational plans for the coup. Meetings took place at Zuhayr al-Husseini's premises and Khulûsi al-Kuzbari's farm.

As the conspirators realized that their forces were insufficient, they thought of enlisting the aid of a Jordanian armoured brigade; the Jordanians, however, declined on the ground that this would cause international complications; Brig. Hussein also rejected the idea. Another plan, originated by Khâlid Jâda, was to start the coup in Homs, where he contacted a retired officer named Salim al-Azî; the latter, however, was of the opinion that such a plan was not feasible for lack of adequate forces and a radio station in Homs. The final plan, as related in the "indictment," was as follows: 48 hours before zero hour, Khâlid Jâda and the other conspirators would mobilize their paid fidâ'iyyîn and dispatch them to the village of Dumeir where they would join the armoured force and the desert guard units commanded by Lieut.-Col. Kuzbari. The joint forces would then move on Damascus where they would occupy the vital positions. Hishâm al-Husseini would disrupt foreign communications and place internal communications at the service of the movement. Brig. Faisal Sirri al-Husseini would take control of Qatana camp.

In case of success a cabinet would be formed under Asad al-Kurâni [of Aleppo, Watani party]; in case of failure, the plotters would escape to Jordan which had guaranteed them asylum.

Thus ends the indictment. It makes no mention of Lieut-Col. Nahlâwi other than that Jâda, when trying to recruit a certain officer, asserted that Nahlâwi and Brig. Dahmân were among the conspirators.

The "indictment" does not specifically mention the aim of the conspiracy; however, it relates that Jâda told one officer that its object was "to restore Syria to its previous international position." (Ahram, May 4, 1962; MENA, May 4, 1962 [May 7, 1962])

While Haykal claimed that no trial was held because the Syrian politicians feared that might undermine the "secessionist government," a Lebanese paper said a week earlier that a trial was being conducted and mentioned as the defendants Brig. Hussein, his brother Zuhayr, Khulûsi al-Kuzbari and Suhbi al-Halabi, a Jordanian merchant close to King Hussein. They had been charged with plotting to implement the "Greater Syria" plan and to make Hussein king of Syria. (Anwar, April 27, 1962)

Egyptian Charges of a Kuzbari-King Hussein-King Saud Conspiracy. In an earlier article, Hassanein Haykal claimed that in the course of the conspiracy, Lieut.-Col. Haydar al-Kuzbari had met King Hussein. Haykal said that Kuzbari was the most prominent of the revolt's leaders. He had no qualifications for further advancement in the army, had been due to go on pension, and loved money; thus "he was a good catch for the men of King Hussein" who were headed by Sharif Nâsir [the King's uncle, Commander Royal Armoured Arm]. King Hussein had contacted King Saud already at the beginning of 1961 and received a sum of money from him to finance a coup in Syria. Later in the year, Haykal continued, Kuzbari crossed into Jordan and met Hussein. He told him of plans for a coup in Aug when Abdel Nasser was scheduled to be in Syria; the coup would thus encompass Egypt too and "the whole question will be solved at once"; Egypt would be free to separate from the union if she wished to. King Hussein agreed, flew to Riyadh (on Aug 1, see p 158 a) and obtained an additional sum of money from Saud. The plan for the coup at that time failed to materialize as Abdel Nasser changed his schedule. (Ahram, Dec 1)

Both King Hussein and Saudi Arabia denied any connection with the coup; see pp 146 b, 152 a.

Lieut-Col. Nahlâwi Enters the Picture: Financing by the Company of Five? As already mentioned above according to a Cairo source, Mustafa Amin in Al-Musawwar, Lieut-Col. Kuzbari approached Lieut-Col. Abd al-Karim an-Nahlâwi in Jan 1961 and told him that he was speaking on behalf of a group which was ready to bear any expense involved in changing the situation in Syria. Nahlâwi was at the time Director of FM Amer's office and Director of Officers' Affairs. The latter post enabled him to place officers in such a way as to facilitate the coup. He had been appointed to this post on the recommendation of high-ranking Syrian officers as being uninvolved with factions in the army.

Amin continued that Lieut-Col. Kuzbari arranged a meeting between his cousin, Dr Ma'mûn al-Kuzbari [who became the first Syrian FM after the coup], and Nahlâwi; the former declared the readiness of the "Company of Five" to place about £1 million at the disposal of the movement. (Dr Kuzbari was the son-in-law of Adil al-Khoja, a prominent partner in the "Company of Five.") (The spokesman for the Revolutionary Command denied on Oct 4 that Dr Kuzbari had been privy to the coup. (Times, Oct 5))

Nahlawi agreed in principle, but stipulated deliberate and unhurried planning and preparation.

The July socialization measures, Amin continued, convinced the plotters of the need to hurry. Nahlawi forged the signature of FM Amer on orders transferring a number of loyal officers from key positions. Members of the insurgents' group were posted to Qatana; Brig. Abd al-Ghani Dahman was appointed commander of Damascus area, Brig. Muwaffaq Asafah OC Infantry [as already pointed out, it would seem that Amin erred here and that the officer concerned was Brig. Muwaffaq Asafah, COS Air Force, Northern Region]; Col. Nasib Hindi, cousin by marriage of Nahlawi, was appointed commander of the armoured force in Damascus.

Meanwhile Nahlawi's contacts with Dr Ma'mun al-Kuzbari continued. The latter went to Amman to clinch negotiations with King Hussein which had been started by Lieut.-Col. Kuzbari, then went to Europe to raise additional funds and obtain the approval of the great powers. He succeeded in his task and returned to Damascus on Sept 25 at the summons of the plotters. At a meeting in the afternoon of Sept 26, zero hour was fixed for Sept 28 at dawn. The sudden arrival at Damascus on Sept 26 of FM Amer and Sarraj, the resignation of Sarraj and rumours that he was planning a coup himself did not deter Nahlawi from his plan. (Musawwar, Oct 12)

A western source added to this story that Nahlawi had persuaded Amer to retire or transfer 150 Syrian officers on the grounds that their loyalty was suspected; he then told the officers that the Egyptians were planning to replace them by Egyptians and so secured their support. (Manchester Guardian, Weekly, Oct 12)

"Two Groups: Extremists and Reformists." As already mentioned, in Jan 1962, three of the Syrian officers who led the coup visited Cairo on business of state and were twice received by President Abdel Nasser. They were Col. Zuhayr Aqil, Col. Muhammad Mansur and Lieut.-Col. Fa'iz al-Rifa'i. Hassanain Haykal, Al-Ahram editor, published what purported to be a detailed, in part verbatim, record of these meetings.

They told Abdel Nasser, who gave them a friendly welcome, that they had come to him as Syria was in danger from both imperialism—the coup in Lebanon (pp 398 ff) was aimed at Damascus—and from Israel. They now wished "to restore unity in a new form." They said that secession had not been in their plans [of the coup]; they had aimed only at the correction of mistakes. They told Nasser that some of them had met FM Amer at noon on the day of the coup and told him that they wished Abdel Nasser to remain President. Communiqué No. 9 (see p 609 b) was issued on this basis and correctly represented their attitude. They further claimed that they had not read Communiqué No. 2 which, Abdel Nasser said, showed the "reactionary and secessionist character" of the coup, nor had they had anything to do with Damascus Radio's attacks on Abdel Nasser as a "tyrant." Already early in the morning they had felt that events were being steered by certain persons in a pre-determined manner, against their wishes. They accused Lieut.-Col. Kuzbari and Brig. Hussein, who had meantime been imprisoned, of treason for having received money from King Hussein. The officers also declared themselves against "the capitalists, the feudalists, the political parties, the agents of reaction..." (Ahram, April 27, 1962)

Hassanain Haykal, writing of these officers, said that it had been known since four days after the coup that there were two groups among the insurgent officers.

The first group, "those who had been bribed," such as Kuzbari and Hussein, received King Saud's money from King Hussein, intended to kill FM Amer on the morning of the coup [Lieut.-Col. Kuzbari shelled Amer's residence, see above], issued the communiqué against socialism and handed Syria over to the reactionaries.

The second group comprised "power-hungry and unscrupulous plotters" such as Lieut.-Col. Nahlawi and Lieut.-Col. Dahman, as well as "dupes" who were made to believe that Syria had lost her personality in the union, but who were opposed to reaction. This group, responsible for Communiqué No. 9, wished to preserve a form of union under the presidency of Abdel Nasser. Haykal does not name "the dupes" but was probably thinking of the three officers mentioned above. It must be remembered that Haykal wrote these articles after the Syrian coup of March 28, 1962 (not dealt with in this volume), following which Nahlawi and Dahman were exiled while there was hope in Cairo of a possible understanding with other Syrian officers. (Ahram, April 4, 20, 1962)

"Where Was The Security Service?" [This question was publicly asked by the Egyptians themselves, especially in view of the closeness of the plotters to Marshal Amer and even to Abdel Nasser himself.] A Western correspondent spoke of the "unhappy Field Marshal... whose responsibility it was to keep Syria loyal to the President and who was completely duped by his Syrian subordinates." (Manchester Guardian, Weekly, Oct 12)

Hassanain Haykal wrote that there had been a security service report on the leaders of the conspiracy, its organization and aims, but it had not received sufficient attention. (According to The Guardian of Oct 10, Amer himself had been handed this report by the Egyptian intelligence service in Syria.) Haykal asked how this could have happened and continued that such things happened even in the most powerful of countries. (Ahram, Oct 6)

M. Amin, on the other hand, claimed that the success of the plot was due to the absence of an effective Egyptian intelligence service in Syria, in deference to Syrian sensibilities; even the two or three Egyptian agents in Damascus, who had been directly attached to [Vice-President and Minister of the Interior] Zakariya Muhyi ad-Din in Cairo and whose duties related solely to the Egyptian region, had been withdrawn by request of Syria. Subsequently, the Syrian intelligence began to run wild and a few days before the coup the two intelligence services were merged—over the opposition of certain Syrian intelligence officers. Whether Syrian intelligence did or did not have knowledge of the conspiracy, the fact was that no one gave Cairo prior warning. (Musawwar, Oct 12)

Syrian sources did not agree that Egyptian intelligence had been weak—at least not in quantity: "6,500 intelligence agents used to receive salaries... totalling about £81 million per annum." (SNA, Oct 4)

Sarraj Crisis Aided The Conspirators. Foreign observers remarked that the dispute between FM Amer and Col. Abd al-Hamid as-Sarraj (for details see pp 602-4) had gravely weakened the security services just when the plot was coming to a head. (Times, Oct 6; Weltwoche, Oct 13)

CAUSES OF THE UNION'S FAILURE

GENERAL ANALYSIS

Army Discontent. A major cause of the revolt of the Syrian army was seen in its discontent with Egyptian predominance in the armed forces. The Syrian officers resented Cairo's policy of replacing with Egyptian officers the Syrians purged from the army en masse. An aggravating factor in this connection was "the mania of Arab officers for spying on one another" (Weltwoche, Oct 13). There had been no corresponding influx of Syrian officers into the Egyptian army. Two spokesmen for the Syrian army were quoted after the coup as saying that "two and a half times as many Egyptian officers had served in the Syrian army as vice versa" (Times, Oct 5). It was even thought that "the main cause of the break-up of the UAR was jealousy among military men over promotion and perquisites." (Daily Telegraph, Oct 5)

Syrian spokesmen enlarged upon what they claimed to have been the dishonourable and disloyal treatment meted out to the Syrian army as a whole (see Syrian Views). Egyptian spokesmen claimed that there had been no general discontent in the Syrian army but only intrigues and treason on the part of a few disgruntled officers (see Egyptian Views).

The Geographical Factor was quoted in two connections. The separation of Egypt and Syria "by a hostile Israel" impeded relations (Observer, Sunday Telegraph, Oct 1; Haykal in Ahram, Nov 3). Even more basically, geography was responsible for the different character of the two peoples, which lay at the root of all their differences. (NYT, Oct 1)

Syria "Difficult to Govern"; The Syrian "National Character." A traditional propensity for mutinous conduct, or at least for lack of cooperation with government, was also held to be one of the causes of the dissolution, apart from any Egyptian misjudgement or excesses.

It was remarked that "Syrians of high calibre" were notably lacking in obedience (Economist, Sept 30), that "the Syrians are hard to satisfy and to keep satisfied" (Times, Oct 16), that "Syrian politics had always been volatile" (NYT, Oct 1). An unnamed Egyptian official was quoted as saying: "Those Syrians are certainly difficult to govern" (NYT, Sept 29). Syria's pre-union past, in which military risings were a prominent feature, was noted in this context. (NYT, Oct 2)

Haykal wrote that when Shukri al-Quwatli, President of Syria, signed the agreement on the union in Cairo, he told Abdel Nasser: "You have no idea, Mr President, what you have taken upon yourself. You have accepted a people every individual of which regards himself as a politician. Half of them imagine themselves to be leaders, a quarter of them prophets and at least 10% of them gods. You have accepted people among whom there are worshippers of God, worshippers of fire, worshippers of the devil and worshippers of..." "Quwatli here used a word," Haykal remarked, "which I can't put down on paper." (Ahram, Oct 20)

Opposition to "Socialist Measures"; Other Economic Factors. It was generally agreed that economic factors were among the main causes of the dissolution. Syria is richer than Egypt, it was observed. Widespread disquiet was caused by rigid import and currency restrictions, imposed in Feb 1961 on Syria's previously free economy, and in July by the nationalization measures. (Observer, Oct 1)

Abdel Nasser's "Arab Socialism" had frightened the Syrian middle-class which was far more powerful than Egypt's and "accustomed to an almost nineteenth-century freedom from State controls" (Spectator, Oct 6). The New York Times wrote that these measures as well as land reforms had put "the old Syrian élite group's traditional way of life... clearly in jeopardy." Three years of bad harvests caused by drought aggravated the situation. (NYT, Oct 1; Spectator, Oct 6; Observer, Oct 8)

The pressure of Egyptian industrial imports on the Syrian market was also mentioned: "Some Syrian factories were closed as a consequence of the union; one Damascus paper estimates 65 factories" (Financial Times, Oct 16). The New York Herald Tribune quoted individual complaints: "A textile man" said that his business had been hurt by a flood of cheap Egyptian goods; "a farmer" said that he had been getting on well with the sharecroppers who helped work his land, until the Egyptians gave much of it away to landless people who were unable to cultivate it because they were given no equipment or technical assistance; a lawyer maintained that a new tax recently imposed had merely been the last straw. (NYHT, Oct 8)

Economic factors naturally played an important part in the explanations offered by Cairo and Damascus. The Egyptian view, in its essence, was that Syrian feudalism and capitalism, with the "Company of Five" at the centre, had engineered the dissolution because their existence was threatened by economic progress and social justice, as embodied in UAR policy. According to the most extreme Syrian view, the dissolution was an outcome, in the economic field, of plain oppression and exploitation; in other analyses, the economies of Syria and Egypt were presented as basically different and incompatible under centralized direction (for details see below: Syrian Views).

Regional Versus Arab Nationalism. The crux of the problem, according to many observers, was the fact that the two peoples had not coalesced into one nation. The Syrians never ceased to regard the Egyptians as foreigners (Times, Oct 16), and they began to fear that Syria might lose her "separate personality." The Egyptians on the other hand were lacking in Arab consciousness, it was pointed out by Haykal himself (see below: Haykal). The pan-Arab nationalism which had been responsible for the union in the first place had begun to recede within months of the formation of the UAR (NYT, Oct 1). Haykal stated that the union had been premature, and that Arab nationalism, by its very embodiment in the UAR, became more vulnerable, (see below: Haykal.)

Overcentralization and Egyptianization. This cause is closely linked to the foregoing. Western papers held the increasing preponderance of Cairo in Syrian affairs to be one of the main factors responsible for the insurrection (NYT; NYHT, Sept 29, 30); in the words of The Times, "the Syrians... disliked being, as they thought they were, told what to do by people whom they regarded, Arab unity or no Arab unity, as foreigners" (Times, Sept 30). "Abdel Nasser's attempt to centralize in Cairo all real control over that artificial hybrid, the United Arab Republic, had given increasing offence in Damascus." (Sunday Times, UK, Oct 1)

Abdel Nasser endeavoured to meet opposition by Egyptianization (Daily Telegraph, Oct 1); "Further centralization in the UAR—a single Parliament, a single Cabinet—placed more power in Egyptian hands" (NYT, Oct 1); Abdel Nasser's ideas of reorganization with "Damascus reduced to the status of an unimportant provincial city" served only to confirm long-held suspicions that Syria's... population were destined to become second-class citizens" (Irish Times, Oct 5). The opinion of the man in the street was reported by The New York Herald Tribune, quoting a lawyer who "thanked God he wouldn't have to deal with Egyptians heading government departments." (NYHT, Oct 8)

Fear for the disruption of the Syrian body politic was expressed by Shukri al-Quwatli, Syrian President before the merger (see: Syrian Views).

The abolition of parties was seen as an important grievance. "Political frictions began as the old Syrian parties were abolished, and their leaders side-tracked in favour of Egyptians" (NYT, Oct 1); this theme was treated in the same vein by almost every foreign observer. The case of the Ba'ath stood out because of its important role in the original formation of the UAR. (Daily Telegraph, Oct 1)

A Catholic paper thought the Syrian Christians had been particularly firm in their opposition to the UAR. (Catholic Herald, UK, Oct 6)

Both Abdel Nasser and Hassanein Haykal justified the political line taken by Cairo in Syria and attacked "selfish and disgruntled" Syrian politicians; Abdel Nasser stressed the former aspect, while Haykal tended to concentrate on the latter theme (see below: Nasser, Haykal).

The "autocracy" of the Egyptian rulers was the main theme of Syrians commenting on the political causes of the dissolution, (see below: Syrian Views.)

Abdel Nasser's "Failure of Charisma." Joseph Alsop in The Washington Post attributed a part in the break-up of the UAR to Abdel Nasser's "failure of charisma." Abdel Nasser was "one of the ablest" of those who lead "by stirring the emotions and fanning the passions of his followers." But inevitably "the paroxysms of passion diminish as the years go by. The mobs that writhed and howled instead begin to think, in particular, about what the leader has done and is doing for them." In the case of Syria, the result of this evolution was damaging to Abdel Nasser. (Washington Post, Oct 2)

Hassanein Haykal, [Abdel Nasser's chief spokesman] elaborated on the point that Abdel Nasser's "hero personality" alone—in the absence of supporting factors—was unable to sustain the Union. (Ahram, Oct 5; see also below: Haykal.)

The Police Regime. The personality and ruthless police methods of Col. Abd al-Hamid as-Sarrāj, head of the secret service, was widely regarded as an important factor in building up dissatisfaction in Syria (see e.g. Financial Times, Sept 29). Hassanein Haykal also admitted that it had been a mistake to permit Sarrāj to have his way in maintaining an all-embracing net of internal espionage (see below: Haykal), while Syrian sources enlarged upon "the stifling political rule violating human dignity and freedom... corrupting behaviour and conscience." (R. Damascus, Oct 2 [4]; see also: Syrian Views.)

SYRIAN VIEWS

Blow to Dignity; Oppression; Purge of Officers; Nationalization; Pro-Soviet Leanings. The Syrian case for dissolution of the UAR was given in a statement by Dr Kuzbari, head of the provisional government on Sept 29, the day of its formation. It said that Syria had made the greater sacrifice in establishing the union. Soon, however, "those who undertook to lead the union began to lead in 'an Eastern direction' and 'along a course which separated the Arabs from their aspirations for a noble, true unity free from domination and hypocrisy.' They also did not respond to appeals... to rectify the situation... and establish full equity 'as regards dignity and the dealings between two sister countries.'"

The result was "the liquidation of the sincere national elements, particularly the Army officers and the... youth." When the cup was full, "the Arab revolutionary movement in this country" arose.

In carrying out its "blessed revolutionary uprising," the Arab [Syrian] army truly expressed the sufferings of the Arab people in Syria from blows to their dignity, wounds in the core of their Arabism, oppressive and dictatorial measures, and improvised laws which led to the deterioration of the country's economic situation and its currency. Confidence between the ruler and the ruled was lost. Arab capital evaporated. Free men and those working in the economic, social, political and military fields were dispersed. Unity was converted into factionalism, fraternity into slavery and joint economic interests into embezzlement... Those in power violated the principles and the constitution (of the Union). (R. Damascus, Sept 29 [Oct 2])

Syrian Body Politic, Government Disrupted; Political Leadership Eliminated. Shukri al-Quwatli, the last Syrian President before the union with Egypt and "First Citizen" of the UAR, who had been abroad at the time of the coup, published a statement in support of the separation after his return to Syria.

Quwatli said that the "regime which ruled us" had called a large number of people traitors and reactionaries merely because they belonged to a certain group or social class. Under these conditions, only the social concord among the various strata of the people prevented the spreading of rancour and malice. Those who for 40 years had served Syria's national cause could not be deprived of their honour and dignity simply because they belonged to certain social strata. Socialism must be achieved by a long and phased process, and if economic measures are not accompanied by psychological and social adjustments, they will fail.

All the errors committed had one common denominator—reliance on a minority, while the majority was held in suspicion. Fake organizations and opportunists were entrusted with the implementation of a cooperative socialism they themselves did not believe in or understand. The Syrian people were entirely ignored where their system of government was concerned. The National Union, the only popular organization permitted, was in reality ruled by the executive. The National Assembly was felt by the deputies to be a farce. Government was not merely authoritarian, it was utterly inefficient as well. "It was the system which had a thousand and one spies." It was firm when it should have been lenient, and cowardly when it should have been strong-willed. It fell short in experience, intelligence, vigilance and faith. "It came close to the people only as the people's executioner." "Had this regime continued," Quwatli said, "the Republic would have dissolved into a number of regions ruled by mutually antagonistic individuals; a strange, wondrous machinery (system) sprouting many heads out of one body, and endowing each head with a number of inclinations, whims and lusts; a system suffering successive shocks as the one rebels against the other and the right hand ambushes the left... until the regime became like that in the last phase of the Arab Caliphate." (Nasr, Oct 24; R. Damascus, Oct 23 [25])

One of the complaints of the Army's Revolutionary Command was that the Egyptians had relied "in government on the feeble elements, working for the full autocracy of the rulers." (R. Damascus, Oct 2 [4])

Terror, Egyptian Overbearing and Exploitation. Mustafa al-Barudi, Minister of Propaganda, said that Syria had been responsible for the creation of the UAR. But "they have caused the Arabs to detest unity." "Not a day passed without hearing of victims who were tortured... Was anyone safe when uttering a word within his own four walls?" Exploitation was rife: "The smallest member of the (Egyptian) retinue thought that he had inherited our country... Is it lawful that the Arab funds should be spent to buy the people's conscience and Arab soil seized by false pretences? Have not the departments of state been inflated by the hundreds of posts created? Have not the funds of the state been squandered...?" (R. Damascus, Sept 30 [Oct 3])

Suppression of Free Enterprise; Anti-Industrialization Policy. The economic case for the dissolution was given in detail in a joint statement by the Syrian chambers of commerce, industry and agriculture and other economic organizations. The burden of the statement was that Syria's prosperity and progress depended on her system of economic freedom, "completely different from the conditions in Egypt." Under the Union, Egypt tried from the beginning to subvert that freedom through legislation, administrative coercion and sabotage, with "the sole purpose of weakening the country's economic potentialities, blocking its way to industrialization, converting it into an agricultural country supplying agricultural products and raw materials to Egypt and, at the same time, opening Syria's vast markets to Egypt's industrial products." Industrialization and economic planning, currency, external trade, economic unification and measures bearing on social justice were analyzed to support the conclusion. (R. Damascus, Sept 30 [Oct 3])

Army Grievances. The army's grievances were detailed in a statement by the "Supreme Arab Revolutionary Command of the Armed Forces." The "disastrous errors" of the Egyptian rule included: "The weakening of the Arab army in Syria, its mass liquidation, and the attempt to humiliate it..."

The policy in the army was "Egyptianization instead of unification." While able Syrian officers were sent south, Egyptians infiltrated the northern intelligence service and from there spread "like octopuses" everywhere. They offended discipline by by-passing their [Syrian] direct superiors. Mass transfers and pensionings of Syrian officers were put through with the aim of "liquidating every northern Arab officer." Important measures, such as the preparation of the Army Law, were carried without any Syrian participation whatsoever. Stocks and equipment were carried off to Egypt in great quantities under specious pretexts, although Syria's share of the defence burden was proportionally much larger than Egypt's. Syrian representations and protests were of no avail. (R. Damascus, Oct 2 [4])

Regionalism. Gen. Zahr ad-Din was quoted to have said on Oct 5 that "certain Egyptian elements tried to dominate us. We could not tolerate the history of this nation being buried." (Mid. Mir., Oct 7)

Izzat an-Nus, Minister of Education and National Guidance, said that the 1952 revolution in Egypt had no "Arab basis." The Egyptians had adopted Arab unity "politically, but not as a mission." (R. Damascus, Oct 5 [7])

(Compare below: Haykal: "Egypt was lacking in Arab consciousness; Regional Chauvinism.")

"Abdel Nasser Failed To Understand Syria." A Damascus paper wrote that Abdel Nasser had failed to understand Syria, the mentality of the people. Instead of establishing direct contact with the people he had relied on intermediaries and intelligence reports. He had rebuffed those Syrians who went to Cairo to tell him the truth. And even now, on the morrow of the revolution, he still refused to understand. (Ayyam, Sept 30)

EGYPTIAN VIEWS

Abdel Nasser. [The image of the revolution and its background, as formed by President Abdel Nasser, was contained in six public addresses—between the day of the coup and Oct 16. This image was simple and unblurred: Abdel Nasser had taken upon himself the formation of the UAR at the urgent request of the Syrian public, though he knew the dangers involved and preferred a gradual approach. He resolved however to do his duty by the Arab nation and save Syria from its perils. The years of union were a tale of high endeavour and mounting success. Israel was held in check, the imperialist powers impressed, the army built up, huge sums invested in development. However, the main purpose of the union was the creation of a socialist society—free, just, dignified, in which the ordinary man would be liberated from feudalism and capitalist monopoly, and Arab nationalism would fulfil itself. It was this purpose which roused the enmity of the former exploiters of the people's wealth, chief among them the "Company of Five" in Damascus, and their imperialist allies. They engineered the insurrection of Sept 28, carried out under cover of darkness by a group of treacherous or misled officers, abetted by disgruntled politicians. The mass of the people were, and are, steadfastly in favour of the UAR. Abdel Nasser abstained from an armed showdown, since an Arab union should not be achieved by force; he abstained from urging boycott and civil disobedience against the separatist government, so that Syria, under whatever regime, might take her place in the Arab front. Contributory to the collapse of the UAR were a number of mistakes, chief among them Abdel Nasser's "reconciliation with reactionaries," but also the failures of the National Union, the government machinery and the masses.]

[In later speeches, Abdel Nasser often returned to these themes, mainly elaborating on the "capitalist coup against socialism," but without any significant addition to his basic analysis.]

Abdel Nasser Bowled to Syrian Request for Union Though He Realized Difficulties Involved. "Syria told me: Let us unite... will you leave Syria to be torn by strife?... I had already realized in 1958 that union as a constitutional concept is no easy matter, [but when pressed by the Syrians] I said I agree to union and now that I have accepted it, I will not forsake it under any circumstances" (A). "In 1958 all the Syrian parties and all the blocs of the Syrian Army asked me to accept union... I knew that when union was established every self-seeker would want to serve his interests only. There would be a conflict of interests, a conflict in the aims of the politicians... of the capitalists. They agreed to union, but everyone of them had his own interests. In the referendum, the people unanimously approved the union." (C)

The Benefits of the Union; Arab Nationalism Strengthened, Israel Contained. "These three-and-a-half years were years during which the Syrian people exercised great power in supporting the Arab struggle. From Syria the national revolution in Iraq was supported;... the Syrian Army was able to prevent Israel from the complete diversion of the river Jordan;... Syria also exerted great influence on the progress of the liberation movement in Africa... and the forces of peace against the evils of war" (E). "We all know the fear that gripped Israel with the establishment of the union... Israel knew that if she moved in the north, she would meet force from the north and south; if she moved in the south, she would meet force from the north and south." (D)

"In these three-and-a-half years we did our utmost to direct the Syrian people to devote their whole potential to building the homeland and the citizens... there was a plan to double the Syrian national income within ten years or less." (Abdel Nasser quoted many facts and figures in this context.) (E)

Accusations of Egyptian Domination, Exploitation, Police Regime Rejected. Abdel Nasser said the Egyptians in Syria had been neither exploiters, nor parasites, nor oppressors. "Who were the Egyptians in Syria?... They were army officers... on Israel's borders. They were not in Damascus, they were not in Aleppo... They were air force officers. (The President mentioned his brother, a pilot officer, and the brother of Anwar as-Saadat, both serving on the Israel front.) They were engineers who went to supplement the Syrian engineers... They were doctors in the villages..." No Egyptian merchant went to trade with Syria; on the contrary, Syrian tradesmen opened businesses in Egypt. (D)

No "thousands" had been detained without trial under the UAR, but only 95, most of whom were Communists (D). The economic policy of the UAR had benefited Syria, and not impoverished her (D, E). Finally, no attempt had ever been made to suppress the rebellion either by bloodshed or bribery (E). All these points would be established by a committee to be set up by the Arab League (see also p 159 b). (E)

The Progress of Socialism Desired by the Syrian People. "[Before the Union] monopoly was dominant and capitalism was exercising its dictatorship in order to acquire illegal profits... Feudalism controlled the life of the peasants... Five persons [the 'Company of Five'] formed the capitalist dictatorship." "In these three years great gains were realized which could not be achieved in decades. Feudalism ended and land was distributed among the peasants... Laws were made to eliminate the dictatorship of capitalism. Socialist decisions were published..."

to effect social democracy... The Syrian people decided to destroy feudalism, to destroy monopoly, that these factories should be theirs..." (C). "There could be no political freedom without social freedom." (E)

Coup Engineered by Monopolistic Capitalism; Treacherous and Minded Officers. Who then carried out the insurrection, and why? Abdel Nasser said: "... certain misled members" of the forces in Qatana; they betrayed the army in Syria which, in itself, was overwhelmingly loyal (A,C,D). The real initiators of and beneficiaries from the insurrection were the Syrian capitalists, represented above all by the "Company of Five." They saw their monopolistic grip loosened under the UAR, and they had everything to gain from separation; their claims that they would preserve the social gains of the Union were ridiculous hypocrisy (C,D,E). The people as a whole abhorred the insurrection; proof lay in the demonstrations at Aleppo, and reports on recurrent incidents all over Syria, when faithful nationalists braved bayonets and machine guns to demonstrate their faith in the UAR. (C,D)

Coup Succeeded Because of Power of Capital, Abdel Nasser's Abstention from Use of Force. How, then, could the uprising prevail? Abdel Nasser said: "Capital has the power of arms and tanks" (E); "this small force... dominated through temptation, threat and deceit" (C). And it prevailed because Abdel Nasser decided not to attempt military suppression (C) and would neither endanger Syrian patriots by calling them out against the separatist government, nor weaken Arabism by having Syria boycotted internationally. (E)

The Mistakes Made: Suddenness of Union; Reconciliation with Reaction; Failure of Popular Organization, Government Machinery, Mobilization of the Masses. [Abdel Nasser did not term the suddenness of the merger in 1958 a mistake but he said]: "My opinion was that preparations for it [union] should have been made gradually over a period of years in order to enable us to lay sound foundations before building its constitutional framework. But I had to submit to the popular Syrian will. And I felt that thus I was protecting Syrian nationalism and helping to save the Syrian homeland from internal dissension and... imperialist forces." (E)

In his programmatic speech of Oct 16, which heralded a new stage in the implementation of "Arab socialism" in Egypt, Abdel Nasser enumerated five mistakes which had "enabled reaction to secure the bridgehead in Damascus":

1. Reconciliation with reaction allied to imperialism. It was an illusion to think that because the reactionaries belonged to the Arab nation they would hesitate to sacrifice national interests to imperialism in order to regain their positions. Imperialism must be fought in the palaces of reaction, and reaction—in the lap of imperialism (F). In an earlier speech Abdel Nasser included in this mistake also the reconciliation with King Hussein who had deceived him by his conciliatory letters (p 146 a). (D)

2. The National Union had been inadequate as a popular organization; it only served as "a framework for class strife," it was not truly revolutionary; witness, some of its leaders emerged as leaders of the coup.

3. Insufficient efforts had been made to mobilize the masses for active participation in the revolution.

4. The government machinery had been unequal to the huge tasks imposed upon it by the revolution.

5. Opportunism had not been eradicated. (F)

Hassanein Haykal's Analysis. Commencing Oct 6, Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahrām, devoted nine weekly articles in Al-Ahrām's Friday supplement to an evaluation of the background of the recent events in Syria and the lessons to be drawn from them.

Herewith are the major points made by Haykal. (All the articles, except the first, are also given in BBCM, though not always in full.)

Background of the Merger—Syria: Political Strife Within: Imperialist Dangers Without. Prior to the union, Haykal wrote, Syria was torn by political strife. It was under the rule of rival army cliques, cabinets of selfish party politicians without roots in the people, and monopoly capitalists. While internally Syria was on the verge of chaos, it was also threatened with foreign domination. The threats came from the Communists, in alliance with the Chief of Staff General Alif Bizri and supported by the Soviet Union; they also came from imperialism and Arab reaction: from the Baghdad Pact, from the Hashimite family which had sold its Arab heritage for crowns and thrones, from Riyadh warring with the Hashimites in Damascus; behind them all were the US and Britain. Thus, finding itself on the brink of the abyss, Syria sought salvation in immediate union. (Ahrām, Oct 6, 13, 20; BBCM, Oct 16, 23)

Background of the Merger II: Emergence of Abdel Nasser as Arab Hero Figure; His Identification with the Arab Masses; The Establishment of the Union. While the political situation in Syria deteriorated, Haykal continued, Abdel Nasser emerged as the Arab hero, the conqueror of the enemies of the Arabs and their guide towards a glorious future; thus he was acclaimed as their leader by the Arabs everywhere.

The Syrian army took the initiative in establishing the union. "Twenty-two officers representing 22 groups in the army," as well as Syrian politicians, came to Cairo. Abdel Nasser tried to discourage them, dwelling on the difficulties to be expected, but to no avail. Abdel Nasser then put before them three conditions for union: a plebiscite on the union, dissolution of the Syrian parties and cessation of party activity, cessation of military intervention in politics. Under the pressure of the Syrian masses, the politicians, including the Ba'athists, as well as the officers, accepted Abdel Nasser's conditions; the politicians, however, only intended to realize their old ambitions in the new framework. When disappointed, they joined the ranks of reaction personified by the Damascus "Company of Five" and by Kings Saud and Hussein. (Ahrām, Oct 13, 20, 27; BBCM, Oct 16, 23, 28)

The Union as a Defensive Measure Achieved Results. Haykal said that in the given conditions, the establishment of the Union was a "natural defensive measure" by the Arab nation. As such, the Union achieved three important results: it dealt a mortal blow to the Baghdad Pact; it purged Syria of Communism; by its social and economic policy it compelled the forces of reaction to drop their mask of promoters of nationalism and progress.

However, the union should have been more than a defensive measure. (Ahrām, Oct 6, 13)

Defects and Weaknesses of the Union, Errors Committed. Asking why the Union foundered, Haykal wrote that, in addition to the conditions prevailing in Syria on the eve of the merger and the scheming enemies abroad, the "revolutionary energy" emanating from Cairo was itself converted into a "negative factor in the history of the union." He detected the following reasons:

1. Conditions for Union were not Ripe. Solid economic and social foundations were lacking; unity of spirit, language, consciousness and history were no more than a prelude to economic and social unity. Only history would be able to judge whether Abdel Nasser was right to bow to Syrian pressure.

2. Arab Nationalism Lost its Flexibility in the Union. Whereas before the Union, Arab nationalism waged a war of movement and was like a phantom which could not be touched, it became much more vulnerable to attack as a result of the Union. Was it right to have abandoned the former state?

3. Egypt was Lacking in Arab Consciousness. The Egyptian awakening fed on the greatness of its ancient history; "Ottoman tyranny" had separated Egypt from the Arab people east of Sinai, while Napoleon's conquest brought in its wake exclusive contacts with European civilization. Egypt's belief in Arabism which was nevertheless emerging was shaken again when the Hashimites stabbed the Egyptian army in the back in the Palestine war. Since 1952 the belief in Arabism had been growing again and the 1958 plebiscite, in which the Egyptians voted for the union, constituted an "emotional revolution." Still, even then, "hundreds of people" wrote Haykal expressing their apprehension lest Egypt "with all her glory" give up her separate identity.

4. Unequal Social Development. On the eve of the union, Egypt was on the threshold of the socialist revolution, having successfully concluded the battle against foreign imperialism; Syria, however, was still in a stage of capitalism collaborating with imperialism and its Arab agents. Thus "a tug-of-war in social development" ensued within the republic.

5. Cairo had Insufficient Knowledge of Syria. The "new power" found itself helpless in Damascus since the interested Syrian parties withheld statistics on the real situation and much valuable time was lost.

6. The Geographical Division Between the Two Regions proved a stumbling block to the union.

7. Deference to "Regional Chauvinism." The "new power" in Damascus did not exercise genuine authority because Cairo feared the label of tyranny. Cairo's sensitivity to imperialist propaganda in this respect was enhanced by the fact that its population of 25 million gave it a natural preponderance over Syria's four million. The trend towards unity was unable to overcome regional chauvinism (a-na'arāt al-wataniyah al-iqlimiyyah).

8. Semblance of Unity. Genuine unity was never achieved because of the aforementioned factors; there remained only the facade—one president, one flag and one national anthem. The politicians helped to perpetuate this state of non-union, struggling for power against the central authority and each other. (Ahrām, Nov 3)

"Abdel Nasser's Hero Personality not Sufficient to Unite the Arabs." Under the above circumstances, Haykal reflected, the only factor holding the union together was Abdel Nasser, his personality and popularity. A "hero personality" could serve as the driving force towards a genuine union, but it alone could not hold the union together. It could lead—but there must be powerful popular forces to be led. (Ahrām, Oct 6)

Slander of Egyptian Domination and Exploitation. Haykal enumerated a series of what he called "small problems" which contributed to the dissolution. He claimed deliberate misrepresentation by interested Syrian parties of Egyptian activities in Syria;

1. The difficulties inherent in the early stages of industrialization were presented as an Egyptian intention to keep Syria as an agricultural country.

2. The voluntary, pioneering work of Egyptian technicians in Syria gave rise to the charge that Egypt was unloading her unemployed on Syria.

3. The posting of Egyptian officers to the Syrian army, enfeebled by prolonged involvement in politics—in order to strengthen it—led to the accusation that Syria was being ruled by the Egyptian military.

4. When Mahmūd Riyād, Egyptian Ambassador in Damascus, stayed on after the merger, he was termed "the Egyptian high commissioner," while Vice-President Amer when he came to a Syria torn by party strife to solve certain problems "in a neutral spirit" was called "the Viceroy," an allusion to the British Viceroy in India. (Ahram, Nov 10; BBCM, Nov 13)

Personalities: Asali, Bizri, Sarraj. Haykal also "included in the small problems" which adversely affected the Union the behaviour of specific Syrian personalities: Sabri al-Asali, former Vice-President of the UAR, Haykal wrote, had opposed the Union because of his financial interests. Haykal also told in great detail the story of Afif al-Bizri, Commander of the first [Syrian] army after the Union and "undoubtedly a Communist during his youth" who was deposed by Abdel Nasser because of his promotion of Communism in the army and in general. (Ahram, Nov 10; BBCM, Nov 13)

Haykal devoted a whole article to the case of Abd al-Hamid as-Sarraj, the central Syrian figure in the Union. He was, Haykal said, a "faithful, national Arab youth," "despite his faults." As head of the Deuxième Bureau before the Union, Sarraj had protected Syrian independence and foiled dangerous plots; in the Suez affair he had supported Egypt and was responsible for the blowing up of the oil pipelines; in 1958 he had refused King Saud's enormous "bribe" to plot against the Union. Sarraj's faults were his lust for power, the fact that he was not a social revolutionary and his police methods.

Under the Union Sarraj grew in importance; he thus became an easy target and aroused the envy of other nationalist officers. His lust for power exposed him to danger, and with him the whole UAR. Haykal went on to give his version of Sarraj's dispute with Cairo on the eve of the coup; for details see p. 602. (Ahram, Nov 24; BBCM, Nov 27)

The Ba'ath Party. Haykal devoted a whole article to describing how, to his mind, the behaviour of the Ba'ath party contributed to the weakening of the union.

In general, Haykal asserted, the party suffered from great deficiencies: it had failed to turn its ideas into a workable ideology; its leaders, Aflaq, Bitar and Hurani, were nonentities; its policy was one of manoeuvring in the dark; consequently, the Ba'athist rank and file, valuable patriots in themselves, were worthy of pity.

The party, Haykal said, was largely responsible for the failure of the Union because of its manoeuvring to gain exclusive power in Syria. The story began immediately after the union when Bitar, who had been Syrian Foreign Minister, was disappointed in his ambition to become Foreign Minister of the UAR. Some weeks later the Ba'ath leaders began to complain that they were not being allowed to participate in power. Their proposal to establish a council of state under the presidency of Abdel Nasser, consisting of the three Ba'ath leaders and three Egyptians, was vetoed by Abdel Nasser, who refused "to elevate the Ba'athists over other Syrians."

After the Iraqi revolution in July 1958, Haykal continued, Aflaq went to Iraq to advocate immediate union with the UAR, a move which Abdel Nasser rightly thought premature and which indeed caused much harm to the Arab union movement. [Haykal failed to mention that the Syrian Ba'ath intended, with the help of Iraq, to redress the balance inside the UAR in favour of itself.]

Meanwhile, in Syria, Haykal continued, the Ba'ath instituted patronage in favour of its members, and Hurani even tried to intervene in army appointments. Thereupon the Ba'ath was told "delicately" that they must no longer act as partisans. But the Ba'ath now began to complain to the President about persecution by Abd al-Hamid Sarraj.

There followed the story of the elections to the National Union: The Ba'ath demanded the deletion from the election lists of rival candidates; when Abdel Nasser refused to do so on the grounds that it would jeopardize the soundness of the elections, Haykal said, the party boycotted the elections.

Then came the decisive story, Haykal continued, namely the resignation of the Ba'athist members of government in Dec 1959 [2 months after the appointment of Abd al-Hakim Amer as President Abdel Nasser's representative in Syria] which they handled in an under-handed manner. Bitar, in an interview with Abdel Nasser, made clear the real reason for this step: the fact that he and Hurani were kept in posts "far away in Egypt" while Sarraj was "all alone there in Syria." (Ahram, Nov 17; BBCM, Nov 20; compare Haykal's account with details in MER 1960, pp. 462, 497-8)

SIGNIFICANCE

The Blow to the Cause of Arab Unity. Among foreign observers there was unanimity of opinion that the dissolution constituted a grave setback for the cause of Arab unity. The Times analyzed the question in the light of the profession of belief in unity which was an axiom of Arab politics everywhere. "The only conclusion to be drawn from the success of the Syrian separatist movement is either that the UAR was not a symptom of unity or that practical unity must always founder on local interests." "Many good nationalists" would hold to the former view, namely that the Union foundered either because of particular difficulties incident to an Egyptian-Syrian combination, or because it was not a genuine partnership, but the domination of one country over another. The paper, however, adopted the latter thesis: practical unity was impossible; past experience proved conclusively that "the Arab nations remain as individualistic as ever" (Times, Oct 7). This view was echoed in many variations. The New York Times spoke of "a severe blow to Pan-Arabism, in the view of Near East experts" in Washington (NYT, Sept 30). A Swiss political weekly noted that "the Arabs, until recently confident in their endeavours for unity, which they saw as sweeping over all accidental or enforced frontiers like an irresistible tidal wave, are now thrown back into their old condition of disunion and separatism" (Weltwoche, Oct 13). Abdel Nasser himself subscribed to this pessimistic view immediately after the outbreak of the revolution in Damascus when he said that "this movement... poses a threat to the safety of the Republic and to the call of Arab nationalism and Arab unity, and represents a great setback." (R. Coiro, Sept 28 [29])

"The Cause of True Arab Unity not Affected." The Syrian authorities held from the outset that the dissolution was no defeat for Arab nationalism. In the words of Dr Mustafa al-Barudi, Minister of Propaganda in the provisional government: "The Arab army's insurrection... broke out... [for the sake of] true Arab unity... Our aim is the liberation of all parts of the Arab homeland—its liberation from imperialism and the foreigner... from internal oppression... This revolution is Arab in origin, Arab in significance... The mission of the government [is] to pursue Arab unity." (R. Damascus, Sept 30 [Oct 3])

On Oct 11 the Syrian government made public a plan for an Arab federation. (For details, see pp 159 b-160.)

Abdel Nasser, in explaining his acquiescence in the dissolution, said "this experiment [in Arab unity]... was a forerunner operation... National unity in Syria is a... true preparation for realization [of Arab unity]." (R. Coiro, Oct 5 [7])

A letter to the editor from an Arab correspondent read: "Although the Syrian revolt was a blow to the UAR, it did not in any case constitute a great peril to Arab national awakening or unity... No ruler can eradicate the growing national feeling in the Arab countries for reform, progress and unity." (Chr. Sc. Monitor, Oct 27)

Abdel Nasser's Standing. [The impact of the breakup of the UAR on Abdel Nasser as the foremost leader of Arab nationalism was a major topic commented upon. Immediately after the revolution, observers stressed the blow to Abdel Nasser's prestige to the point of doubting his chances of survival; later, they tended to be impressed with his renunciation of attempts to restore unity by force.] Typical pronouncements during the first stage: "Abdel Nasser's helplessness in the face of [the sudden break-up of the UAR] has unjustifiably surprised many influential circles in Britain, who had consistently overestimated Abdel Nasser's strength and appeal, and forecast the inevitable downfall of his rivals. The event should restore a sense of proportion" (Sunday Telegraph, Oct 1); "Abdel Nasser's prestige had been damaged throughout the Arab world... Once again, as at Suez, his armed forces had failed to offer serious resistance... He must seek new victories" (NYT, Oct 2). "For the first time it is soldiers who have staged a coup against [Abdel Nasser], for the first time he has suffered a heavy setback at the hands of his own Arabs, not of imperialists, colonialists or Zionists." (Die Welt, Oct 2)

A later assessment in The Guardian was that Abdel Nasser had "adroitly" rounded off the Syrian episode in a masterly speech [of Oct 5, see p 162] (Guardian, Oct 9), while a church publication attributed to Abdel Nasser "a wisdom and forbearance that sets him above most ME politicians" (Church of England Newspaper, Oct 13). [There was much Arab comment in the same vein.]

Effect on the Middle East Scene. A representative summing up the effect of the dissolution on the ME countries appeared in The New York Times: "Israel can [probably] look forward to a moment of quiet while the Arab states seek new relationships among themselves... [At any rate] Israel now faces a hostile Arab front divided among four powers instead of three. Lebanon, which survived a Syrian-based push for Arab nationalism in 1958, can rest a bit easier. She can also look forward, perhaps, to easier relations with a Syria oriented toward a free economy. Turkey never trusted Abdel Nasser and now finds he has vanished from her southern frontier... Qassim has seen a grievous blow dealt to his strongest Arab rival and a threat to his regime removed. He is likely to press his own claim for influence in Syria... Hussein is obviously delighted. He is no longer pinched between the northern and southern jaws of a UAR that tried to dethrone him... Saud and [the] shaykh... of Kuwait can feel only relief that the force of Arab nationalism, so deeply felt by their educated young men, has diminished for a time." (NYT, Oct 1)

Global Implications. Western opinions on the influence of the dissolution on the position in the ME ranged from the comment that the "Syrian revolt may aid NATO" because of its rightist government (Daily Telegraph, Oct 6) to the view that Soviet influence might be strengthened; the latter opinion was based on the satisfaction with the dissolution shown by Lebanese Communists (see p 378 b) and an expected comeback of the Syrian Communist Party. (Chr. Sc. Monitor, Oct 4)

THE UAR (EGYPT) AFTER THE SYRIAN SECESSION

(October-December)

THE NEW DEPARTURE

(October)

Stability Preserved: Period of Stocktaking: Abdel Nasser's Speeches. [From the break-up of the UAR on Sept 28 and until mid-October matters inside Egypt—as reported by the Cairo press and radio—continued much as usual. No emergency security precautions were reported] except for heavily reinforced guards around Abdel Nasser's home (Jaridah, Oct 20). [Possibly the arrest of army officers which was later officially announced (see below) started during this period.] There were reports [from unfriendly sources] that Abdel Nasser was considering the removal of Field Marshal Amer because of their differing attitudes on the day of the Syrian revolution (e.g. R. Amman, Oct 9-10; IMB, Oct 10). It was also reported that Abdel Nasser had told his vice-presidents that he was "prepared to abide by their decision" and they resolved to ask him to continue in his job. (Hayat, Oct 10)

In his opening speech before the National Congress Preparatory Committee, on Nov 25, Abdel Nasser [referred to this period when he] said that the "reactionaries" who had been arrested (see below: Detentions) had started to move against the revolution in Egypt. They had been encouraged by false allegations of unrest in the armed forces, made in hostile broadcasts. Rumours had been spreading "in the clubs." But all this had had no effect, Abdel Nasser said, and he had come to feel at that time that the country was stable; there had been a tendency to talk and philosophize but this indicated only interest in the state of the country, which was a positive sign. (R. Cairo, Nov 25 [28]; Gumhuriyah; Eg. Gaz., Nov 26)

The government announced some measures benefiting the public; e.g. an extra month's pay for Egyptian officials who had served in Syria, "at the wish of Abdel Nasser" (R. Coiro, Oct 4-10; IMB, Oct 5); reduction of school fees by 50%. (Eg. Gaz., Oct 10)

[At Abdel Nasser made clear in his speech of Oct 16, the period between Sept 28 and this day was one of stocktaking and the determination of a new policy.] In his five speeches between Sept 28 and Oct 5 (Sept 28 (two), 29, Oct 2, 3) Abdel Nasser dwelt upon one central point, namely that the uprising in Syria had been engineered by reaction in collaboration with imperialism, and that it had been a serious error on the part of the regime to compromise with reaction. He said that this lesson must be learned well, and the appropriate conclusions drawn. Another major point he repeatedly emphasized was that the UAR-Egypt would continue to aim at the goal of Arab union.

In his speech of Oct 5 he declared that in order to save the Arab nation from catastrophe and to avoid civil war in Syria, from which the enemies of the nation hoped to benefit, he was lifting the diplomatic blockade he had imposed on that country (Nasser's Speeches pp 243-296; see also p 162.) [From then on the ruling group's main preoccupation apparently became Egypt's internal situation]. Abdel Nasser held a series of meetings with the vice-presidents—Abdel Hakim Amer, Abd al-Latif Baghdadi, Hussein ash-Shafi, Zakariya Muhyi ad-Din and Kamal ad-Din Hussein, and with Anwar as-Saadat (R. Coiro, Oct 6, 10, 12, 13-10; IMB, Oct 6, 10, 12, 13; Eg. Gaz., Oct 12, 14). [These meetings were followed by Abdel Nasser's speech of Oct 16.]

Abdel Nasser: "I Have Chosen Revolution." The gist of Abdel Nasser's address of Oct 16 was: "I have made my choice... ours is the road of revolution"—the alternative being "the road of submission to despair." He said that he had spent the past few days in "careful meditation," "feeling the pulse of this nation," then adding: "I have made my choice in the name of God, in the name of this nation..." [The President made no reference to any consultations preceding his choice.]

Past Achievements. The President continued that a frank appraisal of the facts was imperative at this hour, and he proceeded to survey past achievements as well as mistakes. The objectives of the nation in the 1952 revolution, he said, could be summed up as the restoration of political and social liberty to the fatherland and its citizens. Political freedom had been largely achieved in the struggle culminating in the Suez victory. Imperialism, however, had not yet been completely exterminated. The national forces had therefore embarked on the struggle for social liberty to consolidate and guarantee the achievements of the political battle. The bases of social liberty were economic self-sufficiency and social justice. The President went on to enumerate the achievements in these fields.

Economic Achievements. Regarding economic achievements, the President mentioned a progressive budget, increased yields in agriculture, land reclamation, the agrarian reform, rapid industrialization, the building of the Aswan High Dam, the plan for doubling the national income in ten years, and the creation of the public sector of the economy—"we feel proud that it started with [the nationalization of] all the British, French and Belgian monopoly establishments"—which now possessed a capital exceeding ££1,000m., but whose dynamic impact on the economy exceeded this amount by far.

Social Justice and Socialism. As regards social justice, the President said that it was to be achieved through socialism, whose complicated definition he would set aside for the moment. Social justice essentially meant the right of every citizen to share in the national wealth in accordance with his real efforts in its obtaining, and equality of opportunity. Neither the law of justice nor the divine law allowed either wealth or poverty, learning or illiteracy, human dignity or human degradation to be hereditary. The enemies in the battle for social freedom were "the exploitist and reactionary class" in collaboration with imperialism. Progress in this struggle was marked by the agrarian reform, the nationalization of industries and banks, the granting of rights to workers in management and sharing of profits, and the limitation of individual income—as prescribed by the socialist decrees of July.

The Syrian Secession A Counter-Attack By Reaction. The President went on to say that just as the nationalization of the Suez Canal in July 1956—the victorious outcome of the struggle against imperialism—was followed three months later by the counter-attack of imperialism at Suez, so the July 1961 victory in socialism was followed two months later by the counter-attack of reaction which strove to recoup its losses and "established a bridgehead in Damascus"; and just as imperialism was beaten back at Suez, so would reaction be forced to retreat from Damascus. It was, however, imperative to learn the lesson from the happenings in Syria and to apply it to the whole Arab struggle.

The Errors Made, the Lessons Drawn. Abdel Nasser enumerated five mistakes that had been made and pointed out in a general way the correction to be applied.

(1) Fighting Reaction without Compromise. It had been a mistake to make peace with "reaction" allied to imperialism. It was an illusion to think that the reactionaries would hesitate to sacrifice national interests to imperialism in order to regain their position. It was an illusion to think it possible to reach a compromise with reaction and to remove class distinctions peacefully in the framework of national unity. Imperialism had changed its methods of infiltration; it had now "hidden itself in the palaces and safes of millionaires," while the methods of combating it were still opposition to military alliances and bases. Abdel Nasser drew the conclusion that imperialism must be fought in the "palaces of reaction," and reaction, "in the lap of imperialism."

(2) Making National Union a Tool of Socialist Revolution. Popular organization as embodied in the National Union (NU) had been inadequate. It had been a mistake to open the NU to the forces of reaction which succeeded in "paralyzing [the NU's] revolutionary potential and turning it into a mere organizational facade, unmoved by the force of the masses and their genuine demands." "The most important thing now" was to convert the NU into a "revolutionary tool" of the masses—"the workers, the peasants, the educated, the professionals, the property owners whose ownership is not based on exploitation... to the officers and soldiers who were the pioneers of the great July 23 [1952] Revolution... to those whose hope lies in socialism."

(3) Inculcating The Masses With Revolutionary Fervour. No adequate efforts had been made to mobilize the masses for active participation in the revolution. This must be changed; every association and institution, every village, every school, every individual must be turned into "a lively and fertile revolutionary cell."

(4) Reorganizing Administration on Revolutionary Basis. The government machinery had proved unequal to the huge revolutionary task imposed upon it; in some cases, in fact, it had become a liability in its rigidity and aloofness from the masses. This state of affairs must be radically rectified. The right man must be put in the right place and equitably rewarded for his honest efforts.

(5) Opportunism, struggle for power, selfishness, deviation from the objective of the masses to serve personal ends—all this had not been completely eradicated. This must be done now; the ideals and morality of society must be reformed.

The Call For Revolutionary Action. In conclusion Abdel Nasser emphasized that the need was now for "revolutionary action," not for revolutionary legislation—which was adequate. He reiterated that he was not against private property as such but against "exploiting property"; there was "no room in our society for millionaires." He said he wanted to eliminate class distinctions through equality of opportunity. He wanted no mere revolutionary slogans but "a society throbbing with revolutionary activity."

"I Will Remain Here." Abdel Nasser ended his speech on a personal note. He said he had devoted his life to the Arab revolution and would "remain here as long as God wills." The nation on the other hand, had given him "such support as I never dreamt of." [A similar phrase appeared also in his letter to King Hussein, in March; see p 143 b.] (Ahram, Oct 17; Nasser's Speeches p 287 ff)

CABINET AND ADMINISTRATION

(October)

Cabinet Reshuffled. On Oct 18 the reshuffle of the government which Abdel Nasser "forecast in his address to the nation last Monday (Oct 16)" was announced. The majority of key posts were unaffected. The new set-up included the five [Egyptian] vice-presidents, 20 ministers and three deputy ministers. There were four newcomers among the ministers, while six [apart from the Syrians] had been dropped.

The new ministers were: Dr Abd al-Aziz as-Sayyid—Higher Education (aged 54, administrative director [? muḍir] of Alexandria University); Fathi ash-Shargawi—Justice (aged 45, a lawyer, member of the National Assembly); Dr Muhammad Nagib Hashshād—Agriculture (aged 50, Manager [? wakil] of Ayn Shams (Cairo) University; head of the General Federation of Students); Dr Muhammad an-Nabawi al-Muhandis—Health (aged 45, university professor of medicine and secretary of the doctors' association).

The six Ministers who had been dropped were: Dr Nūr ad-Dīn Tarrāf (Health); Ahmad Husni (State); Sayyid Mar'i (Agriculture); Hasan Abbās Zaki (Economy and Finance); Ahmad al-Mahrūqī (Agrarian Reform) and Ahmad Abdallah Tu'aymah (Waqfs). (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., Oct 19; see also table of government)

A foreign comment was that of the removed ministers, Hasan Abbās Zaki, Nūr ad-Dīn Tarrāf and Sayyid Mar'i, none could be described as a failure in his job. "It is hard to find any explanation for their dismissal other than they are men of means and might seem too bourgeois in a revolutionary administration." (Christian Science Monitor, Oct 24)

In Nov Vice-President Hussein ash-Shāfi' was given the responsibilities of Minister for al-Azhar Affairs (R. Cairo, Nov 11 [W 16]), and in Dec it was announced that he was to take over the affairs of the Islamic Congress [which had been in the charge of Anwar Saadāt]. (MENA, Dec 4 [6])

The Government Machinery. The reorganization was supervised by Abd al-Laṭīf al-Baghādī, Vice-President for Production and Minister of Planning and Finance. On Oct 21 eight committees were set up for "the technical study of questions" raised that day at a meeting chaired by Baghdadi on the reorganization of government machinery.

The questions were: the synthesis of a projects' budget in the development plan; the revision of financial legislation and regulations; the procurement and disposition of stores; the revision of the customs system; the reorganization of the budget and accounts departments of the ministries; the reorganization of local administration; the revision of the taxation system; the revision of the civil service law; a unified pension scheme "in line with socialist principles." The committees were to complete their tasks within one month. (Eg. Gaz., Oct 22)

On Oct 27 Vice-President Baghdadi, in a statement on the reorganization, enlarged upon Abdel Nasser's pronouncements on this matter in his speech of Oct 16 (see above). [Baghdadi gave no indication of the form of the new organization but elaborated on the principles governing the method of approach to it.] He said that the first requirement was to determine the problems involved and to decide on the path to be taken to achieve the desired aims. This in turn demanded "dividing each process into stages." No process [of reorganization] should be started unless success was assured, and no new stage initiated until the preceding stage had achieved its object. All this took time, perseverance and complete co-operation among all concerned. (Ahram; Eg. Mail, Oct 28)

On Oct 31 it was reported that Vice-President Baghdadi had set up a technical office for the reorganization of government administration (maktab fanni li-hu'un tanzim al-adat al-hukumiyyah) responsible directly to himself; it was to examine proposals made by committees to be set up in each ministry [apparently a development of the committees mentioned above]. The ministerial committees were to make their reports by Nov 30. (Ahram, Oct 31, Nov 1)

In December a Presidential Decree provided for the establishment of a Supreme Council for Public Organizations to direct and supervise the public sector of the economy. (See above: Economic Survey (Economic Legislation).)

DETENTIONS AND PROPERTY SEQUESTRATION

(October)

Detention and Sequestration of Property "In Defence of Revolution." On Oct 21, five days after the President's speech, Zakariya Muhyi ad-Din, Vice-President and Minister of the Interior, announced the detention of "reactionaries" and the sequestration of properties, in defence of the revolution. Three persons discharged from prison before serving their full terms were rearrested: Ibrahim Farag Masliah [former Wafd Minister, sentenced to prison in 1953 and released in 1955], Fu'ad Sarraj ad-Din [former Wafd SG and Minister of the Interior, sentenced to 15 years prison in 1953 and released in 1955] and Muhammad Atif Nasar [former Maj.-Gen., sentenced to life imprisonment for conspiracy in 1957 and released in 1958]. Thirty-seven named persons were detained and the monetary property of 167 named persons, including those detained, was sequestered. Muhyi ad-Din declared that these measures were taken in fulfilment of the revolutionary policy announced by the President, and their aim was "to protect [the people's] ability to ward off any stab in the back" such as the Syrian revolution. The persons affected were "reactionaries and their followers." (Eg. Gaz., Oct 22)

Abdel Nasser: Those Arrested "Started to Move." In his opening speech at the National Congress Preparatory Committee on Nov 25, President Abdel Nasser said the Syrian coup had set the "reactionaries" in Egypt thinking that this feat could be repeated in Egypt; they "started to congratulate each other... and considered the socialist revolution at an end." They looked for British help, as they had formerly. They believed the allegations by the Damascus, Amman and Israel radio stations on unrest in the armed forces, and they became bold and "started to move." Rumours began to be heard in the clubs. Abdel Nasser mentioned in this respect "the Badrawi, Sarraj ad-Din, Hämüd Zakis, and Zaki Abd al-Mut'als." But the revolution had also learned the lesson of Syria. These people were arrested. They had been cursing the revolution since its beginnings but had been left alone because cursing did not matter; what did matter was plotting against the people. (R. Cairo, Nov 25 [28]; Gumhuriyyah; Eg. Gaz., Nov 26)

Arrest of Army Officers. At the same time [unconfirmed] reports reaching Beirut claimed that 150 army officers had been arrested over the previous fortnight. Most, if not all, were said to be signatories of a petition to FM Amer calling for reforms which in sum meant a slowing down of the nationalization drive launched in July. (Jaridah, Oct 20; Sunday Telegraph, Oct 22)

However, in his speech on Nov 25 before the Preparatory Committee of the National Congress, Abdel Nasser admitted the arrest of four officers only, "for a reason of which you will be told in the future" (Eg. Gaz., Nov 26). Later, the arrest of a UAR ambassador to a Communist state was also mentioned in connection with the "grave affair" in which these officers were said to have been involved. (Musawwar, Dec 8)

Further Sequestrations and Arrests; Many Non-Egyptians Affected. On Oct 30 a further list was published of 255 "capitalist reactionaries" whose property was sequestered (Ahram, Oct 31; Eg. Gaz., Nov 1). On Nov 25 Abdel Nasser announced that the total number of sequestered properties was 650, plus that of 168 persons who had "made their wealth trading in narcotics" (Eg. Gaz., Nov 26). However, the New York Times, quoting "informed sources," was of the opinion that many more properties had been sequestered than was reported. (NYT, Nov 24)

Prominent on the sequestration lists were non-Arab names, chiefly Jewish, Greek and Armenian, and also Lebanese and Syrian; among those with Syrian connections were Fa'iz Abdallah al-Ijl, son-in-law of Shukri al-Quwatli, and Adnan Hashim al-Atasi, son of the former PM. In his announcement of Oct 21, Muhyi ad-Din said that among persons affected there were those who had come to the country under circumstances of colonialist protection and could not care less about the interests of the nation. Egyptian families affected included the Badrawi, Abud and Farghali, leading in industry and foreign trade. (Ahram, Oct 22, 31; see also comments in Jaridah; Daily Telegraph, Oct 24; Sunday Times, Oct 29; NYT, Nov 1)

In Dec Al-Ahram reported that 15 more persons had been detained in addition to the 37 whose detention was announced on Oct 21; ten of the latter had meanwhile been released by order of Muhyi ad-Din. (Ahram, Dec 28)

Foreign Comments. That Abdel Nasser was going all out to make Egypt "a Tito-type socialist state," was one British comment. (Sunday Telegraph, Oct 22)

The Sunday Times offered two explanations—the one “superficially the more obvious”—that Abdel Nasser was out to annihilate the circles who might, he feared, engineer a coup against him in Egypt as they had in Syria; this view was shared by The Times. The other possible explanation, “more economic and less political” was that “Egyptian socialism... [was] unable to stop half-way because, having frightened private enterprise, the government is compelled to take over more and more itself.” (Sunday Times, Oct 29; Times, Oct 24)

As to the future, the Economist suggested that “the flamboyance of these arrests and of the seizure of private property point to a much rougher road towards Arab socialism than was indicated by the sophisticated, but jumbled, principles laid down three months ago.” (Economist, Oct 28)

THE REORGANIZATION OF THE NATIONAL UNION

(November-December)

PREPARATORY COMMITTEE ESTABLISHED

Preliminary Consultations, “New Alignment Sought.” Soon after his address of Oct 16 Abdel Nasser entered into a series of cabinet consultations to work out “the basic principles of the popular revolutionary organization to bring society into line with the socialist revolution which began in July 1961.” (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., Oct 20)

The following fortnight saw frequent reports on the progress of the consultations and leading articles in the press in the spirit of Abdel Nasser's address. (Ahram, Oct 21, 23, 27, 29, Nav 1, 2, 3, 4)

Abdel Nasser was believed to be planning a new drive to enlist the active support of the intelligentsia in a move to reorganize the government and make fundamental changes in the National Union. The ultimate objective would be a broad alignment of workers, university graduates, professors and soldiers. Abdel Nasser was reported to believe that he needed a wider base of support than the military one on which he had depended heavily until now. Such a “national front,” he reportedly believed would protect him from any attempt at revolt by “reactionaries.” (NYT, Nav 1)

Abdel Nasser's Declaration on Organization Of “Popular Powers.” On Nov 4 Abdel Nasser issued a declaration on the “reorganization of all national popular powers on a democratic basis” which was called for by the “enormous responsibilities” carried by the UAR in its “historic role” as the “base of the Arab pioneer movement.”

Fundamental considerations were: (1) The organization of the “popular powers” must ensure a genuine mobilization of the people of the UAR and their representation “on the largest possible scale”; (2) the “national revolutionary action” must be “closely linked” with a definite plan; (3) the “people itself” must steer the revolutionary movement.

The following steps would be taken:

1) A Republican Decree would be issued for the formation of a committee to be called The Preparatory Committee for the National Congress of Popular Powers (al-lajnah at-tahdriyah lil-mu'tamar al-watani li-quwa ash-sha'abiyyah), which would examine the representation through free elections of the “real genuine power of the people” in a National Congress, within one month.

2) The elections for the National Congress would be held in time for it to convene in Jan 1962. The President would inaugurate the Congress with a report embodying a charter of national action. This report would then be debated by the Congress in open session. The final result of the report and the debate would “constitute the practical crystallization of the charter of national struggle, including the methods and aims of popular action.”

3) This charter would be the basis for the general elections which would eventually be held for the constituent committees (al-lijān at-ta'sisiyah) of the National Union in every village and town throughout the country; the National Congress would define the date and system of these elections. From these committees would arise the General Congress of the National Union—the supreme popular authority in the country which would decide on the drafting of a permanent constitution for the UAR. (Ahram, Nov 5; R. Cairo, Nov 5 [7])

Dissolution of National Assembly. [At the time of the break-up of the UAR the National Assembly (on which see p 590) was not in session.] Following the break-up the 200 Syrian members of the Assembly resigned their seats. (R. Baghdad, Oct 9-10; IMB, Oct 10)

On Nov 7 Abdel Nasser abolished Law No. 249 of 1960 relating to the National Assembly, thereby terminating its existence. Otherwise, the provisional constitution of 1958 remained in force. Abd al-Qādir Hātim, Minister of State, issued a note explaining that in view of the new phase into which the social revolution had entered since the July decrees, and in the light of Abdel Nasser's call for elections to the National Congress of the Popular Powers, it was inevitable that the Assembly, formed prior to these “radical developments,” should be terminated. (Eg. Gaz., Nov 8)

It was reported that already at the time of the inauguration of the “socialist revolution” in the summer of 1961 it had been proposed to purge from the Assembly elements in consonance with the new policy. But this had been rejected as undemocratic, for the people alone had the right to make such changes (Musawwar, Nov 11). In Dec during the debates in the Preparatory Committee for the National Congress, Abdel Nasser said: “Had we taken the socialist laws [of July 1961] to the National Assembly we would have stumbled and would still be debating to this day because interests clash, of course.” (R. Cairo Dec 3 [6])

Appointment of Preparatory Committee for Congress of Popular Powers. On Nov 18, after a further series of discussions with members of the cabinet (Ahram, Nov 6, 8, 10, 12, 15), Abdel Nasser issued a Republican Decree appointing the “Preparatory Committee for the National Congress of Popular Powers” composed of 250 members. The Committee included the entire cabinet, all provincial governors, many senior officials, the Speaker and 26 members of the dissolved National Assembly and representatives of the universities (including Al-Azhar) and public enterprises, journalists, peasants, workers and students; there were 11 women members, drawn from various walks of life. (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., Nov 19)

Anwar as-Saadat was appointed Secretary-General of the Committee. (Ahram, Nov 23)

The Preparatory Committee. On Nov 25, the day of the inauguration of the Preparatory Committee, a Republican Decree established its procedural regulations. The significant clauses were: Art. 1: The SG convenes the Committee and supervises its work. Art. 2: The sessions would be public. A majority of members would constitute a quorum. Recommendations would be made by an absolute majority of the members present. Arts. 3, 4: Members would speak in order of their requests to do so. The SG would close the debate as soon as the members scheduled had finished their address. Art. 6: Motions would be put by the SG only. Art. 7: Voting would be by show of hands. Arts. 8-10: Sub-committees to report on special subjects would be set up accordingly. Art. 11: Members of the public would have the right of submitting proposals to the SG. (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., Nov 26)

The Preparatory Committee convened on Nov 25. Further sessions were held on Nov 26, 27, 28, 29, Dec 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 16, 17, 20, 21, and finally on Dec 31—nineteen in all. (Ahram, passim)

THE DEBATE

Abdel Nasser: "Isolation of Reaction" Prerequisite for "Freedom and Democracy for the People." The first session of the Preparatory Committee was taken up by a three-hour address by Abdel Nasser devoted for the most part to a critical survey of the years since 1952, along the lines evolved in his earlier pronouncements since the July decrees. The phase of the "political revolution," Abdel Nasser said, was complete; in it, the Liberation Rally and the NU had done "splendid" work, but they had not been able to eliminate reaction, which the new, socialist phase of the revolution was to tackle.

Abdel Nasser spoke at length of the "infiltration of reaction" into the state apparatus and the NU. The Suez war, the [West's] economic blockade of Egypt in 1957, and the merger with Syria in 1958 had prevented the revolution from dealing effectively with this problem. Now the reactionaries, "the enemies of the masses" must be "isolated." These enemies were those who opposed the socialist revolution and aimed to revive the capitalist regime. Their isolation was a prerequisite for "full freedom and democracy for the people." Abdel Nasser said that he had often felt that people were afraid, but after the "isolation" the people would have the opportunity of speaking their mind freely, of making mistakes and of correcting them; for once the reactionaries were isolated, the remaining differences between various classes and groups of the people could be resolved peacefully and democratically inside the revolutionary movement. There were "inevitable differences" between such groups as the farmer, the agricultural worker and the small merchant, the intelligentsia and the fellahin, officials and fellahin, the shopkeeper and the customer—but such differences were "purely internal" [to the revolution]. There would, however, be no freedom and democracy for the enemies of the people. Capitalist democracy was but a screen for capitalist exploitation. The formation of two parties would mean the end of the revolution. Never had a capitalist parliament made a social revolution. Democracy was not an end in itself, but a means for creating a society embodying equality of opportunity. (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., Nov 26)

Working Schedule Adopted. On Nov 26, its first working session, the Preparatory Committee unanimously accepted its "terms of reference" as proposed by Anwar as-Saadat, the SG: (1) General discussion of (a) the nature of "the popular powers of the people"; (b) the method by which these powers should be represented in the National Congress; (c) the size of the Congress. (2) A sub-committee to draw up a report based on the general discussion. (3) Discussion of this report. (4) Another sub-committee to "study the representation of the various branches of the popular powers in the Congress." (5) A coordination committee to prepare proposals to be submitted to the Committee for final action. (Eg. Gaz., Nov 27)

Following are the main points of the ensuing debates, in a number of which President Abdel Nasser participated, and repeatedly intervened.

Who Are the Popular Powers? And How Are They to Be Represented in the National Congress? Three main outlooks were expressed:

1) The popular powers are all the citizens: this was the opinion of [the well-known religious modernist] Khālid Muhammad Khālid who explicitly included "the reactionaries"; he added that it was the task of the members to convey their views to the government and not necessarily to share its views. This was also the view of [the authores] Dr A'ishah Abd ar-Rahmān ("Bint ash-Shātī") who said: "The popular powers are the whole people; the ignorant as the university graduate, the rich as the poor." (Ahram, Nov 27, 28)

2) Popular powers are the working people—in the widest sense of the term: the worker, the peasant, the engineer, the student, the mother in her home. This opinion was expressed, among others, by Shaykh Ahmad ash-Sharāsi and Mustafa Kāmil Murād. (Ahram, Nov 27)

3) An ideological approach: the popular powers are those who believe in the socialist democratic and cooperative system—Dr Jābir Abd ar-Rahmān. (Eg. Gaz., Nov 29)

The popular powers are all working people "united by one aim: the struggle for a better society" and "having the energies we need for building the socialist structure, and for protecting its laws"—Muhammad Galāl ad-Dīn Sayyid, Ahmad Kāmil al-Badrī, Dr Hamdī al-Hakīm. (Ahram, Nov 28, Dec 6; Eg. Gaz., Nov 30)

Abdel Nasser defined the popular powers by elimination: "Anyone not an opportunist, a capitalist, a reactionary, a political parasite or a satellite politician." (Eg. Gaz., Nov 29)

The quantitative aspects of the representation were discussed. Hussein Muhammad Mahmūd, a peasant representative, demanded that peasants should make up 80% of the National Congress, because of their preponderance in the population. (Ahram, Dec 4)

Dr Nīmat Mahrān, a woman member, demanded enlarged representation of women; various other members concurred. (Ahram, Dec 6)

Another controversial point was whether the existing organizations were to be the base of the elections. Yūsuf Ali and other members claimed that the election to the National Congress should be based on the existing labour unions (Ahram, Nov 29); Dr Gamāl ad-Dīn Sa'īd suggested that the industrial workers' representatives should be elected through the factories. Mustafa Kāmil Murād, Ali Sayyid Ali and Siyām Farag argued that the agricultural cooperative associations and the trade unions, until reorganized, were not fit to represent the working people. (Ahram, Nov 27, Dec 6, 10)

Abdel Nasser rejected the idea that the present unions and the executive committees could set up true representations of the people's powers. He also said that the time had not yet come for all peasants to join cooperative associations and to set up trade unions for agricultural labourers. (Eg. Gaz., Nov 28)

Proposal to Set Up Socialist Cadre Party. Ihsan Abd al-Qudus, editor of Rûz al-Yûsuf and also a member of the Preparatory Committee, supported—in an article in his journal—the proposal to isolate the reactionaries, but stressed that this was not enough. He suggested making a distinction between the "special socialist base" and the "general national base," organizing the former in a "socialist, democratic, cooperative party" which would be bound together by common socialist ideology and interest. He agreed that the term "party" aroused apprehension because it had been misused in the past, but there was no alternative. He stressed that not all the people could be regarded as socialist; therefore, the socialist elements had to be organized in a special party. Only such a party could provide the strong leadership needed. He wrote that he had advocated the establishment of such a party since 1952 and argued that the failure of the Liberation Rally and the National Union was due to their non-partisan form. (Rûz al-Yûsuf, Dec 4)

Who Are the Enemies of the People and How Should They Be Treated? Question of "Isolation." Abdel Nasser: National Guard to Defend Revolution.—An extreme view was expressed by Ali Sayyid Ali who argued that whoever was affected by the latest "socialist revolutionary laws" must be "isolated" (Yûsuf). Abd an-Nabi Mahmûd Sayyid suggested "isolating" only those who were hurt by the agrarian reform, all umdahs [village heads] and their assistants (Ahram, Dec 6, 7). Other speakers argued that the "feudalists," politicians of the old regime, "opportunists," "exploiters," "agents of foreigners", (explicitly including Communists) and whoever impeded socialist expansion should be isolated to prevent them from betraying the people as they had done in Syria. (Ahram, Nov 27, 30, Dec 4)

The most outspoken opponent of "isolation" was again Khâlid Muhammad Khâlid who said that "isolation" was undemocratic and asked whether it was really necessary to restrict democracy in order to protect socialism. Among the moderates was also Gamâl Mursi Badr who argued that nowadays there were no entire groups that might be dubbed "enemies of the people"; even individuals were entitled to equitable treatment (Ahram, Nov 27, 28). Dr Ahmad Sayyid Darwish said that "isolation" should be based on legality; special laws should be enacted and only a judge be qualified to pronounce on political "isolation." (Ahram, Dec 5)

Abdel Nasser reiterated the major theme of his opening address: the revolution must be protected from its enemies. "Those who forced their way into your homes, beat and wounded you, still exist," the President said, and they would repeat these deeds if given the opportunity. It was unreasonable to turn a former owner of 5,000 feddan, of which 4,900 feddan had been requisitioned. The "isolation" of such men did not mean that they would be put in a military prison, but that they should not be allowed to occupy positions of authority.

Political isolation only—not judicial prosecution—was necessary to protect the socialist revolution; "I shall sign no death warrant" the President said, and recalled that in the past also the Egyptian revolution, unlike other revolutions, had been bloodless and merciful. There had been only a few political trials: of the Muslim Brethren because they attacked the revolution in 1954; of the Communists because they received orders from abroad—not because the revolution was against Marxism; and of people like Sarraj ad-Din [the Wafdist] who were soon pardoned.

At the same time, the President said, the people, everyone, must share with the leadership the task of protecting the revolution, defending it "with his blood. We will set up national resistance groups, and a national guard, and include the fellahin in it." Addressing the Committee, he said: "Should the people here formulate a reactionary constitution, I would not hesitate to put on my military uniform once more and fight it out."

Abdel Nasser said he did not wish to define who were the "enemies" of the people. In any case, "I consider a traitor anyone who suggests the revival of feudalism." (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., Nov 28, 29, 30)

Democracy and Freedoms. A debate developed on this point between President Abdel Nasser and Khâlid Muhammad Khâlid. Khâlid said: "Ten years have passed since the Revolution raised its banner. We must restore its liberties to the people without delay." He added: "Socialism does not differ from democracy; if socialism is a means to liberate humanity from hunger, democracy is a means to liberate humanity from fear" (Ahram, Nov 27). In a later speech Khâlid took issue with Abdel Nasser's opposition to parliamentary democracy and the party system. He said that these must "not be held responsible today for the circumstances under which they worked yesterday," just as it could not be argued that the army should be dissolved because of the corruption in its ranks before July 1952. "To me," Khâlid said, "democracy is simply to enable the people to select its rulers by free poll..." Under the former regime it happened that when Parliament was dissolved by royal decree it would meet unauthorized and force the holding of free elections. If the people thus succeeded in "imposing its will and power" when it was enslaved, Khâlid asked, why should it not do so today "when the government... is at its fingertips and it is not oppressed...? Indeed why should we be afraid to let it rule itself on the largest democratic scale?" Addressing the President directly, Khâlid declared that a phenomenon existed that must be faced courageously: in a capitalist society the people enjoyed more freedom and control of government than in a socialist society. Socialism limited liberty and "indulged in domination and suppression" because of its fear of capitalism. The UAR should adopt the "golden mean" between socialism—which Khâlid advocated—and capitalism, adopting from the latter this asset of freedom. Khâlid also advocated the road of "evolution instead of revolution" [yet at the same time he said, "The whole people have faith in their revolution"—an apparent contradiction which, Abdel Nasser, in his reply, pointed out. What he meant to express, it seems, was "revolution by evolution."] He said that there was no need for "non-democratic measures" such as a "protective war" [against the "reactionaries"], to which the President had referred, in order to safeguard UAR democracy. (Eg. Gaz., Dec 4)

Dr A'ishah Abd ar-Rahman maintained that the people could be relied upon in the choice of their representatives (Ahram, Nov 28). Mustafa al-Baridi, Chairman of the Bar Association, said: "Despite all that has been said about freedom of expression, the fact is that the people are afraid to talk... We must do something to improve this situation... The people must feel secure and feel that they are under genuine liberal rule." He demanded an opposition party, because "parties would work for the interest of the country" and because "this was the freedom which had been known by every Arab." Dr Rashwan Fahmi, Chairman of the Medical Association, demanded free elections and a permanent constitution, giving the legislative precedence over the executive. (Ahram; Eg. Gaz., Dec 7)

The main argument of the opponents to this view was the failure of parliamentary democracy under the former regime. Fu'ad Galil said that the people learned what "democracy" was when they were forced to vote for the ruling parties against their own interest (Ahram, Nov 27). Ahmad Munisair recalled that the political parties in the pre-revolutionary days used to buy votes. The least that could be done was to prevent new opportunities from being presented to reactionary elements (Eg. Gaz., Nov 28). Dr Tu'samah al-Garf said opposition meant freedom of criticism and expression and this was guaranteed, but there was no room in the country for parties as they represented special interests. (Ahram, Dec 7)

Mustafa al-Barad'i also demanded freedom of the press. He said that "the press should give space to sincere and liberal opinion." Something must be done, he added, to secure freedom of expression in the nationalized press (Eg. Gaz., Dec 7). Kamal al-Hinnawi answered that freedom of the press existed. Censorship had been imposed only at the first stage of the revolution; afterwards it was abolished. "Now, the censorship rises from the conscience of the journalists themselves and from their understanding of the policy of the country... The press has never felt so much liberty as it feels at present." (Ahram, Dec 7)

Abdel Nasser repeatedly elaborated on this subject, once in direct reply to Khalid whom he challenged to cite a single example of anything he had written not being published under the revolutionary regime. Socialism, the President said, implied the restriction of certain freedoms, mainly economic. He was emphatic that freedom of expression was safe, as it had been over the last ten years, except for the advocates of feudalism or those who received their instructions from abroad, such as the Communists. Abdel Nasser reiterated that there was no room for political parties and western-type democracy with its implied dictatorship of capital, or a one-party system of the Communist type which excluded the majority of the people from the political process. The UAR's was "a democracy of all the popular forces, all the people"; a democracy both political and social, to be established by forming National Union committees throughout the Republic. It was, however, essential for the establishment of this democracy that the people should know how to defend themselves against the reactionaries, the President reiterated. (Ahram, Eg. Gaz., Nov 28, 30, Dec 4)

The Sub-Committees. On Dec 5 the Preparatory Committee decided to establish a sub-committee to prepare resolutions on the following subjects: (1) Who are the popular powers?; (2) the size of the National Congress; (3) the proportion of the various sectors of the popular powers in the composition of the Congress.

Eighty-nine members of the Preparatory Committee put forward their own names. The Preparatory Committee then decided that its SG, Anwar as-Saadat, should choose the sub-committee members from among these candidates. On Dec 6 Saadat announced the names of the 21 sub-committee members. (Ahram, Dec 6, 7)

On Dec 9 the sub-committee, in its first session, unanimously elected Dr Gâbir Gadd as its rapporteur (mu-qarrir). The sub-committee held 11 sessions in all, and on Dec 19 submitted its report to the plenary. (Ahram, Dec 10-20)

The Preparatory Committee then decided to establish five sub-committees to be nominated by the SG—to discuss the representation of various groups inside each sector at the National Congress as follows: farmers, workers, "national capitalists" (ar-rasmiyah al-wataniyah), officials and women, university teachers and students. (Ahram, Dec 22, 24)

On Dec 27 the five sub-committees submitted their reports to a coordination committee which, on Dec 29, affirmed the reports with minor amendments and submitted them to the Preparatory Committee. (Ahram, Dec 28, 30, 31)

PREPARATORY COMMITTEE RESOLUTIONS

The Preparatory Committee in plenary session adopted its resolutions by affirming one by one the reports of its various sub-committees, with occasional amendments.

"Isolation of Enemies of the People." As regards "isolation," the Committee resolved: "Isolation" (asil) meant "deprivation of the right to exercise the political prerogatives enjoyed by the people; of the right to participate in any political body; of the right to occupy any leading post in any socialist body connected with it, such as trade unions, cooperative societies and professional associations." Isolation should be limited to the isolated persons alone, and should not imply deprivation of civil rights. There would be two forms of isolation: (1) isolation of the "enemies of the people's socialist revolution"; (2) removal or exclusion (istib'ad) of "those whose interests are incompatible with the interest of the people at the present stage of socialist reconstruction."

"Enemies of the People's Socialist Revolution": The following were so defined:

1) Whoever had been found guilty by the Revolutionary, People's, Treasury, State Security and Supreme National Courts of committing a crime against the country, unless completely amnestied.

2) Whoever had helped foreigners, directly or indirectly, to gain power over the country or to harm its interests.

3) Whoever had misused his influence to thrive at the expense of the people or to realize personal gains for himself or others in an unjustifiable manner.

4) Whoever had participated in corrupt political life by violating the constitution, falsifying elections, attacking political freedoms or supporting monarchical tyranny. This applied to members of the royal court, ministers, party members and MPs.

5) Members of the former royal family.

The "Excluded" (mustab'adin) were banned from taking part in political organizations during the constructive stage of socialism on the grounds that their interests were in conflict with those of the people. The following groups were defined as excluded:

1) Those who were affected by the agrarian reform laws. Those who had proved "responsive to socialism" and those who had rendered "well-known services to the people" were exempted.

2) "Reactionary and exploiting elements opposed to socialism" among those who held shares to a value of more than £E10,000 and those who were affected by the nationalization of the Mir Bank and National Bank of Egypt, and certain (detailed) decrees of July 1961.

3) "Reactionary elements hostile to socialism" among those whose funds had been sequestered or those who had been put under arrest on security or economic grounds since July 22, 1961.

4) Those who had been convicted of having had a share in corrupting the political life of the people through their influence on public opinion, or who had received secret funds, whether from internal or from foreign sources; those who had been convicted of abusing their authority in labour unions, cooperative organizations, or chambers of commerce and industry in order to further private interests or to distort the principles on which these organizations had originally been founded.

The Committee recommended that "isolation" in both forms should remain in force until the persons affected could prove that they had adopted themselves to the socialist system. They would enjoy the right to appeal before a special committee which would include professional judges. The Committee also recommended that the President set up a committee for the protection of the socialist revolution in the political, social, economic and cultural spheres. [The resolutions said nothing about who was actually to implement the "isolation."] (Ahram, Dec 20, 22, 1961; Jan 1, 1962; Eg. Gaz., Dec 20)

Composition of National Congress. Concerning the National Congress, the Preparatory Committee affirmed the sub-committee report as follows:

1) The Congress should have 1,500 members.

2) The popular powers would be divided into 8 sectors composed as follows:

Farmers	375 members	25%
Workers	300 members	20%
"National Capitalists"	150 members	10%
Professional Associations	225 members	15%
Non-Union Civil Servants	135 members	9%
University and College
Teachers	105 members	7%
Students	105 members	7%
Women	105 members	7%

(Eg. Gaz., Dec 20; Ahram, Dec 20, 21)

On Dec 31, at its final session, the Preparatory Committee affirmed the reports of the five sub-committees concerning the representation of various groups within each sector. Seats were allocated as follows:

The 375 seats of the farmers: 80 to the members of agrarian reform cooperatives; 265 to agricultural co-operative associations; 7 to members of agricultural labour unions; 15 to government agricultural labourers, and 8 to members of fishermen's unions.

The 300 seats of the workers: 120 to industry workers, 26 to commerce, 64 in the services and 90 in government employ.

The 150 seats of "national capitalists": 75 to businessmen and 75 to industrialists.

The 225 seats of the professional associations: 17 to physicians, 8 to dentists, 8 to veterinarians, 9 to pharmacists, 16 to lawyers, 83 to teachers, 18 to agronomists, 31 to the engineering professions, 8 to bookkeepers and auditors, 10 to journalists, 8 to scientists and 9 to artists.

The 135 seats of non-union civil servants were assigned by governorates according to the number of officials in each governorate, with a minimum of 2 representatives for each, except for the four desert governorates which were allocated one representative each.

The 105 seats of the academic teaching staff: 4 to Al-Azhar, 27 to Cairo University, 18 to Ayn ash-Shams University, 17 to Alexandria University, 6 to Asyut University, 22 to colleges and 11 to Technical Research Commissions (hay'at al-buhūth al-fanniyah).

The 105 seats of students—4 to Al-Azhar, 20 to Cairo University, 15 to Ayn ash-Shams University, 14 to Alexandria, 4 to Asyut, 13 to the colleges, 30 to secondary school pupils and 5 to students studying abroad.

The 105 seats of women—8 to physicians, 1 dentist, 1 veterinarian, 3 to pharmacists, 5 to lawyers, 34 to teachers, 4 to agronomists, 1 to the engineering professions, 2 to scientists, 1 bookkeeper, 3 to journalists, 5 to artists, 10 to workers, 21 to members of cooperative associations and 6 to members of women's associations. (Ahram, Dec 27, 28, 31, 1961, Jan 1, 1962)

On Dec 31, at the final session, Anwar as-Saadāt declared that the Preparatory Committee had finished its task and its resolutions would be submitted to President Abdel Nasser. (Ahram, Jan 1, 1962)

THE UAR: INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SYNOPSIS

General. The UAR's objectives in foreign policy remained the same as in 1960; (MER 1960, p 510). In her prime aim, the establishment of an Arab union under her leadership, the UAR experienced a grave setback when her only achievement, the Egyptian-Syrian union, disintegrated (Sept). The damage caused by this event to the UAR's (Egypt's) international standing, however, seemed to have been relatively slight.

The UAR continued to pursue her policy of "positive neutralism" or—as it came to be called—"non-alignment." Her increased activity in the neutralist sphere which had become apparent in 1960 (MER 1960, p 514) found its expression in her sponsoring of the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries. (See pp 56 ff.)

Certain changes took place in the relations of the UAR with the world powers, during the period under review. At the beginning of the year, the UAR took an extreme anti-American and anti-UN line over the Congo crisis which led to the impression in the West that she was coordinating her efforts with those of the Soviet Union. In the spring, however, when the first steps were being taken in Cairo for convening the Belgrade conference, the UAR emerged in a "middle of the road" position between the so-called "leftist" and "rightist" neutralists. Simultaneously, her relations with the US improved. At the same time, while her ties with the Soviet Union continued to be close, the UAR became involved in a public dispute with her in which she demonstrated that she meant to preserve her independence and freedom of action. The impression that Abdel Nasser had adopted an attitude of relative moderation was reinforced by his position at the Belgrade Conference, in September. Thus by the end of the year, even though Cairo had meanwhile renewed vehement attacks on "Western imperialism"—this time as personified by Britain and France—she appeared to have become more neutral between East and West. Basically, however, the UAR's position between the world powers had not changed. She still sought to attain her objectives, in particular Arab union and leadership in Africa, at the expense of Western positions, and as far as the elimination of the latter was concerned, her interests continued to correspond with those of the East.

The UAR secured large scale economic aid from both East and West, with the importance of Western aid growing. Regarding foreign trade, Egyptian exports were divided about equally between Communist and Western countries, but her imports from the West were about threefold those from the East.

At the United Nations General Assembly, the UAR, together with Morocco, Iraq and Yemen, recorded the highest coincidence of votes with the Communist countries and the lowest with the US, of any ME country. At the 15th session coincidence with the Communist countries was 71% and with the US 20.6%; at the 16th Assembly the figures were 67.2% and 14.4% respectively.

The struggle against Israel continued to figure prominently in the UAR's foreign policy, in her relations with the world powers, and in diplomatic and other efforts all over the world, especially in Africa. (See: The Arab-Israel Conflict)

The Arab World. The UAR continued to strive towards the establishment of an Arab union, with a political system after its own pattern and under its leadership. Until the Syrian secession, however, the UAR accommodated itself to working in the framework of "Arab solidarity," the concept opposed to that of Arab union which was embodied in the Arab League and upheld by all other Arab governments (see p 97 ff.). This trend was strengthened by an improvement of relations with Jordan, at King Hussein's initiative. In the crisis evoked by Iraq's claim to sovereignty over Kuwait (June) the UAR was in accord with the Arab majority in supporting Kuwait's independence. The Bizerta episode, when President Bourguiba momentarily joined the camp of militant Arab nationalism, led at long last to a truce between Tunisia and the UAR. Thus, by mid-summer the UAR was on speaking terms with all Arab governments for the first time since her establishment in 1958.

Only six weeks later, all this changed drastically, in the wake of the Syrian secession. The basic difference between Cairo and the majority of Arab governments reappeared with a vengeance, and Egypt reverted to the revolutionary path in pursuance of her objectives in the Arab world. First, however, President Abdel Nasser had to clarify whether Egypt would continue on the course of Arab nationalism at all, in view of the Egyptian public's disappointment at Egypt's Arab venture and the apparently widespread desire that Egypt should now keep to herself. This the President did immediately, repeatedly emphasizing that Egypt would continue to lead the "Arab struggle." In keeping with his conclusion that the Syrian coup had been engineered by "reaction" in alliance with imperialism, Abdel Nasser declared that he would now "fight imperialism in the palaces of reaction." Socialism, according to this doctrine, had to precede Arab union, lest reaction strike again; the UAR therefore raised the banner of socialism in the Arab world. In this struggle, it was explained, Egypt would act as a state on the formal level, but as a revolution on the popular level everywhere in the Arab nation. At the beginning of 1962, this doctrine was finally termed "unity of aim before unity of rank."

Initiative in the inter-Arab struggle which followed the Syrian secession was, however, by no means one-sided. The new regime in Syria became Cairo's number one enemy and the Syrian leaders showed no more willingness to come to terms with Abdel Nasser than he with them. King Hussein broke his truce with Abdel Nasser by recognizing Syria's independence on the morrow of the coup. Iraq and Tunisia made it quite plain that they viewed the event with favour. In the case of Saudi Arabia, Cairo opened the attack. In Dec the UAR dissolved its federation with Yemen (the United Arab States) which had been formally established in March 1958 but never actually implemented; previously the Imam had attacked Cairo's nationalization policy. The UAR remained on speaking terms only with Lebanon, Libya, Sudan, Kuwait and Morocco, but these countries were no less opposed than the others to the UAR's aims. By the end of the year, the UAR was isolated among the Arab countries of the ME but took the offensive on the assumption that in her revolutionary policies of anti-imperialism, quest for union, and "Arab socialism," she dissolved its federation with Yemen (the United Arab people).

The Communist Countries. Relations with the Soviet Union continued on the established pattern. (See MER 1960, p 511.) The correspondence of interests and policies of the two countries was most clearly seen at the beginning of the year in the Congo crisis where both supported extremist, anti-Western elements, and strongly attacked the West and the United Nations. Significantly, however, in regard to the UN, the UAR did not go quite as far as the Soviet Union, in consideration of the support the UN enjoyed among the Afro-Asian nations. PM Khrushchov noted the two governments' "correspondence of views" on "such important questions of our time" as the struggle for peace, disarmament and the liquidation of colonialism. The UAR continued to rely exclusively on Soviet arms and on Soviet aid for her foremost development project, the Aswan High Dam.

That there were differences as well as cooperation between the two countries was amply demonstrated when they engaged in a propaganda campaign in May-June. The campaign was launched by the Soviet press on the issue of the alleged maltreatment of Communists in the UAR and specifically the alleged death or murder of two Communist leaders, one Syrian and the other Lebanese, in a Syrian prison. The wider issues involved were Communist criticism of the UAR regime, the Communist attitude to the Egyptian-Syrian union, and the UAR's neutralism.

PM Khrushchov himself raised the issue of the UAR regime in a meeting with a UAR parliamentary delegation headed by Anwar as-Saadat, on May 3. Khrushchov told them, in essence, that the UAR's future lay in Communism, though he did not propose to transform the Arab nationalists into Communists "now". He emphasized that Communism consisted of ideas and as such could not be "buried in prison." This encounter was followed, three weeks later, by a concentrated attack on the UAR regime in the Soviet press, on the issue of the Arab Communists. According to the articles, the UAR was not a "national democracy" but a dictatorship, and UAR socialism was "a society where exploiters rule... while progressive people languish in torture chambers." The UAR press reported that Moscow was in fact requesting the UAR to grant absolute freedom of action to the Communist parties; it was challenging the UAR's sovereignty and dignity; the UAR, however, would not allow any interference in her affairs.

The issues of Communist opposition to the Egyptian-Syrian union and the alleged Soviet intent to "subvert the UAR's neutralist policy" were not mentioned by the Soviet press, but were brought up in the UAR's counter-campaign.

Outright appeals by the Syrian Communists to fight against the union had been published in the World Marxist Review in 1960 (MER 1960, p 81), and in 1961 this journal continued to publish articles, by a Soviet commentator among others, attacking Cairo's call for unity as disguised Egyptian colonialism. The UAR information media now claimed that the Soviet campaign had really started at the time of the Egyptian-Syrian merger and that its aim was to strike at the union. Three months later, when the UAR broke up, the Arab Communists enthusiastically welcomed the event, and the Soviet Union preceded the Western powers in recognizing the new regime in Syria.

In contrast to the issues of Communism and the union, there was no direct evidence to support the UAR charge that the Soviet Union sought to divert her from her path of non-alignment. UAR commentators charged that the Soviet Union had interpreted the concept of positive neutralism as a kind of alignment with her own camp. It was also pointed out that the propaganda campaign coincided with the meeting in Cairo of the preparatory committee of the Belgrade Conference on Non-Aligned Countries, which the Soviet Union was thought to dis-favour. In any case, UAR spokesmen stated that the UAR had been given the opportunity to demonstrate the genuineness of her neutralism before the assembled neutrals, and Western observers thought that she had indeed thus strengthened her position among them.

While the campaign underlined the differences between the two countries, it also showed that both sides wished to maintain their cooperation. Thus some days lapsed before the UAR took public notice of the Soviet attacks, and it was only at the height of the campaign that the UAR made public the Khrushchov-Saadat encounter which had taken place a month earlier. It was also noted that in contrast to the UAR's anti-Western campaigns, the UAR reaction in this case was directed against the Soviet information media and did not extend to the Soviet government. There was apparently only one intimation that the difference on Communism might affect Soviet-UAR cooperation, when Pravda warned the UAR "not to cut the tree that provides the shade." On this, the UAR papers recalled that in 1957 Khrushchov had stated his willingness to cooperate with Abdel Nasser even though he hailed the Communists in his country; they also remarked that the USSR too derived benefits from the aid she extended. The campaign subsided in mid-June. On the occasion of a Muslim holiday, the Soviet leaders sent the UAR President messages of friendship, and Abdel Nasser replied in the same spirit. An article in Pravda, obviously designed to end the campaign, said that it could please only Western imperialism which was intent on driving a wedge between the two countries. Two weeks later a new UAR ambassador to the USSR, whose departure had been delayed, finally took up his post.

After the break-up of the UAR, however, there were renewed altercations between the Soviet and the UAR information media, started apparently by the latter. The UAR press, including Hamanein Haykal, President Abdel Nasser's leading spokesman, condemned the Arab Communists as enemies of Arab nationalism and collaborators with imperialism. Self-interest was the only motive imputed to the Soviet Union in extending aid to the Arabs, and she was even alleged to have reached an understanding with Britain on a common policy in the area. Soviet radio commentators reacted sharply to these articles, saying i.e. that Haykal was trying to harm the cooperation between the socialist states and the Arab countries in the interests of imperialism.

In the latter part of the year there were some instances in international politics where the two countries did not see eye to eye. When, on the eve of the Belgrade Conference, the USSR announced its intention to resume nuclear tests, Abdel Nasser, in his speech at the conference, expressed his "shock" at this step. (An authoritative Cairo comment said, however, that Abdel Nasser had acted on a hint from Khrushchov). Also, Abdel Nasser's attitude on the German question at the conference did not accord with that of the Communist bloc. In Nov., the Soviet Union vetoed the UAR-sponsored admission of Kuwait to the UN; there was no public UAR comment on this Soviet step which was described in the West as a "blow at President Abdel Nasser." At the end of the year, Soviet-UAR cooperation was however again underlined, when the C-in-C of the Soviet navy visited the UAR and the Eastern bloc delivered a batch of naval units, including submarines.

Soviet economic and technical assistance continued in fulfillment of the general aid agreements signed in former years; there was no new general agreement during the year. The USSR was reportedly assisting in the construction of over 90 industrial and other enterprises, in addition to the Aswan High Dam.

Regarding other Communist countries, an important development was the elevation, in May, of the East German trade mission in Damascus to the status of Consulate-General, which caused a clash between Bonn and Cairo. There was also a marked expansion of economic relations between the two countries. Economic co-operation continued with other Communist countries, especially Czechoslovakia.

Close cooperation was maintained between the UAR and Yugoslavia in both the political and the economic spheres. Presidents Abdel Nasser and Tito met three times during the year, and they jointly sponsored the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries.

Western Countries. UAR relations with Western countries in general continued to improve. Western economic aid assumed the greatest importance not only for the development of the country but also for current needs, in the form of the supply of US food surpluses. Apart from an agreement with Yugoslavia, all the new aid and credit agreements signed in 1961, which totalled $534 million, were with Western countries and Western-financed international funds. (On relations with the US, see separate synopsis below: The United States).

The improvement of relations with one Western power—which brought with it the benefits of economic aid—were, however, balanced by attacks on the "neo-imperialism" of others. Thus at the beginning of the year, when the UAR's relations with the US reached a low point over the Congo crisis, she re-established diplomatic relations with the United Kingdom, and subsequently also received a sizable British credit. Even in this period, though, UAR suspicions of British intentions were not allayed—and they were probably strengthened by the British intervention in Kuwait in June; the UAR continued to attack "British imperialism," and especially the British positions in Southern Arabia, the Persian Gulf and East Africa. France was also denounced throughout the year over Algeria and other issues.

Towards the end of the year, however, when UAR relations with the US had noticeably improved, Cairo strongly intensified her attacks on Britain and France—though the British forces had meanwhile been withdrawn from Kuwait, and Britain, to show her good faith, had delayed her recognition of Syria even longer than the US. The two countries were attacked over their attitude on the Congo question and were depicted as the leading enemies of Arab nationalism. Hassanin Haykal classified the following countries as the enemies of the UAR: France and Britain, Iran and Turkey—the Middle East CENTO Members—(but significantly not the US—the chief backer of CENTO) and the Arab countries with Western ties; these countries, Haykal alleged, were scheming to deal the UAR a deadly blow. At the same time, the UAR arrested members of the French Assets Mission, the only French official representatives in Cairo, on charges of espionage and a conspiracy to assassinate President Abdel Nasser, among others.

As for the other Western countries, UAR relations grew closer in particular with West Germany and Italy, especially in the fields of economic and technical assistance. West Germany extended large scale credits for development projects; significantly, however, a short time before the agreement was reached, the UAR permitted East Germany to open a Consulate-General in Damascus, and, rejecting Bonn's protests as "threats," declared that West Germany had stronger political and economic interests in the Arab countries than vice versa. There were certain friendly contacts with the Scandinavian countries, the Netherlands and Austria, among others. The usually friendly relations with Greece were marred—though apparently not on the official level—by the exodus of the Greek community from Egypt following the nationalizations by which many Greeks were deprived of their livelihood and all of their security. Belgium cut off diplomatic relations with the UAR, after her embassy in Cairo had been sacked following the murder of the ex-premier of Congo Patrice Lumumba; Cairo had already confiscated Belgian properties in the UAR, in connection with the Congo crisis, at the end of 1960.

Africa. In Africa, rather like in the Arab world, the UAR, in her quest for influence and leadership, supported revolutionary movements and became identified with a minority of countries which took an extremist, anti-Western stand. In January, these countries, the UAR, Morocco, three sub-Saharan states—Ghana, Guinea and Mali—and the Algerian Provisional Government participated in a conference at Casablanca, which was called primarily to discuss the Congo crisis. The conference issued an "African Charter" aimed at giving the group a permanent character. (See synopsis pp 48-9) The policies of the Casablanca group were opposed by the great majority of African countries who took a more moderate stand and supported the established order; these countries also joined forces, at conferences in Brazzaville (of 12 French speaking countries) and in Monrovia, where these 12 and another 7 countries participated. This division affected especially UAR relations with the countries of the Brazzaville group, whom she attacked as imperialist stooges. In the Congo itself the UAR intensified her support for the Stanleyville government of Antoine Gizenga, and, during the first quarter of the year, the Congo crisis visibly occupied the UAR more than any other issue in foreign affairs. (See separate synopsis below: The UAR and the Congo).

This concentration on Africa indeed gave rise to the impression that the UAR had shifted her efforts from the Arab arena, where she had been contained, to Africa. It was pointed out, however, that nobody could ignore Africa, and certainly not the UAR, who was a part of it. Abdel Nasser himself, and his partisans, justified the efforts in Africa also as a service to the Arab cause, especially crucial in combating Israel's "infiltration" of the continent. At the Casablanca conference, Abdel Nasser in fact achieved the condemnation of Israel as a tool of imperialism.

In charting her policy in Africa, it appeared that the UAR encountered a number of problems and contradictory situations which were not easily overcome. There was the fundamental issue that Egypt was white, while African nationalism was basically black; it was also remarked that Africans still remembered the Arabs as slave traders. It was further noted that in his quest for African leadership, Abdel Nasser, while enjoying high prestige as a leader of the African liberation movement, encountered similar aspirations by black Africans, such as President Nkrumah of Ghana with whom he cooperated in the Casablanca group. Further, Africa was crisscrossed by internal dissension, and wooing one party involved the risk of alienating the others. The UAR's increasing reliance on Islam as a means for spreading its influence in the continent sometimes aroused resentment in the countries concerned. Moreover, the UAR's "obsession with Israel," it was observed, imposed a certain strain on her relations with the African countries which enjoyed Israel's aid. There were also differences on the aims of African nationalism; President Nkrumah, for instance, strove towards the unification of Africa, while Abdel Nasser declared that such a goal was not yet feasible, because of the differences in the continent; the potentially contradictory claims of Arab and African nationalism were probably also a factor in the UAR attitude on this question. By the end of the year, certain observers indeed claimed to have detected a policy change in Cairo, in consideration of such factors (see p. 675 a.)

Cairo's activities in Africa encompassed a variety of fields. Her most important ties were on the political level, as witnessed by the Casablanca conference and the involvement in the Congo. The UAR continued to harbour African nationalists from non-independent territories; nine countries were represented by offices in Cairo. On the same level, the UAR was a prime mover of the All-African People's Conference, a non-governmental, anti-Western organization, in which dissident movements were prominent. The political activity was strongly supported by Cairo broadcasts to Africa—10 hours daily in 12 languages. The UAR, as has been mentioned, endeavoured to develop Islamic ties in the continent. She also sought to extend educational assistance, by sending out teachers and receiving African students in her institutions; many of the projects in this field failed to materialize during the year, but an "Afro-Asian Technical Institution" in Cairo started to function.

In the economic field, a number of missions were sent to Africa and new trade agreements concluded; the volume of trade with African countries remained insignificant, but progress was made in establishing maritime and air communications. The UAR vehemently opposed the association of African countries with the European Common Market and sought to promote inter-African economic co-operation in the framework of the Casablanca group. In the important field of economic and technical aid the UAR effort remained largely in the realm of plans and projects, but some practical beginnings in technical assistance were made, and the UAR extended credits of ££6m, each to Guinea and Mali, for purchasing equipment in the UAR for development projects.

(For synopses on relations with individual African countries, see under countries.)

Non-Arab Middle East Countries. As was the case with the majority of Arab countries, the UAR was also in conflict with most of the non-Arab Middle East countries, primarily, of course, with Israel as has already been mentioned. Cairo accused the two CENTO members in the area, Iran and Turkey, of conspiring with the West to harm the UAR. In 1960 the UAR had cut off her diplomatic relations with Iran, over the latter's friendly ties with Israel; on Oct. 1 she severed relations with Turkey, for having been the first country to recognize the independence of Syria, on the morrow of the coup d'état. The UAR supported Somalia's irredentist claims on Ethiopian territory and the secessionist movement in Eritrea which opposed the federation with Ethiopia. Ethiopia's de jure recognition of Israel aroused resentment in the UAR. The two countries maintained normal official relations, however, and, while in Africa Ethiopia joined the Monrovia group, she met with the UAR at the neutralist conference in Belgrade.

The UAR's ties with Somalia, on the other hand, remained closer than with any other ME or African country, and she extended her assistance in a variety of fields. Relations with Cyprus also grew closer, especially as a tendency towards neutralism began to emerge in the newly-independent country; President Makarios visited the UAR.

Asia. The UAR's most important political ties in Asia were with India and Indonesia, the continent's leading neutralists. Abdel Nasser's position on international issues differed, however, from both those of PM Nehru and President Sukarno, lying somewhere between the moderation of the former and the extremist, militant, "leftist" attitude of the latter. Other Asian countries with whom the UAR met on the neutralist level were Afghanistan, Burma (PM U Nu visited Cairo), Cambodia, Ceylon and Nepal. UAR economic ties expanded somewhat in the continent, especially with Ceylon and Japan. The UAR also sought to establish contacts in the Islamic sphere.

Latin America. As had been noted in 1960, the UAR showed increased interest in Latin America. This interest was thought to have been among the considerations that brought the UAR to sponsor the neutralist Belgrade conference instead of an exclusively Afro-Asian one. However, of the five Latin American countries invited to the conference—Bolivia, Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador and Mexico—only Cuba attended as a member. The UAR established a number of new diplomatic and other contacts in the area, and also bestowed decorations on a long list of Latin American personalities.

THE UAR AND THE CONGO CRISIS

SYNOPSIS

At the beginning of the year the UAR continued and even intensified its policy of aiding the Stanleyville government of Antoine Gizenga. The UAR also persisted in its sharp criticism of the UN—especially the Secretary-General—and the Western powers—on lines similar to those of the USSR.

From January 4-7 the heads of the neutralist, anti-Western African states—the UAR, Ghana, Guinea, Mali and Morocco as well as representatives of the Algerian Provisional Government, Libya and Ceylon—convened at Casablanca. The Congo crisis—among other factors—had brought these countries closer together, and it was the foremost item on the agenda. They endorsed the withdrawal of their contingents from the UN force in the Congo, and reserved for themselves "the right to take appropriate action" if in their opinion the purposes and principles which justified the presence of the UN force in the Congo were not realized.

Between January 31-February 6 the UAR contingent in the UN force in the Congo was actually withdrawn. Secretary-General Hammarskjöld's appeals to reconsider the decision having been rejected. The UAR commander made it quite clear that this move might aid the Gizenga forces in Orientale Province in invading neighbouring Equateur Province where the UAR units had been stationed. At the same time the UAR denied repeated charges by the Congo central government, and press reports, that the UAR was supplying Gizenga with war materials.

The news of the murder of Patrice Lumumba in Katanga, published on February 13, proved the occasion for an extreme anti-Western and anti-UN outburst in the UAR. The Western powers, Belgium and Secretary-General Hammarskjöld were charged with responsibility for the murder. Western embassies, particularly the Belgian, and the local UN headquarters, were attacked by rioters. Belgium, her protests unanswered, severed relations with the UAR, while Cairo sequestered all properties of Belgian private citizens in the UAR. Immediately following the news of Lumumba's death, Abdel Nasser announced the UAR's recognition of the Gizenga government as the Congo's legitimate and national government. The UAR was thus the first state to follow the USSR's example.

At this juncture, President Kennedy warned that the US would oppose any attempt by any government to intervene unilaterally in the Congo, and Secretary of State Rusk let it be known that the warning was addressed to the UAR as well as to the USSR; he reportedly also said that the UAR was closely coordinating its efforts with those of the USSR. The Cairo information media replied that the UAR would not be intimidated, and repeated its charges against the US. The US press attaché in Cairo was detained for ten hours for having allegedly distributed leaflets on the Congo.

At the Security Council, however, the UAR, which was a member at that time, did not follow the USSR's lead in demanding the dismissal of Hammarskjöld—though the Cairo information media reiterated this demand. Together with Ceylon and Liberia she sponsored a resolution which omitted any mention of the Secretary-General as the executive authority. It authorized the UN to use force to prevent civil war in the Congo and urged the withdrawal of foreign military and political personnel. The resolution was endorsed by the West, with some reservations, and adopted on February 2.

While the UN attempted to implement this resolution, the UAR persisted in her pro-Gizenga, anti-Western and anti-UN propaganda. As regards the UN, she differentiated between the Charter and the organization as such, which she said she respected, and the UN's executive body which she denounced as a tool of Western imperialism. The UAR denounced the Tananarive and Coquilhatville conferences at which the non-Lumumbist Congolese leaders sought a solution for their country. Meanwhile she exchanged ambassadors with Stanleyville. The central government, headed by President Kasavubu, was even denounced for trying to implement the Security Council resolutions, on the grounds that it wanted to seize the Katanga riches for its American backers. The UK, which opposed the use of force against the Katanga secessionist regime headed by Tshombe, was denounced for coveting these riches for herself. The differences between the US and the UK on this topic were described as a falling out of thieves.

In August, following a series of contacts, a coalition government was formed under the premiership of Cyrille Adoula, with Gizenga as Second Vice Premier. The UAR, however, kept her Ambassador at Stanleyville, and when Gizenga failed to take up his post, and later resumed his feud with the central government, the Cairo information media again supported his stand on the grounds that the West sought to dominate the Congo through the central government.

In autumn, a shift of emphasis became noticeable in the UAR's pronouncements concerning the Congo. After the death of Hammarskjöld, attacks on the UN executive ceased. Attacks on the US became also much less frequent and, with the Katanga secession now becoming the main issue, Cairo directed its attack on Britain, France, Belgium, Rhodesia and—as a matter of course—Israel. This development must also be seen in the wider context of the UAR's foreign relations at the time, namely the trend towards a more neutral line between the USSR and the US (for which see Synopsis, p 632 a).

WITHDRAWAL OF UAR CONTINGENT FROM THE CONGO SEEN AS MOVE TO AID STANLEYVILLE

[The 550-man-strong UAR battalion, commanded by Agid (Col.) Sa'ad ad-Din ash-Shadhili, was to be withdrawn from the UN command following a decision announced on Dec 6 1960 by the UAR, Ceylon and Yugoslavia to withdraw their contingents from the UN force in the Congo (see MER 1960, p 32). The decision was later endorsed at the Casablanca conference (Jan 4-7). The projected withdrawal of the contingents of the UAR, Ceylon, Yugoslavia, Guinea, Indonesia and Morocco would have reduced the 19,000-man-strong UN force by about 3,700 men.]

On Jan 22 the UAR officially asked the UN SG to arrange for the withdrawal of its contingent by the end of the month. UAR sources explained that the UAR refused to be partner to what was happening in the Congo and did not want the African countries to be held responsible for crimes committed against the Congo with the support of the UN forces. (Akrum, Jan 23; R. Cairo, Jan 23-1MB, Jan 24; Hayat, Jan 24)

On Jan 25 the SG called the UAR, Indonesia and Morocco expressing his regret over their insistence on repatriating their troops despite former appeals [e.g. Dec 14, 1960] to reconsider the decision. On Jan 26 the SG made public his former messages in which he pointed out that the withdrawal might result in a serious weakening of the force, and even bring about its liquidation. The SG repeated his former warnings that this might cause "the likelihood in the Congo of immediate civil war degenerating into uninhibited tribal conflict and the complete disintegration of the remaining fabric of national unity." (USIS, Jan 27; UN Doc. A/4800)

Abdel Nasser instructed Umar Lutfi, UAR representative in the UN, to reject the SG's appeal. The UAR forces were returned to Cairo, in an airlift operation by US transports assigned to the UN forces, between Jan 31 and Feb 6 (Ahram, Jan 28, 31, Feb 5, 6). Hassanain Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, denied that the UAR had betrayed the UN in withdrawing its troops. On the contrary, the UN had betrayed its principles, and brought about its own failure. (Ahram, Feb 3)

[Both UAR and Western sources implied that the move was intended to support the Lumumbist forces.] The AAPSO, in an extraordinary session held in Cairo on Jan 21-22, adopted a resolution on the Congo which inter alia invited the governments which had announced the withdrawal of their troops to put them at the disposal of the "legitimate government of Stanleyville" (NCNA, Jan 23 [25]). The New York Times wrote that the withdrawals were "plainly aimed at weakening the UN army and creating power vacuums that the Lumumba forces and their foreign backers might fill." The paper claimed that, "in what appeared to be an arrangement between the UAR and the Gizenga regime," pro-Lumumba forces had advanced into the area of Equateur Province which the UAR troops were about to evacuate (NYT, Jan 30). Col. Shadhili, the commander of the UAR contingent in the Congo, said in a press conference upon his arrival in Cairo in Feb that following the withdrawal of the UAR forces the door was open for an invasion of Equateur Province by Gizenga's forces in Orientale Province. (MENA, Feb 4 [6])

ALLEGED UAR MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO STANLEYVILLE GOVERNMENT

At the beginning of Jan it was reported that Pierre Mulele, representing the Stanleyville "Central Government" in Cairo, had asked Abd al-Hakim Amer, Vice President of the UAR, for military and financial assistance. (MER 1960, p 32)

President Kasavubu, in communications to the SG of Jan 7 and 14, complained, among other things, that a UAR aircraft had landed at Lisala on Dec 31 1960 without clearance from the Congolese authorities (UN Year Book, 1960, p 79). On Jan 17 an official source at Leopoldville stated that a UAR Ilyushin transport plane had landed at Gemena, Equateur Province, on Jan 16 and had been detained and searched by Congolese [pro-Leopoldville] forces who boarded it after a brief struggle with UAR soldiers stationed in the region. The aircraft contained arms, ammunition and propaganda material intended for the Lumumbist forces. (R. Cairo, Jan 17-18; IMB, Jan 18; R. Elisabethville, Jan 17 [19]; Ha'aretz, Jan 18)

UAR sources denied this statement and claimed that the plane had landed 15 days before with UN authorization and that news agencies had repeatedly carried the same report since the aircraft's arrival in the Congo (R. Cairo, Jan 17-18; IMB, Jan 18; Ahram, Jan 19). Later in Jan, Egyptian sources, quoting reports that Ilyushin 14 planes were pouring in from the UAR with supplies to the Lumumbists, carried a denial by the MENA editor to the effect that these reports were repetitions of "former lies" on this topic. (Eg. Gaz., Jan 26; R. Cairo, Jan 25 [27])

The New York Times correspondent in Leopoldville, however, persisted in reporting through Jan that there was "plenty of evidence that weapons and other supplies are flowing from the UAR into Orientale Province by air and land." (NYT, Jan 30; see also Jan 8, 25)

On Jan 24 President Kasavubu asked the SC to consider his complaint of flagrant interference by the UAR in the domestic affairs of the Congo. The New York Times noted in this connection the charges made—and denied—of arms supplies from Egypt. (UN Year Book 1960, p 79; NYT, Jan 25)

At the same time the AAPSO set up in Cairo an international Congo Aid Committee, with a UAR chairman. Other members were "the Congo" [Stanleyville], Guinea, the USSR, People's China, Algeria, Ghana, Mali, Japan, Indonesia, Morocco, India and the Sudan. (Tasi in English, Jan 24 [26])

On Feb 7 in the Security Council, Variste Loliki, the Congo representative, repeated the charges against the UAR. He said that para. 5 of the Casablanca Conference (Jan 4-7) resolution on the Congo [reserving for participating states "the right to take appropriate action" if the purposes and principles which justified the presence of the UN Operational Command in the Congo were not realized and respected] was a thinly disguised threat of direct intervention, if not of aggression. He asked the SC to consider whether such direct intervention by the UAR was not already a fact. He alleged that Czechoslovak arms and ammunition had been captured in the Congo and that they had been brought in by the UAR, by land and by air. Referring to the AAPSO session in Cairo, he said the UAR was calling peaceful peoples in Asia and Africa to join it in aggressive activity by sending arms and volunteers. He asked the countries which had decided to withdraw their contingents from the UN force not to leave their arms behind. He also repeated the charges of UAR aircraft landing clandestinely in the Congo, and added that the UAR contingent had behaved as if it were in a conquered country. Umar Lutfi, the UAR delegate, denied Loliki's assertions. (S/PV, 932; Eg. Gaz., Feb 9)

A Cairo Radio commentator said Kasavubu was "afraid of the UAR activities aimed at freeing the African continent from the shackles of imperialism." (R. Cairo, Jan 25-18B, Jan 26)

Secretary of State Dean Rusk was reported to have stated on Feb 15 that the UAR had supplied some arms and ammunition to Stanleyville. (Times, Feb 17; see also further below)

On March 19, the Stanleyville government mission in Cairo announced the establishment of an air transport company, "Transports Aeriens Congolais." (MENA, March 19 [21])

REACTION TO MURDER OF LUMUMBA

Hammariskjold's Resignation Demanded, Western Powers Held Responsible. [On Jan 17 it was announced in Leopoldville that Patrice Lumumba had been transferred to Katanga from Thysville camp together with General Maurice Mpolo and Joseph Okito, both of whom held office during his premiership. The SG protested this move to President Kasavubu and Mr. Tshombe. He also stated that he had received reliable reports on the "brutal mishandling" of the three men during their transfer.]

[The UAR pressed for Lumumba's release and attacked the UN for its lack of action]. On Jan 26 the UAR, Ceylon, Guinea, Ghana, Mali, Morocco and Yugoslavia made a joint request for a meeting of the Security Council to take up "alarming recent developments" in the Congo. They also protested to the Council that Lumumba and some of his officials had been treated brutally. (UN Doc. A/4800; NYT, Jan 28)

On Feb 13 the murder was announced in Katanga of Lumumba, Mpolo and Okito by villagers, 210 miles northwest of Elisabethville. Three days earlier the Katanga authorities had announced that the three men had escaped from prison. In a letter to the SG, the UAR and a number of [neutralist] countries expressed their concern that this news was published as a prelude to the announcement of their death. (UN Doc., A/4800)

[The Katangese President announced that he would oppose any UN inquiry and that the matter was outside the competence of the UN.]

[Pro-Lumumbist and anti-Belgian demonstrations occurred on Feb 14-16 in a number of East-European and Afro-Asian capitals as well as in some Western capitals. The most violent scenes took place in Moscow, Cairo and Belgrade.] In Cairo, a "funeral procession" for Lumumba, organized by students, among them a large number of Africans, developed into a riot in which the Belgian Embassy and the Ambassador's residence were sacked and set on fire. The mobs also attacked and stoned the UN local headquarters and the British and the US embassies, and smashed windows of the USIS premises, the American Library and the UN office in Cairo. (Mid. Mir., Feb 18; see also: The UAR-Belgium, The UK, The USA)

On Feb 13 an official UAR statement, issued by Abd al-Qādir Hātim, said inter alia: "The UAR sincerely feels that responsibility for Lumumba's blood falls on the imperialist authorities. The agents in the Congo, such as Moïse Tshombe, were only tools in their hands. Sharing this responsibility with them is the UN authority in the Congo, which from the beginning betrayed its mission and collaborated with imperialism..." (R. Cairo, Feb 13 [15]). For over a week the UAR information media maintained a massive attack on the UN, SG Hammarskjöld, "Western imperialism" and "Congolese stooges" and charged them with the responsibility for the murder. A theme frequently reiterated was that Lumumba had died only to live again in an anti-imperialist movement. Reactions in other countries and demonstrations in Cairo and Damascus were described at length. Following are some examples: "Those who killed Lumumba are not a group of villagers... the killer is European imperialism represented by Belgium, France, Britain, the USA and indeed the UN which sent its forces there to protect the people from imperialism but protected imperialism from the people... Today we do not weep for Lumumba. We weep for the UN, its Charter and its honour..." (Gumhuriya, Feb 14; R. Cairo, Feb 14 [15]). The African people had lost confidence in Hammarskjöld, a Cairo paper asserted (Aham, Feb 14); instead of a judge he had become a party in the Congo and soiled his hands with blood, another added. (Rus al-Yusuf, Feb 20)

On Feb 14, the USSR demanded the dismissal of SG Hammarskjöld [whom its representative had a day earlier charged with responsibility for Lumumba's murder] (UN Doc., A/4800). [The UAR did not follow the USSR's lead at the UN.] The UAR information media, however, called for Hammarskjöld's departure. Al-Ahrām of Feb 14 headed a front page article: "Let Hammarskjöld Go!"

(Aham, Feb 14; see also BBCM, Feb 15 for a survey of UAR comments). At the same time, however, UAR sources pointed out that it was not the UN itself that was under attack from the UAR, which continued to respect the UN Charter, but the way its executive organization had behaved in the Congo: "Free people have the power to differentiate between the UN and its executive body." "Congolese events have opened their [the people's] eyes to the weakness of the executive machinery of this international organization because of its submission to the influence of certain states and policies..." (Akhbar, Feb 16; R. Cairo, Feb 16 [18])

Abdel Nasser said in Damascus on Feb 21: "The USA's support of Kasavubu after the murder of Lumumba is evidence of its complicity with Kasavubu in the treacherous crime." (Nasser's Speeches, p. 99)

The themes set out above were also contained in the resolutions of a joint rally of the National Union and the Afro-Asian Solidarity Conference in Cairo on Feb 15 (R. Cairo, Feb 15 [17]). Representatives of African offices in Cairo accused imperialism of responsibility for the murder and called for the recognition of the Gizenga government (R. Damascus, Feb 14 [15]). Streets and squares in Cairo, Alexandria and Port Said were renamed after Lumumba. (MENA, Feb 15 [17]; Aham, Feb 24, 28)

Belgium broke off diplomatic relations with the UAR on Feb 25 following the sacking and burning of the Belgian Embassy and the Ambassador's residence. (For details, see: The UAR-Belgium)

A meeting of the Casablanca group at Accra, from Feb 19-24, was mostly occupied with the Congo problem. FM Mahmūd Fawzi represented the UAR. (See p. 54 a)

On Feb 20 Abdel Nasser sent messages to President Kennedy, PM Khrushchev and PM Macmillan concerning the UAR's point of view on the Congo and Lumumba's murder; they warned of "the dire consequences" of Lumumba's death. (Hayat, Feb 21, 22)

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH STANLEYVILLE US CENSURE OF UAR POLICY

Diplomatic Relations Established With Stanleyville Regime. [In Dec 1960 President Kasavubu declared the UAR ambassador persona non grata and expelled the UAR embassy staff from Leopoldville. Pierre Mulele opened a "Middle East Bureau of the Congo" in Cairo, representing the Stanleyville government of Lumumba and Gizenga. (See MER 1960, pp 30, 32.)]

On Feb 13, following Lumumba's murder, Abdel Nasser informed the leaders of the Casablanca Bloc countries, and the Presidents of Yugoslavia, India and Indonesia, of the UAR's full recognition of the Gizenga government as the Congo's "legitimate and national government." He also referred to an agreement, announced a day earlier, to open in Cairo an office of the representative of the Gizenga government and a UAR office in Stanleyville. MENA said this agreement had been already implemented. The first Stanleyville representatives would be Mulele and Bernard Salumu [former secretary to Lumumba and District Commissioner of Stanleyville] (MENA, Feb 12, 14 [14, 16]; Aham, Feb 14). The Cairo mission was described by Al-Ahrām as the principal channel of the Stanleyville government's contacts with the outside world. The mission was distributing all outgoing mail from the Stanleyville government. (Aham, Feb 17)

Izvestia lauded the UAR's recognition of the Gizenga regime as well as its attitude on the Lumumba issue, stating that "in the noble struggle for world peace the Soviet Union and the UAR have a common attitude to many important international issues..." (Tass in English, Feb 22 [SU, 24]; see also R. Moscow in Arabic, Feb 19 [SU, 21])

In March Salumu was appointed Ambassador to the UAR on behalf of the Stanleyville government. He presented his credentials on April 13 (Ahram, March 7; Hayat, April 14). On May 27 Mamdūh Gubbah presented his credentials as UAR ambassador to Gizenga at Stanleyville. Gubbah stated at the ceremony that the UAR's policy was one of a full and constant support for Gizenga's "legitimate national government," and that it would offer aid to the great Congolese people in all fields. (R. Cairo, May 27 [30]; Ahram, May 28)

US Warning to UAR; Detention of US Diplomat in Cairo. An announcement made by President Kennedy, on Feb 15, against unilateral intervention in the Congo, was reportedly interpreted by Dean Rusk, the Secretary of State, as a warning to the UAR as well as to the USSR. Rusk was reported to have told the House Foreign Affairs Committee in a closed meeting on Feb 15 that the UAR was closely coordinating its activities with those of the USSR and had supplied some arms and ammunition to the opposition faction in Stanleyville led by Gizenga. Rusk said he hoped the UAR would recognize the grave danger to its independence and that of other African countries in the Soviet attack on the UN. (Times, Feb 17)

The UAR asked the USA for a clarification of Rusk's statement (Hayat, Feb 18). The UAR press and radio reacted by declaring that no threat would deter the UAR from following a policy based not on dependence on any other country but on its own conscience. It made a counter-charge that the Americans had collaborated with the colonialists in paying Mobutu's troops and in setting up a foreign legion. Hassanein Haykal denied that the UAR was coordinating its line of action with that of the USSR. He charged the US with directing the UN Secretariat so as to serve the US imperialist policy and enable it to achieve its ends under the protection of the UN flag, and with following a policy in the ME of pressure and threats vis-à-vis the UAR and the small liberated states. (BBCM, Feb 18; R. Cairo, Feb 16, 17 [18, 20]; V of A, Feb 17 [20]; Ahram, Feb 17, 24)

On Feb 18 the press attaché at the US embassy in Cairo was detained by security police for over ten hours and accused of distributing leaflets which, an official UAR statement said, "detailed the viewpoint of the imperialists on the Congo, and attacked states supporting Mr Lumumba." A US spokesman said the pamphlets contained excerpts from recent speeches on the Congo and Africa by President Kennedy and Ambassador Stevenson. A copy was blown out of the window of the attaché's car, and he was then immediately arrested. The spokesman said the attaché had distributed only such material as would have been issued by USIS to newspapers as a matter of course. (Mid. Mir., Feb 25)

THE UAR AT THE SECURITY COUNCIL

[The UAR, being at the time a member of the Security Council, took an active part in its deliberations, and sponsored a number of resolutions.]

On Feb 14, following the murder of Lumumba the USSR submitted a draft resolution calling for the dismissal of the SG, the disbanding of all military units under the command of Tshombe and Mobutu, the removal of Belgian troops and the discontinuation of UN operations in the Congo. (S/4706; S/PV, 942)

On Feb 17 the UAR, Ceylon and Liberia submitted a draft resolution urging the UN to take immediately all appropriate measures to prevent civil war in the Congo, including—in the last resort—the use of force. It also urged the immediate evacuation of all Belgian and other foreign military personnel and political advisers not under UN command and the prevention of the departure of such personnel for the Congo, called for an immediate and impartial investigation into the circumstances of the death of Lumumba and his colleagues and punishment for the perpetrators of those crimes, urged the convening of Parliament and the taking of necessary protective measures to this end, and urged that Congolese armed units should be reorganized with a view to their exclusion from the country's political life (S/4741). A score of African and Asian states were reported to be behind the resolution, made public after days of intensive backstage consultations in which Nigeria and India were among non-members of the Council who played key advisory roles. (Jer. Times, Jordan, Feb 19)

A second draft resolution, sponsored by Liberia, Ceylon and the UAR on Feb 20, would have authorized the use of force to prevent further arrests and assassinations of Congolese political leaders (S/4733). The resolution was spurred by the SG's announcement at the SC on Feb 20 that six political leaders of Orientale had been executed by the South Kasai authorities. (S/PV, 940)

On Feb 20 the Soviet draft resolution was rejected by eight votes to one (USSR), with Ceylon and the UAR abstaining. The first three-power resolution was adopted by nine votes to none with France and the USSR abstaining. In the preceding debate the US, the UK, Turkey and other countries made certain reservations, namely that though the SG was not mentioned in the resolution, it was he who was to implement it, and that there must be no use of force until all efforts to seek agreement by peaceful means had failed. The Soviet representative said he had abstained because the resolution did not provide a radical enough solution, but even so it was a first step in the direction recommended by the USSR. The second three-power resolution failed to obtain the seven affirmative votes required for adoption. There were no votes against, but five members—Turkey, the UK, the US, France and China—abstained. (S/PV, 942)

UAR Follow-Up. Al-Akhbar of Feb 24 said that the SC resolution of Feb 21 was the UN's last chance and that the world was watching closely to see how the SG would take it. It added that the UN should have sufficient forces to deal with Tshombe's and Mobutu's resistance to the disarming of their troops (BBCM, Feb 25). Cairo Radio claimed that the approval of the resolution by the West was meant to be "a cover while still pursuing the objective of retaining the Congo as a base of Belgian influence and consequently of Western influence." (R. Cairo, Feb 24 [27])

There were frequent charges that foreign military personnel, Belgian, French and American, continued in the Congo, contrary to the SC resolution. Britain was accused of recruiting troops in Kenya to be sent to the Congo (R. Cairo, March 7, 8 [9]; V of Free Africa in Swahili, Feb 27 [March 1]; Akhbar, March 8). In March, following clashes between Mobutu's forces and the UN, which subsequently abandoned some areas, including the Matadi harbour, Cairo Radio accused the UN of failing to implement the SC resolution because of irresolution and lack of fighting power. (R. Cairo, March 8-IMB, March 8)

The Feb 21 resolution was approved by the GA at its resumed 15th session (March 7-April 22). In addition, the Assembly adopted on April 15 three resolutions submitted by India, Pakistan and other Asian and African countries. The UAR voted for the first resolution which demanded the withdrawal of all Belgian personnel from the Congo, abstained on the second resolution which called on Congolese authorities not to attempt a solution by force and decided to appoint a seven-man conciliation commission to assist in the solution of the Congo problem, and voted for the third resolution proposing the establishment of a four-member investigation commission. (For details see Table: UN Voting Record)

Difference with India Over Congo Policy Denied. [Following the Feb 21 resolution, the SG appealed to African States, including the UAR and other member states which had provided contingents of the UN force, to provide new or additional troops. Consequently India dispatched in March an armoured brigade group of 3,000 men.] An Indian source wrote that Abdel Nasser had raised no objections to this measure. (Times of India, March 7)

The Voice of the Arabs referred to a BBC broadcast which maintained that the dispatch of Indian forces to the Congo, after the UAR had withdrawn hers, was a proof of divergent policies by Abdel Nasser and Nehru. The Cairo commentator maintained that conditions had changed since the UAR withdrawal. "When the UAR forces were fully withdrawn from the Congo there was not a single Indian soldier working under the UN command in the Congo... Only after obtaining assurances from the UN that the [UN] resolutions would be carried out did Nehru agree to send his forces to the Congo..." The station denied any disagreement between Nehru and Abdel Nasser. (V of A, March 22 [24])

THE UAR AND POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS IN THE CONGO

[Background: The UN Conciliation Commission, in its interim report of Feb 16, said it considered it desirable to convene a summit meeting of Congolese political leaders at a neutral place. It also advocated the enlarging of the Ileo government in Leopoldville into a national government, and the convening of Parliament without delay.]

On Feb 28 Ileo, Tshombe and Kalonji (of Kasai), the three anti-Lumumbist leaders, signed a pact aimed at solving the Congo's problems without outside interference, and announced that a Congolese round table conference would take place at Tananarive, Madagascar. The conference (March 8-12) took place without the participation of Gizenga or other Lumumbist leaders, though they had been invited, and decided to turn the Congo into a confederacy under the presidency of Kasavubu. An additional conference, to work out details, opened at Coquilhatville on April 24, again without participation of the Lumumbists. Agreement was reached on the formation of the United States of the Congo, with greater powers vested in the central government than was envisaged at Tananarive.

At Coquilhatville a split occurred between Tshombe and the rest over Kasavubu's acceptance of the SC Feb 21 resolution (announced April 17) which was at the beginning rejected by both Leopoldville and Katanga. Tshombe was arrested and charged with crimes against the state. In mid-June Tshombe was freed and signed an agreement with Ileo whereby he agreed to reunite Katanga with the rest of the Congo; on his return to Elisabethville, however, he repudiated his agreement and reiterated his intention to maintain Katanga's separate existence.

Meanwhile contacts had been going on since the Tananarive conference, between the Leopoldville government and Gizenga. Consequently, on July 25 the Congolese Parliament convened, with all parts of the Congo, except Katanga, represented. A new government was formed by Cyrille Adoula, and received a new unanimous vote of confidence by the Chamber of Deputies. Gizenga was given the post of Second Vice Premier; he, however, did not come to Leopoldville to take up his post and—a visit by Adoula to Stanleyville having proved abortive—he formed a new party in that city, with the aim of ridding the Congo of "pro-Western elements."

Condemning Tananarive and Coquilhatville Conferences. The UAR press and radio denounced the Tananarive conference plan: The US and the "imperialists from Europe" had called this "stooze conference" and approved its decisions because they wished to split the country in order to rule it and exploit its riches. The American imperialists, said a Voice of Free Africa broadcast in Swahili, wished to succeed the British and the Belgians in ruling Africa. A Cairo Radio commentary referred to the UAR's intention to request an emergency meeting of the SC to discuss the latest developments in the Congo and the failure to carry out the Council's resolutions there. Cairo Radio also noted that Moscow Radio had attacked the Tananarive resolutions. (R. Cairo press review, March 13 [14]; R. Cairo, March 15-IMB, March 15; VFA in Swahili, R. Cairo, March 13 [15])

As regards the Coquilhatville conference, Cairo attacked both Kasavubu and Tshombe but nevertheless welcomed the trend towards the "inevitable unity of the Congo." (For sources, see below.)

President Kasavubu Described As Stooze of US. A Cairo Radio broadcast described the conflict between Kasavubu and Tshombe as a reflection of the falling out of thieves, namely the colonial powers [USA and Belgium] over the booty [Katanga]. This also explained the change in Kasavubu's stand towards centralization: It was the result of the US's aspiration to liquidate the Belgian influence in Katanga and to gain control over the province by putting its administration under the central government of Kasavubu. Kasavubu's implementation of the SC resolution of Feb 21 regarding the trial of Lumumba's murderers, Cairo said, was aimed only at getting rid of Tshombe and attaining control over Katanga and its uranium fields which were coveted by his foreign supporters. Kasavubu himself was partner to the murder, the station claimed. In summoning Parliament Kasavubu aimed at enticing its members into coming to Leopoldville so he could arrest whomsoever he wanted, and pressure the rest for a sham approval of his constitution. He planned to disarm Katanga's forces, but not his own. (R. Cairo, May 14, 19 [16, 23])

Meanwhile in a letter dated May 16 to the SG, Gizenga requested that Parliament should be convened at Kamina, which should be reinforced by units from the UAR, Ghana, Guinea, Mali, Sudan and Togo. (UN Doc. A/4800)

Continued Support for Gizenga. In June, on the occasion of the Congo independence day, Abdel Nasser announced his support for Gizenga's intentions to reconquer "all the lost parts of the Congo." (Ahram, July 1)

On July 5 Lumumba's widow arrived in Cairo and was accommodated with her children in a villa which formerly belonged to a Belgian businessman. (Ahram, July 6)

Six UAR doctors arrived in Stanleyville for a tour of duty. (Anwar, Beirut, July 16)

On July 23 Mrs. Gizenga arrived in the UAR for a short stay and conveyed her husband's greetings to the people. (MENA, July 24 [25])

UAR Ambassador Remains in Stanleyville After Establishment of Leopoldville Coalition Government. When the Adoula Government was formed, Al-Ahram said, it was expected that the UAR would re-establish its Stanleyville embassy in Leopoldville and present new credentials to President Kasavubu if Gizenga were to join the government. Al-Ahram wrote that since the beginning of the crisis the main plank of the UAR Congo policy had been non-interference and the welcoming of any measure designed to bring stability and unity to the Congo. Thus the UAR would welcome Gizenga's joining the Adoula government.

On Aug 14 Gizenga's Ambassador Salumu flew to Stanleyville at the request of the UAR to clarify Gizenga's attitude. The UAR was to adopt its policy according to the answer given. At the same time the UAR joined several Afro-Asian countries in asking the UN SG to delay recognition of the Adoula government until the attitude of Gizenga was made clear. (Ahram, Aug 11, 12, 14, 15, 16)

Despite repeated announcements of the intended transfer, however, the UAR Ambassador to Congo was still in Stanleyville at the end of 1961 and planned to transfer the embassy in Jan 1962. The appointment of a new ambassador was also envisaged (Ahram, Sept 22, Nov 2, Dec 23, 24). A Belgian source wrote that PM Adoula had suggested the appointment of a new Ambassador; this was understood to imply that Adoula did not want "an Egyptian mercenary for an Ambassador, but a diplomat committed in principle to non-interference in the internal affairs of the Congo." (Le Soir, Brussels, Dec 27)

[In the meantime the UAR maintained contacts with both Stanleyville and Leopoldville.] In Aug Tshombe accused the Gizenga regime of having received arms and ammunition from the UAR. He said he had notified the UN that the arms arrived in Stanleyville in four plane-loads on Aug 5 (R. Leopoldville, Aug 12 [15]; Jer. Post, Aug 13). In Aug Col. Lessa, the Chief of Staff of General Lundula (Commander of the Congolese National Army of Orientale Province), visited Cairo with a military mission (L'Esor, Aug 12). (In Nov General Lundula pledged allegiance to the President of the Republic.) In Dec Julien Kasongo visited Abdel Nasser in Cairo on behalf of PM Adoula. (Ahram, Dec 10)

Cairo Radio's Swahili programme at the end of Nov said that Gizenga had realized the motive for the West's sudden shift of support from Katanga to the central government. It was aimed first at gaining control of the entire Congo and secondly at countering the danger of Adoula coming to terms with the eastern powers. Realizing this, Gizenga went to Stanleyville to renew the struggle, begun by Lumumba, to unite the Congo and counter the imperialist threat. The majority of Congolese, who supported Gizenga, had also seen through the Western trick. (R. Cairo in Swahili, Nov 30 [Dec 2])

At the beginning of Dec, Yusuf as-Siba'i, the Egyptian SG of the AAPSO, accused the UN forces of organizing "campaigns of torture against the Congolese nationals struggling in Stanleyville, Kivu, and elsewhere." Siba'i also accused NATO members of supplying the Katanga forces with arms (see below) and assisting opposition to Congolese military operations aimed at putting an end to Katanga's secession. He called for the withdrawal of UN and foreign forces from the Congo. (MENA, Dec 2 [5])

UAR Holds Britain, France, Belgium Responsible For Katanga Secession; "Imperialist Powers" Charged With Responsibility For Death of Hammarskjöld. In condemning the Katanga secession, the UAR accused Britain of opposing the UN decisions in the Congo, and of pursuing an imperialist policy in Africa along with France [both opposed the use of force by the UN in Katanga], and Roy Welensky of Rhodesia. Zionism and Israel were similarly accused of supporting Katanga. (R. Cairo, Sept 5 [8]; VFA in Swahili, Sept 19 [22]; R. Cairo, Sept 24 [26]; VFA in Swahili, Dec 7 [11]; R. Cairo in Amharic, Dec 13 [15]). (The US, on the other hand, was denounced as the chief backer of Kasavubu.)

Upon Hammarskjöld's death, President Abdel Nasser, in a message of condolence to the King of Sweden, lauded the SG for exerting "extraordinary efforts to enhance the prestige of the position he occupied." In a message to the President of the UN GA he charged the "imperialist powers" who "plotted against the UN mission in the Congo" with the responsibility for Hammarskjöld's death and added that the "challenge which the UN is facing... is the destruction of the imperialist attempt to separate Katanga." (R. Cairo, Sept 24 [26])

The UAR radio and press took up these themes and called for the continuation of the late SG's activity against the separation of Katanga. Britain, France, Belgium, Portugal and Rhodesia were charged with supporting Katanga. (R. Cairo, Sept 20 [22], 23, 24, 25 [26]; VFA in Swahili, Sept 20 [22])

The UAR denounced the ceasefire agreement between the UN and Tshombe as "tantamount to a retreat on the battlefield and a semi-official recognition of Katanga's secession." (R. Cairo, Oct 15 [17])

On Nov 14 the UAR, Ceylon and Liberia submitted a draft resolution by which the SC would, inter alia, authorize the SG to take vigorous action, including the use of force, for the detention or deportation of all foreign mercenaries and other "hostile elements" as laid down in the resolution of Feb 21, and to take measures to prevent the entry of such elements or of war material, demand that all secessionist activities in Katanga cease forthwith, and declare full and firm support for the central government of the Congo.

While all Council members expressed opposition to secessionist activities in Katanga and to foreign interference in the Congo, several representatives voiced reservations about certain provisions of the draft resolution. France opposed the use of force, the US and Britain suggested that the resolution should not be confined to the problem of Katanga (a reference to the defiance of the central government by the Gizenga forces in Orientale Province). On Nov 20 the three sponsors submitted a revision of their draft resolution, according to which the SC would among other things declare that all secessionist activities were contrary to the Loi Fondamentale and Council resolutions, while specifically demanding that such activities then taking place in Katanga cease forthwith. The resolution, with US amendments and Soviet sub-amendments, was adopted by nine votes with France and the UK abstaining. (UN Year Book, 1961)

Cairo Radio welcomed the resolution. It claimed, however, that the UN secretariat was at the same time trying to solve the Katanga chaos in favour of the British and the French. (R. Cairo in Hausa, Dec 6 [9]).

In Nov an Austrian scientific delegation arrived in Cairo to prepare a survey on fishing, mineral and other resources of the Red Sea. (Akhbar al-Yawm, Nov 25)

BELGIUM

[UAR-Belgian relations deteriorated as a result of the Congo crisis. The UAR nationalized several Belgian companies in Egypt on the grounds that Belgium was responsible for the expulsion of the UAR ambassador from Leopoldville. MER 1960, p. 31]

UAR Rejects Belgian Note. On Feb 15 it was reported in Cairo that a Belgian note, submitted recently, had been returned to the ambassador without comment, because it was couched in terms that were unacceptable to a post-revolutionary government. In the note Belgium accepted the nationalization of Belgian property in the UAR, and asked for negotiations over the evaluation of the property. It also contained a reference to the Montreux Convention of 1936, alluding to the foreign capitulations. After the rejection of his note, the Belgian ambassador decided to leave for Brussels for consultations. (Ahram, Feb 15; Arab Obs., Feb 19)

Belgian Embassy Sacked; Anti-UAR Demonstrations in Brussels. On Feb 15, thousands of demonstrators protesting the murder of Patrice Lumumba sacked the Belgian embassy and the ambassador's residence in Cairo and set fire to them. Three days later the Belgian consulate in Alexandria was attacked (Eg. Gaz., Feb 16, 19). The Belgian government protested, and demanded the punishment of the perpetrators and compensation. (Manar; Ahram, Feb 23)

In Brussels anti-UAR demonstrations took place on Feb 16, 17 and 18. Students hurled stones and bottles and smashed the UAR embassy windows. The ambassador protested. (BBC in Arabic, Feb 16-IMB, Feb 17; Ahram, Feb 18; Eg. Gaz., Feb 20)

On Feb 19 the Belgian government warned its citizens against going to the UAR because of the latter's inability to guarantee the elementary security of persons and property. (Eg. Gaz., Feb 20)

Relations Broken Off; All Belgian Property in UAR Sequestered. On Feb 25 Belgium broke off diplomatic relations with the UAR "after the UAR government had rejected all Belgian protests over the attack on the Belgian embassy in Cairo." The Swiss embassy was asked to look after Belgian interests in the UAR. (Eg. Gaz.; Sunday Times, Feb 26)

On Feb 26 all Belgian property in the UAR was sequestered. The properties of 49 companies and 300 Belgian residents were affected. Belgian residents were expelled and given a week to leave the country. The first group of Belgians left Egypt on Feb 27. (Ahram, Feb 27, 28; Eg. Gaz., Feb 28)

The UAR ambassador and embassy staff in Brussels left Belgium on March 4. Yugoslavia agreed to look after the UAR's interests in Belgium. (Eg. Gaz., March 5, 7)

In Sept-Oct UAR papers reported Belgian endeavours to re-establish diplomatic relations with the UAR (Ahram, Sept 23; Ruz al-Yusuf, Oct 2). [By the end of the year relations had not yet been resumed.]

CANADA

In April a group of graduates of the Canadian Military College visited the UAR on a tour of military installations. They also visited the Arab League HQ. (Ruz al-Yusuf, March 27; R. Cairo, April 20-IMB, April 21)

DENMARK

Danish FM Visits UAR. (Note: For Denmark's relations with the Syrian Region before the break-up of the UAR, see under: Syria.)

On Feb 24, Jens Otto Krag, the Danish Foreign Minister, and his wife arrived in Cairo on a six-day official visit in return of the visit made by Dr. Mahmud Fawzi to Denmark in Dec 1959. He toured both regions of the UAR and the Gaza strip where he inspected the Danish forces participating in the UNEF, and was received by President Abdel Nasser. His talks with the President and with the UAR Foreign Minister, it was reported, concerned the relations between the two countries as well as international problems and particularly Afro-Asian affairs, the Congo problem and the Casablanca Conference. (Ahram, Feb 24, 25; Eg. Gaz., Feb 26-28, March 1-3; Mid. Mir., March 4)

Various Contacts. In July it was reported that the two countries had agreed to exempt their respective nationals from entry and transit fees as of July 15. (Anwar; Eg. Mail, July 15)

In Oct it was reported that Denmark had approved a UAR request to open a tourist and information office in Copenhagen. (Akhbar, Oct 31)

FRANCE

UAR Stand Against France. [Throughout the year UAR spokesmen and information media condemned France for her stand on Algeria and cast doubt upon French intentions in regard to negotiations with the Algerian Provisional Government. (See pp 174 ff) The Bizerta crisis provided another instance for UAR attacks upon France. French "neo-imperialism" in Algeria and the Afro-Malagasi union also came under constant UAR attack, and so did France's close relations with Israel. (For details, see index.)]

Terminating Custodianship of French Property in Egypt. On Feb 8 MENA reported that "it has been decided to take the necessary steps to terminate and raise the custodianship of French nationals' properties in Egypt." (MENA, Feb 8 [10])

Espionage Charges Against Members of French Assets Mission. [Background: The activities of the French Assets Mission, established in Cairo to deal with questions concerning French property seized after the Suez Campaign in 1956, were governed by the 1958 Zurich agreement between France and the UAR which gave the mission "the necessary facilities to execute its mission." Furthermore, the UAR Government, in a note of April 23, 1959, addressed to the Swiss embassy as having charge of French interests, and in a presidential decree published in the Official Gazette of Sept 16, 1959, granted the members of the mission immunity from jurisdiction, and inviolability to the building and archives of the mission. See also MER 1960, p 530; Monde, Dec 8]

On Nov 25 the French Foreign Ministry disclosed that the head of the Mission, and three of its members, had been arrested on Nov 24 by the UAR authorities on espionage charges. The French statement denied these charges, added that the mission enjoyed juridical immunity, and asked through the Swiss Government [as having charge of French interests in the UAR] for their immediate release. (NYHT, Nov 27; Monde, Nov 28)

On Nov 26 Cairo announced the arrest on Nov 24 of André Mattei, the head of the mission, and four of its members, a French lawyer, a Greek journalist, a journalist of Italian origin and four Egyptian citizens. MENA alleged that they had carried out espionage, conspired to assassinate Abdel Nasser, fomented disorder in Egypt preparatory to an Israeli attack, used the facilities of the Swiss embassy to issue pamphlets attacking the regime, and the Swiss diplomatic bag for illegal currency operations. A French intelligence specialist in terrorist attacks had visited the UAR in connection with the above plans. On Nov 27 and 28 Cairo sources reported "confessions" made by the arrested diplomats which allegedly substantiated the above charges. (Ahrum, Eg. Gaz., Nov 27-29)

On Nov 28 and Dec 4 four of the mission's members appeared in filmed interviews on Cairo television. They did not admit to any of the above charges; they said they had sent reports on economic and political matters to Paris. One of them said he had not been compelled by force to sign his "confession." (Times, Nov 29; Ahrum, Nov 29, Dec 5; Mid. Mir., Dec 2, 9; R. Cairo, Nov 27-29 [28-30]; IMB, Nov 28-30)

On Nov 28 the Swiss government protested against the accusation that Switzerland had supported the Frenchmen in espionage and subversive activities and demanded an immediate denial of these accusations (R. Cairo, Nov 28 [30]). A UAR spokesman declared that the charges against Switzerland were not made by the UAR but were included in the "confessions" of the detained Frenchmen. He added that the UAR had hoped that the Swiss government would investigate its officials, who were included in the "confessions." (R. Cairo, Nov 28 [30])

On Dec 5 the bill of indictment in respect of four French officials arrested in Cairo and a fifth abroad was published. All five were charged with: (1) communicating intelligence to a foreign state in order to harm the country; (2) paying money and providing facilities to other persons for this purpose; (3) inciting towards the overthrow, hatred, and contempt of the UAR regime; (4) disseminating subversive propaganda with the aim of harming the public interest; (5) gathering, for the benefit of France, military, political and economic information about the country in return for money payments and other advantages; conducting propaganda against the state in order to harm its military, political, and economic position in implementation of the French government's policy of seeking to overthrow the established regime in the country; (6) planning to assassinate the President of the Republic as one of the means of achieving this objective.

Six other persons, among them Adli Andraos [a well known Egyptian Coptic intellectual] and Adil Thabit, editor of The Egyptian Economic and Political Review, were charged with having supplied the Frenchmen with political and economic information. (R. Cairo, Dec 6 [7])

On Dec 7 the text of a French note circulated among the members of the UN was made public. It denounced the arrests as constituting both a flagrant breach of international usage and a violation of the diplomatic immunity provided for mission members. It said the accusations made against the French representatives were false and incredible and stated that if the UAR brought the diplomats to trial it would bear "responsibility for an act without precedent in the history of the law of nations." The note listed a number of legal arguments in refutation of the UAR assertion that the detained mission members did not enjoy diplomatic immunity. (Monde, Dec 8)

On Dec 11 another French note was circulated among UN members, saying that a French offer to submit the UAR accusation to a process of settlement in conformity with the UN Charter and the normal procedures of international law, i.e. by recourse to reconciliation or arbitration by an international judge, had remained unanswered. (Monde, Dec 12)

A UAR note circulated among the UN members stated that the juridical immunity accorded unilaterally by the UAR to the mission's members whilst performing their duties did not extend to their persons; the members of the mission did not hold diplomatic cards and were not registered on the UAR diplomatic list; and the "French spies" had departed from the terms of their mission by their subversive activities against the UAR's sovereignty and security. (Ahrum, Dec 14)

On Dec 14 Cairo reported that the UK and "some other Western countries" had interceded on behalf of the "French spies" but their approaches had been rejected, as only Switzerland, which represented French interests in the UAR, had a right to interpose in this matter. (Ahrum, Dec 14)

On Jan 15, 1962, the trial opened before the Supreme State Security Court in Cairo. The accused were represented by 24 Egyptian lawyers with two French lawyers taking part as advisers. On Jan 21, 1962, the court, after lengthy legal argument, rejected the stand of the defence that the court was not competent to try the accused diplomats as they enjoyed diplomatic immunity. The court then proceeded to examine the defendants, all of whom pleaded "not guilty." They stated that their "confessions" had been extracted by force. They said they had been flung on the ground, stripped, beaten on the neck, and left for hours in a dungeon, prevented from sleeping, and threatened with death or torture.

The prosecution rejected these allegations as lies and asked the Court to impose a penalty of hard labour for life on all of them. (Ahram, Jan 14-16, 18, 22, 23, 28, 29, 30, 31, Feb 4, 11, 14, March 18, 20, 25, April 5, 1962; Monde, Jan 4, 10, 15, 16, 18, 19, 21, 23, 24, 25, 28, 29, 30, Feb 4, 5, 6, 13, 18, 25, 28, March 4, 6, 13, 14, 15, 20, 24, 26, April 3, 4, 5, 1962)

On April 7 the prosecution asked the court to suspend the trial indefinitely for higher considerations connected with the public interest. The court ordered the release of the defendants (R. Cairo, April 7, 1962 [April 9, 1962]). Al-Ahram said that the release of the French "spies" was in implementation of Abdel Nasser's statement that the Algerian cease-fire agreement had opened the way for an Arab-French rapprochement. (Ahram, April 8, 1962)

UAR Sees France a Major Enemy. In an article in Dec, Muhammad Hassanin Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, classified the enemies of the UAR as follows: (1) Britain and France "which are CETO members" (sic); (2) Iran and Turkey, the ME CETO members; (3) Arab countries with Western ties. These enemies were now planning concerted action to deal the UAR a deadly, or at least a "semi-deadly" blow, seeing as they did in the break-up of the UAR an opportunity to shape the future of the ME to their own taste. France appeared to be in command of the operation. While Britain preferred a secondary and masked role, France did not care to hide her face. France considered Cairo responsible for the eclipse of her interests and prestige in the ME. She also hoped to achieve easier terms in an Algerian settlement if the Algerians lost their main source of support in Cairo. In addition, Israel was pressing France to eliminate the danger from Cairo before an Algerian settlement, which might bring to an end the struggle between France and the Arabs. Thus France had assumed the leading role in the operation against Egypt. She first assumed that Egypt had been weakened to such an extent by the Syrian coup that the regime could be overthrown even by a minor operation; this was what the French Assets Mission had set out to do. This assumption having proved wrong, France was now planning the assassination of Egyptian personalities, a list of whom had been prepared in Paris. In addition France—with Britain—was expected to try and exert economic pressure on the UAR and to conduct psychological warfare against her. (Ahram, Dec 22; R. Cairo, Dec 22 [29])

UAR Takes Over French Schools and Orders French Teachers to Leave. Under the terms of the Zurich agreement of 1958 three French secondary schools in Cairo and Alexandria were reopened and the French government sent some 300 teachers to Egypt to work in these and other schools.

On Dec 26, after the arrest of the French diplomats, the three schools were again sequestered but the teachers were requested to remain at their posts. On Dec 29 the French Government ordered 125 teachers to return home because of worsening conditions in Egypt. But before the orders reached the UAR the Ministry of Education ordered the French teachers to leave the UAR for "insulting the UAR and Arab nationalism." The French teaching staff in the Catholic schools, who were priests, nuns and nurses, were exempted from this order. A first group of about 40 teachers left Alexandria at the end of the year. (Ahram; Daily Telegraph, Dec 30; NYT, Jan 2, 1962)

GERMAN FEDERAL REPUBLIC

Cairo-Bonn Clash Over East German Consulate in Damascus. On May 12 it was announced in Damascus that the UAR had approved the elevation of the East German trade mission in Damascus to consulate. (Mid. Mir., May 13, 20)

The West German ambassador in Cairo, in an official démarche, expressed his government's surprise at this decision, while a German spokesman said in Bonn that President Abdel Nasser had personally reassured the German ambassador in 1959 that there would be no change in the status of the East German representation in the UAR. [East Germany had had a consulate-general in Cairo since 1959.] (Times, May 15)

On May 15 Cairo radio quoted a responsible source to the effect that reports of Bonn's reaction had caused "great surprise" in Cairo. The source denied that the opening of the Damascus consulate constituted a break of a promise given earlier to the West German government, and stated that Bonn's reaction to the measure "could probably be regarded as a threat." The policy of the UAR towards Germany and its people stemmed from a desire for mutual cooperation and "not from involvement in promises which were not made or from a threat of pressure which had no effect" (R. Cairo, May 15 [17]). Al-Ahram saw "the hand of Zionism" in West German press comments, which, the paper declared, did not reflect the official views in Bonn. (Ahram, May 15)

The same day the GFR ambassador was received by Vice-President Ahd al-Latif al-Baghdadi. According to MENA Baghdadi expressed the UAR's dissatisfaction at "statements and reports contradicting the truth" which had been published in Bonn, and said that the UAR was ready to cancel the visit of its [economic] delegation (see below) if the "threatening tone" continued, because it did not bow to threats. Al-Ahram added that the ambassador had not been received by the President [though it did not say that he had asked for an audience]. (R. Cairo, May 16 [18]; Ahram, May 17; Arab Obs., May 21)

On May 16 it was announced in Bonn that the ambassador in Cairo and the consul in Damascus had been recalled for consultation. (Ahram, May 17)

On the same day an official source in Cairo said that the UAR had on various occasions stressed that it did not think of recognizing two German states, and that the opening of a consulate in Damascus was complementary to the exchange of consular representation between East Germany and the UAR. The Bonn version that the UAR had stated that it would not extend its formal relations with East Germany beyond the consulate-general in Cairo was untrue. At the beginning of 1961 the UAR informed the GFR—in reply to a question—that it did not think of recognizing two German states. That was all. (R. Cairo, May 16 [18]; Arab Obs., May 21)

During the following days UAR papers continued to comment on the issue, saying inter alia that Germany had stronger political and economic interests in the Arab countries than vice versa, and rejecting "economic threats." (Ayyam, May 17; Ahram, May 18)

On May 26 it was announced in Bonn that the German ambassador in Cairo and the consul-general in Damascus were due to return to their posts. (Hayat, May 27)

On June 17 the ambassador was received by President Abdel Nasser. He renewed the invitation to Vice-Pres-sident Baghdadi to visit Germany. He explained his government's attitude regarding the East German consulate in Damascus. (Ahram, June 18)

German Financial Aid. On June 25 a UAR economic delegation, headed by Vice-President Abd al-Latif al-Baghdadi, arrived in Bonn on a two-week official visit. (Eg. Gaz., June 26)

The delegation conferred with Dr Erhard, the Minister of Economy, toured the industrial centres and established contacts with German industrialist and businessmen. The delegation paid a protocol call on President Heinrich Lübke, to whom it handed an invitation from Abdel Nasser to visit the UAR. It was also received by Chancellor Adenauer. (Eg. Gaz.; Ahram, June 26, 27; Eg. Mail, July 1)

On July 5 it was announced that a protocol of an economic agreement had been signed providing for German aid to the UAR as follows:

1) DM500m. to cover the foreign exchange cost of the Euphrates dam in the Syrian region. The loan was for 20 years at 3 3/4% interest. Repayment would start in the sixth year. The GFR undertook to set up an international consortium to finance any extra amount needed to construct the dam. If by the end of 1963 the amount invested would be less than DM100m. the balance would be used to finance industrial projects on the same conditions as under (2). (For more information on the Euphrates project, see pp 163 b, 512.)

2) DM150m. to finance basic projects (dams, bridges, roads, etc.) to be agreed upon by both sides. This loan was for 12-16 years at 3% interest.

3) The GFR government agreed to give guarantees of loans (credits) to the UAR [by German private firms] up to DM250m. for 9-10 years, this to include the unused balance of the loans agreed upon in 1958. Moreover the GFR would guarantee loans to the UAR to the amount of DM150m. for seven years. All the loans [credits] would be given at international market interest rates.

The two parties also agreed to increase GFR imports from the UAR, especially cotton; to encourage German tourism to the UAR; to cooperate in establishing hotels and other tourist facilities in the UAR, and to carry out research on the Qatara Depression project. The UAR would invest a similar amount in providing materials, employees and workers. (MENA, Feb 2 [W 9]; Eg. Gaz.; Ahram, Feb 3; EFSPA, No. 38, Feb)

Nationalization Measures Affect Greek Community; Greek FM to Egypt. [The July revolutionary decrees which inter alia nationalized over 400 private enterprises, in whole or in part, seriously affected the Greek community in Egypt, which had extensive commercial interests.]

On Aug 5 Evangelos Averoff, the Greek Foreign Minister, arrived in Cairo on an unofficial mission to discuss the impact of the nationalization measures on Greeks living in the UAR (Hayat, Aug 6). He had a meeting with President Abdel Nasser, who "explained to him in detail the policy of his country at the present time." He also had talks with leaders of the Greek community on the new legislation and facilities requested by Greek nationals who intended to leave the country for good. At Alexandria airport, he told reporters that he was "fairly satisfied," and that he had been assured that no obstacles would be put in the way of Greeks working in Egypt provided that the companies employing them kept within the law. He also stated that friendship with the UAR was a basic element of Greek foreign policy. (Eg. Gaz., Aug 7, 8, 11; Hayat, Aug 11; Mid. Mir., Aug 12)

Exodus of Greek Community. The Times reported in Dec that 500 Greek refugees from Egypt were landing at Piraeus weekly, "penniless and desperate. They are the remnants of a once prosperous community rapidly driven out by President [Abdel] Nasser's nationalization measures." Emigrants were allowed to take with them only ££20 each and a few personal possessions.

An official of the association of Greek refugees from Egypt in Athens said: "More than 36,000 of us came to Greece since 1952. Others emigrated to Canada, Australia, and South Africa. By next March the 155-year-old Greek community of Egypt, which numbered 140,000 people in 1940, will have been totally dispersed and ruined." This official estimated the value of Greek private property in Egypt at about ££120m; most of it had been confiscated. Greek communal property, such as schools, hospitals and legacies, was worth "more than ££255m." This had not yet been touched and the Greek government had been urged to take swift action to protect this wealth.

The tragedy of the refugees had aroused indignation and resentment at what in Greece was regarded as the ingratitude of the Egyptians, the correspondent wrote. He added, "it is perhaps ironical that Greece should have hitherto pursued policies in staunch support of President Nasser precisely in order to safeguard the well-being and interests of Greeks living in Egypt." At present 40,000 Greeks remained in Egypt, the correspondent added. (Times, Dec 29)

Swiss Embassy Accused of Aiding French Spies. On Nov 24 the head of the French assets mission in Cairo, together with three other members, were arrested on charges of espionage. UAR newspapers reported that the "spies" had used the facilities of the Swiss embassy to prepare pamphlets attacking the regime and using the Swiss diplomatic bag for illegal currency operations. (The Swiss embassy had represented French interests in Cairo since relations between Egypt and France were broken off in 1956.) The Swiss government protested against the accusations and demanded an immediate denial. An official UAR spokesman commented that the charges against Switzerland were not made by the UAR but by the detained Frenchmen. He added that the UAR had hoped that the Swiss government would investigate the officials mentioned. (Ahram, Nov 27-29; R. Cairo, Nov 28 [30])

THE UNITED KINGDOM

"Combating British Imperialism." [While direct relations between the UAR and the UK improved with the re-establishment of diplomatic relations and the extension of sizable British private credits to the UAR, Cairo continued to "combat British imperialism." The main UAR targets were the British positions in Southern Arabia and the Persian Gulf as well as in East Africa. Cairo also accused the UK of plotting against the UAR, both before and after the Syrian secession. For details, see index.]

UK Attacked on Arms Sales to Israel. On Jan 31 MENA, commenting on a Reuter dispatch that a ship loaded with 14 Centurion tanks and other military equipment had left Britain en route for Israel, said that "UK arms for Israel" were nothing strange. Britain had created Israel and had provided her all along with armaments. The Arabs were "surprised to hear British spokesmen openly admit this crime," but the Arabs "are vigilant and strongly determined to resist Israel and its supporters and collaborators." (Eg. Gaz., Feb 1)

Release of British "Spy." On Feb 6 the UAR authorities released from prison James Zarh, a 42-year-old Maltese British subject, who had been sentenced in 1957 to 10 years imprisonment on espionage charges. Al-Ahram, writing two days earlier on the forthcoming release, said it was intended to express the UAR's appreciation of the attitude of Prof. Arnold Toynbee, the noted British historian, in defending the Arab cause in a public debate with Yacov Herzog, the Israeli ambassador in Montreal, on Jan 31. (Ahram, Feb 4, 7)

A British Foreign Office spokesman warmly welcomed this action which would "help still further the improvement in relations" following the exchange of ambassadors. (Eg. Gaz., Feb 7)

Ambassadors Exchanged; Cairo: Struggle Against Imperialism Continues. The re-establishment of diplomatic relations was finally agreed upon in Jan. (For details see MER 1960, pp 534-537)

On Feb 1 the British consulate in Alexandria was reopened. (Eg. Gaz., Feb 2)

On March 24 Muhammad al-Kuni presented his credentials as UAR ambassador to the Court of St. James. (Eg. Gaz., March 25)

On March 14 Harold Beeley, the British ambassador, arrived in Cairo, and on March 29 he presented his credentials to President Abdel Nasser. (Ahram, March 15, 30)

[The Cairo press welcomed the ambassador as an improvement in UK-UAR relations but made it clear that London had still a long way to go to win Cairo's confidence.] Al-Gumhuriyah wrote that "if London succeeded in winning Cairo's confidence, it would perform a miracle and win very very much" (Gumhuriyah, March 15). Al-Akhbar wrote that if the UK wished to open a new era in its relations with the UAR, it must understand the new position of the Arab world, and of the UAR. It should understand the UAR policy of positive neutrality and abstain from obstructing the UAR's independence and freedom of political action in regard to Arab and African countries. (Akhbar, March 16)

Muhammad Hassanain Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram [and unofficial spokesman for President Abdel Nasser] wrote that Beeley faced "an unenviable task," since tension between Cairo and London, which had been abating since 1956, had recently been aggravated. "London knows perfectly well that Cairo sees imperialism as its enemy, and that war against imperialism is inexorable," Haykal wrote. "On the other hand Cairo knows perfectly well that imperialism will seize any opportunity to destroy nationalism, as witness Suez, as witness Lumumba... We cannot overlook the bitterness of defeat felt in London after the aggression against Egypt... nor Britain's connivance with Israel." Diplomacy, said Haykal, was basically a continuation of war by peaceful means. "But that does not change the nature of the struggle, which is like that of day against night. Letters of credence and the opening of champagne bottles at embassy receptions will not dispel the lingering smoke of the battlefield." (Mid. Mir., March 25 quoting Ahram of March 18 [apparently March 17])

UAR Students in UK Universities. On April 30, the British Association of Universities announced that 304 UAR students had enrolled in British Universities for the academic year 1960/61. (Eg. Gaz., May 1)

British Private Credit to UAR. On May 4 a private credit of £20m, repayable over five years at 5 per cent interest, was made available to the UAR under an agreement signed in Cairo between Dr Aziz Sidqi, the UAR Minister of Industry, and Sir Charles Denman, Director of the British merchant banking firm of C. Tennant, Sons and Co. A clause in the agreement provided for the extension of the credit up to £50m, if the initial agreement proved satisfactory. The credit would serve for the purchase of machinery and equipment in the framework of the UAR's five-year industrialization plan. (Ahram, May 4, 5; MEED, May 12)

"Abdel Nasser's Suspicion of Britain Still Lively": This was the impression gained by a Times correspondent who interviewed the President in May. The impression left by the Suez campaign was still deep. In answer to a question whether there was bound to be mistrust "for a generation at least" Abdel Nasser said "not necessarily." However, Abdel Nasser continued, the real chance for a new start was in 1954 when even an attempt had been made on his life because he favoured agreement with Britain; this chance had been lost. He expressed his conviction that Britain had supported the Communists in Iraq in order to keep the country divided. He did not regard British support for Communists more absurd than that "Britain should have chosen to attack with Israel in 1956." Ultimately, the President said, relations between the two countries would be determined by Britain's attitude to the Arabs and Israel. "We feel," he said, "that you are on the side of Israel," which received from Britain tanks and submarines. But, he said, "Britain is a big power and should be fair and just." (Times, May 15)

British Refusal to Allow UAR Consulate in Aden and Persian Gulf. On May 16, Hussein Dhu al-Fiqar Sabri, Deputy Foreign Minister, addressing the National Assembly, criticized Britain for rejecting the UAR's request for establishment of consulates in Aden and Kuwait. In Aden, the reasons given by the UK were hostile broadcasts and UAR activities in the area. As for Kuwait the British explained that the Ruler had agreed in principle to a consulate but that Kuwait lacked the necessary administration. The fact was, however, Sabri said, that Britain wished to conceal her imperialistic activities in these areas. (R. Cairo, May 17 [19])

UAR Minister of Industry in UK. On Aug 21 Dr Aziz Sidqi, Minister of Industry, arrived in London at the head of a four-man industrial mission, to discuss the participation of the British government as well as private firms in the implementation of industrial projects in the UAR. (Eg. Gaz., Aug 22)

Civil Aviation Agreement; Tourism. On Aug 4 a British-UAR civil aviation agreement was initialled in Cairo. (Ahram, Aug 5)

Representatives of the British tourist industry visited the UAR in Sept at the invitation of United Arab Airlines, with the aim of encouraging British tourism in the UAR. (Eg. Gaz., Sept 17)

Recognition of New Syrian Regime. On Oct 13 the UK recognized the Syrian Government. [The recognition came some days after that of the USSR, the US and a number of Arab and other countries.] The Times remarked that the accusations made after the Syrian coup that Britain had somehow engineered the coup "could be regarded as a matter of common form, but it was natural that the British government should not thereafter take the lead in recognizing the new regime." (Times, Oct 14)

Understanding on Scientific Cooperation. In Dec it was reported that an agreement on scientific cooperation had been reached between the UAR and the UK. This would include the exchange of scientists, experts and technicians for research work in British institutions, participation of British experts and scientists in UAR scientific conferences and the supply of British scientific publications to the UAR. (Eg. Gaz., Dec 11)

Britain Attacked as Enemy of UAR. In an article in Dec Muhammad Hassanain Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, classified the enemies of the UAR as follows: (1) Britain and France "which are CENTO members"; (2) Iran and Turkey, the ME CENTO members; (3) Arab countries with Western ties. These enemies were now planning concerted action to deal the UAR a deadly, or at least a "semi-deadly" blow, seeing as they did in the breakup of the UAR an opportunity to shape the future of the ME to their own taste. France appeared to be in command of the operation while Britain preferred a secondary and marked role, just as it had in the Congo. In the Congo, because of its interests in Katanga and Northern Rhodesia, Britain worked against the UN, co-operated with Tshombe and "in spite of all appearances" was "responsible for the blood of Lumumba, of Hammarikjold, of the UN troops, and of all the bloodshed" there. In the ME Britain might try to apply "hidden economic pressure" on Egypt, and participate in psychological warfare against her. She also might hide behind "her man in the ME, the child king" in Amman, and manipulate him just as she had done in the case of Tshombe, "her man in the Congo." (Ahram, Dec 22; R. Cairo, Dec 22 [29])

British Property Released. In Dec MENA stated that the property of 80% of British subjects sequestered in Oct 1956 had been released. The release of property of the remaining 20% had been delayed because of failure to submit the documents and information required by the authorities. (Eg. Gaz., Dec 23)

THE UNITED STATES

Synopsis; References: At the beginning of the year, relations between the UAR and the US sharply deteriorated over their divergent policies on the Congo crisis. (pp 636 ff). During this period the UAR also demonstrated apprehensions lest the policy of the new US administration, under President Kennedy, prove detrimental to her interests, especially in regard to the Arab-Israel conflict (pp 194-5).

First signs of a clearing of the political atmosphere appeared in the spring, and from mid-summer on relations between the two countries noticeably improved. In March, President Kennedy opened an exchange of correspondence with President Abdel Nasser. In the same month he appointed as ambassador to Cairo a personality long associated with Egypt. In May Kennedy sent to Abdel Nasser and other Arab heads of state letters dealing mainly with the Arab-Israel conflict, which expressed the wish for understanding and friendship with the Arab countries and a readiness to extend economic assistance. President Abdel Nasser responded with a frank expression of his views (pp 197 ff). In May-June a rather acrimonious public debate took place between the Soviet Union and the UAR—though not on the official level—over the treatment of Communists by the latter; it was remarked in the UAR and elsewhere that this episode served to show the UAR's independence of the USSR (pp 654 ff). In July it was announced that the US had approved the sale to the UAR of a number of experimental rockets (p 225). At the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries (Sept), President Abdel Nasser—who was one of its sponsors—took a moderate stand, which in the eyes of Western observers contrasted favourably with the more extreme attitude of such countries as Ghana, Cuba, Indonesia and Iraq; President Abdel Nasser also expressed his regret at the resumption of nuclear tests by the Soviet Union, announced on the eve of the conference (pp 56 ff).

During the last four months of the year friendly contacts between the two countries grew in a variety of fields, including official visits.

Economic assistance to the UAR continued throughout the year—apparently unaffected by the political crisis—and grew in volume. This assistance was primarily designed, a US official declared, to keep the UAR from being completely dependent on Soviet assistance (see below).

The UAR's anti-American policy in Africa also continued throughout the year though anti-US propaganda markedly declined in volume in its second half. In the autumn months Cairo broadcasts continued to advise African states against ties with the US (e.g. p 676 b), and sharply anti-US pronouncements were made by UAR spokesmen on various occasions, as e.g. at the AAPSO Executive Committee meeting in Gaza in Dec (p 45 b). Nevertheless, by this time the hunt of Cairo's "struggle against Western imperialism" had turned, for the time being, against the UK and France, who were charged with supporting the Katanga secession in the Congo (p 641 h) and with hostile designs in the ME (p 649 b).

The UAR voting record at the UN General Assembly showed a low rate of coincidence with the US against a high one with the Communist countries. At the 15th session 20.6% of the UAR's votes coincided with those of the US as against 70.1% with the Communist countries; at the 16th session, the figures were 14.4% and 67.2% respectively; (p. 7.)

Anti-American Attitudes. Following are some samples of anti-US attitudes taken by the UAR during the first half of the year, in addition to those referred to in the synopsis.

A Cairo weekly listed Hawaii [which had joined the US as the 50th state in March 1960] among the countries due for liberation and independence during 1961. (Musawwar, Dec 30, 1960)

Satisfaction was expressed at Saudi Arabia's decision not to renew the Dhahran agreement. Al-Gumhuriyah referred to this decision as the liquidation of an imperialist base of aggression. (Gumhuriyah, March 19; R. Cairo, March 19 [21])

The UAR strongly condemned the Bay of Pigs invasion attempt in Cuba. Demonstrations against "American imperialism" and "Kennedy's massacre in Cuba" took place in UAR cities (see p 690 h). The UAR cancelled concerts due to be given in Cairo and Alexandria by an American orchestra in protest against "US intervention in Cuba." (Mid. Mir., April 22)

US Approaches, Various Friendly Contacts. After he stepped down from the presidency, Gen. Eisenhower sent Nasser a message in which he said that his acquaintance with him had made him understand the "national personality" (shakhiyyah wataniyah) of the UAR which was the foundation of her power and greatness. (Ahram, Jan 27)

On March 20 it was disclosed in Washington that President Kennedy and President Abdel Nasser had exchanged correspondence a fortnight previously; the contents of the letters were not disclosed. (Mid. Mir., March 25)

On March 23 it was announced that Dr. John S. Badeau, President of the Near East Foundation of New York, had been appointed as American Ambassador at Cairo, in place of F. Reinhardt who was transferred to Rome. Badeau served at the American University in Cairo from 1936-1953, the last eight years as its president. (R. Cairo, March 23-IMB, March 23; NYT, April 12). Dr. Badeau presented his credentials to Abdel Nasser on July 19. (Eg. Gaz., July 20)

On March 27 a group of 37 US officers and cadets arrived at Cairo for a two-day visit at the invitation of the UAR Military Academy. (Ahram, March 28)

On April 1 the Cairo branch of the First National City Bank of New York, "the only American bank operating in Cairo," was by agreement transferred to the National Bank of Egypt. (NYT, April 4)

On April 7, President Kennedy asked Congress to allocate $10m. for the preservation of antiquities located in the inundation area of the Aswan High Dam. (NYT, April 8)

On May 8 the UAR Ambassador at Washington was received by President Kennedy. "Speculation among diplomats" had it that letters between Presidents Abdel Nasser and Kennedy might have been exchanged at the meeting, and the possibility explored of "restoring relations... to a better basis." (Eg. Gaz., May 10)

President Kennedy's letters to Abdel Nasser and other Arab heads of state of May 11 have been referred to in the synopsis, above.

UAR-USSR Tension Seen Contributing To Improving Relations. On June 7 The New York Times Cairo correspondent quoted "officials of the UAR" as denying that "the campaign of criticism by the Soviet press" (see synopsis above) necessarily meant the Arabs were "entering a pro-US phase"; "we [the Arabs] cannot do that because of your [American] Israel policy." All the same, the correspondent added, one month before a directive had been sent to newspapers in Cairo to desist from assailing the US. "This move came prior to Cairo's retorts to the Soviet press campaign." On June 25 the correspondent quoted "diplomatic sources in Beirut" as saying that Kennedy's letters of May 11 together with "Abdel Nasser's exchange of attacks with the Soviet press [had] served to halt the deteriorating trend in US-Arab relations"; in consequence, the State Department was considering an invitation to Abdel Nasser to pay an official visit to Washington (NYT, June 8, 26). However, on June 27, the State Department denied that such a plan was "at present under active consideration." (NYT, June 28)

Further Friendly Political Gestures, Tourism, Trade. In July-Aug. over 1,000 tons of insecticide were flown from the US to Cairo in an emergency airlift at the request of the UAR, in order to save the Egyptian cotton crop. (NYT, Aug 8)

The UAR decided to open in Sept six additional tourist offices in the US. (MENA, Sept 7 [W 14])

President Kennedy's speech at the UN on Sept 25 (NYT, Sept 26) met with guarded approval in Cairo: it was "important" and it pointed to an "improvement in the international atmosphere" which was said to be ultimately due to the Belgrade conference. (R. Cairo, Sept 26 [28]; Gumhuriyah, Sept 26)

[In its attitude towards the break-up of the UAR and the new Syrian regime the US showed regard for Egyptian susceptibilities; see p 513 al.]

In Oct the Director of the UAR Desert Development Institute went to the US to visit the Tennessee Valley Project while the Director of the US Subterranean Waters Department came on a visit to Cairo. (Akhbar, Oct 6; MENA, Oct 25 [27])

Mutual Visits. During Sept-Nov a number of UAR ministers visited the US.

In Sept Dr Muhammad Khalil, UAR Minister of Communications, went to the US on a three-week visit. He conferred with the Secretary of Commerce and the President of the Export-Import Bank, and visited postal and communications establishments. Cairo Radio said he had welcomed the participation of American business circles in the development of the UAR transport and communication systems. (Eg. Gaz., Sept 1, 7; R. Cairo, Sept 27-IMB, Sept 28)

Dr Kamal Ramzi Astino and Jamal al-Sufi, UAR Ministers of Supply, also visited the US in Sept. They had talks on US economic aid, and agreements were reached for aid under PL 480 (see below: Economic Assistance). Dr Astino later stated that he had also asked the US for a loan of 70 scientists—agronomists, geologists, nuclear physicists among others—and had been promised an early reply. (Gumhuriyah, Sept 8; Ahram, Sept 10, Oct 9; Akhbar, Oct 10)

In Nov Dr Tharwat Ukashah, UAR Minister of Culture and National Guidance, attended the opening of the Tutankhamen exhibition at Washington and had talks at the State Department. (Eg. Mail, Nov 4, 22; MENA, Nov 15 [17])

In Oct, the UAR was visited by several US personalities: Phillips Talbot, Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Eg. Gaz., Oct 18); Senator Hubert H. Humphrey, on a tour of the ME and other countries, who discussed among other topics the US contribution to the protection of the Nubian monuments (NYT, Oct 20; Eg. Gaz., Oct 22, 24); and Senator W. Stuart Symington, on an informative visit. (R. Cairo, Oct 24-IMB, Oct 24)

On Oct 21 a delegation of 12 Egyptian television workers and journalists was to visit the US as guests of the American press (Akhbar, Oct 4), and, at the end of the month, 34 American journalists came to Cairo at the invitation of the Information Department. (Ahram, Oct 30)

Favourable Change in US Attitude Seen in UAR [Towards the end of Nov a Cairo press commentary put into relief the change of atmosphere that had taken place during the year.] Ruz al-Yusuf speculated that the recent visits of American personalities were a prelude to the determination of a new stable US ME policy. This new US attitude was the outcome of an understanding, born out of the Belgrade conference, that non-alignment stood in most cases for genuine independence, and that USSR aid did not impair the freedom of action of its recipients (Ruz al-Yusuf, Nov 29). (For an American evaluation at the same time of the importance of US economic aid for the UAR, see below, Economic Assistance.)

Egyptian Interest in Muslim and Arab Affairs in US. The Minister of Waqf appointed Dr Mahmud Yusuf ash-Shawarbi of Cairo University, envoy of the Supreme Council for Islamic Affairs in the US, to the post of Director of the Islamic Cultural Center in New York. (Eg. Gaz., Feb 2, 4)

In Feb James Muhammad Khalil, (an American of Lebanese extraction), President of the Muslim Communities Union in the US and Canada, visited the UAR (R. Cairo, Feb 25 [28]; Akhbar Sa'ah, July 19). A conference of Arab emigrants in the US and Canada took place in Cairo in July (see p 116.) In Oct James Ansara, SG of the Arab Immigrants Clubs Associations in North America, arrived in Cairo "to coordinate action between the UAR and Arab emigrants." (Ahram, Oct 17)

US Economic Assistance. By Nov 1961, US economic assistance to Egypt since the revolution in 1952 had reached the sum total of $586m. according to the US embassy in Cairo. It was noted that most Egyptians were unaware of the extent of this aid. (NYT, Nov 13)

In Aug an Administration representative testifying before the Senate Appropriations Committee defined the principles of US aid to the UAR as follows: The US had not attempted to match the level of Soviet assistance, but had sought to maintain friendly relations with the UAR and to provide assistance at a reasonable level. US aid contributed to development and kept the UAR from being completely dependent on Soviet bloc economic assistance and therefore unduly dependent on Soviet good will.

Programmed economic assistance to the UAR was as follows: In US fiscal year 1960, $90,021,000 of which $61,700,000 under PL 480 and $28,321,000 as economic aid under the mutual security programme. The figures for 1961 were $78,447,000, $76,200,000 and $2,247,000 respectively. (US Senate, Committee of Appropriations, Foreign Assistance 1962, Washington 1961, pp 283, 297, 299)

According to a later official US source, actual figures for US supplies under PL 480 were higher: Sales agreements signed during US fiscal year 1960 amounted to $72.7m., 1961—$72.8m., 1962—$165.8m. (Operations Report, Dec 31, 1962, AID, FY 1963)

Surplus food supplied to the Egyptian R. under PL 480 was to be paid for in local currency; 65% of the payment would be relented to the UAR, repayable over 30 years at 4% interest, while 15% would be given to the Egyptian region as an outright gift, for development projects to be approved by both governments. The agreement providing for the 15% grant was signed in Cairo on Feb. 13. (Eg. Gaz., Feb 14, 19; EFSPA, No. 41, May; VEFSPA No 88/24, May)

Agreements under PL 480 and for other aid were concluded throughout the year [regardless of political developments] (for details see tables, pp 78-9).

A New York Times despatch on the agreement of Nov 10 for the supply to Egypt of $20.7m. worth of US food stuffs under PL 480 said the agreement found the Egyptians "in exceptional immediate need." The primary reason was the failure of the cotton and maize crops, due to various natural causes. Behind this was "Abdel Nasser's social revolution" with its "sharp shift to a state-controlled economy," which entailed a demand for new sources of foreign aid. While one opinion was that the US should in consequence reconsider its policy of economic aid, the paper also quoted "other Western diplomats" who held that Abdel Nasser was "attempting considerable social reforms... no more than the Kennedy administration recently called on some Latin Americans to do..." (NYT, Nov 13)

COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

COMMUNIST VIEWS ON INTERNAL DEVELOPMENTS IN THE UAR

[See also below: "May-June: The Great Propaganda Campaign."]

UAR's Call for Arab Unity—"Disguise of Egyptian Colonialism." An outright attack on the Egyptian-Syrian union, and on the UAR's contribution to Arab unity in general, was made by the Syrian CP leader, Khālid Bakdash, in a discussion on "The Agricultural Question And The National Liberation Movement" published in Problemy Mira i Sotsializma (World Marxist Review) in Jan. "The experience of the nearly three years that have passed since the formation of the UAR," wrote Bakdash, "has taught the peasants and all Syrians that the union imposed on them has no sound basis, that the policy of the Cairo Government is wreaking havoc with the slogan of Arab unity and Arab nationalism; this slogan is being utilized to push Egyptian nationalism, which is the embodiment of the expansionist, jingoist features of the Egyptian big bourgeoisie." Bakdash called "for a radical revision of the fundamental principles underlying the union, for liberation from Egyptian colonialism..."

A Soviet commentator, I. Plyshevsky, writing on the anti-colonial movement in Africa in the same journal in July, stated inter alia: "The African peoples, reaching out toward unity, ... have before them the deplorable example of Egypt and Syria. As is generally known, union in this case amounted to the subordination of Syria to Egypt. The African peoples can hardly accept such association." (World Marxist Review, Jan, July)

The Persecution of Communists by "Nasser's Gendarmes." [The "repression and persecution of democrats" in the UAR figured prominently in the UAR-USSR propaganda campaign of May-June. Except during these two months, however, the denunciation of the UAR's treatment of political opponents was, as in 1960, left largely to international Communist sources.]

In April Problemy Mira i Sotsializma published a report signed M.O. which stated that well-known intellectuals and trade union leaders as well as "hundreds of other patriots are subjected to brutal torture and incarcerated in conditions especially designed to break their will and undermine their health."

A report by Farid Shukri on the death of Farajallah al-Hilu, the SG of the Lebanese CP, was published under the heading "Foul Murder" in the July issue of the same journal, [i.e., several weeks after the Soviet information media had stopped their campaign concerning the Hilu affair—see below.]

In Aug a report said that "Communists and patriots languishing in Syrian prisons are at present subjected to tortures which in their brutality exceed anything experienced by the prisoners in over two years of imprisonment." Political prisoners were being forced by "Nasser's gendarmes" to sign statements in which they "heap dirt on the CP and declare their loyalty to the Nasser regime." They were told that legal procedure would not apply to them and that, if they refused to sign the statements, death was "inevitable." "The rulers of the UAR," the article went on, "organize these savage reprisals against Communists and democrats in Syria in order to suppress the growing national struggle against the existing regime in the UAR."

An open letter by a GDR schoolteacher protesting to Abdel Nasser against the persecutions was published in Sept. (Problemy Mira i Sotsializma, April, July, Aug, Sept)

UAR Regime a "Dictatorship," Not "National Democracy." (See below, under: The Great Propaganda Campaign.)

On Nationalization: "UAR Far From Socialism." In Aug, an article in Pravda by V. Mayevskiy following his recent visit to the UAR surveyed the impact of economic reforms in general and of the nationalization and agrarian decrees of July in particular. Referring to the land reform measures of previous years, Mayevskiy wrote that they "only partly changed the situation in the villages." There were "many landowners who still own large areas of land," while "millions of fallahin" remained landless and poverty-stricken. Moreover, the bourgeoisie had "consolidated its positions" and the state had been "undermined by the illegal activities of financial monopolies, speculations, bribery, corruption." All this, Mayevskiy claimed, "has given rise to deep discontent."

As regards the latest economic decrees Mayevskiy said that they were "welcomed by the working people" of the UAR who "want to believe" that the decrees signify the "strengthening of the national economy and the state sector, and the weakening of the dictates of big private capital, [and] a further attack on the position of the big landowners..." However, it remained to be seen whether these "hopes" would be realized, or whether they would be thwarted "by the reactionary forces which will undoubtedly attempt to put a spoke in the wheel." In the meantime, said Mayevskiy, the UAR's social and economic policy was not only "far removed from Communism"; it was "also far from building socialism." The author did not wish "to lessen the importance of the President's decrees," but they must not be confused with "real socialism." There was "only one real socialism, based on the Marxist-Leninist teaching and proved by the great experience of the Soviet land and of other socialist countries." (Pravda, Aug 24)

THE USSR

POLITICAL RELATIONS

(January-May)

Soviet Mission to the Afro-Asian Council. A delegation of the Soviet Afro-Asian Solidarity Committee attended the extraordinary session of the AAPSO Council which opened in Cairo on Jan 21. A message from PM Khrushchov was read at the opening session of the conference. (Tass in English, Jan 16 [SU 18]; Pravda, Jan 22)

Khrushchov Invited to UAR. In Dec 1960 it was reported from Cairo that Vice President Amer had renewed Abdel Nasser's invitation to PM Khrushchov to visit the UAR, and, in Feb 1961, that the visit had been discussed with V.S. Semenov, the Soviet Deputy FM, during the latter's visit to Cairo (see below). Khrushchov had finally decided to accept the invitation; the exact date of the visit was to be settled within the coming weeks (Ruz al-Yusuf, Dec 26, 1960, Feb 27, 1961). Khrushchov had previously accepted invitations from several other African countries, and it was believed he would visit at least five African countries by June (Jer. Post, Jan 20). [The visit did not materialize during the year.]

Soviet Ministerial Visits. The Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister, V.S. Semenov, visited the UAR for four days at the end of Jan on his way to a UN conference at Addis Ababa, and again in Feb, when he attended the National Day celebrations in Damascus. Semenov told newsmen in Cairo he had come in order "to strengthen the existing friendship" between the UAR and the Soviet Union. He conferred with Abdel Nasser, as well as with the vice-presidents and a number of ministers. (Eg. Gaz., Jan 28; MENA, Feb 21 [23]; Izvestia, Feb 24)

On March 23 a Soviet delegation led by M.A. Lesechko, First Deputy Chairman of Gosplan, arrived in Cairo to attend the opening of the International Agricultural Fair. (Izvestia, March 25; Pravda, March 30)

On April 11 V.G. Bakayev, the USSR Minister of Merchant Marine, arrived in Suez on board a Soviet ship en route to Odessa from Hodeida, Yemen. He visited Port Said where he placed a wreath on the monument of the victims of the "1956 aggression against Egypt" and called on the Governor who recalled the friendship which linked the two "hero-cities" of Port Said and Stalingrad (Hayat, April 12; Tass in English, April 12 and R. Moscow in Arabic, April 13 [SU 15]). N.D. Poutsev, the USSR Minister of Communications, also visited the UAR in April. He conferred with the Southern R. Minister of Communications, and was received by Abdel Nasser. (MENA, April 11, 16 [13, W 20])

Khrushchov: UAR-Soviet "Correspondence of Viewpoints." In a message to Abdel Nasser on the occasion of the UAR National Day, Khrushchov "noted with pleasure the correspondence of viewpoints of the Soviet and UAR Governments on such important questions of our time as the struggle for the consolidation of general peace, for disarmament and for the complete liquidation of the system of colonialism." In his reply Abdel Nasser "noted with satisfaction that relations of cordiality and cooperation and a spirit of mutual cooperation exist between the Soviet Union and the UAR." (Pravda, March 15)

Abdel Nasser: Gagarin Flight "Victory For Peace." On the occasion of the first successful manned space flight, launched by the Soviet Union, Abdel Nasser sent a message to PM Khrushchov, in which he expressed the UAR's "profound admiration... for this remarkable accomplishment of the Soviet people—a victory for mankind everywhere... and therefore a victory for peace." This was confirmed by the fact that the Soviet Union had taken the opportunity to make "a new and warm appeal for agreement on disarmament." (R. Cairo, April 12 [14]; Pravda, April 15)

The universality of the Soviet space achievement and its contribution to peace was also the theme of UAR radio and newspaper comments: "Man's latest victory," said Cairo Radio, "means the winning of peace without war and... the defeat of the imperialists and warmongers, the enemies of the people, of human progress and of freedom... a certain victory for all peoples." (R. Cairo, April 14 [17])

Al-Akhbar urged US-USSR cooperation in space. Referring to the secrecy with which each of the two powers treated its space research, the paper argued that "now that the Soviet Union has been proclaimed the winner, the secrecy is no longer understandable." (Akhbar, April 16; see also Akhbar, Gumhuriyah, April 13; Arab Obs., April 23)

The second Soviet manned space flight, that of Titov in Aug, was similarly acclaimed in the UAR. (R. Cairo, Aug 6, 7 [9])

UAR Parliamentary Mission to USSR. A UAR parliamentary delegation led by Anwar as-Saadat, President of the National Assembly, arrived in Moscow on April 27, for a 14-day visit at the invitation of the Supreme Soviet. Before leaving Cairo Saadat declared that this was the first such visit and a "sign of cooperation and friendship between two countries which have different regimes but which make common efforts for the sake of the maintenance of world peace and the welfare of humanity." (Eg. Gaz., April 28; Pravda, April 28)

Members of the delegation toured Leningrad, Tashkent and Stalingrad and met various Soviet leaders. On May 3 the delegation was received by PM Khrushchov, and had what a Tass release described as a "warm and friendly discussion." The delegation left the USSR on May 12 when Saadat sent a letter to Khrushchov, published in Pravda four days later, in which he thanked him, among others, for "the spirit of friendship, brotherhood and understanding which you displayed during our talks," and assured him that "nothing in the world can now break that friendship founded on mutual understanding and sincerity." (Pravda, April 30, May 4, 9, 11, 12, 13, 16). [Three weeks later, however, it transpired that Khrushchov had at that meeting sharply criticized the UAR regime; see below.]

POLITICAL RELATIONS THE GREAT PROPAGANDA CAMPAIGN AND THE KHRUSHCHOV-SAADAT ENCOUNTER (May-June)

The Campaign Opens—The Case of Riyad al-Turk. Several reports of the imprisonment and "brutal treatment" by the UAR authorities of Communists and "militant democrats" appeared in the world Communist press in the beginning of the year, and some of these were reproduced without comment in Soviet newspapers. (Pravda, Jan 20; Trud, Feb 5)

On May 20 Trud carried a report from the Lebanese Communist paper As-Nida' alleging the death "as the result of savage torture" of Riyad al-Turk, a Syrian Communist leader who had been under arrest in Syria. (Trud, May 20)

Two days later the UAR Deputy Foreign Minister drew the attention of the Soviet ambassador in Cairo to this "false report" which had originated in "biased newspapers." (R. Cairo, May 23-IMB, May 24)

Moscow View on "UAR Dictatorship": No "National Democracy." In an article on "The National Democratic State" published in Kommunist at the end of May, B. Ponomarev, then a departmental head and later Secretary of the Central Committee of the CPSU, listed the UAR among the newly independent nations which had resorted to dictatorship and did not, therefore, qualify as "national democracies." "The national democratic state," wrote Ponomarev, "is a state repudiating dictatorial and despotic methods of government. Historical experience has shown that, after achieving national independence, a clique of the bourgeoisie and landowners seek to establish a reactionary, anti-democratic order in the country... The UAR authorities are more and more frequently resorting to reactionary and terrorist punitive measures against valiant anti-imperialist fighters, and foremost representatives of the working class and the popular masses. Trials follow one after another; hundreds of selfless fighters for national independence and democracy are in exile or in prison." (Kommunist, Nov 8, 1961)

Soviet Warning: "Cut Not The Tree That Provides The Shade." [An article signed "Observer," thus stressing its official inspiration, published in Pravda on May 31, and employing language of a vengefulness and forthrightness unprecedented in Soviet writings about the UAR, gave a new edge to what had hitherto been no more than indirect Soviet admonitions.] Charging that two Egyptian papers, Al-Ahram and Al-Musawwar, had "simultaneously (strange coincidence?) put their columns at the disposal of the vilest anti-Soviet slander," the Pravda author referred to UAR socialism as "a society in which exploiters rule and people make speeches about democracy while progressive people languish in torture chambers for their political beliefs." After recalling the economic and political support which the Soviet Union had extended to the UAR, the writer reminded "freedom-loving Arabs" of their proverb: "Cut not the tree that provides the shade." It only remained to be wondered, concluded the article, "who ordered this anti-Soviet music... who paid for it?" (Pravda, May 31; the articles referred to could not be found in Al-Ahram or Al-Musawwar of the first five months of the year.)

A Further Charge—The Case of Farajallah al-Hilu. On the same day Pravda also reported a statement by the Lebanese CP according to which the SG of the Party, Farajallah al-Hilu, had died in a Syrian prison as the result of torture. (On the Hilu case, see p 391 b.) On June 2 and 3 Pravda published protests concerning the killing of Hilu. (Pravda, May 31, June 2, 3)

Cairo Radio, addressing itself solely to the Lebanese source of the charge and making no reference to the Soviet Union, dismissed the report of Hilu's death as "a false allegation." (R. Cairo, May 31 [June 2])

Cairo Takes Up The Challenge: No Interference In Internal Affairs Will Be Tolerated. Cairo first took public notice of a "Soviet propaganda campaign" on June 4, when Cairo Radio broadcast a MENA commentary according to which "informed Arab circles have expressed their surprise at the organized campaign directed against the UAR by official Soviet propaganda." It was felt, said MENA, that the UAR's silence had been going on "far too long" and had been "misinterpreted" by the Soviet Union. The commentary noted that "the current campaign actually began last January" when the Communist press began publishing reports concerning imprisoned Communists in the UAR. When the UAR authorities notified the Soviet Union that the report of Riyad al-Turk's death was untrue, it was expected "that following this friendly and patient attempt the Soviet propaganda machine would adopt a wise and responsible policy." Instead, the USSR had "departed from any logic in its attack on the UAR" and had revived the "old story" concerning Hilu. Referring to the Pravda article of May 31, the commentary went on: "In fact, since the campaign of slander against the UAR has reached this point, it is no longer a passing incident which can be met with silence. It is... a continuation of attitudes which Arab public opinion has been trying its best to forget—a continuation of the attack on Arab unity... It went beyond that in an attempt to influence relations between the Soviet and UAR peoples." [The UAR reaction concerned not only the Soviet publications recorded above but also attacks on the Egyptian-Syrian union made by non-USSR Communists and especially Khalid Bakdash, the exiled Syrian Communist leader.] "Informed circles," warned MENA in conclusion, "see this course adopted by Soviet propaganda as a mistake with grave consequences, whatever its purpose." (R. Cairo, June 4 [6])

Three comments by Al-Gumhuriyah of June 5-6, broadcast by Cairo Radio, asked why the Soviet attack should have been launched while fruitful friendship existed between the two states and at a time when the UAR was attacking "Anglo-American imperialism in all its forms." The truth in regard to Hilu and Turk had been made available to the USSR. Why then did the attacks continue; perhaps "they think our silence was fear?" If so they were gravely mistaken. Moscow was in fact requesting the UAR to grant "absolute freedom of action to the Communist parties." It was challenging the UAR's sovereignty and dignity. But relations must be based on equality without subservience and submission. The UAR would not allow any interference in her affairs. Moscow, however, did not understand and accept the "constructive spirit of positive neutralism." It interpreted it as some kind of alignment with its camp and imagined that the UAR would pay the price of alignment. And was it not surprising that the attacks should coincide with the opening in Cairo of the preparatory conference of non-aligned states? (Gumhuriyah, June 5, 6; R. Cairo, June 5 [6])

Riyād at-Turk Appears Before Press. On the following day, June 5, the Syrian authorities produced Riyād at-Turk at a press conference in Damascus. He was said to be a leading Syrian Communist, born in Homs in 1930, who had re-entered Syria from the Lebanon with false identity papers in the autumn of 1960 and was currently awaiting trial. Turk denied having been tortured in prison. (R. Cairo, June 6-IMB, June 7; Arab Obs., June 11)

Al-Ahrām called on Pravda to repudiate the false report of Turk's death: "Will the newspaper whose name means 'truth' in Russian live up to its name?" (Ahrām, June 7)

Soviet Protests About Hilu Continue. Reports of protest meetings and messages concerning Hilu's death continued to appear in the Soviet press until June 10. Pilgrimages by the Lebanese public to Hilu's birthplace were reported on June 4 (Trud) and June 7 and 8 (Pravda); protest articles in the Lebanese press, including "bourgeois" newspapers, were reported in Pravda on June 4 and 10; a message of sympathy from the Central Committee of the CPSU to the Lebanese CP expressing "profound condolences in connection with the death of the faithful son of the Lebanese people," and a similar message to Hilu's widow from the Committee of Soviet Women, were published in Pravda on June 9. (Mizan, June 9; NYT, June 6)

UAR Counter-Campaign Intensifies. Cairo Sees Arab Unity, Independent Neutralist Policy. [At the same time Cairo's counter-campaign mounted in intensity with every day that passed.]

Cables of protest from Arab trade unions, professional associations and other public organizations were reported pouring into UAR newspaper offices and were given the widest publicity. One such cable said: "Destiny has shown you to be imperialists and also agents of world Zionism, suckled on Marx the Jew." (Eg. Gaz., June 13; BBCM, June 7-15)

A second MENA commentary, broadcast from Cairo on June 5, differed from the first in claiming that the Soviet campaign had started not in Jan but at the time of the unification of Egypt and Syria, and in declaring that it was not the UAR which had been surprised by the Soviet campaign, but the USSR which had been surprised by the strength of the UAR reaction. (BBCM, June 7)

A third MENA commentary broadcast from Cairo on June 6 noted:

1) In the "recent stage" of the campaign, the "official Soviet propaganda machinery" had launched 157 attacks on the UAR.

2) "Other organs of an official nature," in addition to official Soviet press sources, had participated in the campaign. Even Arabs studying in the USSR had been used to serve Soviet propaganda, though "luckily these students were very few."

3) In addition, the organs of other Communist parties, "which accepted [positions of] subservience" had been used. Foremost among these was the Lebanese CP. The commentary described the Soviet campaign as an "aggressive attack" representing "a climax of psychological warfare," which had two major objectives: (1) "To strike at the unity between Egypt and Syria." (2) "To attack 'our independent policy, so that it would not be a living example for the new nations.'" (BBCM, June 8)

"What are the motives for this black Communist hatred of the UAR?" asked Al-Akhbār of June 6. The Soviet attack had nothing to do with the UAR's repression of "subversive Communist activities," and most certainly not with Riyād at-Turk, who was enjoying a state of health that "would be envied by the thousands of inmates of Siberia and other places." The real motive, said Al-Akhbār, was to subvert the UAR's neutralist policy.

Two days later, on June 8, Al-Akhbār referred to "the spate of invective poured out by the Soviet media against us, our principles, our policy and our system," and declared that there could be no stronger and more eloquent reply to the campaign of lies than the statement by Khrushchov to the New York Times of Oct 11, 1957 in which he had stated his willingness to cooperate with Abdel Nasser despite the fact that "he throws all the Communists in his country in gaol." (Akhbār, June 8, 8)

Cairo Publishes Khrushchov-Saadāt Encounter: Khrushchov's Criticism of UAR Regime, Arab Nationalism. On June 9, at the height of the propaganda campaign, Cairo published what was described as the text of an address delivered by PM Khrushchov on May 3 to the UAR parliamentary delegation led by Anwar as-Saadāt, as well as the reply sent by Saadāt after the delegation's return to the UAR.

The "disputed topics" raised by Khrushchov in his address were the following: 1) "We are Communists and you are not connected with that word. But history will teach you. We are not the ones to teach you. If our people live better than you under the Communist banner, then how can you declare yourselves averse to Communism? The people will tell you to get out." 2) "Nationalism is not the pinnacle of happiness... You may think that I want to transform you from Arab nationalists into Communists. Naturally I do not propose to do this now, but I feel that some of those who are present here will be Communists in the future, because life imposes itself on men. Communism consists of ideas and ideas cannot be buried in prisons." 3) "You say that you seek socialism. But you do not know much about the socialism that leads to Communism. As a scientific phenomenon socialism is the first step to Communism... If you want socialism then you must not say that you are averse to Communism. You are placing yourselves in a critical position and have fallen into the imperialist trap." (R. Cairo, June 9 [10])

A New York Times correspondent had reported a day earlier that Khrushchov was said to have told Saadât: "We can hardly have confidence in your Abdel Nasser when he is losing his grip on the country and not solving his country's problems." (NYT, June 8)

Anwar al-Saadât's reply sought to refute Khrushchov's strictures "with similar frankness." The "logical construction" of Khrushchov's statement concerning living standards, said Saadât, invited the question whether capitalism was not superior to Communism, since it still provided higher living standards for its people. As regards the transformation of Arab nationalists into socialists, Saadât expressed the hope that Khrushchov's words were also not intended to apply to the future and "that the word 'now' which occurred in your statement was only used figuratively." The UAR, too, believed that ideas cannot be fought with prisons—this would be evident "if the measures adopted by our revolution were to be compared with the measures adopted by other revolutions." Lastly, Saadât said, the UAR did not believe that history progresses "along the blind alley of which capitalism is the beginning and Communism is the imperative end." The view of capitalism and communism as the only available alternatives was an error commonly made by imperialism, Saadât noted.

(Soviet sources did not report the Khrushchov-Saadât exchange—beyond the statement at the end of the visit (quoted above)—either before or after it was made public in the UAR.)

In an introduction to the Khrushchov-Saadât exchanges, Muhammad Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahrâm, stated that the UAR parliamentary delegation had immediately decided on the need for a reply to Khrushchov, but had preferred to wait until returning to Cairo for consultations. Three days after his return to Cairo from the Soviet Union, Saadât had completed his reply. Among the reasons which then prompted further delay, Haykal cited the Soviet Union's own silence in the matter, and a request made by the Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister at a meeting with the UAR chargé d'affaires in Moscow that the matter should not be taken up again, lest it turn into an open crisis. In his letter to Khrushchov Saadât also stated that on hearing Khrushchov's speech he "felt that we ought to make some immediate remarks in defence of our view." However, he thought "such action would be outside the limits of our task as a parliamentary delegation," and he did not wish to "convert our meeting with you into an ideological controversy" (Ahrâm, June 9; R. Cairo, June 9 [10]). [The date on which Saadât's reply was finally sent to Moscow was not given in UAR reports.]

Cairo: USSR Also Benefits From Aid To UAR, Campaign Proved UAR's Non-Alignment. On June 9 Cairo Radio broadcast a summary of an article in Al-Gumhuriyah. Its author took issue with Pravda's reference to the Arab proverb about the need to preserve the tree that gives the shade. "Pravda, of course, is hinting at Russian loans to us," said the author, but the UAR treated the Soviet Union as one treated a hank: "The benefit which the hank gets from the client is not less than the benefit which the client obtains from the bank." (R. Cairo, June 9 [12]; Gumhuriyah, June 9)

Al-Ahrâm suggested a proverb of its own. Noting that the allegations concerning Hilu's death had already appeared in the London Daily Worker two years previously, Al-Ahrâm recalled the adage, "If you are a liar then you had better have a good memory," and went on: "But they lie and lie while their memory is weak." (Ahrâm, June 12)

The Arab Observer reported continued mass protests against the "vile campaign of calumny," and declared that the campaign, despite its ill intentions, had done the UAR more good than harm, for it had proved to the world, and especially to the delegates of the non-aligned states meeting in Cairo "how genuine the UAR's policy of neutrality and non-alignment is." (Arab Obs., June 18)

A UAR "responsible authority" was quoted as saying that "we are putting our case, as it were, before the Asians and Africans at the neutralists' conference so they can see that power politics are practised by both sides..." He complained that the Russians "were for us when we were acting against the imperialists," but had grown more and more intolerant of the UAR's independent policy. "More and more they look at neutralism the way John Foster Dulles did," he said. "They say, 'the choice is between liberty and imperialism.'" (NYT, June 7)

Western Appraisals: UAR Attacks Soviet Propaganda Organs, Not Government; UAR Position Strengthened Among Non-Aligned. The Daily Telegraph correspondent reported that diplomats in Cairo regarded the current Soviet-UAR propaganda battle as having more foundation than previous clashes of this type. (Daily Telegraph, June 6)

Western embassies in Cairo were reported to believe that the UAR would drop its campaign as soon as the USSR showed signs of doing so. It had been noted that in contrast to the UAR's anti-Western campaigns, the current UAR attack on the Soviet Union was directed against Soviet propaganda organs and did not extend to the Soviet government. The opinion in diplomatic circles in Cairo was that the USSR had decided to intensify its campaign against the UAR out of annoyance at the UAR's part in arranging the neutralists' conference projected for Sept in Yugoslavia. Whatever the cause, the effect had been to strengthen Abdel Nasser's position among the non-aligned states. (Scotsman, June 17)

Another Western observer also remarked that the UAR preferred to see "the dispute with the Soviet press" kept below the official government level so as not to involve the names of Khrushchov and Abdel Nasser. (NYT, June 8)

The Campaign Subsides; Pravda Call To Preserve Friendship. On June 13, i.e. six days after Al-Ahrâm had challenged Pravda to print the "truth" concerning Riyâd al-Turk, a report of the latter's meeting with the press was published in Trud (Trud, June 13). Cairo Radio described the Trud report as a "retreat" on Moscow's part. (R. Cairo, June 14-JMB, June 14)

On June 17, Pravda published a lengthy article by I. Aleksandrov under the title "In Whose Interest Is This?" The author asserted that the contents of the Pravda article of May 31 which had been "permeated with solicitude for maintaining and improving the relations between our two countries" had been given a "distorted interpretation" in the UAR. It appeared, said Aleksandrov, that "MENA, which is the official agency of the UAR, also did not study the full text of this article." Noting that statements concerning Hilu's death had also been published by non-Communist sources, the author said: "Why then is the publication of similar material in the Soviet press regarded as interference?" The policy of the Soviet Government was one of non-interference in other countries' affairs, but this did not prevent "public opinion and the press in the Soviet Union from expressing views on this or that event." After declaring that the Soviet people would "always raise their voice for the protection of victims of tyranny," Aleksandrov pointed out that the UAR's anti-Soviet press campaigns "are not proper and can never please anybody except the imperialist circles in the West, which have been working for years to drive a wedge in the relations of the Soviet Union and the UAR." In conclusion, the author noted: "Soviet-Arab friendship has endured the test of time... The Soviet Union cherishes this friendship, and therefore the Soviet Union is striving for its development and consolidation in the future. We should like to believe that the UAR is also striving for this." (Pravda, June 17)

On June 16 messages from Khrushchov and Brezhnev to Abdel Nasser on the occasion of the Muslim New Year, in which the Soviet leaders expressed their hope for continued friendship and cooperation with the UAR, as well as Abdel Nasser's reply reciprocating these sentiments, were published in Cairo, and two days later in Moscow. (Ahram, June 16; Pravda, June 18)

Also on June 18, Abdel Nasser received the Soviet Ambassador in Cairo at the latter's request. (MENA, June 18 [20])

There was an echo of the charges concerning Hili's death when Asiya i Afrika Segodnya published in Sept a "requiem" in Hili's memory by the Egyptian poet Nagib Surur. (Mizan, Dec)

POLITICAL RELATIONS

(July-October)

New UAR Ambassador Delays Taking Up Post. Muhammad Awad al-Kuni, UAR Ambassador in Moscow, left the Soviet Union in Feb to take up his appointment as UAR Ambassador in London (Pravda, Feb 18). In March it was reported that the new UAR Ambassador to Moscow, Murad Ghallib, formerly Ambassador to Congo, would take up his post at the end of March (Ahram, March 6). In April it was reported that Ghallib would leave for Moscow in time to attend the May Day celebrations (Ahram, April 4; Ruz al-Yusuf, April 17). Nothing further was heard of the matter until June when it was stated in Cairo that Ghallib's departure for the USSR had been postponed, with no reason given [but probably in connection with the propaganda campaign]. Ghallib finally arrived in Moscow on July 1 and presented his credentials on July 12. (Ruz al-Yusuf, June 12; Pravda, July 2; Izvestia, July 13)

"Important" Letter from Khrushchov. In Aug it was reported from Cairo that the Soviet Ambassador had handed Abdel Nasser an "important political letter" from Khrushchov. The contents of the letter, said to be 14 pages long, were not revealed. (MENA, Aug 13 [15])

UAR Reaction to Soviet Nuclear Tests. On Aug 31, the eve of the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries, the USSR announced its intention to resume nuclear tests. In his speech at the conference Abdel Nasser expressed his "shock" at this step. An authoritative Cairo comment said Abdel Nasser had acted at a hint from Khrushchov. (For details, see pp 63 b-64 a.)

[UAR reaction to the Soviet Union's explosion of the 50-megaton plus bomb on Oct 23 was rather more critical.] A radio commentary said it made "observers wonder why the Soviet Union should intentionally boast about the magnitude of its nuclear tests." US observers regarded the Soviet tests as aiming "at exploiting human fear... and hence at forcing humanity to accept anything imposed by the Soviet Union" as regards a nuclear tests agreement. The USSR may also intend "to exert pressure on the West to make it accept solutions of the Berlin, Laotian, Vietnamese and other issues," and "to deepen the gap between the Western allies" in respect of these questions. The broadcast recalled that "a similar campaign of threats" had taken place some years previously, when the USSR had announced its possession of inter-continental ballistic missiles. (R. Cairo, Nov 1 [3])

The New York Times reported that while there had been no official comment in Cairo, opinion there had become "increasingly critical" of the Soviet nuclear tests. (NYT, Nov 1)

Cairo Reaction to Soviet Recognition of Syrian Secession.

On Oct 9, two days after Soviet recognition of the break-away regime in Syria, the UAR Ambassador in Moscow, Murad Ghallib, was received by Khrushchov at his own request (Pravda, Oct 10). It was reported in Cairo that Khrushchov explained to the Ambassador the reasons for USSR recognition of the new Syrian regime. (Pravda, Oct 10; Musanawer, Oct 27)

The New York Times correspondent reported that "Egyptians were hurt, though not completely surprised, that the Soviet Union had moved ahead of the Western powers in offering diplomatic relations to those Abdel Nasser had branded tools of the 'imperialists' and of 'reactionary machinations'." The Cairo press had reported Soviet recognition "factually and prominently." And though there was "some puzzlement over the implications," the UAR press and radio had prepared the public for the possibility of Soviet recognition. (NYT, Oct 9; see also Ahram, Gumhuriyah, Oct 8)

POLITICAL RELATIONS

CAIRO ATTACKS ON COMMUNISM; PRESS AND RADIO RECRIMINATIONS

(October-December)

[Following the break-up of the UAR (Sept 28), the UAR press, in articles, in post mortem analyses on the Egyptian-Syrian union and in attacks on the Syrian regime, also criticized the Arab Communists, terming them enemies of Arab nationalism and collaborators with imperialism. The USSR was described as motivated by self-interest only in extending aid to the Arabs and she was even said to have reached an understanding with Britain on a common policy in the area. Soviet radio commentators reacted sharply to these articles.]

Haykal: Ousting of Communists From Nationalist Ranks A Major Achievement of the UAR. In one of his articles on the Egyptian-Syrian union, Muhammad Hassanin Haykal, chief editor of Al-Ahram [and official spokesman for President Abdel Nasser], wrote that the ousting of the Communists from the Arab national ranks was one of the "three victories" achieved under the union. Before the establishment of the union, during the phase of the purely anti-imperialist struggles, the Communists had stood in the nationalist ranks but at the point of union they parted ways. Haykal also mentioned that during the period of internal strife in Syria which preceded the union, the USSR—like the other great powers—had not kept aloof from this struggle; the USSR then supported

Egypt against the Baghdad pact and, at the same time, it backed the Syrian CP as a nucleus for the advancement of Communism in the Arab East. (Ahram, Oct 13; R. Cairo, Oct 13 [16])

Some days later, a Moscow Radio commentator took issue with Al-Ahram for having published "evil statements" designed to "mislead readers" in respect of certain parts in the CPSU Draft Programme dealing with nationalism and democracy. The broadcast warned that "such wicked distortions will not help to consolidate the friendship between the Soviet Union and the Arab countries." (R. Moscow in Arabic, Oct 16 [SU 18])

Cairo Paper: Communists—The Enemies of Arab Nationalism. Moscow: Dirty Slander. In an article of Nov 13 on the Syrian situation, the Cairo Al-Masā, said experience had shown that the Communists, when finding themselves frustrated in their bid for power in an Arab country, preferred that it remain in a wretched state and under imperialist influence. They opposed the Arab nationalist movements, they fought the UAR and they cooperated with imperialism. Their aim was to raise doubt in the people's mind as regards the leader in their struggle, Gamāl Abdel Nasser. (Masā, Nov 13)

A Moscow Radio commentator, speaking of this "libelous and malicious" article which tried "to impose on the reader the idea that the Communists are the enemies of the Arab nation and the Arab liberation movement," said that this "dirty slander" was prompted by the magnitude of the interest which the CPSU Programme had aroused among the Arab peoples. (R. Moscow in Arabic, Nov 17 [SU 20])

Cairo Paper: British-Communist Agreement To Frustrate Arab Nationalism. Moscow: Paper Financed by U.S. An article in the Cairo Al-Akhbar of Dec 8, entitled "The Local Communists And Our Nationalist Setback," said inter alia: "Since Macmillan's visit to the USSR [Feb 21-March 3, 1959] and his agreement with her leaders on a common political design, the Arab nation has suffered from the consequences of the pact between the local Communists and the agents of Britain and their coming together with her imperialistic policy in one front against Arab nationalism and comprehensive Arab union." (Akhbar, Dec 8)

Moscow Radio reacted the next day. Such "malicious fabrications," said the commentator, were no rare phenomena in Al-Akhbar; US dollars had killed the sense of national dignity in the paper's "scribblers." (R. Moscow in Arabic, Dec 9 [SU 12])

Haykal: Soviet Support Motivated by Self-Interest, UAR Stands Alone in Battle. Moscow: Haykal Serves Imperialism. On Dec 15, Hassanin Haykal, in an article headed "We Face The Battle Alone," made the point—among others—that USSR as well as local Communist aid in the past battles of the Egyptian revolution and Arab nationalism had been given out of self-interest. The UAR had no right to blame the USSR for this attitude but it must remember how things stood. The Soviet Union, like any other great power, had its own interests and plans of operation; these might coincide with those of the UAR as in the Suez crisis when Egypt battled Western imperialism, or they might clash as in 1959 when the UAR opposed the "Communist attempt to control Iraq." As to the "Communist elements in the area"—"they wanted to use their hostility towards imperialism during the Suez crisis for activities beyond Suez... so that afterwards they would have something impressive and effective to say"; they and the reactionaries who also gave their support during the crisis, were similarly motivated. Haykal recalled the clash between Arab nationalism and the Communist parties of Iraq and Syria in 1958-9 in which the first prevailed; the extent of the victory was symbolized by Khālid Bakdash having become "like a wandering Jew." (Ahram, Dec 15; R. Cairo, Dec 15 [18])

A week later Moscow Radio sharply criticized Haykal's "ugly and unsavoury article," in which he had tried "to deny the great importance of the cooperation between the socialist states and the Arab countries in the struggle of the Arabs for liberation and a better life," and had done "his utmost to make the ideas of the Communists appear contrary to the interests of the Arabs." The experience of past Soviet support for the Arabs, as well as the CPSU Programme, showed that Communist ideas were in "complete accord" with Arab national aspirations; Haykal's "cheap fabrication" did not deceive any one. "In whose interest is he trying to harm the co-operation between the socialist states and the Arab countries? The only answer to this question is: imperialism..." (R. Moscow in Arabic, Dec 16 [SU 20])

Soviet Veto of Kuwait UN Membership Interpreted As "Blow" at Abdel Nasser. On Nov 30 the Soviet Union vetoed the UAR-sponsored membership of Kuwait in the UN (S/PV 984, Nov 30). The New York Herald Tribune, in an editorial entitled "Moscow Slaps Nasser's Face," saw the Soviet veto in the Security Council as "obviously a blow at President Nasser." Khrushchov, said the paper, was antagonized by all three of Abdel Nasser's "postures": that of the Arab nationalist "who seeks Egyptian hegemony over the ME"; that of "high priest of neutralism"; and that of "the theoretician who thinks there is a non-Communist road to socialism" (NYHT, Dec 3). [There was no official UAR comment on the USSR veto. No editorial comment appeared on this topic in major Cairo papers.]

MILITARY RELATIONS

MIG Aircraft for UAR. Israel press and radio sources, quoting a dispatch by the Beirut correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, reported in March that the UAR had received a squadron of some 15 MIG-19 jet fighters from the USSR. (R. Israel in English, March 10 [W 16]; Ha'Oretz, March 12)

In Nov there were reports of UAR efforts to acquire more advanced Soviet jet fighters—MIG 21—capable of matching the performance of the US "Starfighter" and the French "Mirage-3" (Ha'Oretz, Nov 14). The New York Times referred to reports of UAR pilots training in the Soviet Union and added that according to reports the UAR "recently received new MIG jet fighters from the USSR." (NYT, Dec 31)

Acquisition of Naval Units from the USSR; Visit of Soviet Naval Delegation. At the end of Dec the arrival of a number of Soviet- and Czechoslovak-built vessels for the UAR navy was reported in the Cairo and foreign press. According to the Cairo Al-Masā the UAR navy had become "the most powerful striking force in the Eastern Mediterranean," as the result of the latest naval acquisitions from the Eastern bloc. French press reports said the new naval units consisted primarily of submarines but also included some minesweepers (Masā, Dec 26; Monde, Dec 27; Figaro, Dec 27). "One or two destroyers" were also believed to be included. (NYT, Dec 31)

The arrival of these acquisitions coincided with the visit in the UAR of Admiral S.G. Gorskoy, C-in-C of the Soviet navy.

From Dec 12-25 Admiral Gorskoy, at the head of an eight-member naval delegation, toured UAR naval installations, attended naval exercises and was received by Abdel Nasser and FM Amer; the latter was presented with a sword bearing the insignia of the Soviet navy. Tass reported that Vice-Admiral Sulayman Izrat, Commander of the UAR navy, had expressed to Gorskoy "hearty gratitude for the disinterested assistance the Soviet Union was rendering to the UAR with the object of strengthening the defence of the UAR." A Western paper said that a UAR request for the supply of additional Soviet submarines was discussed during the Admiral's visit. (MENA, Dec 12 [15]; Tass in English, Dec 13 [SU 15]; MENA; R. Cairo, Dec 20 [22]; MENA, Dec 25 [W 28]; Scotsman, Dec 18)

Reports of Soviet Naval Base in the UAR Denied. In Dec it was reported by Israel and Western sources that the UAR and the Soviet Union had agreed on the establishment of a Soviet naval base in the UAR to replace the Soviet base at Valona. Admiral Gorskoy's visit to the UAR was said to be connected with the project. (Ha'aretz, Dec 27; Daily Telegraph; Figaro, Dec 27; "Voice of the Free" in Arabic, Dec 28 [30])

The reports were denied from Cairo as "a fantastic manoeuvre," "a fabricated story," and "a transparent Israel campaign based on naive imagination." (MENA, Dec 27 [29]; Mid. Mir., Dec 30)

The Scotsman said the reports of Soviet bases were discounted by authoritative sources. The USSR would undermine its whole campaign against Western foreign bases, these sources pointed out, if it sought bases in the UAR. The Tel-Aviv Ha'aretz noted that the granting of a Soviet base would run counter to the logic of Abdel Nasser's policy which was founded on playing off the two world blocs against one another; however, the paper did not preclude the possibility that the provision of refuelling and maintenance facilities for Soviet ships in UAR ports may have been under discussion. (Scotsman, Dec 18; Ha'aretz, Dec 28)

Reports of New UAR-USSR Arms Deal. At the end of Dec an Israel paper reported that discussions currently held in Moscow between the UAR Ambassador and the Soviet First Deputy Prime Minister, A. Mikoyan, were believed to turn on a new arms deal. The prospect of further Soviet arms supplies to the UAR could be inferred from Abdel Nasser's speech of Dec 23 in which he had said that the UAR was in the process of "doubling" her armed forces. (Ha'aretz, Dec 26)

ECONOMIC AND TECHNICAL AID (EGYPT)

[No new aid agreement was concluded by the two countries during 1961. All projects mentioned below were executed in the framework of previous agreements.]

Scope of Aid, Industrial Enterprises, Shipyard, Power Plant. In April an official USSR source was quoted to the effect that the USSR was assisting in the construction of over 90 industrial and other enterprises in the UAR. Among these were 11 "engineering" enterprises, four factories for oils and lubricants, six chemical and pharmaceutical plants, four factories for agricultural produce and three textile plants. (Gumhuriyah, April 21)

In the same month the UAR Central Minister of Industry stated that the USSR was participating in 53

UAR industrial enterprises to the value of close on ££47m. (Eg. Gaz., May 1)

In Feb it was announced that the USSR would supply machinery, equipment and technical assistance for a pharmaceuticals plant of the Nasr Medical Chemicals Company. The total cost of the factory was estimated at ££3m.; it was to employ some 1,000 workers and supply 90% of local needs. The installation of the Soviet equipment was scheduled to begin in mid-1962. (R. Cairo, Feb 14 [W 23]; R. Cairo, Feb 14-IMB, Feb 15; MEED, Feb 24)

Also in March a contract was signed with the USSR for the construction of a 75,000 kw. power station at Suez. A team of UAR experts was due to leave for the USSR in April in connection with the project. (Gumhuriyah, March 15; Ahram, April 10)

Atomic Centre. In March it was reported from Moscow that a nuclear physics laboratory had been opened in the UAR Atomic Centre [at Inshas] and that the testing of the first accelerator of fundamental particles with a power of 2.5m. electron volts had been started. Soviet specialists had participated in the installation of the laboratory. (R. Moscow, March 23 [W 30])

The testing of the 2,000 kw nuclear reactor at Inshas (see MER 1960, p 85) was begun on July 27. The reactor was manufactured in the USSR in accordance with an agreement of July 12, 1956, and a team of Soviet experts, headed by A.G. Orekhov, assisted in its installation as well as in the training of UAR personnel. The Chairman of the UAR Atomic Energy Commission declared that the reactor was intended for the production of radioactive isotopes and research in nuclear physics and biology. (Tass, July 28 [W Aug 3]; MEED, Aug 4). In Oct it was announced that the reactor had begun full-capacity operations. (Izvestia, Oct 10)

Prospecting and Mining. In Feb it was reported that oil deposits had been discovered on the Red Sea coast, with the aid of Soviet specialists and equipment. (R. Moscow, Feb 23 [SU, 25])

(Akhbar, May 15)

In June four Soviet geological experts were expected in the UAR; one was a specialist in under-water oil drilling; the others would assist UAR engineers in the new Sinai coal mines (Akhbar al-Yaum, June 3). [On the discovery of coal deposits in the Sinai Peninsula, see MER 1960, p. 85.]

In Nov it was reported that a team of Soviet and UAR geologists were preparing to conduct a survey of water resources along the north-western coast. (Ahram, Nov 23)

In Dec a report from Moscow stated that "the world's first seismographic ship" was being constructed in the Ukraine for the UAR; it would be completed in 1962 and used for oil and gas prospecting in the Red Sea. (R. Moscow in Arabic, Dec 15 [SU 20])

Study Tours; Visits; Technical Assistance. In Dec 1960 it was reported that 50 UAR scientists would be sent to the USSR in Jan for advanced training in different fields of science, including nuclear physics and engineering. (Ahram, Dec 25, 1960)

Three Soviet scientists arrived in Cairo in Jan for an expected six-week stay to do research on the black spots that had appeared in Egyptian cotton. (Gumhuriyah, Jan 23)

Two Soviet experts arrived in Cairo in Jan for an expected two months stay for work in crystallography at the National Research Centre. (Ahram, Jan 29)

In March it was announced that four UAR railway experts would leave for a six-week visit to the USSR to inspect railway installations and materials contracted for by the UAR. (Jaridah Rasmiyah, March 21)

THE ASWAN HIGH DAM

Soviet Statement on Progress of Work. On the first anniversary of the inauguration of the Aswan construction project, Izvestia published a statement by the First Deputy Chairman for Foreign Economic Relations, I.V. Arkhimov, in the course of which he remarked that the main attention of the Egyptian and Soviet specialists in 1960 had been devoted to the setting up of the building site and a network of roads, the organization of water and electricity supplies and the construction of various subsidiary undertakings. At the same time work on the diversion canal was carried out and by the end of 1961 3.5m. cubic metres of earth would have been extracted. "The most diverse construction equipment was brought to Aswan from the Soviet Union... Up to a hundred Soviet enterprises were engaged in the deliveries... Soviet and Egyptian specialists are in charge of the work. By the end of the year they numbered 330. About 3,000 Egyptian workers are also taking part in the construction work." (Izvestia, Jan 10; Mizan, Feb)

Supreme Soviet Ratifies Aswan Agreement. On Jan 25 the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet ratified the agreement of Aug 27, 1960 on Soviet economic and technical assistance to the UAR in the construction of the Aswan High Dam (Pravda, Jan 27). The instruments of ratification were exchanged in Cairo on March 2. (R. Cairo, March 2-IMB, March 3)

Electric Power Installations. In Nov contracts were signed in Cairo which provided for the design by Soviet experts of a high-voltage electricity grid, including a transformer station to connect the electric power station at Aswan with Cairo, Tanta and Alexandria. The value of the contracts was given as over ££2.6m. (R. Moscow, in Arabic, Nov 28 [SU, Dec 1]; Ahram, Nov 28; MEED, Dec 8). [A Soviet team of experts came to Cairo in April in this connection.]

UAR Office for High Dam Affairs Opened in Moscow. A special UAR liaison office to supervise the manufacture and shipment of Soviet equipment for the Aswan High Dam was opened in Moscow in the spring (Ahram, April 24, July 1). [Reports of equipment dispatched from the USSR for the High Dam were published sporadically in the Soviet and UAR press throughout the year.]

UAR Criticized for Lack of Publicity. An account of a tour of the Aswan High Dam for foreign journalists, published in Izvestia of Sept 14, criticized the UAR authorities for their alleged failure to accord adequate publicity to the project in general and to Soviet assistance in particular. The writer recorded the reply he received from an official of the UAR Information Ministry when he "tactfully hinted" at the lack of publicity: "[He] admitted as an indisputable truth: 'Just now there is nothing to say about it; after all the building has not yet been finished.'" "It is clear," the writer went on, "that this point of view, most unfortunately, was not confined to [this official]."

Similar criticism was voiced in a Pravda article of the same date. (Mizan, Oct)

In Feb a Polish delegation, led by the Minister of Shipping, visited the UAR for talks on cooperation in maritime affairs in general and the fishing industry in particular. (The visit followed that of a UAR delegation to Poland in Nov 1960—see MER 1960, p 88.) On Feb 23 an agreement was signed under which Polish experts would study the prevention of erosion in the Egyptian coastal zone, and draft plans for the reopening of the Damietta Strait. Poland would also assist in the establishment of vocational centres for fishermen in the UAR and train UAR fishermen in Poland. The UAR would buy fishing boats and fishery equipment in Poland. Supplementary agreements for individual projects would be concluded later on. (R. Warsaw, Feb 5 [EE 8]; Eg. Gaz., Feb 24)

In March it was reported that a team of Polish technicians would shortly begin work on the repair of the canal linking the lakes north of the Delta to the Mediterranean, so as to facilitate the free flow of fish from the sea into the lakes. (Masa, March 31)

In March, it was reported that three petroleum tankers which the UAR had bought in Poland for the UAR would "sail shortly." (Ahram, March 18)

A group of Polish experts began a survey of the site of Gaza port, it was reported in May. (R. Cairo, May 24 [W, June 1])

In Sept it was reported that a factory for the manufacture of dyeing and printing materials would be built at Ismailiya by a Polish engineering company at a cost of £E5m. It was planned as the nucleus of an organic chemicals industry and would have a potential annual output of over 2,000 tons of chemical dyes and of about 2,000 tons of by-products. (MEED, Sept 8)

Cultural Relations. In Jan an exhibition of archaeological finds, excavated by a Polish expedition at Tall Atrib in Lower Egypt, was opened at the Polish National Museum in Warsaw (PAP in English, Jan 7 [EE 10]). In Feb it was reported that a team of Polish archaeologists had uncovered important finds in Kom al-Dik Square in the centre of Alexandria. A Polish archaeological team had also worked in Sudanese Nubia, in an area due to be flooded by the Aswan dam lake. In the next few years Polish teams would work simultaneously in six sectors in Egypt and Syria. A Polish film team was expected to arrive in the UAR in March to film work on the various sites. (PAP in English, Feb 2 [EE 4])

The Education Minister for the Egyptian R., Ahmad Nagib Hashim, received the Rector of Warsaw University on Jan 19. They discussed cultural relations. (R. Cairo, Jan 19 [W 26])

The Vice-Chairman of the Polish State Council, Prof. Oskar Lange, arrived in Cairo at the end of Feb on a week's visit. He was to give a series of lectures on economic planning. (R. Warsaw, Feb 27 [EE 28])

NORTH VIETNAM

On April 9 a North Vietnamese trade mission, headed by Foreign Minister Ung Van Khiem, arrived in Cairo after a tour of African countries to conduct talks on increasing trade, and to amend the existing agreement including credit facilities within the limit of £E100,000. President Abdel Nasser received the mission, and accepted an invitation to visit North Vietnam in the coming year. (R. Cairo, April 11 [W 20]; NCNA, April 15 [EE 19])

Cairo Radio reported that a "businessmen's delegation" would go to North Vietnam to conclude trade deals there and market Arab products, and to study Vietnamese production. (R. Cairo, April 11 [W 20])

MENA reported that the Vietnamese FM had proposed to the deputy FM of the UAR, Dhu al-Fiqar Sabri, that the UAR recognize his government, with representation at embassy or legation level, that the commercial office in Cairo should become a consulate-general, "or" that the UAR should simultaneously recognize both the North and South Vietnam governments. Sabri told him the last proposal would mean increasing cold-war tension but he would discuss the other two proposals. (MENA, April 14 [15])

In May, it was reported that the North Vietnam commercial office in Cairo had been transformed into a consulate-general. (Ahram, May 13)

YUGOSLAVIA

Abdel Nasser-Tito Meetings; Coordination of Non-Alignment Policy. President Abdel Nasser and Tito met three times during the year: in April in Egypt, when they jointly issued invitations for a conference of non-aligned countries; in Sept in Belgrade during this conference, and in Nov in Cairo, when they conferred with PM Nehru of India on questions of non-alignment policy. (For details see p 56 ff.)

Economic Cooperation; Yugoslav Aid. (For economic cooperation with the Syrian R. see under: Syria.)

On Jan 10 an agreement on economic and industrial cooperation was signed at Belgrade between Yugoslavia and the UAR, by their respective Ministers of Industry. Yugoslavia granted the UAR a credit of $20m to buy Yugoslav industrial plants, machines and spare parts (Eg. Gaz., Jan 10, 11; MEED, Jan 13; Arab Obs., Jan 15; see also MER 1960, p 554). On Jan 19 the first contracts under the agreement were signed in Cairo. (MENA, Jan 20 [W 26]; MEED, Jan 27)

In March the first session of the Yugoslav-UAR joint committee for economic cooperation took place in Cairo. The Yugoslav delegation was headed by Mijalko Todorovic, Deputy Chairman of the Federal Executive Council [i.e., one of the four vice-presidents of the Republic]; the UAR team—by Abd al-Latif al-Baghaddadi, Vice-President and Central Minister of Planning. (The establishment of this committee was announced in the joint communiqué of Presidents Abdel Nasser and Tito following their meeting in Brioni in June 1960. See MER 1960, p 553.) On March 21 agreements were signed, covering (1) the future working of the joint committee which was to meet at least once a year; (2) further projects to be financed by the Yugoslav $20m. credit (see above); (3) an annex to the existing industrial cooperation agreement, extending it to the Syrian R.; (4) measures for cooperation in economic planning, the exchange of experts, and agriculture. (R. Cairo, March 11-IMB, March 12; Eg. Gaz., March 12, 13, 14, 15, 23, 24; Tanyug, March 21 [EE 23]; MEED, March 24)

In Aug it was announced that in Oct Baghdadi would attend a meeting of the joint committee in Belgrade (Eg. Gaz., Aug 25). [The visit had not materialized by the end of the year.]

Agreement on Nuclear Research. On April 6 the UAR and Yugoslavia signed an agreement in Cairo on cooperation in the fields of nuclear research and processing nuclear raw materials; the agreement also provided for UAR experts to study in Yugoslavia and for a joint commission to prospect for uranium ore in the UAR. (Tanyug, April 5 [EE 7]; Mid. Mir., April 8)

Ministerial, Parliamentary and Other Visits. During the year a number of Yugoslav ministers visited the UAR: in Jan the Ministers of Education and Foreign Trade (Eg. Gaz., Jan 16, 18; Akhir Sa'ah, Jan 25); in April the Minister of Agriculture; in Dec the Minister of Communications (R. Cairo, April 5, Dec 11-IMB, April 6, Dec 12). For the visit to Cairo in March of Vice-President Todorovic—see above. The UAR Minister of Industry visited Belgrade in Jan (see above), and the UAR Minister of Education in May. (Tanyug, May 10 [EE 13], 22 [EE 24]).

The Director-General of the Yugoslav News Agency (Tanyug), visited Cairo in March. (Eg. Gaz., March 13; Eg. Mail, March 18)

Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs Appointed Ambassador to Cairo. On Oct 12 Dr Jozse Brilej, Yugoslav Deputy Foreign Minister, presented his credentials as his country's new ambassador to the UAR. Dr Brilej was a former ambassador to the UK and permanent representative of his country at the UN. (Eg. Gaz., Aug. 2, 3, Oct 13)

Yugoslavia to Represent UAR Interests in Turkey. Following the severing of diplomatic relations between the UAR and Turkey in Oct, it was announced that Yugoslavia would look after the UAR's interests in Turkey. (Ahram, Oct 15)

NON-ARAB ME COUNTRIES

CYPRUS

Diplomatic Representation. The first UAR ambassador to Cyprus presented his credentials to President Makarios on Jan 14. President Makarios expressed his wish for cooperation with the UAR and added: "The fact that many Cypriots are living in your country is proof of the friendship, goodwill and faith that exists between our two countries." (MER 1960, p 552; Ahram, Jan 11, 15; Cyprus Mail, Jan 15)

Cyprus' first ambassador to the UAR presented his credentials to Abdel Nasser on March 28. (R. Cairo, March 28-IMB, March 29)

Cyprus Supports Algeria on UAR Appeal. On Jan 9 the Cyprus House of Representatives, in response to an appeal by the UAR National Assembly, passed a resolution supporting the Algerian insurgents and condemning the "inhuman handling" of the Algerians by the "occupying power." The House divided on community lines, the Greek members voting in favour and the Turkish members against. A Turkish draft resolution would have had the House expressing its sympathy with the demands of the Algerian people for freedom and hope for a "just solution." (Cyprus Mail, Jan 10)

UAR Denies Pressure on Cyprus Regarding Relations with Israel. On Feb 25 the UAR embassy in Nicosia described as "completely unfounded and false" reports that the ambassador had made representations to Cyprus over the establishment of diplomatic relations between Cyprus and Israel. (See MER 1960, p 181-2.) Nevertheless, the statement continued, "the UAR truly believes that any widening of the scope of relations between Israel and countries friendly to the UAR, such as Cyprus, may harm relations between them and the UAR." (Eg. Gaz., Feb 26)

Cyprus President Visits UAR. Archbishop Makarios, President of Cyprus, paid an official visit to the UAR from June 3-10. He was accompanied by his Foreign Minister, among others. He had several talks with President Abdel Nasser and visited industrial, military, agricultural and social establishments. He also met with the Rector of Al-Azhar and the Coptic Pope. (Ahram, June 4-10)

A Times correspondent remarked that while there was no prearranged agenda, both Presidents Makarios and Abdel Nasser were plainly in the position of wanting something from the other. The Egyptians would much like to see Cyprus becoming less favourably disposed towards trade with Israel and Israel tourism in the island. The opinion had been expressed in Egypt that this loophole in the Arab boycott of Israel was a poor return for the support expressed by Cairo during EOKA days; and at least some of the Cypriot community in Egypt, anxious for their future under the Egyptianization regime, subscribed to this viewpoint. President Makarios would like to obtain assurances that the Cypriots in Egypt (now considerably fewer than the 15,000 a few years ago) would be permitted to continue gaining a livelihood in Egypt instead of adding to unemployment in Cyprus. (Times, June 5)

In an address to the UAR National Assembly, President Makarios spoke of the common struggle for liberty waged by the Egyptian and Cypriot peoples "who, with heroism and sacrifice, have dealt a devastating blow to foreign interference, exploitation and colonialism." (Ahram, June 6)

President Makarios told journalists that he had been deeply impressed by Abdel Nasser's personality and statesmanship, and by the UAR's industrial and agricultural reform policy. Answering a question on British bases in Cyprus, he emphasized his country's policy of non-alignment and that the people of Cyprus would never allow these bases to be used for launching attacks, particularly against the UAR. (Ahram, Eg. Gaz., June 11; R. Cairo, June 10 [13])

An official communiqué issued at the end of the visit stated that the talks between the two Presidents had resulted in complete identity of views and in the consolidation of brotherly ties uniting the Arab and Cypriot peoples. The two Presidents reaffirmed their adherence to the principles of the UN Charter, and declared themselves opposed to attempts to solve international problems through force or interference in internal affairs of states and in favour of disarmament and banning of nuclear tests. They declared the singleness of their countries' support of liberation movements "within and outside the UN"; they stressed that the Palestine question should be solved in accordance with the UN Charter "on the basis of the restoration of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people." They advocated an Algerian settlement through negotiations on the basis of self-determination, and denounced racial discrimination. They recorded their satisfaction at the friendship between the two countries based on common objectives and attitude to world problems as well as on cooperation in all fields. The two sides agreed to increase trade between them and to conclude an agreement on facilitating mutual tourism, as well as a technical cooperation agreement in the fields of agriculture, irrigation and dams. An understanding was reached regarding matters relating to Cypriots resident in the UAR. Abdel Nasser accepted an invitation to visit Cyprus. (Eg. Gaz., Ahrām, June 11; Nasser's Speeches, pp 120 ff)

A Cairo source wrote that following the agreements, UAR citizens would be allowed to visit Cyprus despite travel restrictions imposed in order to save hard currency. The UAR would import apples and other fruit from Cyprus, while Cyprus was expected to import more UAR products. (Arab Obs., June 11)

Cyprus and the Break-up of the UAR. In a telegramme to Abdel Nasser on the break-up of the UAR President Makarios said: "I am following with... regret the fateful events in Syria. I wish to assure you that my thoughts are with you in these critical moments." (Cyprus Mail, Oct 3)

Cypriot Turkish papers supported Syria; one of them said that while the Greek Cypriots had turned pro-Nasser after Makarios' visit to the UAR, the Turkish Cypriots had now recognized Syria (quoted in Cyprus Mail, Oct 10, 11). [Turkey was the second country, after Jordan, to recognize independent Syria, whereupon the UAR cut off diplomatic relations with her].

Cyprus recognized the Syrian Republic on Nov 3. (Narr, Nov 5)

Cooperation, Various Contacts. In June it was announced in Nicosia that visa formalities were to be abolished for citizens of Cyprus and the UAR wishing to visit the other country. Air services between the two countries, suspended since the Suez campaign, would be resumed at the end of June by United Arab Airlines and Cyprus Airways. (Eg. Gaz., June 17)

The UAR was one of seven countries officially participating in the 8th International Cyprus Fair in Nicosia in July. 150 UAR firms exhibited their products. (Eg. Gaz., July 3)

In Aug 50 Cypriot students toured Egypt in the framework of an exchange of student delegations. (R. Cairo, Aug 19-IMB, Aug 20)

In Oct it was reported that UAR dam building engineers were due to leave for Nicosia, to survey plans for dams in Cyprus. (Ahrām, Oct 7)

In Nov a UAR trade delegation was to discuss in Cyprus the export of UAR textiles and cement in exchange for dried fruit and other products. It would also propose to establish in Cyprus a UAR trade office. (MENA, Oct 31 [W, Nov 9]; MEED, Nov 10)

Cyprus Reported To Suggest Closer Cooperation. In Nov it was reported in Cairo that the Cypriot FM had recently written the UAR FM that Cyprus was looking forward to closer cooperation between the two countries by increasing official visits and tourism. The Cypriot ambassador had also suggested the publication in Cairo of a Cyprus-UAR monthly magazine in English, to deal with matters of interest to both countries. (Ahrām, Nov 18)

ETHIOPIA

[The UAR continued to voice support for Somali claims over parts of Ethiopia and it supported the secessionist movement in Eritrea which opposed the federation with Ethiopia. On the official level, however, the two countries maintained normal relations.]

Support For Somali Claims Over Ogaden Province. Cairo

Radio in Somali called for the "liberation" of Djibouti and Ogaden province in Ethiopia. "Ogaden is still under imperialist domination and Abyssinian imperialism is still with us." (R. Cairo, Jan 11 [13])

On Jan 24 it was reported from Cairo that American officers and pilots had assisted the Ethiopians in recent clashes between Ethiopian forces and Somali tribesmen. (R. Baghdad, Jan 24-IMB, Jan 25)

The UAR students federation passed a resolution in support of the "unity of the Somali lands." (Hayat, Feb 12)

A member of the Greater Somali League was reported by Cairo Radio to have called on the Ethiopian government to agree to a plebiscite in the "occupied Somali territories." (R. Cairo, Feb 24 [27])

A report from Mogadishu in the UAR press said that on April 4 the Ethiopian army had started a campaign of mass killings of Somalis in the border area. A Somali village which had requested to be "joined with the motherland of Somalia" had been completely destroyed with all its inhabitants (Ahrām, April 14). A Cairo paper compared the "Ethiopian campaign" to the happenings in Palestine where, the article said, the owners of the land had been expelled and replaced by the conquerors. A third of Ethiopia's territory was said to belong to Somalia, including Harar province. (Akhbar al-Yaum, May 13)

On May 16 the UAR ambassador in Addis-Ababa was requested to explain the demonstrations of Al-Azhar students in Cairo in front of the Ethiopian embassy; they had tried to attack the building and to set fire to the ambassador's car. (BBC in Arabic, May 17-IMB, May 18; Falastin, May 18)

A Cairo weekly had this to say on Ethiopia, among other things: "... Ethiopia also possesses the Haud area which was handed over to it by Britain in 1898 without the consent of its 200,000 Somali inhabitants. This has created tension along the border between the two states... The Somali Republic is asking for the return of the Haud area... Since the end of World War II, American influence has been creeping into Ethiopia to replace the British influence. American advisers control the country's economic—and political—life and there is a big American military base, called 'Radio Mina' there." (Arab Obs., Aug 20)

Commercial Relations. In Nov the UAR press reported that a trade delegation would go to Ethiopia (Akhbar, Nov 3; Ahrām, Nov 21) [but it had not left by the end of the year].

IRAN

Diplomatic Relations. [In July 1960, the UAR broke off diplomatic relations with Iran on the grounds of Iran's friendly relations with Israel and the Shah's allegedly "despotic, reactionary, corrupt and imperialist-dominated" government. (See MER 1960, pp 216-220).]

In March the UAR appointed an archivist as her only diplomatic representative in Tehran to take care of the UAR embassy building there. (Ahrām, March 22)

Cairo Propaganda Against Iranian Government. In Jan Cairo radio repeatedly commented on the elections in Iran describing them as "rigged," "undemocratic" and "corrupt." The Shah was accused of attempting to ensure that the election results would favour reaction and imperialism. (R. Cairo, Jan 15 [17]; see also BDCM, Jan 17, 21, 24)

In Feb the UAR General Federation of Students passed a resolution in support of the "stand of the Iranian students' federation against the Iranian government's policy, which conflicts with the causes of freedom and democracy." (R. Cairo, Feb 11 [14])

In comments following the resignation of Dr. Emami from the premiership and the appointment of Dr. Amini to this post, Cairo papers declared that "since heroic Mossadeq, not one statesman has come to power, who was able to confront the Shah" (Gumhuriyah, May 12); and that the Iranian people wanted to make up for "three hundred lost years" but the Shah was standing in their way. (Akhbar, May 13)

UAR Claims Iran Active Against Her. In March a Lebanese [pro-UAR] paper alleged that there was proof that an anti-UAR radio station, "The Voice of Free Egypt" broadcasting in Arabic to the Persian Gulf, was located in Isfahan. (Hawadith, March 3)

In April it was reported in Cairo that the UAR had approached the German embassy in Cairo, complaining of anti-UAR propaganda activities of the Iranian embassy in Bonn. The embassy produced documents showing that the German Foreign Ministry had already drawn the attention of the Iranian embassy to "those unfriendly activities against a friendly state" and had requested their cessation. (Ahram, April 29)

Iranian PM: UAR Must Initiate Rapprochement. On May 25 Dr. Amini told a Lebanese correspondent that Iran would welcome mediation between her and the UAR, but would not take the initiative, since Cairo had started the dispute. He suggested that a basis for Arab-Iranian political cooperation might be found in an Iranian-Arab common market. He added that his country had recognized Israel de facto 10 years ago, and that the close commercial relations between the two countries were the result of the Arabs' lack of interest in the Iranian market. (Jaridah, May 27)

Iran Recognizes Syrian Independence; Boycott of Iranian Ship in Suez Canal. Iran announced its recognition of the newly established Syrian Republic on Oct 2 [the day after Abdel Nasser cut off his relations with Jordan and Turkey, the two countries first to recognize independent Syria]. (R. Tehran, Oct 2 [3])

A Cairo paper said that had there been diplomatic relations between the UAR and Iran they would have been severed. It ascribed the reason behind the Iranian move to the "Shah getting his own back for the peremptory manner in which the UAR broke off relations with Iran." (Eg. Gaz., Oct 3)

On Oct 5 an Iranian cargo ship which arrived from the Mediterranean was boycotted at Port Said by oil workers (R. Cairo, Oct 6 [9]). The same day the Iranian Foreign Ministry pointed out that the principle of free and unconditional passage through the Canal was secured under international commitments, "thus, the latest measure adopted by the Egyptian government, if repeated, will be an open violation of international law which that government has accepted." (R. Tehran, Oct 5 [7])

Haykal Alleges Iran Conspires To Overthrow UAR Regime. On Dec 22, Hassanin Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram [and unofficial spokesman for Abdel Nasser], alleged that three forces in the ME were coordinating their steps to deal the UAR a deadly "or at least a semi-deadly" blow: Britain and France, Iran and Turkey the ME CENTO members, and the Arab countries bound to the West. The hostile attitude of Iran and Turkey towards the UAR, Haykal wrote, stemmed from the fact that having sold themselves to the West they wanted the Arab area to come under Western influence as well, because the Arab area constituted their natural hinterland and was vital for their defence. Also, they were afraid of the revolutionary example of the UAR and thus they cooperated among themselves, with Israel, and with the "tattered thrones" in the Arab world against any national liberation movement. (Ahram, Dec 22; R. Cairo, Dec 22 [29])

Tehran Radio commented that Haykal's allegations were without foundation, although it was true that Egypt was now isolated from the Arab countries which once it had claimed to lead. Abdel Nasser's propaganda machine was talking about imaginary enemies because of the domestic failures of the UAR government and the defeat of its policies in the Arab world, particularly in Syria. (R. Tehran, Dec 24 [29])

SOMALIA

[UAR relations remained closer with Somalia than with any other ME or African country. The UAR extended aid in the fields of defence, economy, education and others, and continued to support Somalia's irredentist claims. (See also MER 1960, p 549: Background and Synopsis.)]

Statements by Somali Leaders on Relations with UAR as Reported by UAR Sources. PM Abd ar-Rashid Ali Sharmarke: "UAR aid is the best we get; we welcome it as aid from one African Muslim state to another. I also wish to lay stress on the religious ties which have bound the UAR and Somali peoples for thousands of years." (Akhbar, June 20)

The Minister of Transport: "We trust in God and the UAR."

The Minister of Defence: "The UAR has given us support on a vital issue (the irredentist claims of Somalia) and we send our best wishes to that country and its heroic leader, Gamal Abdel Nasser." (Akhbar al-Yawm, May 6)

UAR Support for Somali Irredentist Claims. [Somali irredentist claims included French Somaliland, the Northern Frontier District of Kenya and the Harar-Ogaden province of Ethiopia.]

In Feb the Arab Student Conference in Cairo adopted a resolution supporting the Somali people's desire for national unity. (Ahram, Feb 12)

In Sept a UAR mission was to go to Mogadishu, at Somalia's request, for technical studies on the border disputes between Somalia and Ethiopia and Kenya. (Ahram, Sept 25)

Ethiopia: On UAR support for Somali claims on Ethiopian territory, see Relations Between the UAR and Ethiopia.

French Somaliland: Following the decision of the French Somaliland Assembly to retain their present status in relation to France, Abdi Arr Hasan called on the people of French Somaliland to arouse themselves. He mainly attacked the elected representatives of the Assembly, demanding that they reconsider their decision, and the Somali civil servants whom he accused of always praising France. (R. Cairo, Feb 15 [18])

A UAR journal wrote that the French authorities had banned all ideas of "union with the Somali Motherland," and mentioned the "distressing fact" that "some of the local population support French policy. These people should be taught a lesson." (Musawwar, Aug 4)

The Northern Frontier District of Kenya: [UAR propaganda was directed against the British authorities in Kenya, Cairo broadcasts in Somali and Arabic—but not in Swahili—supported the Somali claims. Such broadcasts ceased, apparently by the middle of the year when this policy began to clash with the UAR's support for Kenya. (see: Kenya.)] In March a Somali citizen broadcasting in Somali over Cairo Radio said that on a tour of Kenya he had met many of the responsible Somalis there who were struggling for freedom and union with the other Somalia. He added that the responsible leaders of "this brotherly East African country" were not against the aspirations of the Somalis, but the British were setting Africans against one another. (R. Cairo, March 8 [10]) In May and June the "Voice of the Arabs" in Arabic for Somalis reported pan-Somali activities in the Northern Frontier District of Kenya against British imperialism. (V of A, April 28 [May 1], June 23 [26])

UAR Broadcasts to Somalia. Cairo Radio had started its Somali service in March 1957. It was first run, among others, by Muhammad Nur Adeh, now employed by Mogadishu Radio. In Feb the service began a series of talks on "neo-colonialism," attacking the French Community and the British Commonwealth as devices for the economic infiltration of Africa. (*R. The Somali Minister of Defence visited Cairo in Nov. (See below: Military Relations.)

Ali Muhammad Hirave, the Somali Minister of Information, visited the UAR in Nov-Dec and signed an agreement with the UAR on information media—for details see below. (R. Mogadishu, Nov 13 [15]; R. Cairo, Nov 24 [27], Dec 8 [11])

Somali PM Visits UAR: The Somali PM, Abd ar-Rashid Ali Sharmark, arrived in Cairo on May 23 on his way to Prague and Moscow accompanied by the Ministers of Agriculture and Education and the directors of these and the Foreign Affairs ministries (MENA, May 23 [25]; Hayot, May 24). He returned to Cairo on June 4, on his way home, for a two-day stay and had talks with Abdel Nasser. The discussions covered the progress of Somali-UAR relations since Sharmark's visit to Cairo in Nov 1960, and the implementation of the agreements on trade and technical cooperation. It was agreed to increase trade and to extend the UAR's aid to Somalia's development projects. Political cooperation on the basis of a non-alignment policy was also discussed and it was agreed to support the forthcoming Belgrade conference of non-aligned countries. (*Ahram, June 5; R. Shaykh Ali Abdi Isma'il Sa'id, the Somali Minister of Defence, visited the UAR from Nov 6 to Nov 24 at the head of a military delegation. He was received by President Abdel Nasser, met army commanders and visited military installations and factories. He also visited Al-Azhar, from where he had graduated in theology in 1958. He stated that UAR military aid was instrumental in creating a Somali army to protect the country from imperialism; all border problems, however, would be settled peacefully, without Africans shedding African blood. (R. Cairo, Nov 6, 14, 24 [8, 16, 27], 13 [14] [W 23]; MENA, Nov 12 [W 16]; R. Mogadishu, Nov 16 [18]; Ahram, Nov 9, 11, 12, 14, 19, 22)

(Compare with actual figures for 1960 trade: pp 82 ff.) (R. Ankara, June 7, 15, 21 [W 29]; Gumhuriyah, June 22)

Speedy Turkish Recognition of Syrian Secession; UAR Breaks Off Diplomatic Relations. Turkey was the second country after Jordan to recognize the newly established Syrian Government, on Sept 29. On Oct 1, President Abdel Nasser broke off diplomatic relations with both Turkey and Jordan on the grounds that they had committed an aggressive act against the UAR. (Cumhuriyet, Sept 30; Ahram, Sept 30, Oct 2)

On Oct 1, the Turkish Foreign Ministry issued a statement saying that Turkey had recognized Syria after the Syrian armed forces had established full control over the country and after Abdel Nasser had publicly accepted the fact of Syria's withdrawal from the union. The recognition of neighbouring Syria and friendship with her was a necessity for Turkey and it was not intended as a hostile act against Egypt. Turkey regretted the Egyptian step, and the Turkish nation would preserve its friendship towards the Egyptian nation. (R. Ankara, Oct 1 [3])

The Egyptian oil workers decided on Oct 3 to boycott Turkish ships going through Suez. The Turkish oil workers asked the authorities for permission to boycott ships calling at Turkish ports, but this permission was not granted and Ankara Radio broadcast the following:

(Voice of Arabs, Oct 26 [28])

In an article in Dec, Muhammad Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahram, charged that Turkey was a partner—together with Britain, France, Iran and the pro-Western Arab countries—in a conspiracy to deal the UAR a "deadly blow," including the assassination of Abdel Nasser. (Ahram, Dec 22)

UAR publications stressed the increasing cooperation between the two countries in the economic field, their belief in the policy of non-alignment, and the socialist policy adopted by both. Some minimized the close relations between Burma and Israel.

The joint communiqué issued on Dec 29 said that the two sides had exchanged views on world problems and the international events which had taken place since the Belgrade Conference, in which the two leaders had participated. They reaffirmed their determination to work for the preservation of world peace and full disarmament, and to adhere to the policy of non-alignment, and the spiritual principles of the Bandung and Belgrade conferences. They declared their support for the liberation struggle of Africa and their absolute support for Algerian independence. They condemned colonialist policy in the ME and declared their support for the restoration of all the Arab people's rights in Palestine in accordance with the UN Charter and resolutions. (On the Palestine issue in this respect, see also p 330). At Burma's request, discussions had dealt with the UAR's socialist policy. It was also agreed that Ceylon would import from the UAR 50,000 tons of rice, 30,000 tons of cement and 100,000 lbs of yarn and textiles. It would export to the UAR 25,000,000 lbs of tea a year and an unspecified amount of rubber, coconuts and "by-products." It was reported in Cairo that of a total yearly import of 45 millions lbs of tea half came from India and the rest from China and Ceylon. The new agreement implied that Ceylon's share would be considerably increased at the expense of one or both of the other two suppliers. (Ahram, Feb 19, 25, 26; Eg. Gaz.; Gumhuriyah, Feb 26; R. Cairo, Feb 25 [W, March 2]; Akhbar, Feb 28)

[India and the UAR differed on the question of an Afro-Asian or neutralist meeting. The latter, the Belgrade Conference, was finally sponsored by Presidents Abdel Nasser and Tito. India, which opposed the forming of any "third bloc" or even the resemblance of one, joined them late and reluctantly. Three groups of neutralist opinion were seen to have emerged and to have found expression in the Belgrade conference: leftists, moderates and middle-roads, Nehru belonging to the second and Abdel Nasser to the third group. For details, see pp 56 ff.]

[There were also reports—which were denied—that the two statesmen differed on the Congo crisis. See p 540 a.]

"major international issues." The two Presidents expressed their satisfaction with the cordial relations between their countries (Ahram, May 16, 17; Eg. Gaz., May 17, 19). a visit to the Pakistani atomic centre in Karachi and invited its head to visit the UAR. (Gumhuriyah, Dec 13; R. Karachi, Dec 13 [FE 15])

THE PHILIPPINES

In Feb Shaykh Shaltūt, Rector of Al-Azhar, participated in the second Islamic conference held in Mindanao. (Ahram, Feb 11; Hayat, Feb 12)

On Sept 8 the UAR nominated its Minister in Manila as its first ambassador to the Philippines. (Ahram, Sept 8)

SOUTH VIETNAM

Trade and Political Relations. In May a South Vietnamese trade delegation conducted talks in Cairo on the implementation of a trade agreement concluded in 1960 and a trade protocol for 1961. The head of the delegation, who delivered to President Abdel Nasser a message from President Ngo Dinh Diem, later stated that it had been agreed to exchange trade representatives and to strengthen cultural ties. He added that the UAR had not officially recognized South Vietnam; the exchange of trade representatives amounted to de facto recognition. (Ahram, May 3, 9, 12)

On Aug 5 it was reported in Cairo that Ngo Dinh Nhu, the brother of President Ngo Dinh Diem and his political adviser, had been invited to Cairo by UAR representatives in Rabat. He had not accepted the invitation but had agreed to the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries (Eg. Gaz., Aug 5). [Until the end of the year no such relations were established.]

AFRICA

AFRICA IN GENERAL

AFRICAN VERSUS ARAB "CIRCLES" IN UAR POLICIES

[At the beginning of the year the impression was widely held that the UAR had shifted the emphasis in her foreign policy efforts from the Arab "circle" to the African one. (There were three "circles" in Abdel Nasser's Philosophy of the Revolution, the two mentioned and the Islamic "circle.") This impression was caused by the UAR's involvement in the Congo conflict and the establishment of the Casablanca bloc on the one hand, and the impasse she had reached in her endeavour to unite the Arab countries under her leadership, on the other.]

Jordanian Attack on UAR Policy. At the beginning of Jan, Amman Radio sharply attacked the UAR's African policy. The commentary said that after having failed in the Arab "circle" Abdel Nasser had turned to the African "circle" with the same amount of success. He had enabled Israel to break the boycott siege and to penetrate Africa by means of her ships which sailed the Red Sea freely. (R. Amman, Jan 7-1MB, Jan 8; Jer. Post, Jan 22; NYHT, Jan 25)

Justification for UAR Concentration on Africa as Service to Arab Cause. The Beirut [pro-UAR] Al-Sayyid replied to Arab criticism on UAR policy in Africa. The paper confirmed that the UAR was now concentrating her efforts in Africa, even at the expense of Arab questions. The Congo problem was taking up most of the time and headlines in the UAR radio and press. The reason for this was that the UAR had an important position in the continent, and the African states had become a powerful bloc in the international area. The UAR therefore had to establish strong ties with the African countries. Congo was seen by the African countries as a symbol of their struggle for independence and by concentrating on the Congo the UAR could win their friendship. Another important reason for the UAR's interest in Africa was Israel's effort to break the boycott siege by stepping up her activities in Africa. In the Casablanca conference Abdel Nasser had made two important gains in Arab problems—Palestine and Algeria.

UAR interest and activity in Africa was actually in the service of the Arab cause and not at its expense. (Sayyad, Jan 12)

Problems of an Arab Leader in Black Africa; Dangers and Opportunities. Under the headline "Nasser Seeks Role in Africa", Joe Alex Morris Jr. wrote in the New York Herald Tribune in Jan that Abdel Nasser was endeavouring to boost his prestige and influence in emerging independent Africa. Having met with little success in the first—or Arab—"circle," he was making a bid for the second. Here too, however, the record consisted of ups and downs, for two main reasons. The first was the rise of black African nationalist leaders such as Kwame Nkrumah who were willing to include the North African Arabs in their pan-Africanism but left no doubt that they thought African nationalism was basically black. The other reason was the inherent contradiction in present-day Africa: wooing one party involved the risk of alienating others. Additional checks on Abdel Nasser's success in Africa were his "obsession with Israel." This imposed a strain on his relations with the new African states which enjoyed Israeli aid and to which Israel was "hardly a problem." Furthermore, less than a century previously the Arabs were known and hated in black Africa as slavers who looted the continent. Thus, despite similar problems and the common bond of anti-colonialism it seemed unlikely that an Arab from Egypt would be able to gain the adulation of black Africa. On the other hand, if Abdel Nasser were wise enough to limit his objectives, his influence would become widespread in the continent as he was already admired as a revolutionary leader of the liberation movement in Africa, and had a natural advantage in the Islamized countries of central Africa. (NYHT, Jan 22)

"Egypt Can't Ignore Africa." In Aug, however, it was remarked that the common contention that Abdel Nasser had switched his attention to Africa after having been rebuffed in most of the Arab countries was an oversimplification. Nobody could ignore Africa and least of all Egypt, which was a part of it. The UAR could claim leadership there almost as a right, and few were in a better position to teach newly independent states what they wanted to know. (Times, Aug 2)

[After the secession of Syria from the UAR, there appeared a second wave of press reports on a shift in the UAR's policy towards Africa, and an adjustment of its African policy to new circumstances.]

Policy Change after Break-up of UAR? At the end of the year reports originating in Cairo said that the UAR was changing its African policy. This change was said to be due mainly to (1) the split with Syria and (2) the result of past experience in the UAR's African policy, when it had often acted on one-sided information and faulty evaluation of the facts. In consequence of this reappraisal the UAR government would in future:

- 1) support evolutionary rather than revolutionary movements in Africa in order to avoid chaos;
- 2) adopt non-alignment in the case of locally opposed groups, particularly in non-independent states;
- 3) concentrate on safeguarding the Egyptian hinterland (Sudan, East Africa and Eastern Congo) against domination by either Communism or the West.

After the split with Syria it was expected that the UAR would strengthen its interest in Africa, because it was the Syrian insistence on the primacy of the "Arab struggle" which had impeded the full development of Abdel Nasser's African policy in the past.

The sources cited examples to illustrate the change in policy: the cessation of Cairo Radio attacks on Julius Nyerere, PM of Tanganyika, and on the Kenya leader Tom Mboya, and support of the Congolese central government of PM Adoula. In Zanzibar and the Kenya Northern Frontier District, where the Arabs and Somalis were rejecting African domination, Egyptian influence would be exerted to prevent a racial clash. (Jer. Post, (OFNS), Dec 3; Jeune Afrique, Dec 2-6)

The UAR and African Unity: Advocates Solidarity instead of Union. [The UAR did not voice support for an African political union as an immediate objective for independent Africa as did e.g. Presidents Nkrumah, Sekou Touré and Modibo Keita of the Casablanca bloc. In addition to the reasons for this attitude advanced by President Abdel Nasser (see below) it was probably necessary to avoid having to make a choice between Arab unity and African unity, or even having to declare which of the two was foremost in the interest of the UAR.]

After the success of the African revolution, an article in Ruz al-Yusuf said, African countries were in need of outside assistance but could accept it neither from the imperialist West nor Russia, so as not to breach their neutralism. The only way open to Africa was to cooperate with those African countries which had gained their independence earlier. A cooperative association of African states should be established on the principles of freedom and for the purpose of defending their independence. There was no intention of setting up federations or an all-embracing African union. This was unimportant and inopportune. After creating this framework, it would be easy for African states to accept outside assistance without fear for their independence or their neutralism. (Ruz al-Yusuf, March 27)

In Aug. in a television interview, Abdel Nasser explained that the Africans interpreted the word "unity" in the same way as the Arabs. There should first be solidarity and cooperation. Eventually the goal of union would be reached. This would not be easy for the states of Africa to achieve, however, because there existed different peoples in the continent. He advocated in principle regional unifications of small African countries. Nevertheless, achieving African solidarity was in itself a great victory. Abdel Nasser cited the Casablanca Charter as an example of the means to overcome obstacles in the way of closer relations in Africa. He concluded that the meaning and aims of African unity were solidarity, cooperation and brotherhood. (Ahram, Aug 14)

Israel as a Cause for UAR Activity in Africa. (For details of Arab and UAR anti-Israel activities in Africa, see pp 202-3)

[The importance attached by the UAR to Israeli activities in the African continent and the extent to which it caused greater UAR concentration in African affairs was reflected in Abdel Nasser's revolution anniversary speech of July 22.] He said that the UAR was working for the solidarity of Africa and continued: "This is because imperialism has enabled Israel to infiltrate into Africa to pave the way for its own re-entry." At first, the African leaders had been deceived but later they realized that Israel was "a product of the new imperialism..." (Ahram, July 23; Nasser's Speeches, pp 159-60)

UAR CLAIMS LEADERSHIP OF AFRICA

[As in 1960, the UAR press and radio stressed the UAR's mission in Africa as a pacemaker for the African independence movement, as leader and guide.] Some examples follow.

The UAR was described as the centre of the liberation movement which was spreading throughout the continent. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Jan 2)

Two factors had made independence and mutual relations possible in Africa and Asia, a Cairo broadcast in Hausa said. "First, the increasing general demand for freedom set some countries free. Secondly, the Suez crisis of 1952 (sic) set an example to patriots for launching a struggle to liberate Africa and Asia... After the UAR achieved its independence and became... free of any kind of colonial bonds, it set out to assist those countries in Africa and Asia still under colonial rule to attain their freedom..." (R. Cairo in House to West Africa, July 25 [31])

The peoples of Africa looked to Cairo to help them overcome disease. Only Cairo, the capital of Africa, could direct the war against sickness in the continent, together with the African states. (Akhbar Sa'ah, Jan 25, May 3)

All Africans looked to Abdel Nasser as their hope for achieving freedom. Cairo was both Africa's largest city and a refuge for African leaders seeking independence. With its long history of defending freedom and protecting the persecuted, and with its rich moral and cultural inheritance, Cairo had become "the beacon of light radiating the faith to defend justice and the will to die for it." (Akhbar, March 24; BBCM, March 25)

The UAR requested to be represented at the WHO conferences for Africa as an observer. (The UAR belonged to the WHO regional committee for the ME.) At first, the WHO Executive refused but finally agreed to the UAR request, it was reported in Cairo. (Ahram, July 20)

THE UAR AND THE WORLD BLOCS IN AFRICA

[Throughout 1961 the UAR information media heavily attacked the western powers, usually under the general title of "imperialists." Colonial powers came in for the heaviest criticism and abuse, but the USA was also a target. The Soviet Union, whose policy on the Congo question coincided on the whole with that of the UAR, was not subjected to criticism, but Communism occasionally was, in broadcasts to East Africa. At the same time, neutralism and non-alignment were continually advocated as the only possible policy for Africa.]

Against Christianity in Africa. In an article on imperialism, Hassanein Haykal, editor of Al-Ahrâm, said that imperialism had penetrated the continent in the wake of the missionaries. The missionaries maintained that they wished to contribute to Africa through religion. Instead of giving, however, they took, and took everything. Consequently, the saying went in Africa: When the imperialists came to Africa, they had the Gospel and the Africans possessed the land; years passed; now the Africans had the Gospel and the imperialists possessed all the lands. (Ahrâm, Feb 17; see also below: Islam and Arabism)

US Reported to See UAR-Soviet Coordination on Congo; UAR Denial. Secretary of State Dean Rusk told the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee on Feb 15, according to reports from Washington, that the UAR was playing an active role in the explosive situation in Congo, was in close contact with the Soviet Union in coordinating its efforts, and had supplied some arms and ammunition to the Gizenga faction in Stanleyville. He went on to say that President Kennedy's statement in a press conference on the same day (to the effect that the US would defend the UN Charter by opposing any attempt by any government to intervene unilaterally in the Congo) was addressed to the UAR as much as to the USSR. (Times, Feb 17)

This was reported by Cairo Radio's home service, together with a comment that the US was well aware that the UAR's policy was completely independent. In a Swahili broadcast on the reported statement, Cairo Radio omitted the entire reference to the alleged UAR-Soviet cooperation and emphasized even more that the UAR was independent and non-aligned. (BBCM, Feb 18, 24)

On the other hand, publicity was given to a statement included in a report said to have been submitted to the US Congress in Feb to the effect that Abdel Nasser's policy in Africa—just as in the Arab world—was opposed to all attempts from both East and West to gain influence in the area. (Ahrâm, Feb 12)

At the same time, Hassanein Haykal took pains to refute the American contention that UAR policy went hand in hand with that of the Soviet Union, especially in African questions under discussion at the UN. He maintained that the UAR voted as she did in each case solely because it was consistent with her policy to do so. Enumerating issues on which the UAR and USSR votes had coincided and on which the US had taken the opposite stand, Haykal wrote: "In order to satisfy the US we would have had to support the continuation of colonialism... to abstain from supporting Congo's independence... to take part in the murder of Lumumba... Could we have taken a different stand in all these questions from the one we actually took?" (Ahrâm, Feb 24)

Against Western Influence in Africa. [The UAR advised the African states to dissociate themselves completely from the West, politically, economically and culturally. Africans suspected of being favourably inclined towards the West were termed "stooges." This line did not noticeably change during the year.]

After the setting up of what came to be known as the "Casablanca bloc," the UAR attacked plans for setting up a rival African bloc. The call of President Tubman of Liberia for such a conference was criticized on the grounds that the US was behind Tubman's initiative, aiming at creating a balance to equalize the Casablanca conference (Rûs al-Yusuf, March 6). (For details of the Casablanca and Monrovia conferences see pp 48 ff and pp 54 b-55 respectively).

In March it was reported that the UAR was studying a new plan intended to combat western influence in Africa. (Rûs al-Yusuf, March 13)

The American Peace Corps was attacked on the grounds that its aims were the enslavement of peoples. (R. Cairo, March 14 [16])

A plan to get a hold on the African markets was said to have been prepared by imperialism. The plan concerned an Assistance Fund allegedly offered by President Kennedy to African states which would agree to join European blocs. It was the UAR's duty to guard against such plotters. (Akhbar al-Yaum, June 3)

In a speech at the economic committee of the Casablanca bloc the UAR Minister of Finance called on African states not to associate with the Common Market, whose aim was to exploit them and foil their attempts to set up competing industries. (R. Cairo, July 18 [20])

In Sept, in a talk on US "neo-colonialism" the Cairo "Voice of Africa" criticized the Nyasaland Malawi Congress Party (MCP) for welcoming Mennen Williams, US Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs. The MCP leaders hoped for US aid but in fact their "strange liking for the US" constituted a great danger, for the US policy in Africa served its own military and economic interests and was "opposed to the interests of Africa." The USA had military bases in Ethiopia, Liberia and Libya; it supported the policy of apartheid in South Africa; it was responsible for the Congo affair; it supported Portugal's "crimes of annihilation and mass murder" in Angola; and it supported France against Tunisia in the Bizerta crisis. The African peoples should beware of the dangers of US neo-colonialism. (Voice of Africa, Sept 10 [12])

In Oct a Cairo Radio talk counselled West African States to take the following action if they wished to be really independent and non-aligned: (1) cancel all connections with and commitments to imperialist states, specifically membership in the French community and joint defence treaties with Britain and the USA; (2) expel foreign capitalism represented by banks and investment companies; (3) refuse membership in the Common Market and join organizations for economic unity inaugurated by the Casablanca powers; (4) end the foreign cultural invasion, and gain freedom from cultural subordination in Europe. (R. Cairo in English for West Africa, Oct 12 [14])

On Dec 2, "Quit Africa" day, a large gathering in Cairo of representatives of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organization, African states and UAR institutions decided to warn the imperialist countries to quit Africa completely and declared total solidarity with all freedom fighters. (Ahrâm, Dec 3)

Samples of Cairo Anti-Western Broadcasts To Africa. [The following samples, in addition to those cited above, are typical of the motives and the language used in these broadcasts. The "Voice of Free Africa" did not identify itself as a UAR station.]

"The imperialist dogs continue their bestial actions. . .

Get out of Africa, you imperialist dogs... Africans want to regain their rights which you have stolen from them... The imperialists hate to see Africans in power. This is what forces them to train stooges in the Congo... There are stooges in Kenya. The whole of East Africa is full of stooges." (Voice of Free Africa in Swahili, Feb 1 [3])

"The dogs, the pigs, the rulers—whatever they are, Belgians, Americans, British—have succeeded for a short time in forming their governments... Tihombe's government in Katanga, the Mobutu-Kasavubu government in Leopoldville..." (Voice of Free Africa in Swahili, Feb 6 [8])

"If the Africans were united in Kenya today, our elder Jomo Kenyatta would have been freed. But the dogs, the imperialists, and the pigs, the settlers, have bought stooges like the KADU leaders..." (Voice of Free Africa in Swahili, March 7 [9])

Against Communist Influence in Africa. [There were occasional broadcasts against Communist influence in Africa, mainly East Africa. They were few in comparison with the broadcasts against imperialism.]

Some African "agents" were accused of attempting to bring Communist influence into the continent. (Voice of Free Africa, March 6 [8])

In March a commentator in Swahili said that besides imperialist support of "stooges" in Africa there was also the danger of Communism in East and Central Africa. There were stooges who were trying to introduce Communism there. "The imperialists from Europe and Communists of the world want to bring a cold war to East and Central Africa." (Voice of Free Africa in Swahili, March 10 [13])

"If the Africans in Zanzibar had united, they would have succeeded in forming a government by Africans and for Africans. The imperialists, the British dogs, would never have played about with Africans. Communist stooges there would never have had a chance today to play about with Africans." (Voice of Free Africa in Swahili, March 7 [9])

THE UAR AS CENTRE FOR AFRICAN NATIONALISTS

African Offices. On Jan 1 a Cairo source published the following list of African political offices in Cairo:

- 1) Zanzibar office, opened in Aug 1960, headed by Ali Sultan.
- 2) Uganda office, opened by John Kale in 1957.
- 3) Kenya office, opened by Odiambo Okello in 1958.
- 4) South Africa office, representing the African National Congress (ANC) opened in 1960 by M. L. Pilusu.
- 5) Northern Rhodesia office, opened after Kenneth Kaunda visited Cairo (in June 1960. See MER 1960, p 546). The office represented Kaunda's party, the United National Independence Party (UNIP).
- 6) Southern Rhodesia office, opened in Sept 1960 by the SG of SR's National Democratic Party, T. G. Si-lundike. (Bima' al-Watan, Jan 1)

In a statement by Okello in Oct, in the name of all African offices in Cairo, the three following offices were mentioned in addition:

- 7) Ruanda Urundi
- 8) South West Africa
- 9) Basutoland (Ahram, Oct 8)

[Political offices representing independent African states were not mentioned, although press reports in 1960 mentioned the existence of offices for Nigeria, Somalia,

Ethiopia (Eritrea), Mauritania, Cameroun and Equatorial Africa. It was not clear whether offices were closed after the countries concerned attained independence.]

Personal Problems of African Representatives. The Africans of the political offices, who were mostly concentrated in Cairo's Zamalek quarter, were interviewed on their life in the city. They complained of lack of social intercourse, especially with girls. They were lonely and contacts on the social level were limited to meetings with other Africans. Egyptian society was more or less closed to them. The Uganda representative, however, had married an Egyptian girl and had acquired through her many friends. (Ruz al-Yusuf, May 1)

African Offices; Political Declarations. [The African political offices frequently issued declarations to the press on political issues. The statements were not limited to African affairs but dealt with various international matters, e.g. support of the Casablanca conference (Ahram; Gumburiyah, Jan 9); support of Cuba (Ahram, April 22); and praise of Abdel Nasser's speech of Oct 5 on the break-up of the UAR. (Ahram, Oct 8)

EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE; MILITARY TRAINING

[Much publicity was devoted to UAR educational assistance, the award of scholarships and the despatch of UAR teachers. Implementation of projects in these fields lagged somewhat, however. For details see also under UAR relations with individual African countries.]

Military Training. In April it was reported that trainees from 33 African and Arab countries were studying in UAR military institutions "new techniques of warfare in the air, sea and on land," in addition to such subjects as arts, geography and history. (Akhbar, April 28)

Many African trainees were reported to be among the new officers who graduated from a war college course in June. (Ahram, June 28)

Scholarships, Teachers. In May it was reported that 150 scholarships would be accorded and 50 teachers sent to the African states. (Ahram, May 2)

In Aug, Doudou Gueye, SG of the Association of African Journalists, visited Cairo and discussed the award of 8 UAR scholarships to African journalists and radio employees. (Akhir Sa'ah, Aug 9)

The UAR Ministry of Education requested an allocation of an additional ££35,000 to defray the cost of teachers' missions to work in African countries, including Ghana, Guinea, and Sierra Leone. (MENA, Feb 11 [W 16]; Ahram, Feb 12)

5,000 UAR teachers were to pass examinations after which a number would be chosen for work in friendly states, including newly-independent states in Africa, in order to strengthen cultural relations between them and the UAR. (Ahram, March 27)

Institutions for Africans and the Study of Africa. On May 20 a first course was completed for African and Arab scientists in the medical application of radio-isotopes at the UAR institution for atomic energy. There were four Nigerians among the participants; all the others came from Arab countries. The course had been organized in cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency in connection with a UAR request for the establishment in Cairo of a ME regional radio-isotope centre for the Arab countries. (Akhir Sa'ah, May 17; UN Year Book 1961, p 593)

On Feb 5 the Labour Committee of the UAR National Assembly met to discuss the setting up of a training institute for workers as a counter-move to Israel's Afro-Asian Institute for Labour Studies and Cooperation, established in 1960 (MER 1960, p 302) (R. Cairo, Feb 6-IMB, Feb 6). [No such institute was established during the year.]

In March it was reported that a demographical institute would be set up in Cairo, to serve African researchers who wished to study demographic problems of the continent (Ahram, March 14). [By the end of the year there was no report that the institute had been established.]

In April a report was published on heated discussions at the Cairo University Council on a suggestion to set up an institute for research into tropical vegetation. Some of the participants, including the dean, had maintained that there was no need at present for such an institute, and it was enough that the faculty of arts had inaugurated an institute for African studies in which the history and geography of the continent were being taught. On that note the discussion had ended. The writer of the report called for the establishment of the institute because the UAR had to train specialists in this field, as Israel was doing, so as to avoid embarrassment should she be called upon to supply such specialists to African countries. (Akhir Sa'ah, April 19)

It appeared later that the above mentioned institute for African studies at Cairo University had not yet been established. The preparatory committee had not even started work. Divisions of opinion on the matter had cropped up between the universities, as well as opposition to the idea on the part of some responsible persons in the university. (Akhir Sa'ah, Sept 6)

An Afro-Asian Technical Institute started to function in Oct. First reports spoke only of African trainees. Graduates of secondary schools in the UAR and African countries would study agriculture, engineering and commerce for a two and a half year period. Those wishing to continue their studies could do so for a further period of two (or three) years in order to obtain their engineers' diploma. Teaching would be in English, French and Arabic. Reports on the number of students to be enrolled varied from 150 to 300, 100 of them from the UAR itself. On the day of opening, it was reported that 75 students had been accepted from Afro-Asian countries, including 27 from non-Arab African states. (Akhbar, June 13; Ahram, July 15, Aug 19, Sept 9, Oct 14; R. Cairo, in Hebrew, Oct 28-IMB, Oct 29)

African students in the UAR met with language difficulties in their studies. In May, the UAR Higher Council of Universities recommended that faculties teaching theoretical subjects arrange special courses in French or English. The faculty of law had already done so. (Ahram, May 28)

BROADCASTS AND PROPAGANDA

Broadcasts. [UAR broadcasts to Africa remained a principal instrument of policy in the continent and their importance grew with the addition of new transmitters and the extension in both time and languages of transmission.]

In Aug UAR broadcasts to Africa were as follows:

1) Broadcasts from "The Voice of Africa from Cairo":

Daily length of

Total number of languages	12

(BBCM, W Aug 10)

In April a new transmitter was installed in Cairo, which enabled broadcasts to Africa to be extended by 6 hours. The new antenna, located in Mansura, was said to be the tallest in all Africa and Asia, and the transmitter's power was said to be second only to those in the US and USSR. It was installed by technicians from Czechoslovakia. (Ahram, April 1; Akhbar, April 4)

On July 3, Cairo Radio celebrated the seventh anniversary of its Swahili broadcasts. (R. Cairo, July 3 [5])

In a speech at the UAR National Assembly, Abd al-Qādir Hātim, Minister of State, said that the UAR's broadcasting network had become an example to be followed by other peoples struggling for liberty and independence. (Eg. Gaz., Feb 7)

Information. In April it was reported that 30 information centres would be set up, most of them in Africa and Latin America. Each centre would be staffed by press, radio and television attachés. (Ahram, April 14)

In Oct press attachés were appointed at the UAR embassies in Mali and Nigeria. (Ahram, Oct 8)

In Oct it was decided to send a cultural exhibition of the UAR to tour Africa (Ahram, Oct 26). [No further reports on the matter were available.]

ISLAMIC ACTIVITIES

Al-Azhar Activities. In Jan, Mahmūd Shaltūt, the Rector of Al-Azhar, said that 3,000 foreign students were studying at the university and the number of Africans among them was steadily increasing. In one month alone—Dec 1960—94 African students had enrolled.

Defining the duties of the university's missionaries abroad, the Rector said that they spread the tenets of Islam, defended the religion against its enemies and fought against missionary movements which had been brought by imperialism into the continent. (Ahram, Jan 2)

In Jan the Islamic Congress decided to set up a special institution with the aid of Al-Azhar to direct activities against the enemies of Islam and against the "Zionist intention to falsify the Qur'ān" (Hayat, Jan

5; BBCM, Jan 6). [There was no report on the establishment of such an institution.]

In March, replying to criticism of Al-Azhar for having neglected the Muslims in Africa, the Rector said that Al-Azhar had started teaching foreign languages including English, French and Swahili and had set up a special institute to prepare religious emissaries for service abroad. Emissaries had already been sent to Somalia, Libya and Nigeria. For lack of funds, however, this and other projects had had to be abandoned. The Minister of Finance had drastically cut the university's budget estimate. (Musiawar, March 3)

On Oct 29 the Rector of Al-Azhar received a delegation from East Africa headed by Chief Abdullah Fundikira, Tanganyika Minister of Justice. They discussed the despatch of teachers, imams and religious publications to East Africa. (Ahram, Oct 30)

Plans for "Religious Attachés." "Voice of Islam" Broadcasting Station. In Jan it was reported that the UAR was planning to introduce "religious attachés" in some of its missions in Africa. They would make contact with Muslim leaders and organizations and serve as consultants on social, educational and cultural questions that Islamic institutions might help solve. Teachers and imams from Al-Azhar were to be sent to Africa with the primary task of converting the estimated 40 million pagans to Islam. This move was understood to have been prompted by the reports then circulating on the rapid spread of Islam in West Africa. (NYT, Jan 16)

During the same period the UAR Minister of Waqfs approved a plan for the setting up of "The Voice of Islam" radio station in Cairo. (Ahram, Jan 9)

[Neither of these two plans was reported to have materialized during the year.]

Activity in Connection with Pilgrimage. The SG of the Arab Federation of Trade Unions decided to invite two African leaders to the pilgrimage at the expense of the Federation. The leaders would pay a visit to Cairo after their pilgrimage. (Ahram, April 19)

Hasan Abbas Zaki, head of the UAR pilgrimage delegation to Mecca, was reported to have taken with him 5,000 copies of the Qur'an to be distributed among the pilgrims from Africa and Asia. (Akhbar, April 23)

Cairo Radio Broadcasts to Africa Glorify Islam; Depreciate Christianity, "European Culture." [Islam was a frequent topic in Cairo broadcasts to Africa. Talks were given explaining the tenets of Islam, its laws, feasts, history etc. to the listeners in African languages. Readings from the Qur'an and religious music were a permanent feature in the broadcasts. The contrast between Islam and European culture was stressed; the first was described as original, progressive and human, the second as degenerate and immoral.]

In Jan it was reported that the UAR had decided to push [in Africa] as hard as possible the argument that Christianity was European and western and therefore somehow tainted with imperialism. Islam, on the other hand, was to be represented as the natural faith for free Africa. (NYT, Jan 16)

Following are a few samples of broadcasts:

A religious talk in Swahili explained Islam as a world religion teaching the brotherhood of all peoples; another in Somali dwelt on the perils of self-indulgence and yet another in Swahili extolled the Prophet's leadership. (R. Cairo, April 14 [21]; June 9 [16])

A speaker in Hausa on the spread of Islam in Africa said that in contrast with Christianity, which relied on aggressive proselytizing by missionaries, Islam had been propagated by West African natives who had visited the centres of Islamic learning and returned to teach their fellow countrymen. As a result, Islam had spread beyond expectation. (R. Cairo, May 17 [19]). [No such talks were broadcast to East Africa, where Islam had been introduced by conquerors and slave-dealers.]

In a talk broadcast to West Africa in Hausa, Cairo Radio said that Islamic culture had been the source of the European Renaissance, though later the progress of Muslims was retarded by economic and political vicissitudes. "Islam is a religion of civilization and calls for development... But there is a danger in the civilization of Europe, which practises immorality, and people must differentiate it from the true civilization and abstain from the former." (R. Cairo, July 21 [27])

Another talk, in Swahili, dwelt on the Crusaders' attempt to conquer and destroy Islam. (R. Cairo, Oct 27 [Nov 3])

African Views on Islam and Arabism. In an editorial on "Islamism and Pan-Africanism" Le Courrier d'Afrique said that Muslim countries like the UAR and Morocco who were increasingly declaring their solidarity with Africa were at the same time playing the Communist role in Congo by supporting such people as Lumumba and Gizenga. Were such countries really African? The editorial replied that until it was invaded by the Arabs, who carried out savage expeditions in the search of slaves and ivory, the northern part of the continent was inhabited by black Africans. At present Islam was penetrating in a different, but no less dangerous manner into the continent. Some countries—such as the UAR—wanted to become dominating through a new form of colonialism. Pan-Islam agitation by North African and other Muslim states was being taken advantage of by the Communist bloc to spread neo-Marxism and Communist propaganda. (Le Courrier d'Afrique, Feb 10)

In an interview in Bamako, Mali, Hampate Ba, an influential Islamic scholar and leader said that Islam's success in Africa was due partly to the fact that it disregarded colour. Hampate Ba said he wanted African Islam to be "universal," free of political influence and untouched by Arab nationalism. (NYT, March 20)

ECONOMIC ACTIVITY

[UAR efforts to widen economic and trade relations with Africa continued in 1961. More economic missions toured the continent and trade agreements were concluded with African countries. The UAR also participated in the economic discussions with the Casablanca Charter states which aimed at creating an African Common Market—see p 56 a. See also UAR relations with individual African countries.]

Volume of Trade. The value of total UAR exports in 1961 to non-Arab African countries was $4.8m. (1.04% of her total exports); imports stood at $6.1m. (0.92% of her total imports). Somalia was Egypt's most important customer ($1.6m.) followed by Guinea ($1.0m.); Congo, Southern Rhodesia and South Africa were the foremost exporters to Egypt. (See table of trade, p 86.)

Economic Mission. At the end of March an economic mission left Cairo to tour 13 African states (Ahram Iqtisadi, Feb 16). The delegation left Cairo for Addis Ababa on March 27 for a 4-day visit to Ethiopia (R. Addis Ababa, March 27 [W 30]) and went on to Ghana,

Togo and the Ivory Coast. (R. Cairo, April 29-IMB, April 30)

Economic Policy: Countering Imperialist Schemes. In Feb Hasan Abbās Zaki, the Southern R. Minister of Economy, explained the UAR's economic policy towards the newly-independent states as follows. These states had wrested their independence from imperialism which was nevertheless trying to maintain its hold on their economy by creating economic blocs such as the Commonwealth and the EEC, and also by giving them assistance through third countries such as Israel. As the UAR had experienced this process, she could help the new states to achieve complete independence and to withstand this pressure by the following means: (1) sending missions to study their needs and trade possibilities; (2) inviting representatives from these countries to the UAR; (3) opening commercial agencies, specifically in Cameroon, Congo, Ethiopia, Guinea, the Ivory Coast, Mali, Nigeria and Senegal; (4) holding permanent exhibitions; (5) participating actively in economic conferences and institutions in Africa, such as the Economic Commission for Africa, and encouraging the investment of Arab capital in these countries; (7) offering facilities to importers in these countries and aiding their governments in development plans. (Ahram, Feb 4)

Banking. In April it was reported that UAR banks were due to open branches in African countries. (Akhbar al-Yawm, April 29)

In May the UAR Minister of Economy, Abd al-Mun'im al-Qaysuni, discussed plans for setting up an Arab banking company for Asia and Africa. Qaysuni said that the aim was not the profit to be gained, but, "if we ourselves do not hasten to establish these banks, there are others who may forestall us" (Ahram, May 2, 22). [No report was available on the opening of UAR banks in African countries during 1961.]

Problems of Trade. In March two journalists who had toured Africa reported on UAR exports, their possibilities and problems. Their report contained the following points: (1) European countries were re-exporting to Africa agricultural produce which they had bought from the UAR. (2) Agreements and contracts signed by the UAR with African countries were not being properly implemented on account of failure on the part of UAR institutions to execute the terms of contracts as scheduled. (3) There were over 10,000 Arab merchants in Ghana and Nigeria who were ready to import UAR products but had received no encouragement and guidance from UAR representatives in those countries. (4) UAR cement exported to Africa had met with great success and was competing favourably with Israeli and other cement. (5) Means of transport to West Africa had to be developed in order to increase trade with the area. (Akhbar al-Yawm, March 11)

Exports and Trade Representation in Africa. Out of 27 commercial bureaux to be opened by the UAR in the forthcoming budgetary year, 10 were to be in Africa. (Ruz al-Yusuf, March 20)

The setting up of joint UAR-African export-import firms was being planned. (Ahram, Sept 18, 30)

In Oct it was reported that UAR tourist offices would be opened in Ghana, Somalia and Casablanca on Nov 1. (Ahram, Oct 4)

Reports in Nov said that "An-Nasr" Import-Export Co. would open bureaux in Congo, Ethiopia, Kenya,

Mali, Sierra Leone, and South Africa. Bureaux which had already been set up by the company would be expanded. These were situated in Ghana, Guinea, Libya, Morocco, Nigeria and Somalia. (Akhbar, Nov 2; Gumhuriyah, Nov 9)

Transport. In Jan it was reported that a new shipping line between the UAR and Somalia would be opened. (Hayat, Jan 13)

In July a UAR ship arrived in Dakar, thereby inaugurating a new shipping line to West Africa (see MER 1960, p. 545). By Oct two UAR ships were carrying cement to Liberia and general cargo to other West African ports. (Masa, July 16, Oct 30)

In Nov it was reported that the General Institution for Maritime Transport had decided to set up a UAR-African shipping company whose vessels would ply between African ports. (Ahram, Nov 24)

A weekly flight to Lagos and Accra was to be inaugurated by United Arab Airlines on Feb 28. (Ahram, Feb 19; see also under: Ghana)

In April trials were carried out for a projected air service from Damascus to East Africa via Aden and Mogadishu. (Ayyam, April 2)

In Dec a UAR source said that talks on air agreements were being held with Nigeria, Mali and Senegal. (R. Cairo in Hebrew, Dec 31, 1961-IMB, Jan 1, 1962)

EAST AFRICA

Nile Waters. [During 1961 Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika—all of which were approaching independence—put forward claims to a portion of the Nile waters, the White Nile originating in their territories. Neither the Nile waters agreement of 1929 between Egypt and the UK nor the agreement of 1959 between Egypt and the Sudan provided for allocations for these countries.]

In April the Kenya Minister of Agriculture and Irrigation came to Cairo for talks on Kenya's request for a portion of the Nile waters. (Ahram, April 7)

It was later reported that all the three East African countries had requested discussions on the subject. (Ahram, April 10, 11)

UAR sources put the yearly quantity to be apportioned to the three countries at 1,750 million c.u.m. [out of an annual flow of from 40,000 to 150,000 million c.u.m.]. (Ahram, July 8, Aug 11)

In Oct informal talks on the question were held in Khartoum between representatives of the three countries and the joint UAR-Sudan Nile waters commission (established under the 1959 agreement). The outcome was not made public. In Nov it was reported that the discussions would be reopened in Jan 1962. It appeared that the sides could not reach agreement as to the volume of water to be allocated to the three East African countries. (Ahram, Oct 31; Akhir Sa'ah, Nov 29)

East African Federation Opposed. [Cairo was hostile to the project for an East African federation comprising Kenya, Tanganyika, Uganda and Zanzibar, which was favoured by many East African leaders, particularly the Tanganyikan PM, Julius Nyerere.]

In March a UAR diplomat who had toured East African countries called the projected federation a British plot. In this way Britain hoped to extend the white settlers' dominating influence from Kenya to other territories. The national parties in East Africa were against the federation but some leaders, including Dr. Nyerere, had been influenced by British-American propaganda and supported the plan (Ruz al-Yusuf, March 27). Britain also wanted to facilitate the setting up of bases in the area. The project was compared to the federation of shaykhdoms in the Persian Gulf, said to be planned by Britain. (R. Cairo in Swahili, July 15 [18], July 29 [Aug 1])

Broadcasts. [Cairo broadcast to East Africa in Swahili both in its "Voice of Africa" programme and over the "Voice of Free Africa" which did not identify itself as a UAR station. These broadcasts attacked "British colonialism," and imperialism in general and its "stooges," and—occasionally—also Communism and its "stooges." The British and the imperialists were termed, as usual, "dogs and pigs." (See above: The UAR and the World Blocs in Africa: Samples of Cairo and Western Broadcasts; also: Broadcasts and Propaganda.)]

A "Voice of Free Africa" commentary in Swahili said that the disturbances in Zanzibar resulted from the British policy there of inciting leaders against each other, so that the British could maintain their rule. The latter were stirring up the Christian Africans against the Muslims in order to create disturbances. The commentator warned the Christians in Uganda not to mix religion with politics. He called for unity so that the "imperialist dogs" may be thrown out. (Voice of Free Africa in Swahili, Sept 5, 6 [8])

British Charged with Obstructing UAR Diplomat's Movements. In March Dr. Abd al-Aziz Isahq, a UAR diplomat on a tour of East Africa, complained in Dar es Salaam of "disgraceful treatment" meted out to him. At Nairobi he had been detained at the airport for 14 hours without any explanation. Furthermore, he had had to cancel a visit to Zanzibar because a visa applied for four weeks earlier had not been received. (Times, March 14). He was not permitted to visit Uganda. (Ahram, March 16)

EX-FRENCH AFRICA

Attacks on African and Malagasy Union States. [The UAR press and radio accused the organization of ex-French African states of subservience to imperialism. This organization, the Union Africaine et Malgache (UAM), formed part of the French Community and comprised the following states: Cameroun, Central African Republic, Chad, Congo (Brazzaville), Dahomey, Gabon, Malagasy Republic, Ivory Coast, Mauritania, Niger, Senegal and Upper Volta. These countries became also known as the Brazzaville group after a conference they held in that city in Dec 1960 on the Congo problem. (See MER 1960, p 26.)

In a series of talks in Somali on "neo-colonialism," Cairo Radio attacked the French Community in Africa and the British Commonwealth as levers for neo-colonialism and for economic penetration into the continent. (R. Cairo, Feb 28 [March 2])

In April a Swahili broadcast criticized the twelve states for being pro-French and for not voting with the Afro-Asian groups on the Algeria and Congo questions. (Compare voting record at UN, MER 1960, p 14 ff, this volume p 14 ff.) This policy was termed "a menace to the African states." (R. Cairo in Swahili, April 6 [8])

The majority of the UAM states abstained from voting on the UN General Assembly resolution on French atomic tests in the Sahara, calling for the denuclearization of Africa. Their abstention showed, Al-Ahram remarked, that these countries were "led by France as she wished." (Ahram, Dec 8)

The Yaounde Conference Criticized. Al-Ahram contrasted the Accra conference of Casablanca Charter states (April 6-11) with the UAM states' conference at Yaounde (March 27-30). The Accra conference was described as a democratic, open meeting, while at Yaounde a "secret society" was meeting which turned its back on Africa's burning problems such as Congo, Algeria, Kenya, South Africa and the Portuguese colonies. This secret society had one leader, Houphouët-Boigny of the Ivory Coast, "a friend of de Gaulle and his counsellor on African affairs. When Boigny tells the secret society, 'do this and thus,' they reply 'Amen'." The representatives meeting at Yaounde belonged to a new class in the UAM states whose interests were tied to imperialism.

The aim of the conference in Yaounde was to create a "bogy" of Communism and to devise ways and means of perpetuating French political and economic domination by establishing an Afro-Malagasy Economic Union [which was approved at the beginning] and devising a united foreign policy. Had each of the twelve countries determined its own foreign policy, the intention to unite would have been understandable, Al-Ahram remarked; "but one man determines them—Houphouët-Boigny, counsellor to the President of France on African affairs!" Another hidden intention of the conference was to create a bloc of the twelve states at the UN to counterbalance the Casablanca bloc, thereby dealing a blow to African unity. (Ahram, April 14)

AFRICAN COUNTRIES

ANGOLA

[In Feb-March Angolan nationalists started large-scale attacks on European settlements, thus starting the Angolan war.]

Mário Pinto de Andrade of the Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola (MPLA) sent Abdel Nasser a request for UAR assistance to the rebellion in Angola. (MENA, June 1 [3])

"Angola Week" was celebrated in June throughout the UAR. (R. Damascus, June 27 [29])

John Sifamba, head of the Geneva office of the União das Populações de Angola (UPA), visited Cairo in July. He later stated that he had "received all he asked for"

from the UAR which had pledged its support of the armed revolution against Portuguese imperialism. He said that he intended to open an Angola office in Cairo in Sept 1961 (MENA, July 13 [14]). [By Oct, no such office had apparently been established.]

UAR broadcasts, to the end of 1961, supported the Angolan rebels, attacked Portuguese policies in Angola and alleged arms supplies to Portugal by imperialists. (See BBCM for the period.)

CAMEROUN

[The UAR's ambivalent policy towards Cameroun continued in 1961. There was a shift towards better relations with the government; the political exiles, however, continued to enjoy Cairo's hospitality.]

Official Relations. The UAR's first ambassador to Cameroun, Nagib as-Sadr [see MER 1960, p 545] presented his credentials to President Ahidjo of Cameroun at the beginning of Jan. (Ahram, Jan 7)

Cameroun's first ambassador to Cairo presented his credentials to President Abdel Nasser on Feb 2. He told a reporter of proposals to conclude trade, economic and cultural agreements between the UAR and Cameroun. He would also discuss the lack of direct air communications between the two countries as well as "the fate of the Cameroun politicians in Cairo." [See below: Contacts with Cameroun Opposition; also MER 1960, p 545.] (Ahram, Jan 6, Feb 3; Ruz al-Yusuf, Jan 23)

On July 11 the Cameroun Minister for Culture and Guidance arrived in Cairo for a few days' visit. (Ahram, July 12)

A trade and payments agreement was initiated in Cameroun in May (Masa, May 30) and signed in Cairo on Dec 19. Victor Kanga, the Cameroun Federal Minister of National Economy, who came for this purpose to Cairo, was received by President Abdel Nasser to whom he delivered a message of friendship from President Ahmadou Ahidjo of Cameroun.

The agreement stipulated payments in free currency, and included a most-favoured nation clause. "Volume of trade was fixed at a minimum value of £E125,000 per year." Cameroun was to import cotton and silk, manufactured products and oil products from the UAR and to export timber, livestock and hides. (Akhbar, Dec 17; Ahram, Dec 19, 20)

Cairo Contacts With Cameroun Opposition. In Jan two leaders of Cameroun's outlawed Union des Populations Camerounaises (UPC), Kingue Abel and Ernest Ouandie, arrived in Cairo where they denounced the Cameroun government's "cooperation with imperialism." (Akhbar, Jan 15)

In Feb Al-Ahram reported the arrival in Cairo of Mme Martha Mourié, widow of UPC leader Felix Mourié who had died of poisoning the previous year (MER 1960, p 545). Reportedly, she had escaped from a Cameroun prison. She told a tale of terror, concentration camps and torture of Mourié's followers. (Ahram, Feb 13)

The UPC was represented at the All-African People's Conference (AAPC) in Cairo (on which see p 46) by a delegation headed by Kingue Abel. Mme Mourié was introduced to the conference in the opening session by its UAR chairman. (MENA, March 26 [29])

ENTENTE COUNTRIES

Dahomey. A goodwill mission from Dahomey visited the UAR in Sept. (R. Paris, Sept 8 [12])

Niger. In April, Djibo Bakary [former vice-president of the Niger executive council; anti-French; was defeated in 1958 referendum and exiled in Oct 1959] was received by Abdel Nasser in Cairo. He said he was greatly impressed by his meetings with the UAR President. (Ahram, April 7; Hayat, April 8)

Upper Volta. In Aug the UAR appointed her first ambassador to Upper Volta. [The appointment was cancelled after the break-up of the UAR because the ambassador was a Syrian.] (Ahram, Aug 26)

Tharwat Ukāshah, the UAR Minister of Culture and National Guidance, led his country's delegation at the independence celebrations of Upper Volta. (Akhbar, Dec 7)

FEDERATION OF RHODESIA AND NYASALAND

[The UAR supported the African nationalists in the Rhodesias and Nyasaland, gave shelter to African nationalist leaders, and in broadcasts to Rhodesia advocated violence and revolution as the only effective means for the Africans to rid themselves of colonial rule. It criticized the Nyasaland leaders' friendly attitude to the US.]

Offices of Rhodesia African Leaders in Cairo. There were in Cairo a Northern Rhodesia Office, representing the United National Independence Party (UNIP), and a Southern Rhodesia Office, representing the National Democratic Party (NDP). (Bina' al-Watan, Cairo, Jan 1; see also MER 1960, p 546)

In Feb-March three African leaders from Northern and Southern Rhodesia visited the UAR: Kenneth Kaunda, leader of UNIP, his deputy, Matthew Chona, from Northern Rhodesia and Joshua Nkomo, leader of the NDP from Southern Rhodesia (R. Damascus, Feb 27-IMB, Feb 28; Ahram, Feb 17). They were received by President Abdel Nasser in Damascus on Feb 28 (Ahram, March 1). Kaunda later said that Abdel Nasser was a great leader in whom Africans saw a noble example in their struggle for freedom; he had expressed his support for freedom of Northern Rhodesia. (Gumhuriyah, March 2)

Cairo Broadcasts. Cairo Radio attacked "the Jew" Sir Roy Welensky, PM of the Federation, on his and the British government's stand at the recent talks on Northern Rhodesia in London. (R. Cairo in Swahili, Feb 25 [28])

A [typical] talk broadcast by Cairo Radio in Nov in its "Northern Rhodesia Corner" contained the following points:

1) A strong attack on the Colonial Secretary, R. Maudling, "this chattering and blathering tool of British monopolist-capitalists," for having said that he would continue with the policy of hinging independence to the colonial territories at the pace and method best suited to the aspirations of their peoples and to serve their interests, and that before you can have justice you must have security.

2) After 70 years of exploitation it was the Africans' duty to "kick out all the European elements from Northern Rhodesia." "Only through bloodshed" would the British relinquish their hold. The many Northern Rhodesians who still hoped to achieve their goal gradually, by "being moderate and reasonable," laboured under a "terrible illusion."

3) In this colonial exploitation the US and Britain went hand in hand: "The English contribute their 500 years of experience in swindling the colonial peoples, while the Americans contribute the power of the dollar and the corrupted practices which today symbolize American rottenness all over the world."

4) Capitalism consisted of concentrating the means of production in the hands of the few and exploiting the many. The few were the settlers, and the only means of doing away with this "inhuman exploitation" was a "thorough revolution." The present state of affairs "will only alter when violence has put an end to this merciless and inhuman exploitation." (R. Cairo in English, Nov 5 [7])

Nyasaland: NCP Supported But Criticized For Friendliness Towards US. In March and April Cairo Radio broadcast two interviews with Kanyama Chiume of the Nyasaland Malawi Congress Party (MCP) who was on a visit to the UAR, at the same time participating in the All-African People's Conference (AAPC) which was then being held in Cairo. He described conditions in his country and his party's struggle for freedom under Dr Hastings Banda. He praised President Abdel Nasser by whom he had been received, and the AAPC. (R. Cairo in Swahili, March 27, April 7 [March 29, April 10])

Cairo Radio welcomed the MCP success in the Nyasaland elections [on Aug 15] and especially Dr Banda's declaration [on Aug 16] that the election results were a direct mandate to secede from the Federation. Rule by the African people would wipe out the "he-goat imperialism of the Boer dogs in Nyasaland." The white population was afraid that after leaving the Central African Federation, Dr Banda would supply arms to Kaunda and Nkomo in the Rhodesias to help them free themselves of the Federation. (R. Cairo, Aug 16 [18]; Voice of Free Africa, Aug 17 [19])

In Sept the Cairo "Voice of Africa" criticized the MCP for welcoming Menner Williams, US Assistant Secretary of State. Terming the MCP's leaders' attitude to the US a "strange liking," the commentator said that they hoped for US aid. Their attitude, however, constituted "a great danger to its [Nyasaland's] independence and a clear disregard of the facts in Africa," because the US pursued "a policy in Africa based on defending her military and economic interests and, in general... opposed to the interests of Africa." (R. Cairo Voice of Africa, Sept 10 [12])

GABON

Musa Arafah, the UAR Minister of Works, led the UAR delegation at the independence celebrations of Gabon, in Aug. (MENA, Aug 2 [4])

GHANA

[At the beginning of the year Ghana and the UAR came together in the Casablanca conference, convened in the wake of the Congo crisis as a basically anti-Western grouping. Later, however, despite their formal cooperation in the Casablanca bloc there was a perceptible cooling in the political relations between the two countries. While the presidents of the other non-Arab states of the bloc—Guinea and Mali—visited the UAR during 1961, Nkrumah's projected visit did not take place. At the Belgrade conference Abdel Nasser and Nkrumah took divergent attitudes, the latter taking a stand closer to the Soviet Union. (See: The Belgrade Conference.) The anti-Israeli resolution of the Casablanca conference, sponsored by the UAR and endorsed after some hesitation by Nkrumah, had little noticeable effect on Israeli relations with Ghana.

[Ties in other fields continued to develop between the two countries.]

Ghana Foreign Minister in Cairo. On Jan 23 Ghana's FM, Ako Adjei, arrived in Cairo. He had talks with Abdel Nasser and FM Fawzi. He said that President Nkrumah would shortly visit the UAR and declared that his government was bent on implementing the Casablanca conference decisions, especially in regard to Israel. Other topics discussed were the Congo and the strengthening of Ghana-UAR relations in general. (MENA, Jan 23 [25]; R. Damascus, Jan 23-IMB, Jan 24; Ahram, Jan 24)

Nkrumah's Visit to the UAR Fails to Materialize. A forthcoming visit of President Nkrumah was repeatedly announced. In addition to the Ghanaian FM's announcement (above), UAR sources reported in Feb that the visit was expected for June, and in June—for August (Ahram, Jan 24, Feb 24, June 23). [The visit did not take place during the year.]

In a message to Abdel Nasser on the break-up of the UAR Nkrumah said: "I am sure that with your well-known determination and reliable judgement, you will find a satisfactory solution to this regrettable episode." (Ghanaian Times, Oct 11)

Ministerial Visits; Communication Ties; Air Services, Telephone, Shipping Line. A UAR goodwill mission left for Accra in Jan to attend the inauguration of the Cairo-Accra air service. The delegation was headed by Muhammad Ibrahim, Minister of State for War Affairs, who said that he would discuss in Accra the question of an exhibition of products of the UAR military factories and facilities for the Ghanaian shipping line to Alexandria. (Eg. Mail, Jan 28; R. Damascus, Jan 30-IMB, Jan 31)

Mrs. Fayia Nkrumah, the [Egyptian born] wife of President Nkrumah, arrived in Cairo on the inaugural flight of Ghana Airways, Beirut-Cairo-Accra route (Eg. Gaz., Feb 6, 16, 24; Hayat, Jan 19). [United Arab Airlines inaugurated a weekly flight on the Cairo-Lagos-Accra route in Feb.]

An agreement on the establishment of the service had been signed on Aug 29, 1960. (MER 1960, p 547)

Krobo Eduei, Ghanaian Minister of Communications, arrived in Cairo on Feb 9 heading a delegation on an official 5-day visit, in connection with the inauguration of the air service. He was received by Abdel Nasser on Feb 12. (R. Cairo, Feb 10, 13-IMB, Feb 10, 13)

In March a delegation representing the Ghana Black Star Line [formerly a joint Ghanaian-Israeli enterprise] held talks in Cairo on "the establishment of a [joint] shipping line for the two countries." (Ghanaian Times, March 22)

In May, on returning from a visit to Ghana, the UAR Minister of Communications said that an agreement had been reached in accordance with the Casablanca resolutions on the establishment of direct telephone communications between the two countries. (Ahram, May 4)

UAR Cultural Centres in Ghana. A new UAR cultural centre was being set up in Kumasi in addition to the existing one in Accra. It was to include a library of 13,000 books in Arabic and English. (Akhbar, March 14; See also MER 1960, p 547)

The Accra centre, which opened in June 1959, was designed to hold courses in Arabic for over 150 students "monthly." However, in one single month there had been no less than 650 applications. (Akhbar Sa'ah, June 28)

Islamic Contacts. In April the Rector of Al-Azhar received Muhammad Anan (?), leader of the Muslim Youth Association in Ghana, who brought greetings from Muslims in Ghana and asked for religious books and missionaries. (MENA, April 11 [13])

In Aug Cairo Radio broadcast in Hausa an interview with Mallam Muhammad Mutawakil, a Muslim leader from Ghana. He said that Muslims should visit the UAR to learn from it. He described the opening of Islamic schools in Ghana. Asked about the creation of a "united Muslim religious entity" he said it was a "most encouraging movement." (R. Cairo, Aug 4 [11]; Ahram, Aug 4)

Writing in the Ghanaian Ahanti Pioneer, Labran Muhammad Ibrahim, General Secretary of the Ghana Muslim Council, commented that the broadcast over the Cairo "Voice of Africa" radio, stating that the Muslims in Ghana aspired to separate education for their children, was without foundation; separate education was contrary to Ghanaian policy, and if the Muslims of Ghana required any aid from Muslim countries the consent of the Ghana Government was required first. (Courrier-Soudan, Bamako, Aug 21)

Technical Assistance. Upon Ghanaian request a UAR civil aviation expert was to be employed as adviser and assistant to the Director of Aviation in Accra. (Ahram, Aug 13)

Ghana requested from the UAR an expert in rice-growing and another in cotton-growing. (Ahram, Oct 25)

GUINEA

Synopsis. The UAR strengthened its ties with Guinea on a basis of positive neutralism and anti-imperialism. The two countries cooperated in the Casablanca bloc. Following Sekou Touré's visit to the UAR in May, a large scale assistance programme to Guinea was launched by the UAR. However, much of it remained on paper and implementation was scanty compared with the plans. Abdel Nasser declined Touré's invitation to the UAR to join the projected Guinea-Ghana-Mali federation.

Diplomatic Representation. Guinea's ambassador to the UAR, Seydou Diallo, leader of the Union of Workers of Black Africa (UGTAN), presented his credentials to Abdel Nasser on April 13. He returned to Conakry the following day to prepare Sekou Touré's visit to the UAR. (Ahram, April 14, 15)

Sekou Touré's Visit to UAR. President Sekou Touré had intended to visit the UAR in 1960 but the tour was repeatedly postponed. (See MER 1960, p 547.) At the Casablanca conference in Jan Abdel Nasser invited Sekou Touré to visit Cairo in Feb (Ahram, Jan 7). The visit was postponed until the end of March and then again until May. (Ahram, Jan 20, March 10)

On May 7, before leaving for Cairo, Sekou Touré suggested in a speech that the UAR join the projected Ghana-Guinea-Mali union (R. Cairo, May 7-IMB, May 8). Cairo's response, it was reported, was cool, if polite, and Abdel Nasser was expected to tell his guest that cross-continental federations—as opposed to regional ones—were not then feasible. (NYT, May 10; compare also p 675 a, on the UAR approach to African unity.)

Sekou Touré arrived in Cairo on May 8. He was accompanied by his Ministers of Foreign Affairs, Public Works, Education, Trade and Internal Affairs. (R. Cairo, May 8-IMB, May 9)

Touré had talks with Abdel Nasser, toured the country, visited the Aswan High Dam site, armament and other industries, Port Said and the Suez Canal, military installations, social institutions, historical sites etc. He addressed a special session of the UAR National Assembly in which he praised warmly the achievements of the Egyptian revolution. (He also paid a one-day visit to Saudi Arabia.)

On May 16 he met Abdel Nasser and President Sukarno of Indonesia, who had arrived in Cairo. The three presidents discussed the international situation and the forthcoming conference of non-aligned nations.

The talks between the two sides resulted in four agreements: trade and payments, technical assistance, cultural exchange and military cooperation, signed by the two presidents on May 16. (For details see below.)

In a joint communiqué, issued on May 17 at the end of the visit, the two presidents affirmed their agreement on the essential problems facing their countries in Africa and the ME and reiterated their stand against both old and new style colonialism. They stressed the necessity for easing world tensions and "the struggle against underdevelopment," and advocated banning the use of force to solve international problems. They urged that steps be taken to end nuclear testing and advocated complete disarmament, which they saw as a means of releasing the energies and resources of mankind for an all-out war against poverty and backwardness. They agreed to work for African solidarity and true cooperation, and recognized the need to strengthen the Casablanca African Charter. They condemned France for nuclear testing in Africa, the UN for failing to ensure the unity of Congo under the Gizenga government, South Africa for its apartheid policy and Portugal for its Angola policy. They also condemned Israel as a bridgehead of imperialism in both its old and new forms in the ME, Africa and Asia. They supported Algerian independence and the rights of the Palestine Arabs. Abdel Nasser accepted Sekou Touré's invitation to visit Guinea. (Ahram; Gumhuriyah, May 8-13; R. Cairo, May 17 [19]; Nasser's Speeches, pp 107 ff, 113)

In Aug Touré was invited to attend the conference of Casablanca bloc leaders in Cairo, on the eve of the Belgrade conference of non-aligned countries, but he did not participate owing to internal difficulties. (Ahram, Aug 12; Hayat, Aug 30)

Trade and Payments Agreement, ££6m. Credit To Guinea. The agreement signed on May 16 provided for an expansion of trade to a minimum level of ££2 million per annum. The parties were to accord each other most-favoured nation treatment and would permit the holding of exhibitions and fairs. The agreement provided for the opening of an account in Egyptian currency in the name of the Guinea Republic Bank at the Central Egyptian Bank through which each side would give the other credit facilities up to ££500,000. Both parties gave an assurance not to use transport in which Israel had direct or indirect interest.

An appendix to the agreement provided for a UAR loan to Guinea of ££6m. at 2½% repayable over 7 years. The loan was to be used to buy machinery, tools and factories, while the UAR would use the repayments on imports from Guinea.

A UAR-Guinean company with headquarters in Conakry was to be set up to implement construction, communications, irrigation and technical engineering projects, the capital to be shared equally by both countries. The agreement was valid for one year, renewable automatically. (R. Cairo, May 16, NCNA, May 18 [W 25])

The protocol of ratification was exchanged on July 4. The UAR planned to export to Guinea: cotton, linen, artificial silk, rice, vegetables and fruits, mining and industrial products, railway carriages, vehicles, glassware, pharmaceutical products and butagas cookers. Guinea was to sell the UAR: Coffee, palm oil, raw hides, rubber, aluminium and livestock. (Cairo, July 4 [W 13])

Each country would arrange radio programmes describing the other people and its daily life. (Ahram, May 17)

In July it was decided to send 25 UAR teachers to teach in Guinean schools. (Ahram, July 7)

General Kita Nomandian, Commander of the Guinean Army, arrived in Cairo for talks on July 7. (Ahram, July 8)

A first consignment of light arms and half-track vehicles reached Conakry from the UAR in Nov. (L'Espresso, Bamako, Nov 8)

(Afrique Action, Tunis, April 3)

KENYA

[In Feb, general elections in Kenya gave Africans a majority in the Legislative Council. The Kenya African National Union (KANU) won 18 seats against the 11 of the opposition Kenya African Democratic Union (KADU). KANU refused to form a government while Jomo Kenyatta, their leader, was in custody, and on March 18 KADU agreed to form a minority government. Kenyatta was released in Aug, and in Nov flew to London to demand independence for Kenya.]

[The UAR supported Somalia's claim to the Northern Frontier District of Kenya up to mid-1961, when this policy began to clash with the UAR's support for Kenyatta's policy of a unified Kenya. UAR broadcasts supported KANU and attacked KADU as well as Tom Mboya of KANU (who refused to join the UAR-sponsored All-African Trade Union Federation). Cairo Radio also denounced the Arab Party of the Kenya Coast and Mombasa, which called for the secession of the coastal strip from Kenya. On the other hand, Cairo described the proposed federation plan for East Africa as a British plot to ensure the perpetuation of their rule in the area. (See p 680 b.)]

Support for Somalia Irredentist Claims. (See The UAR-Somalia.)

Cairo Attacks on British. UAR propaganda generally described the white settlers in Kenya as "imperialists, dogs, pigs, old goats, bloodsuckers and sorcerers." They were accused of conspiring with the Governor of Kenya, Sir Patrick Renison, and with KADU leaders, who were described as stooges and "black Europeans," to divide Kenya by creating "many Tombos." The British authorities were accused of acts of terrorism against the African population. The broadcasts demanded the immediate removal of the "NATO bases" in Kenya to avoid "another Bizerta." The Asians in Kenya were described as British stooges. (See i.e. VFA in Swahili, March 3, 5 [6]; R. Cairo in Swahili, June 6 [6], July 18 [20], Sept 5 [7], Dec 26 [28])

Support for Jomo Kenyatta. [The UAR supported Jomo Kenyatta, the KANU leader, who was imprisoned by the British authorities. UAR propaganda treatment of the Kenyatta case was similar to that accorded to Patrice Lumumba of the Congo.]

Cairo Radio sent "Jomo Kenyatta badges" to listeners who applied for them. Kenyans were asked to go on strike from Feb 1-3 in protest against Kenyatta's detention. The British and their "KADU stooges" were attacked for turning down Kenyatta's request to be released. The broadcasts demanded his release and his appointment as Chief Minister. (R. Cairo in Swahili, Jan 9 [16], Jan 31 [Feb 2], March 2 [4], March 3 [6], March 14 [16], March 21 [23], April 4 [7], etc.)

The secretary of the Kenya office in Cairo, Wera Ambitho of KANU, thanked Abdel Nasser for supporting Kenyatta. (Hayat, Aug 10)

Upon Kenyatta's release on Aug 16, Abdel Nasser called his congratulations. He said that Kenyatta's struggle had proved that once the people were determined to attain their freedom they were bound to achieve their goals. The peoples of Africa would follow his example. He hoped that a new era would open in Kenya under Kenyatta's leadership and that the ties between the UAR and the people of Kenya would become stronger (MENA, Aug 18 [21]). (The UAR information media gave very extensive coverage to Kenyatta's release.)

Kenyatta was invited to visit the UAR. On Nov 15, during a stopover at Cairo airport on his way from London to Nairobi, he thanked Abdel Nasser for helping the Africans in their struggle for national liberation. (R. Cairo, Nov 15 [16])

UAR and Kenyan African Parties. [UAR broadcasts generally praised KANU and the Kikuyu Central Association.] James Gichuru, acting president of KANU, met Abdel Nasser in Cairo on Jan 14. (MENA, Jan 15 [17])

During the Feb elections UAR broadcasts called upon voters to support KANU. KADU was called upon to stand by KANU in its fight against the British.

When KADU agreed on March 18 to form a government UAR organs attacked that party for having broken its pledge not to cooperate with the British. Ronald Ngala, the KADU leader, was attacked as a "stupid stooge." (R. Cairo in Swahili, Feb 20 [22], March 11 [16], 22 [24]; VFA, March 5 [7], April 21 [25], 25 [28])

Kenya was represented at the All-African People's Conference (AAPC) in Cairo, which demanded the release of Jomo Kenyatta and attacked Harry Thuku [first president of KANU] who was described as a "stooge." Tom Mboya, who attended the conference, was interviewed on the radio [but later was attacked again in the UAR press—see below]. Ngala and Gichuru, who both attended the conference, were jointly received by Abdel Nasser who promised Ngala that the UAR would provide education facilities for the people of Kenya. (Ahram, March 31; R. Cairo in Swahili, March 28 [30], March 30, 31 [April 4])

However, attacks on KADU continued. In May broadcasts binned that KANU would bring down the KADU government, if necessary by force. Ngala was attacked as a "puppet" of the British, a traitor (VFA, May 15, 17, 18 [17, 19, 20]). Later KADU was advised to make its peace with KANU for the sake of Africa but attacks on it continued (VFA and R. Cairo in Swahili, Nov 28 [30]). When fights broke out between KANU and KADU members at the end of Nov, Ngala and Muliro were blamed for having incited the fights in the service of the imperialists. (VFA, Dec 1 [4])

Tom Mboya, the KANU and trade union leader, continued to be attacked in the UAR press as "an Americanized playboy" who was being used by US capitalism to gain control of Kenya after the British left. (Rus al-Yusuf, Oct 2; see also MER 1960, p 384)

Towards the end of the year Cairo Radio attacks on Mboya noticeably ceased, following a reappraisal of Cairo's African policy when it was decided to avoid taking sides between local political factions. (Jer. Post, Dec 3; Jeune Afrique, Dec 2-6)

Muslims, Arabs, Asians. Cairo Radio claimed that the British segregated the Africans from the peoples of Arab or Asian origin and aligned the latter with Europeans although their aims were one with the Africans'. The Arabs had been in East Africa for over 500 years, and had intermixed with the Africans to the point where all distinguishing features had been eradicated. (R. Cairo in Swahili, Jan 21 [24])

[This line did not prevent the "Voice of Free Africa" from sharply denouncing both Arabs and Asians for anti-nationalist and separatist policies.] "The imperialists, the dogs, the settlers in Kenya and their Arab and Asian stooges"—about 45% of the Asians—opposed the release of Kenyatta. The Arab Party of the Kenya Coast and Mombasa and its leader Abdillahi Nasser were denounced for advocating the separation of the coastal strip, including Mombasa, from Kenya. Abdillahi was compared with Tshombe of Katanga in his secessionist policy. (VFA, April 5 [7], Sept 12 [14])

In Aug the Rector of Al-Azhar received Shaykh Ali Gunda Seneda, the Chairman of the Kenyan Muslim Union, and agreed to accept 20 African students at Al-Azhar University (MENA, Aug 10 [W 17]). Seneda gave three talks over Cairo Radio. He said that he found all people equal in the UAR regardless of differences in religion. He urged the Muslims to convert others to the principles of Islam, the only true religion. He admitted that before coming to Cairo he had held different opinions on the political situation in Kenya, but now he realized that his previous convictions were hardly helpful in bringing freedom to Kenya. He called on Kenyans to unite under the leadership of Kenyatta. (R. Cairo in Swahili, Sept 6, 7, 8 [8, 9, 11])

Khayr Muhammad Ali of Mombasa, representing the Kenya Coast People's Party, visited Cairo in Dec. (R. Cairo in Swahili, Dec 12 [15])

UAR-Kenya Relations. On the question of Kenya's share in the Nile waters, see p 680 b.

The UAR planned to market its products in Kenya through a Sudanese company. (MENA, Nov 10 [16])

LIBERIA

[The different political courses followed by the UAR and Liberia were emphasized when the UAR's diplomatic representative in Liberia was requested to leave the country after having been accused of contacts with subversive elements.]

Air Service. The Liberian airline was to start an air service between Cairo and Liberia from April 1. (Akher, March 3)

Cultural Agreement. In March Liberia and the UAR signed a cultural agreement in Monrovia. The UAR also offered five scholarships to Liberia in fields to be suggested by the latter. (Liberian Age, March 27; Ahram, July 28)

Al-Ahram later gave the number of scholarships as eight and added that these were too few as many Liberian Muslims wished to send their children to study in the UAR, and Israel was offering Liberians "tens of scholarships" every year. (Ahram, Aug 16)

Arab Building Company. It was reported in Aug that the first Arab building contractor's firm had been set up in Monrovia. The owners were described as an Egyptian, a Palestinian Arab and a former Liberian minister. (Ahram, Aug 16)

Subversive Activities, UAR Diplomat Ousted. At the end of Sept the Liberian government announced the discovery of a pro-Communist plot. Several people were arrested and three of them were reported to have admitted striving to overthrow the government by revolution with the help of foreign embassy personnel; the Ghana embassy was specifically mentioned. The government imposed restrictions on the activities of all foreign diplomatic and consular missions. It also requested the UAR to recall Anwar Farid, Counsellor to the UAR embassy, who was then chargé d'affaires. Farid was accused of openly challenging the emergency powers granted to President Tubman by the Legislature and of meeting with Liberians who were arrested on charges of subversion. (Liberian Age, Oct 2; Washington Post; Ha'aretz, Oct 4; Hayat, Oct 5)

The UAR ambassador to Liberia, who had been on leave, returned to his post at once. (Ahram, Oct 5)

MALAGASY REPUBLIC

No Diplomatic Relations. In Feb Mahmūd Sālih, UAR Minister in Pretoria, flew to Madagascar to discuss the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries. It was reported that the question "needed further study" (Ahram, Feb 18). [No diplomatic relations between the two countries were established by the end of the year.]

UAR Sees Madagascar as French Base. A Cairo reporter described Madagascar as a natural aircraft carrier in the hands of France. French teachers and text-books falsified Madagascar's history. The Malagasy government was levying all the taxes from the people, rather than from the large and rich French companies. France considered President Tsiranana moderate and loyal to France. (Ahram, Sept 24)

MALI

[Mali, which broke away from the Federation of Mali and Senegal in 1960 (see MER 1960, p 549), cooperated with the UAR in the Casablanca bloc. The UAR established diplomatic relations with Mali in 1961 and was host to President Keita on a state visit. Agreements on trade, technical assistance and cultural cooperation were signed but implementation lagged behind schedule.]

Diplomatic Relations Established. On March 29 Modibo Diallo presented his credentials as Mali's first ambassador to the UAR. (Ahram, March 30)

Amin Mahmūd Sāli, the UAR's first ambassador to Mali, presented his credentials in May. (LEssor, May 19)

Declarations of Friendship. Mali leaders praised the UAR and Abdel Nasser on many occasions. President Modibo Keita declared he was "impressed" by Abdel Nasser (R. Cairo, Jan 9-10MB, Jan 10) and said that his principles would "inspire freedom movements in Africa and other continents" (Rus al-Yusuf, Feb 6). Madeira Keita, the Minister of the Interior, noted that Mali was often attacked by "imperialists" for her cooperation with the UAR. He said that they often described Mali as "an agent of Abdel Nasser or of Soviet Communism." (Ahram, Feb 28)

Official Visits, Trade, Cultural and Technical Cooperation Agreements. A Mali economic delegation, headed by Madeira Keita, arrived in the UAR on Feb 26 for talks on the implementation of the Casablanca resolutions and on the economic relations between the two countries. (R. Cairo, Feb 26 [28])

On March 5 three agreements were signed on trade, cultural cooperation and technical assistance. (For details see below.) (R. Cairo, March 5 [7]). [From the UAR the delegation went on to Moscow.]

The Mali Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Information visited the UAR at the beginning of May. (Ahram, May 1; R. Damascus, May 8-10MB, May 9)

In May a 16-member goodwill mission from the UAR visited Mali. (R. Bamako, May 17 [23])

Doudou Gueye, political adviser to President Keita and SG of the Permanent Committee of the African Journalists' Union, visited the UAR in July. (MENA, Aug 2 [4])

An 11-man Mali parliamentary delegation arrived in Cairo on Sept 14. (Eg. Gaz., June 16; R. Cairo, Sept 14-10MB, Sept 15)

Visit of Mali President, Modibo Keita. President of Mali, accompanied by Ministers and high officials, paid a state visit to the UAR from June 12 to 17, when he left for Belgrade. Keita visited UAR industrial establishments, the Aswan High Dam site, military installations, social institutions, etc. At a special session of the National Assembly Keita stressed the affinity between the UAR and Mali and praised UAR progress and its policy of non-alignment. Keita was lauded by the UAR press as "one of the world's champions of freedom, an African leader who has chosen positive neutralism rather than subservience to the French Community."

Keita held talks with Abdel Nasser "at which common understanding and mutual appreciation" prevailed. In a joint communiqué the two sides declared, amongst other things, that they (1) reaffirmed their determination to pursue their struggle against imperialism everywhere; (2) supported positive efforts to ban nuclear tests; (3) would continue to strive for African solidarity, co-operation and coordination; (4) supported the principles of the Casablanca charter; (5) supported the Algerian nationalists; (6) condemned French atomic tests on African soil; (7) denounced the UN's failure to implement its resolutions on the Congo, and supported the Giza regime; (8) condemned policies of racial segregation; (9) affirmed their support for the struggle for freedom in Angola and their determination to work for the liberation of all African territories under foreign domination; (10) condemned Israel "which forms a bridgehead for imperialism and endangers the security and safety of the ME and African and Asian states" and emphasised the need for a "just solution" to the Palestine problem, restoring "all rights of the Arab Palestinians in accordance with the UN Charter"; (11) reaffirmed their faith in positive neutralism and non-alignment and their support for the forthcoming Belgrade conference; (12) recognized the need for cooperation among states on a basis of equality, respect for each other's sovereignty and non-interference in domestic affairs of other states; (13) would strengthen their political, economic, cultural and military relations.

Abdel Nasser accepted Keita's invitation to visit Mali. (Ahram, June 13-18; Eg. Gaz., June 16; R. Cairo, June 17 [19]; Nasser's Speeches, p 123 ff)

UAR Loan to Mali. On April 10 the UAR approved a loan to Mali of £E3m. at 2½% interest repayable over 7 years. (R. Cairo, April 10-10MB, April 10)

The sum was raised to £E6m. in the Abdel Nasser-Keita talks. The loan was to be used to purchase machinery and equipment from the UAR and for development projects. It was stipulated that the loan would in no way benefit Israel. This, noted a UAR newspaper, "closes another door for Israeli infiltration into Africa" while opening a new market for the UAR. (Eg. Gaz., June 17)

Trade Agreement. The trade agreement signed on March 5 between Mali and the UAR was based on the principle of equal trade exchanges between the two countries, encouraged the development of export and import facilities in respect of transit trade and envisaged permanent and temporary exhibitions. The UAR planned to sell Mali its textiles, industrial and agricultural products while buying animal and vegetable products. (Eg. Gaz., June 16)

A Mali trade delegation arrived in the UAR on Aug 25. (Akhbar, Aug 25)

In Nov the Mali ambassador conferred with the UAR authorities on ways and means of overcoming the difficulties which were hindering the implementation of the trade agreement. (R. Cairo, Nov 17-IMB, Nov 19; MENA, Dec 19 [21])

Radio-telephone and telegraph connections between Bamako and Cairo were opened in Dec. (R. Cairo, Dec 3-IMB, Dec 3; Ahram, Dec 5)

Technical Assistance. The technical assistance agreement signed on March 5 provided for: (1) UAR doctors, teachers, engineers, technicians and agricultural experts to serve in Mali; (2) construction by the UAR in Mali of premises for the Mali Parliament and civil service, schools, hospitals, housing, factories, hydro-electric dams and a road network. (Eg. Gaz., June 17)

UAR transport experts visited Bamako in Aug to study the proposed road network. A contract was signed with the Mali government to build 500 km of roads (R. Cairo, Aug 14-IMB, Aug 14). A second team of experts was to go to Mali in Oct to study details of the projected road construction. (Ahram, Sept 3)

In Oct the UAR approved the sending of five doctors to Mali. (Ahram, Oct 10)

In Dec it was reported that the UAR had begun the construction of a hotel in Bamako. (Ahram, Dec 16)

At the end of Dec it was reported that the UAR ambassador to Mali had returned to Cairo to discuss a Mali request for experts, doctors and teachers. (Ahram, Dec 25)

In Oct it was reported that the UAR would be invited to send teachers for the projected University of Mali. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Oct 9)

Ten Mali students arrived in Cairo in Nov on UAR scholarships, but found difficulty with the studies (held in Arabic) as they spoke French only. (Ahram, Nov 22)

Military Aid. The UAR gave Mali a gift of two trainer jet aircraft as the nucleus of a Mali Air Force. (Ahram, Sept 3)

NIGERIA

Diplomatic Relations. The UAR was represented in Lagos by an ambassador. A consulate-general was opened in Sept in Kaduna, Northern Nigeria, and further consulates were planned for the other regions.

Nigerian sources hoped that an embassy would eventually be established in Cairo. [This had not been done by the end of the year.] The Nigerian ambassador to Britain visited Cairo at the end of Oct. (Ruz al-Yusuf, April 7, Oct 16; Ahram, Aug 19, Oct 1; R. Kaduna, Sept 8 [13])

Political Relations in General. In April the Governor-General, Dr. Azikiwe, interviewed by a UAR correspondent in Lagos, said that his country wished to strengthen its relations with the UAR on the basis of mutual respect of each other's sovereignty. He also said that there was no room for rivalry over the leadership of Africa and Asia; their peoples should unite to deal with the tasks facing them. (MENA, April 30 [May 2])

In July the UAR ambassador disclaimed any territorial ambitions on the part of the UAR in Africa, and said it was not true that the UAR's main aim was, as had been alleged, to make Nigeria and other African states her satellites (Daily Mail, Lagos, June 28). In July the Cairo Al-Akhbar said in an article on the visit of the Northern Nigerian PM: "We are free from imperialist greed, but we are one with the new African nations in working to protect them and ourselves from imperialist evils, whatever form they may assume." (R. Cairo, July 13 [14])

Cairo Radio broadcasts in Hausa to Nigeria were described by the clandestine Arab (anti-UAR) radio station, "Voice of the Free," as "Communist inspired and harmful to Nigerian-Arab relations." (Voice of the Free, April 21 [24])

Visit of Northern Region PM and Opposition Leaders. Sir Ahmadu Bello, Sardauna of Sokoto, PM of the Northern Region, accompanied by a number of Northern Nigerian ministers, visited the UAR from July 9-15. He toured the Helwan steel and arms plants and Al-Azhar and visited Damascus. He had talks with President Abdel Nasser on technical cooperation, expansion of trade and cultural exchanges, a projected congress of Islamic leaders and the setting up of joint UAR-Nigerian enterprises. (R. Cairo, July 10 [12]; Ahram, July 11, 12)

It was agreed to send UAR teachers to "schools and universities in Northern Nigeria" and to the "Kano School for Arabic Studies," at the same time sending Northern Nigerian students to Al-Azhar and vocational schools in the UAR. Bello invited Shaykh Shaltūt, Rector of Al-Azhar, to visit Nigeria. Bello said that he had not signed a formal agreement with the UAR because that was a matter for the Federal Government to decide. (Hoyat, July 16)

Questioned at a press conference in Cairo on the subject of Nigerian-Israeli relations, Bello's personal opinion was that the Israelis were "out for domination wherever they may be," but stressed that he was speaking only for the Northern Region, pointing out that "the Israelis had already got a footing in the East and West and the Federal Government cannot expel them overnight because it is only a coalition." (R. Cairo, July 16 [19])

Bello was criticized by the organ of the National Convention of Nigerian Citizens, Western Nigeria, for having "attempted to leap into ME politics and drag Nigeria along with him." (West African Pilot, Enugu, June 7)

A group of opposition leaders in the Northern Nigerian Parliament, led by Hajj Ibrahim Imam of the Borno Youth Movement, associated with the Action Group, visited Cairo in Sept, during a tour of ME countries. Ibrahim Imam was later quoted as saying: "All the Nigerian people regard the UAR and its President as a beacon for the liberation of all the peoples of Africa, and its Muslim majority look to Al-Azhar for Islamic leadership." (Ahram, Sept 13; Europe-Orient, No. 205, Feb 6, 1962)

Chief Awolowo, the head of the opposition in Nigeria's federal parliament, later declared that African states should take the road of non-involvement in East-West disputes and non-partisanship in the Arab-Israeli dispute. (West African Pilot, June 29)

In talks with Abd al-Qadir Hatim, the UAR Minister of State, it was agreed that the two countries would cooperate in radio and television, press, tourism and propaganda; the UAR was to train Nigerian journalists and radio staff, send television staff to Nigeria and supply electronic equipment from the UAR military industry for Nigerian television. (Gumhuriyah, Cairo, Nov 3)

Scientific Contacts. Four Nigerian scientists participated in a two-month training course in Cairo in the use of radio-isotopes. (Daily Telegraph, Lagos, March 5)

In Oct five UAR scientists visited Nigerian research institutes. (Akhir Sa'ah, Cairo, Nov 1)

Economic Contacts. UAR journalists criticized UAR trade efforts in Nigeria: contracts to supply Nigerian merchants were not fulfilled on time, and Nigerian Arab merchants, while ready to deal in UAR goods, did not know what the UAR could supply, which indicated inactivity on the part of the UAR trade attachés. Trade possibilities were many; by March, 200,000 tons of UAR cement had been sold to Nigeria. (Akhbar al-Yaum, March 11)

A 24-member UAR trade mission visited Nigeria in April and proposed an agreement whereby Nigeria would import cement, cloth and tools, and receive UAR technical assistance both in the form of engineers to work in Nigeria, and scholarships for Nigerians at UAR technical schools. (West African Pilot, April 10; Hayat, April 16)

The UAR reportedly offered Northern Nigeria a loan of £E3m. for development, repayable over 7 years at an interest of 2½%, "without strings." (Associated Press, Kaduna, July 23)

Assassination of Prince Rwagasore. Prince Louis Rwagasore, PM of Burundi and son of the Mwami, was assassinated on Oct 13. Cairo Radio alleged that he had been killed by the Belgians who hated him for his role as leader of the People's Unity and Progress Party which had won the elections in the previous month. (R. Cairo, Oct 15 [17]; R. Cairo in Sawahili, Oct 21 [24])

SENEGAL

[On the political level UAR-Senegalese relations developed only slightly after the exchange of diplomatic representatives (while with Mali the UAR cooperated in the Casablanca bloc). The UAR concentrated its efforts in the Islamic field. Senegal's Prime Minister was reported to have criticized Arab nationalism, for which he was attacked in the Cairo press. In Aug there was an unconfirmed report of UAR arms supplies to the Senegalese opposition.]

Senegal's first ambassador to the UAR, Shaykh Ahmad Tijani, presented his credentials in April. The ambassador told the press that the Senegalese people were the African people closest to the UAR; 97% of them were Arabic-speaking Muslims and Abdel Nasser's picture hung in every house (Ahram, April 14, 15). The UAR's first ambassador arrived in Dakar in May. (Hayat, May 13)

A UAR delegation headed by Hasan Abbās Zaki, the Southern R. Minister of Economy, attended Senegal's independence celebrations. He had talks on economic and cultural relations with President Senghor, and PM Mamadou Dia. (Ahram, April 2, 7; MENA, April 6 [8])

Mamadou Dia and Arab Nationalism. In Jan the Cairo Rûz al-Yûsuf severely criticized PM Mamadou Dia's opinions on Arab nationalism as expressed in his book African Nations and World Solidarity. Dia had described Arab nationalism as weak, aggressive, based on hate and cutting itself off from the West. Rûz al-Yûsuf said these were the "sentiments of a black de Gaulle" which were "devilish, accursed and full of venom." (Rûz al-Yûsuf, Jan 30)

Islamic and Arab Contacts. Shaykh Ibrahim Niyasse, described as "Shaykh al-Islām in Senegal" visited the UAR during March-April. He was reported to have said that West African Muslims had started "to fight Israeli penetration," that he was going to Cairo to discuss UAR aid to Muslims in West Africa, and that imperialism had fought against the spread of Arab culture among Muslims in the area, but had failed.

In Cairo he met the Rector of Al-Azhar who promised to send teachers and books to Senegal and to accept students from there at the university. He was received by President Abdel Nasser and met with UAR ministers in Cairo and Damascus. Before leaving the UAR on April 25, Niyasse said he had reached agreement with the UAR on the strengthening of cooperation, the exchange of religious delegations, and the increase of the number of Senegalese students in religious institutions in Cairo. (Akhbar, March 7; Ahram, March 11, 17, 27; R. Damascus, April 3, R. Cairo, April 13, 25-IMB, April 4, 14, 26)

In June the UAR ambassador to Senegal and Senegal's ambassador to the UAR took part in a religious congress of the Tijaniyah, one of the largest Muslim sects in Senegal. The congress passed resolutions requesting the government to consider Arabic as an official language to be taught in schools, as French was. (Akhbar Sa'ah, June 28)

It was subsequently reported that the government had decided to introduce the teaching of Arabic in five primary schools. (Ahram, Sept 23)

In Nov five teachers left for Senegal for a period of two years. (Ahram, Nov 4)

UAR Smuggling of Arms to Senegal? In Aug it was reported that 50 boxes directed to the UAR ambassador in Senegal had aroused the suspicion of the Senegalese authorities who requested that they be opened for inspection. The UAR embassy refused permission and lodged a protest. A short time later a similar consignment arrived in Dakar. The UAR embassy immediately requested its reshipment, explaining that it had arrived in Senegal by mistake. The consignment allegedly contained arms for the opposition in Senegal. (Figaro, Aug 8)

A UAR Minister attended the Sierra Leone independence celebrations. Upon his return to Cairo he said that the people of Sierra Leone were very sympathetic to the UAR and there was a large Arab community in the country, devoted to Arab nationalism. The UAR had sent Arabic language teachers there on Sierra Leone's request. (Akhbar Sa'ah, June 28)

The UAR chargé d'affaires in Freetown said the UAR had granted 23 scholarships to Sierra Leoneans, including ten for professional training at a total cost of ££15,000. Eleven students had already left for the UAR. (Daily Mail, Freetown, Sept 2)

SOUTH AFRICA

Republic of South Africa. [The UAR supported the Africans of South Africa and severed diplomatic relations with the Republic. Cairo Radio in English broadcast a regular Saturday programme to South Africa, "Elwazi Labantu," introduced by Mwandisi L. Pilisi of the SA United Front. The UAR tried to establish contact with SA Muslims.]

When South Africa announced it would leave the British Commonwealth [it became a republic with effect from May 31], the UAR press and radio saw this as a victory for Africans who had created in the Commonwealth an atmosphere which could not tolerate the apartheid policy. (Akhbar, March 17; VFA, March 17 [20])

On May 30 the UAR announced the severance of relations with the South African Republic on the grounds that it represented only a minority of the population (R. Cairo, May 30 [June 1]). Cairo Radio said, "This act is tantamount to a new pact uniting true Africans in South Africa with the UAR people... and it shows that the road from the Cape to Cairo has united the peoples of these countries" (R. Cairo in Sawahili, June 5 [7]). Favourable reaction to the rupture came—among others—from the South Africa office in Cairo (headed by Pilisi) and the Indian embassy in the UAR (MENA, May 30, VFA, May 31 [June 1]). The South African Minister to the UAR was given 10 days to leave the country. The UAR Minister in South Africa was recalled. (Hayat, June 1)

The South African PM Verwoerd came under attack in UAR broadcasts: He "must know that he is facing the wrath of all 20m. (sic) inhabitants of this continent... Those who wish to live by the sword, Verwoerd and the imperialists, shall also die by the sword." (R. Cairo in English, Sept 9 [13])

South West Africa. [Formerly a League of Nations Mandated Territory, administered by the Union (later Republic) of South Africa, South West Africa was later annexed by it and the apartheid policy was applied. The question of the Territory was under consideration by the UN which proclaimed the right of the people of SWA to independence and called for the withdrawal of South African forces from the Territory.]

Sam Nujoma of the SWA People's Organization welcomed the UAR's action in severing its diplomatic relations with South Africa (MENA, May 30 [June 1]). The SWA People's Organization had an office in Cairo. (Akhhbar, Oct 8)

ZANZIBAR

(Background. After the Jan 1961 elections the Zanzibar Nationalist Party (ZNP), supported mainly by the Arab population, the Afro-Shirazi Party (ASP), which received assistance from Ghana and Tanganyika, and the Zanzibar and Pemba People's Party (ZPPP) were unable to form a government. Elections were held again in June when rioting broke out during which scores of Zanzibaris—almost all Arabs—were killed and hundreds injured. The ZPPP and the ZNP, whose alliance won the elections, formed a government.)

Support for ZNP. UAR broadcasts supported the ZNP as the only party which had made successful attempts to raise the standard of education and culture in Zanzibar by opening many schools and obtaining scholarships in the UAR. The party's leader had made Zanzibar's voice heard in African and Asian conferences, which the other parties had never attempted; some of their leaders had actually advocated that the British continue to rule Zanzibar. (R. Cairo in Swahili, Jan 14 [23])

Shaykh Ali Muhsin Bahwani, Zanzibar's Minister of Education, [and leader of the ZNP] met Kamal ad-Din Hussein in Cairo on April 4, on his way back from Indonesia. The two Ministers discussed UAR cultural assistance to Zanzibar. (Akhhbar, April 5)

Abd ar-Rahmān Muhammad Ibo Sālih, SG of the ZNP, visited Cairo in Sept. (Ruz al-Yusuf, Sept 12)

Cairo Minimizes Zanzibar Racial Tensions. Cairo broadcasts claimed that the Zanzibar riots in June had been falsely represented by the British as "caused by colour and religion," in order to divide and rule. But in fact there were no pure Arabs in East Africa; all were native to the region. Also, the fighting was between rival parties and not rival races. The people of Zanzibar should be reconciled and stop the bloodshed. (R. Cairo in Swahili, June 3, 10 [6, 13])

THE MUTAWAKILITE KINGDOM OF YEMEN

(Al-Mamlakah al-Mutawakkiliyah al-Yamaniyah)

INTERNAL AFFAIRS

SYNOPSIS

Unrest and violence continued to characterize Yemeni political life throughout 1961.

In March Imam Ahmad was seriously wounded in an assassination attempt by officers; other attempts on his life were reportedly made in February and August, and a plot against the Imam and Crown Prince Badr was reportedly uncovered in December.

These events served to emphasize the question of succession to the throne, for which there were two contenders, Crown Prince Sayf al-Islam Muhammad al-Badr, the Imam's son, and Sayf al-Islam al-Hasan, the Imam's brother. Badr had the support of the Imam but apparently of few others. Hasan, Yemen's representative at the UN, enjoyed the support of powerful Zaydi tribes. Imam Ahmad endeavoured to retain all real power in his hands but at the same time wished to establish Badr firmly as his successor. Thus in June, while recovering from his wounds, the Imam made Badr officially responsible for "supervising the government" but retained the powers of decision for himself. In October he confirmed Badr as Crown Prince. Towards the end of the year, when Badr returned from a journey abroad, he was accorded much official and organized acclaim. On the other hand, Hasan—who spent some months at home—reportedly refused a request of the Imam to swear allegiance to Badr, in which attitude he was supported by Zaydi tribes, especially the Hashid.

Both Badr and Hasan were assumed to have some mild reforms in mind but no basic change in the regime. During 1961 the first beginnings of modernization were seen in the economic sphere: the establishment of a number of institutions and companies, prompted by the completion of the Russian-built Ahmadî Port at Hodeida and the building of the first motor roads with Eastern and US aid. A modern-type "army" was also founded, in addition to several "armies" already in existence.

The opposition to the regime was widespread but split into many factions.

First, there were the age-old tensions between the Zaydi north and the Shāfi'i south, between the Qahianites and the ruling Hashimites, as well as tribal feuds, and enmity between powerful tribes and the Imam.

Then there were disaffected army officers who participated in all the more substantial plots, and disaffected officials and rebel youth.

Abroad there were the "Free Yemenis" with their centre in Aden and some leaders in Cairo. This oldest of all Yemeni opposition organizations was torn by internal strife and became largely ineffective. Thus additional opposition groups sprang up in Aden, with pro-UAR but perhaps also with pro-Ba'ath leanings. Some of the "Free Yemenis," such as Abd ar-Rahmān al-Baydāni and Muhsin al-Ayni, began to strike out on their own. All these groups and individuals welcomed the dissolution of the United Arab States—the federation between Yemen and the UAR—which, in their view, augured a further weakening of the regime.

All evidence, however, indicated that none of these factors was strong enough to take over power by itself and that there were no programmes for a new regime truly based on Yemeni reality, beyond the yearning for a better life and the apparently widespread desire for a republic.

Observers of the Yemeni scene thought it was only the masterful personality of Imam Ahmad—skilled in holding the balance between the disruptive forces and inspiring a mythical fear in his subjects—which held together the disintegrating fabric of Yemen's archaic body politic. None of the forces in sight was thought to be strong enough either to perpetuate the present regime or to build a new one, for although there was desire for change, tradition still held its sway over the population, and the innumerable dissensions criss-crossing Yemeni society prevented any effective concentration of power.

Thus, observers concluded, civil strife was likely to follow the Imam's death, with world powers and Arab countries intervening, and Yemen becoming another Laos or Congo.

THE REGIME

THE ROYAL HOUSE

"Imam Ahmad—The Only Support of Stability." Writing at the beginning of the year on the struggle for power in Yemen, Al-Hayāt's "Arab, elder statesman" wrote that Imam Ahmad was not only the absolute ruler of the country but also the only guarantee of continued stability; without him the future was uncertain. (See also p 793 for the chaos expected in Yemen after the Imam's disappearance from the scene.) Therefore the forces struggling for power were careful not to endanger the position of the Imam himself and struggled mainly among themselves. (Hayat, Jan 22)

Commenting on the Imam after the attempt on his life in March, The Times noted his "courage" and "ruthlessness." His "physical presence inspires fear as well as respect. So does his absence..."; when he was in Rome [in 1959] the local authorities in Yemen reportedly succeeded in checking an incipient revolt by making the population believe that his return was imminent. People who had come up against the Imam "grudgingly admitted that as far as the art of ruling goes, he is a "natural." He had met with considerable skill the challenge of the opposition, which aimed at modernization and looked to Abdel Nasser, by allowing foreign technicians—mainly Russians and Chinese—into the country and by joining in a federation with the UAR. He had, however, not moved from the belief that Yemen must remain isolated from the rest of the world and that the Imam was the only real authority in the country. (Times, April 1)

It was reportedly believed widely in Yemen that Imam Ahmad, who had so often escaped death at the hand of assassins, was endowed with supernatural powers of survival, that he was "stronger than death." His last escape only served to strengthen this belief. (Ayyam, April 30)

Anti-Corruption Measures. The Imam set up a special commission to fight corruption and consulted the Ulama' about employing severe forms of punishment such as whipping and imprisonment (Fat. Jaz., Jan 16, see also MER 1960, p 394). In a further attempt to stop corruption, the Imam barred access to the Royal Diwan to various officials who had misused their privileges and accepted bribes from Yemenis applying for a Royal hearing. This had led to "misunderstandings" between the Imam and his subjects. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 26)

Disciplining The Courtiers? The following story appeared in an Aden paper, from a correspondent in Ta'izz: While "still ill and temperamental," the Imam had been irritated by a continuous stream of complaints regarding misconduct by the staff of the court. Enquiries having proved to no avail, the entire staff was locked inside the Court for three days, on the Imam's orders, with only water to sustain them. Thereafter a marked decrease was noted in the complaints reaching the Imam. (Aden Chr., Sept 21)

Transferring Powers to Crown Prince Badr. [During the year, though he endeavored to keep all the reins of government firmly in his hands, the Imam apparently came to rely more and more on his son, Badr. This development was speeded up by the attempt on the Imam's life in March, when he was severely wounded (see below: The Opposition).] Though at the beginning of May the Imam was discharged from hospital and returned to Ta'izz (Ayyam, May 11), in August he had to undergo an operation. (Saba, Sept 7)

Rival Pretenders For Succession; Crown Prince Badr Versus Prince Hasan. [The two major rivals for the throne of Yemen were the Crown Prince Sayf al-Islam Muhammad al-Badr and his uncle, the Imam's brother, Sayf al-Islam al-Hasan. Primogeniture in itself was an innovation of Imam Yahya, who named his eldest son, Ahmad, Crown Prince. Traditionally, the candidate for the Imamate, chosen from among the Sayyids or descendants of the Imam Ali, was required to prove himself. In fact, Crown Prince Ahmad succeeded to the Imamate in 1948, following the assassination of Imam Yahya, only after crushing the Free Yemeni revolution and ousting his brother, Sayf al-Haq, who had joined the rebels and set himself up as a kind of constitutional Imam.]

"Badr Lacking Public Support." Badr was considered to be desirous of cooperation with the East in the development of Yemen, to be an admirer of the UAR and to trust the younger elements in Yemen.

He was reported to lack public support. Since 1959, when for four months he had ruled the country whilst his father was undergoing medical treatment in Rome, Badr had been living in semi-isolation. Badr's main support was apparently the Imam himself. The Zaydi tribes supported Hasan. (Hayat, Jan 22, April 2)

Wide Powers Conferred on Badr. In Feb, Badr, having quelled plots against him in Dec 1960 (see MER 1960, p 396), left Yemen to undergo medical treatment in Italy (Hayat, Feb 28). He was accompanied by a few friends "who remained loyal to him after most of his supporters had either left him or been jailed," namely Shaykh Ali Hussein al-Wajih [a Yemeni merchant from Aden], Brig. Yahya Gharas al-Ban and Brig. Abdallah adh-Dhahabi. (Hayat, April 2)

On hearing of the attempt on the Imam's life, Badr flew back to Yemen (Hayat, March 31). It was reported that he was encouraging visitors to his father to express their allegiance to himself as well. (Fat. Jaz., May 1)

On June 25 the Imam conferred on Badr "wide powers" including "supervision of the affairs of Yemen." In all matters requiring specific decisions, he was to refer to the Imam. Appointed as his assistants were Zayd Ibn Yahya Aqabat [former Minister of Agriculture], Muhammad Ibn Yahya Mutahhir, Qadi Abdallah ash-Shimahi, Qadi Muhammad Ibn Yahya al-Haddad and Muhammad Ibn Ahmad al-Kasbi [Governor of San'a]. The appointments were made on the recommendation of ministers and tribal leaders. Badr was to receive the general public several hours daily at his office in Ta'izz. (Falastin, June 27; Saba, June 29)

The reports of the appointment gave the impression that Badr had been made Prime Minister, causing speculation in the press: "Diplomatic circles expect the appointment to stir up opposition in the Yemen" (Ahram, June 26). Badr "has a reputation as a neutralist, with a strong attachment to the UAR." (NYT, June 27)

An Aden paper added that Badr was busy receiving diplomats and arbitrating in public disputes in contrast with the secluded life of Prince Hasan (who was at the time in Yemen, see below). (Aden Chr., June 29)

Sayf al-Islam al-Hasan—Supported By Zaydi Tribes. Prince Hasan, Yemen's representative at the UN, returned from the US in June (Saba, June 15). Earlier, he had denied all reports of a misunderstanding between himself and the Crown Prince, and said his relations with the Imam and Badr were "completely normal." (R. Baghdad, June 10-JMB, June 11)

There were widely differing versions of the reasons for his return to Yemen as well as his views on internal affairs.

Some said he had been invited by the Imam to return and linked this development to attempts to mediate between them. (Jihad, June 11; Ahram, June 12)

On the other hand, it was reported that the official reason for his return to Yemen was his mother's illness and that he was very anxious to return to New York. An [unfriendly] Cairo source reported that Hasan was put into seclusion by the Imam and never left his house except on Fridays. (Haq'a, Cairo, July 13)

The Imam, it was reported, asked Hasan to swear allegiance to Badr as Crown Prince "to avoid trouble in the future." Hasan reportedly responded "by demanding the formation of a new government and the overhaul of the financial administration and that ministers be made responsible 'to the people' [instead of to the Imam]. He reportedly deplored the 'chaos, unhappiness, and confusion' reigning in Yemen and pointed to the example of Abdel Nasser who had given workers a share in profits, whilst Yemeni workers received "starvation wages."

Hasan, it was further reported, did not swear allegiance to Badr. In this attitude, he apparently enjoyed the support of the Hashid shaykhs whom he had met in San'a at the end of Aug. Among the shaykhs he received were Shaykh ad-Dahlimi of the Adhr clan ("the largest of the Hashid clans"), Shaykh Hamid Nahir, Shaykh A'idh Qawbah and Hajj Da'us. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 24, 27, 30)

[Hasan won the support of the Zaydis, especially the tribesmen, during the years he spent amongst them as Governor-General of the northern provinces. He was appointed to this post by his brother, the Imam Ahmad in 1948, after the rebellion; later he was appointed Yemen's representative at the UN, a post he still held in 1961.]

Hasan left Yemen in Sept for Belgrade, to represent the Imam at the conference of non-aligned countries (Fat. Jaz., Sept 2). He then continued on to New York to resume his duties at the UN. His presence in Yemen was described by Aden Chronicle as "a source of embarrassment to the Imam." (Aden Chr., Oct 21)

In Nov it was reported that in an interview with an Aden journalist in New York, Hasan had said that reform in Yemen would at first be a very slow process. "Until we reach a take-off stage we will have to go slow." The people were not accustomed to change, let alone drastic revolutions in their way of life; another difficulty was the expense involved in a "nation-building programme" in a country that was "lacking in almost everything." (Aden Chr., Nov 9)

In Nov it was rumoured that Hasan's son Abdallah had been arrested in Ibb. (Fat. Jaz., Nov 11)

Badr Confirmed as Crown Prince. Badr embarked during the summer on what was described as "an energetic programme of interviews" and also sat in judgement in public disputes. (Aden Chr., July 29)

He left Yemen at the end of Sept for Zurich to continue medical treatment. (Jihad, Oct 1)

The Imam formally confirmed Badr as Crown Prince in a speech on Oct 13, calling upon the people to be loyal to him (Saba, Oct 19). Reports that the Imam had abdicated (R. Damascus, Oct 13-IMB, Oct 13) were subsequently denied. (R. Amman, Oct 14-IMB, Oct 14; Falastin, Oct 15)

Badr left Europe in Nov, stopping in Cairo for talks with Abdel Nasser (Sa'at al-Arab, Nov 14-IMB, Nov 14). He continued on to Hodeida and Ta'izz and reached San'a on Dec 13. His return was marked by public festivities and lavish praise was heaped upon him by the Yemeni press and radio. In San'a the Crown Prince declared his devotion to the homeland, his aspirations for its progress, his hatred of foreign imperialism and of its traitorous lackeys at home. (See e.g. R. San'a, Dec 1, 6, 8, 12, 13 [4, 9, 11, 14, 16]; Saba, Nov 30, Dec 28)

THE ARMED SERVICES, SECURITY AND POLICE

The Victorious Royal Regular Army (al-jaysh al-muza'far an-nizami al-maleki). This was Yemen's standing army, nominally composed of several brigades (liwa'), each including three infantry battalions (lawi), with supporting artillery, tank and machine-gun units. In 1958 its strength was estimated at about 20,000 men. Its main duties were the maintenance of internal security, the enforcement of tax-collection and policing as necessary. It was originally organized on Ottoman lines. Service was for life, and the average age was therefore high; demobilization could be bought by suitable payment. Equipment included Krupp cannons, Mauser rifles, Hotchkiss machine-guns and Russian-supplied arms, such as T34 tanks.

Part of this force was assigned as a Royal Guard (al-ukjah) of 600 men. (The Yemen, Reference Division, Central Office of Information, London, Feb 1958; Le Yemen, La Documentation Française, 1956; and background information)

The C-in-C of this army in 1961 was Muhammad Ibn Hasan ad-Darmin; Commander of the Royal Guard was Muhammad Mar'i (Nasr, May 18). Its headquarters were in San'a. (Saba, June 15)

Following popular protest the government announced it would refrain from using the army to collect tribute in kind. The army would be called out in future for such duty only in cases of default in payment. (Fat. Jaz., Jan 21)

In Oct, units of the Victorious Army with tanks and artillery paraded in San'a on the occasion of the anniversary of the Imam's accession to the throne. (Nasr, Oct 26)

Maj-Gen. Ahmad al-Anasi, commander of the Ta'izz garrison, reviewed a parade in the main square of Ta'izz. The soldiers "demonstrated their ability to defend the country against external aggression." (Saba, Dec 14)

The Defence Army (jaysh ad-difa). This force was set up by an ex-officer of the Ottoman army, Lieut-Col. Tahsin al-Faqir, who trained groups of Yemeni tribesmen in four-month training courses. It was claimed that over 50,000 men, all of them Zaydis, had been given basic military training by 1940. An Iraqi military mission gave this force some further training in 1940-43. In 1943 it was nominally organized in one brigade of infantry supported by one battalion of machine-guns. Estimates of its strength varied considerably but, during the last few years, it probably stood at about 3,000 men. Trained tribesmen were transferred to the reserves, known as al-jaysh al-barrani (see below). (Qalb al-Yemen by Lieut-Col. Muhammad Hasan, member of Iraqi military mission to the Yemen, 1940-43, Baghdad, 1947 and miscellaneous sources)

C-in-C of the Defence Army in 1961: (Gen.) Abd al-Qadir Ibn Abdallah Abu Talib (Nasr, May 18). [Politically, this army was considered loyal to Crown Prince Badr.]

The Reserve Army (al-jaysh al-barrani, literally: The External Army). [This force was the emergency reserve and theoretically included all able-bodied tribesmen, some of whom received training in the Defence Army (see above).]

The National Army (al-jaysh al-watani). In 1960 the Imam ordered the formation of a modern army, to be known as the National Army, to defend the country against "the greedy ones who lie in wait and to 'liberate' the parts of the homeland held by the colonialists." A first group of Yemeni youth completed training in San'a. Their officers, also Yemenis, were trained at the UAR military college, cadets and NCOs at the Yemeni military college in San'a. These officers were reported as training the army in modern methods and in the use of modern light and heavy weapons including Russian T-34 tanks, armoured cars, howitzers, field artillery, mortars, anti-aircraft guns and anti-tank guns. There was also a signals unit. The recruits had not served previously in either the Victorious Army or the Defence Army.

The intention was said to be inculcation of military discipline, a high morale and a sense of loyalty to the officers.

The Imam appointed Col. Muhammad Abd al-Khaliq Hajar to command this army. He had graduated from the Iraqi military academy in Baghdad in 1937, held various posts in the Yemeni armies, and served as staff officer on the Military Committee of the Arab League. Whilst in Cairo, he attended the UAR Staff College and was later re-assigned to Yemen to his new command. (Fat. Jaz., Jan 13; Aden Chr., Jan 19)

The Air Force, Meteorological Service. [The Yemeni air force was equipped with Russian Yak 11 piston-engined fighter aircraft. There were no indications that any newer type of aircraft had been delivered.]

Commander of the air force and Director of the Yemeni Airways Company: Brig. Ghali Ibn Ahmad al-Jarmuzi. (Saba, Dec 28)

Director of Hodeida Airport: Muhammad al-Faqih. (Saba, March 6)

Commander of Pilots and Parachutists Schools (opened in 1960) and of the NCO school: Col. Muhammad Salih al-Ulaifi. (Narr, March 26)

Four officers who were to set up meteorological stations in Ta'izz, Hodeida and San'a under the supervision of a Russian expert, returned in 1961 from training in the USSR. (Narr, April 20, names given)

Parachute School. The first course of Yemeni parachutists graduated in March at the Parachutists School, where they had been trained by Russian instructors. They numbered 50 men, divided into platoons of ten each. In April they jumped from 5,000 feet to a target near Hodeida. The Imam Ahmad ordered the expansion of the school, and the selection of new recruits. (Narr, March 26, April 20; Falastin, April 12; Saba, April 13; R. San'a, April 9, 11, 18 [W 13, 20, 27])

The Navy. [Several coastguard vessels constituted a nucleus of a Yemeni navy.] Sixty cadets at the military academy in San'a were to leave for Russia to train on coastguard vessels there. They were to return after six months, accompanying three motor boats given to Yemen by Russia. (Fat. Jaz., May 8)

UAR Military Aid. UAR experts were reportedly reorganizing the Yemeni armies. (R. Cairo in Hebrew, July 24, 1960-IMB, July 25, 1960; see also above: The National Army.)

In June Brig. Ahmad al-Anasi [subsequently promoted and appointed commander of the Ta'izz garrison of the Victorious Army] returned to Yemen from Cairo, where he had talks with President Nasser on behalf of the Yemeni army. (Saba, June 29)

In Aug UAR military experts were reported to have arrived in Ta'izz to advise on fortifications in Shaykh Sa'id on the heights overlooking the straits of Bah al-Mandeb. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 12)

USSR Military Aid; Decay of Russian Equipment. [In 1956 a small air arm was built up with Russian and Czech aid and some T-34 tanks and light artillery were supplied. Most of the equipment remained immobile and much of it became unserviceable.] Russia sent instructors to Yemen to train Yemeni soldiers in parachuting and the use of Russian arms. (Times, July 27, 1960; Kilah, Aden, Dec 18)

In Jan 16 Yemeni army officers arrived in Hodeida with their men to take over radio-equipped vehicles which had arrived on a Russian ship. (Saba, Jan 9)

In May it was reported in Aden that 11 Russian experts had arrived in Yemen to check the military equipment bought from Russia at a cost of 9.5 million dollars. It had begun to rust and decay, and the Russians, it was reported, hoped to save at least part of the arms and train Yemenis in their maintenance. (Fat. Jaz., May 24)

Later the Imam reportedly ordered an inspection of arms in the Hajja arsenals. Some of the rifles were found to have suffered from insects and rust. Most of them were Russian-made. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 12)

A [hostile] source said the Imam was refraining from handing over newly arrived Czech arms to the army for fear they would be used in revolt against him. (Akhbar al-Yaum, Dec 30)

Political Opposition of Army Officers. See below: Opposition to the Regime.

ECONOMIC STRUCTURE AND PROJECTS

[With the completion of Ahmadi port at Hodeida and the progress in road construction linking the country's main centres, with the aid of the USSR, China and the USA (see: Foreign Relations), the first signs appeared in 1961 of the beginnings of modern economic institutions and development.]

Projected Companies. In Feb it was reported that the Minister of Public Works met with a group of leading merchants in Hodeida. They agreed "in compliance with his Majesty's desire" to explore the possibilities of establishing a transport company and a network of road communications linking the whole country. A committee was set up to start the formation of an electricity company. Other proposals were for a water corporation in view of the water shortage, the establishment of a Yemen Bank and the minting of new currency to replace the Maria Theresa Thalers. (Aden Chr., Feb 9)

Transport Company. The Passengers Road Transport Company Ltd. was founded in Feb. Shares were floated in Yemeni towns. In Sept it was reported that the company was "working hard" to link up Hodeida and San'a with other towns by bus service. (R. San'a, Feb 14 [W 23]; Narr, March 26; R. San'a, Sept 3 [7])

Factories. In Feb Amin Qasim Muhammad Sultan (a Yemeni entrepreneur from Aden) received from the Imam a permit to establish a number of enterprises to "boost the country's economy." Amongst these were metal works and a fruit and vegetables canning factory in Hodeida. (Saba, Feb 6)

In Dec Badr discussed the projected national company to set up cement factories. (San'a, Dec 21 [W 82])

Ministry of Trade Proposed. A Ministry of Trade was to be set up with its head office in Hodeida and would comprise departments of foreign exchange control and foreign trade. (Narr, April 6)

Electricity Company. [A contract for the supply of electricity and water to San'a was granted in June to a company headed by Sayyid Ali Abdallah al-Amrili.] In July it was reported that the Imam had "approved the conversion of the Government Electricity Company into a national company." (R. San'a, July 26 [W Aug 3])

Fuel Company. In Aug it was reported that a Royal Charter for a national fuel corporation had been issued to Crown Prince Badr on the following conditions: (a) all shareholders to be Yemenis; (b) the entire subscribed capital to be Yemeni; (c) the charter of the corporation to be renewed every 30 years "to safeguard the public from exploitation"; (d) in order that the public might benefit, profits should not exceed 10%. (Aden Chr., Aug 17)

A Royal decree provided, inter alia, that the company had the right to import and sell fuel and was responsible for its distribution throughout Yemen. It had to maintain a local six months reserve; storage tanks would be situated at Hodeida; the Foreign Ministry would be supplied with copies of all offers received by the company from abroad. (R. San'a, Sept 7 [9])

In Oct the company discussed oil imports with foreign suppliers, Soviet and Western. (Aden Chr., Sept 14)

Airline. In Aug the Imam issued a decree setting up a Yemeni Airline to operate domestic and international services to be financed by Yemeni capital only and operated by the government. (NCNA, Aug 10 [W 17]; Aden Chr., Aug 17)

Chamber of Commerce. In Nov it was reported that the Imam had ordered the establishment of a chamber of commerce in Hodeida with branches in other Yemeni towns. (R. San'a, Nov 27 [W Dec 7])

TRIBAL AFFAIRS

Tribal Conferences. After the attempt on the Imam's life (March 26), tribal leaders were summoned to Hodeida. Such summonses, it was reported, could be made only in the event of the death of the Imam or for a renewal of allegiance (Mid. Mir., April 8). Bakil and Khawlan shaykhs were specifically mentioned by an Aden paper, which added that the summonses were issued by Badr and did not carry the Imam's seal. (Fat. Jaz., May 8)

In June, it was reported, the Imam held another tribal leaders' conference in Ta'izz, from which Hashid and Bakil shaykhs were "conspicuously absent." [The Zaydi tribes, and especially the Hashid, were reported to show support for Amir Hasan, the Imam's brother and a contender for the succession. See above: The Royal House: Sayf al-Islam al-Hasan.] (Aden Chr., June 8)

Miscellaneous. In Feb the al-Azaniyah tribes returned to Sawma'ah near Al-Bayda, having earlier fled after skirmishes with Protectorate forces. They were granted financial resettlement aid by the governor of Al-Bayda, Salihi Ibn Naji ar-Ruwayshān. (Saba, Feb 2)

In Aug a dispute over land rights led to fighting between Zurayka tribesmen and Sabiha villagers in Al-Hajjal. Qadi al-Jindari governor of Al-Hajariyah, tried to mediate between the two sides. The Imam sent the Zurayka tribe 15 new rifles. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 6)

The tribesmen of Markha also received extra allotments of rifles and ammunition from the Imam "in addition to the monthly wages he was paying them." The purpose was to strengthen security in the area which was torn by traditional strife between the Sidah [those claiming descent from Muhammad] and the tribes. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 31)

In Nov Naqib Pasha Ibn Zub'ah, a chieftain of one of the Nihm tribes of Upper Yemen, escaped from Ar-Radi' prison near San'a and fled to Bayhan. (Aden Chr., Nov 16)

Eight shaykhs of the Hashid and Bakil tribes were reportedly arrested in San'a and Ta'izz on suspicion of foul play and travelling without permission. They were said to be divided between supporters of Crown Prince Badr and Prince Hasan. (Aden Chr., Nov 30)

THE OPPOSITION TO THE REGIME

ATTEMPTS ON THE LIFE OF THE IMAM

Alleged Attempt By Members of Royal Guard. On Feb 11 the Imam was said to have been slightly bruised in a collision between his car and an armoured vehicle of the Royal Guard. Amongst others, the drivers of the two vehicles were arrested and interrogated. (Fat. Jaz., Feb 27; Ahram; Falastin; Hayat, Feb 21)

In April Ahmad ash-Shāmi, who had participated in the investigation on the attempt on the Imam's life in March, reportedly told MENA that the crash had been a deliberate attempt to assassinate the Imam. (Hayat, April 12; the Ahram version of the interview, April 12, does not record this sentence.)

Attempt by Officers. On the night of March 26, the Imam was shot and wounded at the Hodeida hospital where he had gone for examinations and to visit the wounded soldiers who had been with him at the time of the car accident-assassination attempt described above.

Three men took a direct part in the attempt, it was later revealed by Ahmad ash-Shāmi, who participated in the investigation tribunal. They were Lieut. Muhammad al-Alafi, the hospital security officer, Lieut. Abdallah al-Liqyah of the Hodeida Port Fire Brigade and Lieut. Muhi al-Hindawāna (Army).

Lieut. Alafi led the Imam into a prepared ambush. The Imam had informed the hospital director of his coming visit. When the members of the Royal Guard who preceded the Imam arrived at the hospital, Lieut. Alafi asked them not to enter, saying this was the wish of the Imam, and they complied. A little later the Imam arrived and entered the building accompanied by four of his special guards. Inside the hospital, the three officers opened fire on the Imam from different directions. His guards fled. The Imam was hit by one bullet in the shoulder and two in the thigh; as he fell he also hit his head on the ground. The assailants scattered.

Alafi took cover in a house, from which he opened fire at his pursuers, killing one of them and wounding two. Finally he shot himself. Al-Liqyah and Hindawāna were arrested. (Ahram; Hayat, April 12; MENA, April 11 [13])

An Aden paper claimed that Alafi was an educated man and an ardent nationalist. He had studied [in the military college] under Jamāl Jamil, the Iraqi officer who had played a prominent part in the abortive revolution of 1948. Alafi had been one of the officers whom Amir Hasan had compelled to attend the execution of Jamil. (Ayyam, April 30)

Hashid Tribe Involved? According to a Lebanese source, the assassination attempt was thought to be an act of blood vengeance by the Hashid tribe. In 1960 the Imam had executed Hāmid al-Ahmar, the Head Shaykh (shaykh al-mashayikh) of the Hashid tribal federation (qabīlah). The reason for this execution reportedly was, that the Hāshid (as well as the Baqil) were supporting Hasan against Badr for the succession to the throne (Hawadith, March 31). Ahmad ash-Shāmi later stated that in searches in the houses of suspects, important documents were found on the 1959 plot by Ibn al-Ahmar, the Hāshid Shaykh, against the Imam; more names of persons connected with that plot were thus discovered (Hayat, Ahram, April 12; MENA, April 11 [15]). [Shāmi did not directly connect the Hāshid with the assassination attempt nor did Al-Hawadith offer any proof for its statement. No report was available as to whether the accused were Hāshidis. For the Imam-Hāshid feud, compare MER 1960, pp. 394-5]

Investigation Tribunal, Executions. A special tribunal, headed by Crown Prince Badr, was set up to investigate the attack; it comprised six officers and six civilians, including Ahmad ash-Shāmi as personal representative of the Imam.

There were many arrests, figures quoted ranging from 40 to 200. (R. San'a, March 29 [April 4]; R. Amman, March 30 [April 4]; Fat. Jaz., March 31; Hayat, April 12)

On April 9, the Cairo office of the Imam announced that five Yemenis had been sentenced to death for complicity in the attack (NYT, April 11). On May 20 Hindawana and Liqyah were publicly beheaded in Ta'izz. (Saba, May 21; R. San'a, May 21 [23])

Rumour Campaign: The Imam's Health. [For some weeks after the assassination attempt, rumours spread (and were apparently encouraged by various opposition circles) that the Imam's condition was extremely serious or even that he had died. The regime strove to convince the population that this was untrue.]

On March 29, a message by Badr, in the name of the Imam, was broadcast over San'a Radio in order to "enlighten [the people] about the safety of the Imam and Islam, and so that you may not be misled by the falsehoods of the evil-mongers"; the Imam had "escaped unharmed except for slight injuries" (BBCM, April 4). The next day Saba, the Ta'izz paper, even wrote that the Imam was not hurt at all (Saba, March 31). [There were many subsequent reports and announcements designed to emphasize that the reins of government were firmly in the hands of the Imam.]

At the end of April two Yemeni opposition groups in Aden, the (Free) Yemen Union and the Greater Yemen Association (see below: Opposition Abroad) spread a rumour through the Aden paper Al-Yaqazah to the effect that the Imam had died. (ANA, April 29 [May 2])

On May 4 San'a Radio broadcast, for the first time since the assassination attempt, a speech by the Imam himself. He said he deliberately made his voice heard "so that you may be left in no doubt about my health." He still had some wounds left but did not intend to go abroad for treatment [as had also been rumoured]. He denounced the "charges made by interested parties that the Imam rules Yemen by blood and iron. May God stifle ... these liars." (Aden Chr., May 11)

On May 8 the Imam, accompanied by Badr, returned from Hodeida to Ta'izz. (Ayyam, May 11)

More Attempts on the Imam's Life Reported. In Aug it was reported that a soldier of the Imam's bodyguard had plotted to blow up the royal palace in Ta'izz where the Imam was in residence. He had deposited with the Royal Guard a box which he said contained money but in fact contained explosives. The guards' suspicions were aroused and they arrested the soldier who committed suicide on the spot. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 13)

In Dec a plot against the Imam and the Crown Prince was reportedly discovered by the police who arrested the conspirators and confiscated arms, ammunition and foreign currency. (Gumhuriyah, Dec 14)

POLITICAL OPPOSITION OF ARMY OFFICERS

(See also above: Attempts on the Life of the Imam)

Col Jayfi. In May it was reported that Col. Hamūd Ibn Hamūd al-Jayfi (spelt also al-Jā'ifi), accompanied by a sergeant, and a private soldier, had escaped from Ghamdān prison to Bayhan. In Aug, Jayfi left Aden for Rome for medical treatment.

Col. Jayfi graduated from the military academy of Baghdad. On his return to Yemen, he led a campaign against the Dīhāgh tribes and won the battle of Hamara, during which he was wounded. He was later appointed commander of the San'a military college. At the time of the 1948 coup d'état the Imam appointed him Director of General Security in Ta'izz province. Later, the revolutionary government ordered him to go to Aden. After the counter-coup he was jailed for nearly eight years in Hajja. His health having suffered, he was transferred to a hospital following personal intervention by Badr who, from 1955, appointed him to various posts.

According to reports quoted in Al-Jihād, Jayfi was arrested at the end of 1960 after a plot against Crown Prince Badr had been discovered in Dec (see MER 1960, p. 396). According to Fatāt al-Jazirah, he had taken no part in the political struggle but his enemies had alleged that he had been supporting Badr and plotting against the Imam. (Jihād, Jordan, May 18; Fat. Jaz., June 1, Aug 14)

In Jan the arrest was reported of ten men who had been discharged from the army after "the incident which led to the deaths of Qādi al-Jahari and his brother." A search revealed dynamite in their possession and a secret hideout in San'a. (Fat. Jaz., Jan 20)

OTHER DISSENSIONS AND OPPOSITION INSIDE YEMEN

Shāfi'i-Zaydi Split. According to Al-Hayāt's "Arab elder statesman," a group existed in the south which wished to separate the Shāfi'i south from the Zaydi north of the country. (Hayat, Jan 22)

Qahtāni-Hāshimi Differences. The above-mentioned source said a "Qahtāni nationalist movement" existed, especially amongst the educated youth, which would like to see the Imam's family, which was of "Adāni-Hāshimi" stock, "return to Hijaz whence they had come." (Hayat, Jan 22; and the Qahtāni-Hāshimi differences, see MER 1960, p. 394.)

Factionalism. In March, an article in Saba on "the duty of youth" called for a fight against "factionalism" (at-tafrīqah) spread by "unscrupulous and inhuman people." (Saba, March 2; for another article in the same vein, see Nasr, March 26.)

Qādi Ahmad as-Siyāghī, Governor of Ibb, left his post in May on hearing of the Imam's arrival in Ta'izz and travelled to Dhala in the Aden Protectorate to seek political asylum (Aden Chr., May 11). He later arrived in Aden (Fat. Jaz., Aug 14). Siyāghī was said to support Prince Hasan and to oppose Crown Prince Badr. (Jihād, Jordan, May 15; on Siyāghī's dispute with the Imam, see also MER 1960, p. 394.)

Manifestations of Dissension; Terror; Arrests. In May it was reported that a bomb had exploded in the late Imam

Yahya's residence in San'a, which now housed the Treasury; two guards were killed. Bombs also exploded in the government house at Ibb as well as in "Hamām ash-Shifā' Palace" [no dates mentioned]. (Fat. Jaz., May 20)

After the Imam's return to Ta'izz [from Hodeida hospital] vigilance was increased and eight students were arrested on charges of conspiracy. (Fat. Jaz., May 20)

Clandestine leaflets were reportedly circulating in Yemen [no date given]. (Fat. Jaz., April 14)

[In May?] Dr Fadlallah and Yūsuf Wabbah, a merchant, were arrested in Ta'izz on charges of conspiracy. (Fat. Jaz., June 1)

[In June?] leaflets printed in Aden and calling for insurrection were circulated in Ta'izz. (Saba, June 15)

In Aug it was reported that secretly printed leaflets had been circulated in Yemen, calling for civil revolt, "down with Badr and Hasan," and the formation of a national popular government. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 6)

In Aug citizens of Ibb now residing in Aden, protested in a cable to the Imam against "the sanguinary events" which had taken place in Ibb, and the imprisonment of Ibb citizens without trial. It was reported that on Aug 11 and 12 business in Ibb was suspended and nobody was allowed in or out of the town. (Fat. Jaz., Aug 12)

Demonstrations on Breakup of the UAR. Public demonstrations were held in Ta'izz, San'a and Hodeida in protest against Syria's secession from the UAR. It was thought to be a new phenomenon in Yemeni public life for the government to allow such demonstrations. (Fat. Jaz., Oct 5)

Arrests Reported After Dissolution of Federation. At the end of Dec [after the formal dissolution of the UAR-Yemen federation] a [pro-UAR] paper reported that many arrests had been made in Yemen. All nationalist, pro-Nasser elements were under surveillance. (Hawadith, Dec 29)

OPPOSITION ABROAD: THE FREE YEMENIS

Background Note: Nu'mān and Zubayrī. [In 1944 certain disaffected Yemeni leaders went to Aden. They included, among others, al-Mutī Ibn Dūmaj, Shaykh Ahmad Muhammad Nu'mān (a Shāfi'i—see MER 1960 p 396), Sayyid Zaki al-Makki and Qādi Muhammad Mahūd az-Zubayrī (a Zaydi). In 1945 they founded a movement called "The Free Yemenis" (al-yamaniyyūn al-ahdār) later called the "Yemeni Union (al-ittihād al-yamani)" and formed a company called "The Greater Yemen Association" (jam'iyyat yaman al-kubra) to print propaganda. Zubayrī edited a newspaper, Sawt al-Yaman, which was clandestinely distributed in Yemen.

The Free Yemenis participated in the revolution during which Imam Yahya was killed. Nu'mān and Zubayrī served as ministers in Abdallah al-Wazīr's short-lived revolutionary government. Following the counter-coup, both went into exile and were latterly residing in Cairo. In 1960 Nu'mān went to Aden but was expelled, reportedly in response to a request by the Imam who suspected Nu'mān of complicity in a recent outburst of terror in Yemen; he returned to Cairo. (For further details, see MER 1960, pp 157-8, 396-7, 399.)

At the beginning of the year, an Aden paper described Nu'mān as "Leader of the Free Government of Yemen." (Fat. Jaz., Jan 2)

Free Yemen Premises in Aden Searched. Following the Imam's protests in Dec 1960 that Yemeni dissidents in Aden were responsible for the recent terrorist activities in Yemen, and a visit to Aden by Ronald Bailey, British chargé d'affaires in Ta'izz, Aden spokesmen were reported to have expressed their determination to try and prevent Yemeni terrorists from using the Colony as an operational base. (Compare MER 1960, p 399.)

On Dec 31, 1960, police searched the premises of the Yemeni Union and the house of the Union's president, Hajj Muhammad Ali al-Aswadi, who later stated that nothing incriminating had been found in his house. (Mid. Mir., Jan 7)

Free Yemen Programme: Constitutional Government; No Mention of Arab Nationalism. In April the Yemeni Union and the Greater Yemeni Association issued a statement of aims over the signatures of Aswadi, President of the Union, and Abd al-Karīm al-Anasī, Acting President of the Association. The statement said it was futile to assume—as many did—that a change of rulers alone would favourably affect the situation in Yemen, for the foundations of the regime were rotten; there was no popular constitutional regime (niḍm dūstūrī sha'bi) nor any law to limit the powers of government.

Therefore both "popular organizations" had taken the same determined stand "with the masses of the people until the Yemeni nation (al-ummah al-yamaniyah) will achieve all its aspirations for social justice, prosperity, goodness, knowledge, good government, true equality between all parts of the people, until the Yemeni nation may take its place in the community of advanced nations." "Both organizations will support any popular constitutional government stemming from the hearts of the people." "God is the guarantor of rule, and there is no government except that of the people." [It may be noted that the statement made no mention of the terms republic, Arab nationalism or an Arab nation.] (Ayyam, April 18)

Rift in Yemeni Union; Aswadi President, Radicals' Break-away. The visit to Aden of Ahmad Nu'mān in 1960, it was later reported, was for the purpose of reconstituting the Union—the Union's general committee had been inactive for four years—and he was also instrumental in founding the Yemeni Bilqis College at Shaykh Uthmān in the Western Protectorate. Nu'mān, however, was criticized by the more radical elements of the Union in Aden, who claimed he was not working wholeheartedly for the liberation of Yemen. [Compare also a description of Nu'mān as "a past revolutionary"—MER 1960, p 396.] After his return to Cairo [in June 1960] Muhammad Ali al-Aswadi assumed leadership as the Union's president. (Aden Chr., July 13)

Aswadi had lived in Aden for the past 13 years and was described as one of the Colony's leading figures. He had played an important part in the 1948 coup in Yemen but had not been given a post in the al-Wazīr government. (Mid. Mir., Jan 7)

Nu'mān—Zubayrī Leadership Attacked as Inefficient, Corrupt. In June the struggle inside the Yemeni Union apparently came to a head. An Aden paper (probably speaking for the Yemeni "radicals") attacked the Union's leadership for its inefficiency and corruption and said the Union never had any concrete programme. Mentioning Nu'mān and Zubayrī (though not explicitly accusing them), the paper alleged that huge funds had been wasted. Funds had been collected by Yemenis in Aden—who mainly came from Lower Yemen [populated by Shāfi'is]—as well as by Yemenis in Ethiopia, Sudan, Kenya, Europe and America. Funds had been used for the provision of bodyguards for the leaders, a printing press for Sawt al-

Yaman, for "high policy manoeuvres," for premises for the Greater Yemen Association and aid to political prisoners in Yemen. There was no accounting for the sums which had probably disappeared into investments, trade, etc. for private profit. This had led to unceasing friction between the "sincere nationalists" and the "opportunists." The leadership had sided with the opportunists as a victory for nationalism in Yemen would mean the end of a lucrative enterprise. The sincere nationalists had now gathered together but were faced with active opposition on the part of the entrenched leadership. The paper appealed to these leaders to be content with the profits they had made and allow "true nationalist elements" to get on with the job. (Ayyam, June 6)

Elections, Compromises, Continued Struggle. [Sources available were insufficient to provide a coherent picture of the developments inside the Union; the one fact which emerged clearly was that the rift was not healed.]

In June Aswadi, President of the Union, announced in an Aden paper that in view of the continued inactivity of the Union, elections would be held on July 22 "to avoid the chaos and favouritism which would otherwise have occurred in such a situation." Membership cards would be issued to founding members and to generous donors to the cause, whilst other members were requested to pay their dues before the elections, otherwise they would lose their right to vote. The voting register would be kept by the President. Legal steps would be taken to prevent unconstitutional voting. (Ayyam, June 22)

Some days later, Muhammad Abdallah Ali al-Fasil, writing in Al-Ayyam, deplored the fact that the "sincere nationalists" had compromised with the "cunning scoundrels" in order to preserve unity of leadership in the Union, at the price of acquiescing in their corruption. But the clock could not be turned back. The cause was no longer confined to the financial activities of a few but had spread to include labourers, teachers and scholars. (Ayyam, June 25)

According to a [rather abstruse] report, elections to the presidency of the Union were held on July 9 [and not on July 22 as announced]. The police intervened to put an end to a dispute that might have turned into violence. The report said that Aswadi was elected President [but the style of the report is such that this could be a reference to his election in 1960. Aswadi had been President at least since the end of 1960—see above]. (Aden Chr., July 13)

According to the Union's constitution, the Executive was to be elected by the General Committee, which should be composed of Yemenis only, and for one year. The General Committee which should have met twice yearly, had not convened since 1957. The present Executive was therefore declared unconstitutional [by the radicals] and was called upon to tender its resignation. (Aden Chr., July 13)

On Aug 1, Ali al-Ahmadi, S.G. of the Union, called a meeting of the General Committee (hay'ah ammah) of the Union on Sept 2 to elect a new Executive (hay'ah idariyah). (Fat. Jaz., Aug 1)

In mid-Sept the headquarters of the Union in Crater, Aden, were closed down by court order. The background to this development was the strife within the Union. As to the actual reasons, one version was that on Sept 16, Aswadi, backed by Abd al-Warith, tried to have 100 of his supporters admitted to the Union, having overruled the Executive's claim to vote their admission. The opposition to Aswadi was led by Ahmadi and Muhammad Ahmad Nu'man [the son of Ahmad Muhammad Nu'man]. A fierce argument led to a riot (Aden Chr., Sept 21). The other version had it that the opposition wished to arrange a celebration inside the headquarters but was prevented by Aswadi (Fat. Jaz., Sept 19). According to both versions, the four leaders above-mentioned were arrested and later released on bail.

Free Yemenis and the Dissolution of the UAR; "The Yemeni Liberation Movement" in Cairo. According to a Cairo source, Free Yemenis danced in the streets of Aden on hearing of Cairo's decision to dissolve the federation with Yemen [in the hope that this would herald the downfall of the Imam]. (Musawwar, Dec 29)

At the end of Dec, after a lapse of three years, Zubayri resumed his broadcasts over Cairo's "Voice of the Arabs" station, speaking in the name of the "Yemeni Liberation Movement in Cairo." He said it was the "ancient mentality which dominates authority in the Yemen" and was represented by the ruler, which was corrupting the life of the "Yemeni Arab people." It was the situation thus created which forced the masses to rejoice at the abrogation of the union. He called on the people to rise and restore dignity to Yemen and unity between the north and the south [i.e. Aden], which had been disrupted by the imperialists. (BBCM, Dec 29; Fat. Jaz., Dec 31)

Criticism of the Union. Muhammad Hamid Awlaqi [there are Awlaqi shaykhdoms in the Western Protectorate, Aden], writing in an Aden paper, deplored the factionalism evident in the Yemeni Union, and noted with regret that it seemed to be part and parcel of the Yemeni way of life. He also pointed out that Adenis had always supported the Yemeni nationalists while the latter had never troubled to return the favour. (Ayyam, June 25)

Abd ar-Rahman al-Baydani (on whom see below) wrote in 1962, before the revolution, that the Free Yemenis lacked a revolutionary plan, and a political, economic and social ideology, nor had they done anything for the people except exacerbate their hatred of the Imam. They had been solely negative in outlook, using old-fashioned party methods which caused many to turn away from them. In their claims to be the sole ones qualified to rule, they were no different from the Imam himself. (Abd ar-Rahman al-Baydani: Arrar al-Yaman, Kutub Qawmiah, Cairo, 1962, p 23)

UAR Aid To "Free Yemeni" Students. The UAR Students Union was said to have extended financial aid to Yemeni students living in Aden and affiliated to the Free Yemeni Union. (Ibid, p 208)

OTHER YEMENI OPPOSITION IN ADEN

Pro-UAR Youth Group. In April it was reported that an "Organization of Arab Youth" (munazzamat ash-shabab al-arabi) had been recently established in the Tawahi district of Aden. A statement formulated after a protracted debate called for the liberation of N. and S. Yemen from imperialism and reaction, and demanded that any liberated area immediately join the UAR. The platform was to be published shortly [no names were mentioned in this report]. (Ayyam, April 7)

"Free Progressive Arab Party" (hizb al-ahrar al-arabi at-taqadumi). In May, in a "Declaration to the Arab People of Yemen," the constituent body of such an organization announced its establishment in "Shaykh Uthman, Arab Aden," stating that it believed in the principle of "liberating our Arab Nation from the Persian Gulf to the Atlantic Ocean." It called upon Yemeni youth to dedicate itself to rescuing the Arab Nation from its present sorry state and to bring about its liberation and unity. The founding members said they were not interested in personal gain nor were they trying to hide behind resounding slogans [probably a reference to the "Free Yemenis"], and promised to remain true to their ideals. (Ayyam, May 19)

Aden Trade Union Congress. [The programme of the UAR-orientated Congress, the major local political force in Aden Colony, was the unification of Aden and Yemen under a democratic regime and union with the UAR. There was a large Yemeni element amongst the trade union members. See MER 1960, pp 384-8; this vol. pp 436 ff.]

In March the "Nationalist Bureau" (maktab qaumi) of the ATUC established a "Northern [i.e. Yemeni] Branch" (shu'bat ash-shimali). It also appointed Muhsin al-Ayni, a prominent Yemeni political exile, to an important post. (For details see below: Muhsin al-Ayni.) (Ayyam, March 16)

Tribal Leaders in Aden. Shaykh Sinān Abu Luhūm, who had taken refuge in Aden in 1960 (MER 1960, p 397), declined a verbal promise of safe conduct back into Yemen from Bayhan. He demanded a written pardon from the Imam before returning from exile. (Fat. Jas., Feb 2)

Qādi Muhammad Abdallāh ash-Shāmi succeeded in persuading three tribal leaders who had fled to Bayhan to return to Yemen following guarantee of a royal pardon. (Compare MER 1960, p 377; Jihad, Jordan, Feb 14.)

OTHER OPPOSITION ABROAD

Baydāni. At the beginning of 1961 the Yemeni Union in Aden published a lecture given by Abd ar-Rahmān al-Baydāni in Dortmund, West Germany, in which he attacked the present Yemeni regime. [Baydāni, a Shāfi'i, was a veteran of the Free Yemeni movement. He was said to have unsuccessfully attempted to enlist Egyptian support for a revolution in Yemen in 1953, and British support in 1955. He was further said to have denounced to the Imam the Englishman with whom he had been in contact in 1955, as having tried to instigate a revolt. Baydāni was then appointed by the Imam as Ambassador to Bonn, reportedly as a reward for his show of loyalty. Later, he was transferred as Ambassador to Sudan. He resigned this post in 1960 and became active as a political exile against the Imam's regime.]

In his lecture, Baydāni warned West Germany not to make agreements with Yemen, claiming that the present government was not likely to observe its obligations. A positive change in the situation in Yemen, already foreseeable, would make cooperation possible on a basis of trust. Baydāni also spoke of the situation in Yemen and of his proposals for reform. (Fat. Jas., March 5)

Baydāni's Reform Programme. In his book Secrets of Yemen, written before the 1962 Yemeni coup d'état, Baydāni set out, under the heading "The Aims of the People," a programme for a new regime in Yemen as follows:

1. a return to the true law (shari'ah) of Islam after the Hāshimī Imams had abused it for the past thousand years; cessation of feuds between all elements of the nation; abolition of racial discrimination between the Hāshimītes [to which the Hamid ad-Din dynasty belonged] and the people, Zaydis and Shāfi'is; promulgation of a law explaining the rights and duties of the citizen; no act to be regarded as criminal except as defined by law; no punishment except after fair trial according to law;

2. establishment of a Yemeni republic; elections for a representative assembly (majlis niyābi) which would elect the president of the republic;

3. realization of the aims of Arab nationalism, in order that the Arab nation might retrieve its glory [Arab union not mentioned];

4. realization of social justice;

5. establishment of a powerful national army;

6. abolition of injustices: (a) freeing of tribal hostages; (b) abolition of zakāt (tax) assessment and collection and making the payment of zakāt voluntary; (c) increase in availability of foodstuffs and encouragement of coffee-bean and other exports; (d) abolition of payment for medical treatment in hospitals and of all "health taxes"; (e) abolition of forced labour; (f) abolition of the one-fifth tax, compulsory charity and road tolls;

7. raising the standard of living: (a) comprehensive economic planning and encouragement of agriculture, industry, trade and other productive occupations; (b) improved service conditions for the army, police and officials in order to strengthen the state in its drive towards work, production and construction; (c) an educational policy to be based on the economic plan: free schooling for all; vocational training; grants to students unable financially to devote themselves to study; (d) providing the proprietors of "special enterprises" with know-how, capital and customs protection in consonance with public interest; (e) facilitating the return of emigrants to Yemen; (f) the state to provide work for all unemployed with prompt payment of salaries [there was no mention in the programme of labour affairs, trade unions, etc.];

8. the state to attain self-sufficiency by the following means: (a) land reclamation and development; (b) confiscation of lands held by the ruling family; (c) income from oil and mineral imports and "such other projects sponsored by the new state as are not taken up by individuals"; (d) fair customs tariffs; progressive income tax exempting low incomes. (Abd ar-Rahmān al-Baydāni: Aḥdār al-Yaman, Kutub Qaumiyyah, Cairo, 1962, pp 129-31)

Muhsin al-Ayni. In Jan Ayni, a former private secretary to Crown Prince Badr, was ordered by the Aden authorities to leave Aden, following Yemeni representations. Ayni left Aden on Jan 20 for Cairo. (Hayat, Jan 21; Fat. Jas., Jan 22, 23)

Ayni, aged 30, a graduate in law and economics from Cairo University, was known as a "Free Yemeni" and for the previous 18 months had lived in Aden where he taught at the Islamic College, wrote a book, "Plots Against Yemen" (mu'amarāt ala-al-yaman), which was banned in all Arab countries, and also translated a book on Yemen from French. (Hayat; Ayyam, Jan 21; Fat. Jas., Jan 22, 23)

Ayni participated in the Conference of Arab Lawyers in Cairo in Feb as a representative of "Yemeni Aden."

In March Ayni was chosen by the "National Bureau" (maktab qaumi) of the Aden Trade Union Congress (ATUC) as head of its newly-formed Committee for Arab Relations. He appeared also under the title of Permanent Representative of the ATUC in Cairo and the Arab countries. Ayni represented the "Federation of Arab Workers" [International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions?] [May Day?] celebrations in East Germany. (Ayyam, Feb 15, March 16, 23, May 19)

THE DANGERS OF CHANGE ANARCHY PREDICTED

"After the Imam—Chaos." It was widely assumed that after a possible collapse of the Imam's rule, by his forcible removal or otherwise, Yemen might be plunged into a state of chaos.

Thus, Al-Haydi's "Arab elder statesman" observed that Cairo had been fostering groups of young Yemeni nationalists, but had not encouraged them to take action for fear that the collapse of the Imam's rule would plunge the country into a state of chaos which would be difficult to arrest, while providing opportunities for "British and Saudi Arabian expansionism." (Hayat, Jan 22)

A British observer, writing in 1960, said that Yemen lacked both the social and economic prerequisites for transformation into a "new style nationalist state." "The alternative to theocratic absolutism in the Yemen is not Arab Nationalism but anarchy. Even had Crown Prince Badr succeeded in ousting his father's adherents in the summer of 1959 he would have been forced to employ the same methods of rule as his father or see the Shāfi'i tribes revolt against Zaydi rule, and retreat into inter-tribal anarchy." (D.C. Watts: New Threats to Britain's Strategic Position in West Asia, Aden and Somalia: International Relations Journal of the David Davies Memorial Institute, London, Vol. 2 No. 2, Oct 1960, p 88)

The Resistance To Change. After the attempted assassination of Imam Ahmad in March, Aden Chronicle commented that his death could be a prelude to disorder and civil war. Observing that violence was the only way to bring about political change in autocratically-ruled Yemen, the writer cautioned that nevertheless in this,

"one of the world's most outmoded states," "change, if and when it comes, must be introduced with utmost care..." The resistance of a deeply entrenched hierarchy and retinue would have to be overcome. "Immense governmental prestige and power are required to convince the masses as well that any political, economic and social change is going to do them good, given faith and patience" (Aden Chr., April 6). Communism, "religious dissension and resultant divisions among the tribes" were liable to result from the Imam's death. (Aden Chr., May 11)

Prospects For "Another Congo." A gloomy prediction of the fate of Yemen if the Imam were eliminated appeared in another Aden paper: The dark ages would come to life, civil strife would erupt; fanatical tribalism would rear its head; Yemen would be turned into a battlefield of the cold war, and the Arab countries themselves would intervene. Yemen, divided among warring factions and leaders, would become a new Congo or Laos.

This was not too pessimistic a picture, the writer said; the present regime had grown out of the deep divisions in the country and the same divisions made its continued existence still possible. The Imam perhaps kept the balance between the various forces but at the same time he destroyed the state from within. However, there was no new leadership capable of rallying the country after the elimination of the Imam and the dissensions which had been encouraged under the Imam's regime would yield bitter fruit.

The "free Arab countries" and especially the UAR should be on the alert, though they should not intervene as long as the Imam was alive. (Ayyem, April 9)

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SYNOPSIS

In December the UAR (Egypt) dissolved the United Arab States, its federation with Yemen, on the grounds of incompatibility of the regimes and ineffectiveness. Just as the establishment of the federation, on the Imam's initiative, some three years and ten months earlier, followed upon the Egyptian-Syrian union, so did the dissolution follow upon the latter's breakup. The dissolution was preceded by the publication of a poem by the Imam, in which he denounced the policy of nationalization of property—an obvious, though indirect, criticism of President Abdel Nasser. The federation had never been implemented and Cairo commented that the Imam had never intended it to be more than a means of forestalling a civil uprising and perpetuating his regime. The dissolution made no difference to Yemen's international status as she had never given up any attributes of sovereignty or independent diplomatic representation.

Yemen's relations with the other Arab countries were generally friendly, especially so with Saudi Arabia and Jordan (the two other remaining Arab kingdoms in the ME); with Jordan she established diplomatic relations (see p 158 b).

In the international field Yemen continued to pursue a policy of neutrality and to enjoy its fruits in the form of aid. Yemen was represented at the Belgrade Conference of Non-Aligned Countries (pp 56 ff) and at other neutralist and Afro-Asian gatherings.

Communist aid continued. The Russians completed the construction of Ahmadi port at Hodeida and continued other economic and technical as well as military assistance. In November the Chinese completed the construction of the Hodeida—San'a road; no reports were received of any new Chinese projects. Yemenis continued to study in Russia and China. Both countries repeatedly received warm praise from Yemeni spokesmen and in the press. Ties also developed between Yemen and other Communist countries: East Germany, Czechoslovakia, North Korea, Rumania, North Vietnam and Yugoslavia.

US aid was designed to provide an alternative to exclusive Yemeni dependence on the Communist countries. The US continued with road building and water supply projects and made a grant of wheat. A number of Yemenis were granted scholarships for study in the USA. An independent American operator was granted an oil concession in Yemen.

Relations with the United Kingdom continued to centre on Aden, which Yemen claimed as part of her territory. However, as already pointed out in MER 1960 (p 397), the more immediate concern of the Imam was with the Yemeni opposition in Aden which he suspected of responsibility for terrorist activities in Yemen. It was reported that Yemen and the UK achieved an understanding on this question. According to a hostile source, the Imam had agreed in return to withhold aid from the rebels in Aden Protectorate.

As to Yemen's relations with other countries, her technical cooperation with Western Germany is worthy of note, as well as the establishment of diplomatic relations with Ethiopia and Somalia, Yemen's neighbours across the Red Sea.

THE USSR

Political Relations; Denunciation of "Western Imperialism." [Relations between Yemen and the USSR remained cordial throughout the year, with both sides repeatedly reaffirming their intention to continue cooperation based on true friendship.]

Yemen's dispute with Britain over Aden was cited as a foremost example of its struggle against imperialism. A Pravda article assured the Yemeni people of the continued "moral support" of the Soviet Union in this connection. (Pravda, Jan 31)

An Izvestia commentary said there had been many reports about American infiltration in Yemen "through the so-called US aid and the so-called experts." Yemen had been told by the US that all the experts must be regarded as diplomats. Thus a number of bulldozer drivers arrived in Yemen carrying diplomatic passports. These experts cost Yemen so much that they would swallow up the greater part of the alleged US aid. (R. Moscow, Jan 5 [SU 7])

On the occasion of Yemen's National Day, a message from President Brezhnev and PM Khrushchov to the Imam expressed the "profound sympathy" of the Soviet people "for the just struggle of the Yemeni people against the intrigues of the imperialist powers, for the strengthening of the national independence of their country and the further consolidation of its political and economic independence." (R. Moscow, Oct 18 [SU 20])

In Nov a Yemeni paper criticized the USSR for developing atomic weapons instead of using available funds to aid developing countries. The paper upheld the example of West Germany as a country which the USSR could emulate. (Saba, Nov 16)

Hodeida (Ahmadi) Harbour Completed. The construction of the Soviet-built harbour at Hodeida on the Red Sea coast was officially completed at the end of March (see also MER 1960, p 398). The port was named Ahmadi in honour of the Imam. A Soviet delegation, headed by V.G. Bakayev, the Minister of Merchant Marine, arrived at Ahmadi Port on March 30 in a Soviet ship. He was received by Amir Sayf al-Islam Abd ar-Rahman (the Imam being indisposed following the attempt on his life a week earlier) who praised Yemeni-Russian friendship "established on a basis of sincere and pure cooperation of which this port is the magnificent fruit."

On April 2 the port was officially handed over to Yemen. (Pravda, April 2; Izvestia, April 4, 9; Nasr, April 6)

The completion of the project was prominently reported in the Soviet press which contrasted the "enthusiastic" welcome accorded to the Soviet delegation with the unfriendly attitude allegedly displayed by the local population towards the US torpedo boat "Strong" which had earlier entered Ahmadi port "uninvited" and "ungreeted." (Izvestia, May 6)

The Yemeni press praised the Russian aid: The agreement had been fulfilled to the letter, the Russian experts had worked devotedly, Russia had proved that she respected the sovereignty of every state and had only aimed at cooperation and friendship between the two countries. Russia treated all countries, great and small, as equals. (Nasr, April 6, 13)

In an exchange of messages with the Imam, PM Khrushchov emphasized that Soviet aid had no "selfish aims" and recalled that the USSR and Yemen had maintained cordial relations for more than thirty years. (Pravda, April 12)

Minister Bakayev, writing in Pravda, pointed out that the building of Ahmadi port would allow Yemen to free herself of dependence on the port of Aden, a dependence which had hitherto enabled the British to "shackle" Yemen's national aspirations and, at the same time, to make "huge profits" at Yemen's expense.

Both Bakayev and G. Pyatskii, director of the Soviet construction team at Ahmadi, writing in Izvestia, stressed the climatic and topographic difficulties encountered by Soviet planners and engineers. The lack of skilled local manpower was a further hindrance, successfully overcome by the training of native personnel in Yemen as well as in the Soviet Union. (Pravda, March 25; Izvestia, March 26)

According to a Russian source, the cost of the port came to about 60 million roubles. The port comprised three dry cargo wharfs and an oil jetty capable of handling 300,000 tons of cargo annually, including 100,000 tons of fuel products, and of accommodating ships displacing up to 10,000 tons. The entire equipment of the port, stated to be among the most modern in the world, including storage tanks, gantry cranes, power and radio stations, repair workshops and other facilities, was manufactured in the Soviet Union and supplied under a long-term credit. (International Affairs, Sept; R. Moscow, April 8 [SU 10]; Time, April 14; Saba, July 13)

The Yemeni newspaper Saba was quoted to the effect that Yemeni personnel trained in the Soviet Union would handle the general work of the port whilst Soviet technicians would continue to maintain various facilities (R. Baghdad, Feb 20 [W 23]). In April the Yemeni Minister of Navy said that "many young Yemenis" including pilots, had returned from training courses in Russia and were ready to take up the running of the port (Saba, April 13). In Oct 60 Yemeni trainees were due back from the Soviet Union. (Aden Chr., Oct 9)

Originally some 300 Soviet specialists were directly engaged in the construction of the port (see MER 1960, p 398). The return of 50 Soviet technicians to the Soviet Union was reported in the Egyptian press in June. (Haq'iq, June 1; Akhir Sa'ah, June 14)

Bab al-Mandeb Bunkering Port Project. In Jan and April negotiations were reported between Yemen and the USSR for the construction of a fuel bunkering port on the Yemeni coast near the Bab al-Mandeb straits. It was commented that such a port would challenge the monopoly hitherto enjoyed by Aden port in this area. (MENA, Jan 13 [16]; Haq'iq, April 20)

Agreement Reported on Hodeida-Ta'izz Road Project. In March Yemen and Russia were reported to have signed an agreement for the construction of a road between Hodeida and Ta'izz. The necessary equipment was expected to reach Hodeida shortly. (Saba, March 16)

Soviet Aid in General. In July, on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the economic cooperation agreement between the USSR and Yemen, a Russian embassy official in Ta'izz listed the following items of Russian assistance: the construction of Ahmadi Port which had cost some 60 million roubles; a longterm loan for an oil storage project [at Ahmadi port]; 15 Soviet physicians were working in San'a, Ta'izz and Hodeida; 20 places had been allocated to Yemeni students in Russian academic institutions; 20 Yemenis had gone to Russia to study the Russian language; 61 students had successfully completed nautical training [and training in port facilities] in Odessa; 5 Soviet crews were operating Yemeni civil aircraft. Saba highly praised the cooperation with the Soviets. (Saba, July 15)

[It may be noted that there is no mention in this list either of the Bab al-Mandeb port project or of the Hodeida-Ta'izz project which had been reported on earlier in the year.]

Soviet Red Cross Aid. The Soviet Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies sent a shipment of 1,500 tons of cement, 50 tons of flour and 10,000 metres of cotton cloth for the relief of the victims of a fire in Hodeida (R. Moscow in Arabic, Feb 14 [SU 16]). A broadcast from San'a expressed appreciation for "this noble humanitarian gesture" and underlined its significance for relations between the Soviet Union and Yemen. (R. San'a, March 22 [25]; Nasr, March 26)

Soviet Military Aid. See p 697

Trade—Oil. It was reported in Oct that negotiations were taking place for the purchase by Russia of some 1,500 tons of Yemeni coffee, nearly half the country's annual crop, in exchange for Russian sugar and cement.

The same source reported that Soviet experts had been called in to advise the Fuel Supply Company, founded in Sept, on storage and distribution matters. (Aden Chr., Oct 5)

The company discussed oil imports with foreign suppliers: the Soviet Oil Organization, Shell, Caltex and Standard [7] quoted prices and were asked what aid they would offer the Yemeni company.

The Russians had built the oil storage tanks at Ahmadi port, Aden Chronicle reported, and had been convinced that they would be awarded the oil supply contract. The quotations given by the western companies were low, in an attempt to curtail Soviet influence in Yemen. (Aden Chr., Sept 14; R. San'a, Oct 25 [27])

PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Yemeni Muslim Delegation To China Favourably Impressed; Expressions of Friendship. A Yemeni Muslim delegation led by Sayyid Ahmad Ibn Muhammad Zabarah left Peking on Dec 31, 1960. The delegation spent one month in China touring Islamic establishments and was received by Mao Tse-tung. (NCNA, Dec 31, 1960 [FE, Jan 4, 1961])

Both Zabarah and another member of the delegation, Muhammad Ibn Yahya al-Haddad, reported at home that they had met many Chinese Muslims and had seen them enjoying full religious freedom; Muslims were to be found in high political and other positions. In the communes and elsewhere, Haddad said, he had found freedom of speech, enthusiasm and devotion to work; the women took part in the creative activity which was China's hallmark. (NCNA, Feb 6 [FE 9]; Saba, March 16)

An article in the Yemeni An-Nasr reportedly hailed the friendship between the Yemeni and Chinese peoples, praised the modesty of the Chinese people and said that the Yemenis had a feeling of fellowship towards the Chinese whose achievements they admired. (NCNA, Aug 9 [FE 11])

In messages to the Imam and the Crown Prince on the occasion of Yemen's National Day, Chairman Liu Shao-chi and Premier Chou En-lai expressed the hope that "the close cooperation between the two countries will become stronger and develop daily." (R. Peking, Oct 11 [FE 14])

Aid; Hodeida-San'a Road Completed. Prince Hasan, Yemeni representative at the UN, told a journalist that the aid from China was not a gift, as commonly thought, but a long-term loan. (Aden Chr., Nov 9)

The construction of the Hodeida-San'a road, begun with the assistance of China in 1959, was completed in Nov [see also MER 1960, p 398]. Some 230 km in length, the road links the interior of the country with the Russian-built Ahmadi port at Hodeida. (NCNA in English, Dec 12 [W 14]). [In Dec the road was finally opened to traffic throughout its full length.]

Trade. A Chinese trade fair opened in Ta'izz on Jan 7; it had been arranged previously in Hodeida and San'a. At the opening ceremony, the Commercial Counsellor of the Chinese legation expressed his satisfaction at the cooperation that marked relations between China and Yemen "despite American intrigues." (Saba, Jan 19; ANA, Jan 22 [24]; NCNA, Feb 1 [FE 9])

Students in China—And Their Problems. In Feb it was reported that six of the 70 Yemeni students studying in Peking had returned to Yemen and complained that as part of their study course in Peking they had been compelled to study Marxism-Leninism. The Imam was said to have instructed a member of a Yemeni delegation visiting China to investigate the complaint. (R. London, Feb 23-IMB, Feb 24)

In Dec a letter from a Yemeni student in China said that 54 Yemenis were studying there, seven road-construction and 47 various trades of textile manufacturing. The writer urged that better qualified students be chosen in future; they should have secondary education, know at least one foreign language and, last but not least, they should be devout Muslims, strong in their faith and convictions so that they may not be led astray by the "currents of depraved civilization." (Saba, Dec 14)

OTHER COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

German Democratic Republic. In Jan Qadi Abdallah al-Hajari, Yemeni Minister of Communications, arrived in the GDR for a three-week study-tour. He reportedly told the press that the cooperation with the GDR had already brought great benefits to Yemen's telephone and telegraph services. (ADN, Jan 18 [EE 20]; Saba, Feb 2)

On Nov 21 Crown Prince Badr received the GDR Ambassador to the UAR. According to a GDR report, they discussed the German problem and relations between the two countries in a friendly atmosphere. (ADN, Nov 22 [EE 24])

Czechoslovakia. In April the Czechoslovak Ambassador to Cairo presented his credentials to the Imam as his country's first Minister to Yemen. (Ahram, Feb 2, March 25; R. Cairo, April 20-IMB, April 20)

North Korea. A North Korean trade mission visited Yemen between Dec 28, 1960 and Jan 14, 1961 and was received in audience by the Imam. On Jan 11 a trade agreement as well as a protocol for the exchange of trade representatives was signed. North Korea would export machinery, chemicals and textile fabrics in exchange for coffee, cotton, leather and various agricultural products. A joint communiqué stated that the discussions had also turned on the need for the "strengthening of friendly relations between the two countries in the course of the struggle for world peace and against imperialism." (KCNA, Jan 16 [FE 19]; R. San'a, Jan 17 [19], Saba, Feb 2)

Rumania. The Rumanian Ambassador to the UAR, Constantin Stanesco, was accredited as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in the Yemen. (R. Bucharest, May 25 [EE 27])

North Vietnam. A trade agreement and a protocol for the exchange of trade representatives was signed between North Vietnam and Yemen in Feb. (R. San'a, Feb 7 [W 16]; VNA, Feb 28 [FE March 1])

Yugoslavia. A Yugoslav economic delegation arrived in Yemen on Jan 13 for commercial talks with the government and merchants. The Yemeni side also raised the question of cultural ties. (Saba, Feb 2)

The Yugoslav Ambassador to Cairo served also as non-resident Minister to Yemen. (Ahram, June 27)

THE UNITED KINGDOM

(Aden)

Talks, Cooperation on: Aden Border Problems, Tribal Warfare, Subversive Activity. On Jan 1, Ronald Bailey, British chargé d'affaires in Yemen, returned to Ta'izz, bearing with him, it was reported, assurances of Britain's goodwill towards Yemen. On his return, it was reported, Bailey engaged in "cordial discussion with a high ranking official" but according to a UAR source his request for a meeting with the Imam was not met. (Mid. Mir., Jan 7; Ahram, Jan 9)

Bailey had gone to Aden in Dec 1960 to consult on matters relating to a possible connection between recent bomb explosions in Yemen and Yemeni exiles living in Aden. Allegations emanating from Cairo that Bailey had been expelled were denied. (MER 1960, p 399)

Aden spokesmen were reported to have said that the authorities had assured Bailey of their determination to try and prevent Yemeni terrorists from using the Colony as an operational base. Proof of this was provided by a search of the premises of the Yemeni Union in Aden (Mid. Mir., Jan 7). [This anti-Imam Yemeni organization of political exiles continued to be active in the Colony throughout the year; see above.] According to a British source, Britain had agreed to curb the activities of the Yemeni exiles "if and when they are proved to be hostile to Yemen." (Scotsman, Feb 3)

An anti-Imam source said later that Britain and the Imam had reached a non-aggression agreement and the Imam had agreed to withhold aid from the rebels in Aden Protectorate. (Hurriyah, Beirut, quoted by Aden Chr., March 9)

On Jan 22 an official announcement from the Federation of the Amirates of the South [Western Aden Protectorate] reported a border-clash between Yemen and Bayhan tribes. 40 Yemen tribesmen had crossed the border into Bayhan and opened fire on Kurrah village, but had been repulsed. (ANA, Jan 22 [24])

On Jan 26 Sharif Hussein Ibn Ahmad al-Hubayli, Federal Minister of the Interior, and Mr Trevaakis, British advisor to Western Aden Protectorate, left for Bayhan, accompanied by Qādi Muhammad ash-Shāmi, representative of the Imam in Bayda, "to investigate border incidents and make peace between Yemeni and Aden border tribes." (ANA, Jan 26 [28])

In Feb Qādi ash-Shāmi went to Aden and continued his talks with Trevaakis. The talks were to deal with

Yemeni exiles in Aden as well as "deported Yemenis." Shāmi had already persuaded three tribal Yemeni leaders to return to Yemen. (Scotsman, Feb 3; R. Amman, Feb 5 [7]; ANA, Feb 13 [15]; Jihad, Jordan, Feb 14)

Aden Rebel Leader Takes Refuge in Yemen. In June Sultan Muhammad Ibn Aydarus, Sultan of Lower Yafi, who was leading a rebellion against the Aden authorities (MER 1960, p 391), took refuge in Yemen where he was reportedly active in organizing a united rebel command in the protectorate. He was received by the Imam. (For details see p 442 b)

In Aug, Aydarus' presence in Yemen was reportedly discussed among other "matters of mutual interest" at a meeting between Naqib Sālih Ruwayhān, Governor of Bayda, Yemen, and the deputy British agent, E.R. Johnson, at Mukairas. (Middle East Journal, Vol. 15, No. 4)

Aydarus left Yemen for Jedda in Oct. (R. Cairo, Oct 14 [17])

Yemen Claims Sovereignty Over Aden. [Yemen continued to claim sovereignty over Aden Colony and Protectorate, which it consistently termed "Southern Yemen" or "occupied Yemen." (The same claim was also made by Yemeni opposition groups in Aden and Cairo and the Aden Trade Union Congress, though they opposed the Imam and his regime and wished to establish a republic; see pp 437 a, 701 b.)] At the same time, Yemeni spokesmen repeatedly claimed that not only were the British attacking Yemeni "freedom fighters" in "occupied Yemen" [a reference to the tribal rebellions, especially in Yafi; see pp 442-3] but they were also violating Yemeni airspace and carrying on a subversive warfare inside "independent Yemen." In Feb the Yemeni representative reportedly complained of such activities at the Arab Foreign Ministers' Conference in Baghdad. (R. San'a, Jan 11 [13], Jan 17 [19], Feb 17, 20; Hayat, Feb 9; MENA, Aug 22 [23])

Yemen spokesmen repeatedly stated that Yemen would refuse to recognize the independence of Aden and would oppose its admission to the Arab League; Aden could become independent only through union with Yemen. (Aden Chr., June 27, Nov 30; Hayat, Aug 5)

Prince Sayf al-Islam al-Hasan, Yemen representative at the UN, was quoted by an Aden journalist to the effect that Aden might have "her own independent administration" in the event of "independence from British rule. She may, however, continue to cooperate with Yemen." (Aden Chr., Nov 9)

THE UNITED STATES

US Aid Policy. In Aug an Administration statement to the Committee on Appropriations, US Senate, said that the "modest" US aid programme to Yemen served to provide an alternative to exclusive Yemeni dependence on the "Sino-Soviet bloc" which had provided more than $40 million in economic assistance. Present aid came under the heading of "supporting assistance" only; no overall development programme was likely for many years to come. In an answer to a question, the Administration representative said US assistance related to some key roads and to community water supply "and to like projects which we feel reach the people—and the public impact has been very good." He emphasized that Yemen was in a "very strategic location."

The economic aid programme for US fiscal year 1960 amounted to $2,986,000; for 1961, $4 million. (Foreign Assistance Appropriation for 1962, US Senate, Washington, 1961, pp 287, 294, 297, 299)

Food Grant. In Sept it was reported that an agreement had been signed in Washington by which the US granted Yemen 7,000 tons of food grain. (Saba, Sept 7)

Road Building, Water Supply. Throughout the year there were reports on the progress of construction of the Mocha-Ta'izz-Sana'a road with the aid of American technical personnel and equipment. In Oct 1,200 Yemeni labourers were reported to be working on the project. (cf MEK 1960, pp 399-400; K. Sana'a, March 23 [25], April 1 [W 6], June 7 [W 15]; Aden Chr., June 6, Aug 3, Oct 12)

Earlier, a Ta'izz paper commented that, unlike the Chinese on the Hodeida-Sana'a road, the Americans were making only slow progress, and even the Russians, who were shortly to start building the Hodeida-Ta'izz road, might catch up with them. (Saba, March 16)

In April friction was reported between the Americans and Yemeni tribes who protested against the construction of the road, claiming that it would imperil their camel transport business. As a result work had been slowed down. (Aden Chr., April 13)

Twenty Yemenis were sent to the US for training in the operation of road-building equipment. (Saba, Aug 10; Aden Chr., Aug 3)

In Aug it was reported that the water supply project for Ta'izz, which was being built with US aid, was nearing completion. (Aden Chr., Aug 3)

Oil Concession. An independent American operator, John W. Mecom of Houston, Texas, was granted an oil concession covering the same area which was allocated in 1959 to American Overseas Investment Corp. There had been no reports on operations by the latter company and the concession had apparently been cancelled. The concession covered 10,000 sq. miles in the coastal region and included offshore waters; provision was made for a five-year exploration period, followed by 30 years of development. The agreement was signed for Yemen (in Feb ??) by Amir Badr who later in the year also attended the ceremony marking the beginning of the first drilling.

In Aug it was reported that Mecom had struck oil near Salif, but in Oct it was reported from Aden that he had struck water there and now intended to move his drilling equipment to Zaydiyah. (Aden Chr., March 2, June 6, Oct 12; MEED, March 31; Petroleum Times, April 21, Aug 11; R. Sana'a, June 6, 7, 11 [W 15])

American School. A US school was operating in Ta'izz. The pupils were children of American personnel and of the diplomatic corps, and Yemenis, among them "nine royal children." The US chargé d'affaires said in July that there were 25 pupils, most of them Yemenis. There were many requests for enrolment and it was intended to enlarge the school. (Saba, July 27; Aden Chr., Sept 21)

Scholarships. Ten Yemenis were studying in the US on American scholarships and five others had now been awarded scholarships, it was reported in Aug. (Nasr, Aug 31)

OTHER COUNTRIES

German Federal Republic. In May it was reported that a Yemeni mission would make a 15-day visit to West Germany. (Ahram, May 1)

On Oct 2 the two countries signed an agreement on "technical cooperation in the economic field." (R. Sana'a, Oct 2 [4])

Ethiopia. In March 50 Yemenis, expelled from Ethiopia, were drowned when their Yemeni ship capsized in the Red Sea. (Hayat, March 22)

In Aug Amir al-Hasan Ibn Sayf al-Islam al-Hasan was appointed Minister to Ethiopia (Nasr, Aug 17); the Ethiopian Minister presented his credentials to Crown Prince Badr in Sept. (Nasr, Sept 28)

Italy. Crown Prince Badr went to Italy for medical treatment, whilst Italian surgeons came to Yemen to treat Imam Ahmad after the attempt on his life in March. [The Imam had gone to Italy for prolonged medical treatment in 1959.] (Aden Chr., March 3; R. Baghdad, March 30-IMB, March 31)

Indonesia. Ahmad Pasha, Yemeni Minister to the UAS Federal Council, visited the Yemeni community in Indonesia, "numbering 100,000 souls." (Akhbar al-Yaum, April 29)

Philippines. A two-man delegation, "representing the Muslims of the Philippines," on a tour of Arab and Muslim countries, visited Yemen in Dec. They reportedly carried a letter from the President of the Philippines to Imam Ahmad. (Saba, Dec 28)

Somalia. In Feb Yemen raised its representation in Somalia from consulate to legation. (Saba, March 2)

Sweden. A Swedish firm was engaged in mineral prospecting in Yemen. In June it was reported that they had found gold-containing rock. (Musawwar, Feb 17, June 2; Aden Chr., March 3)

A Swedish company was reported to have been granted oil-prospecting rights in the province of Zabid. (Akhbar, Cairo, Oct 13)

MIDDLE EAST RECORD

VOLUME TWO • 1961

Editor: YITZHAK ORON

Co-Editors: Aryeh Shmuelevitz, Uriel Dann

SOME REVIEWS ON VOLUME ONE

MER though continuing a well-established tradition, is a new venture. In our opinion MER is already the best reference-work for the countries of the Middle East. It is a typical objective publication, a milestone for the old Jewish tradition of historical investigations during many centuries. The editor hopes in his foreword that MER reflects the efforts made for objectivity. We can only say: It does and in a brilliant way. Bibliotheca Orientalis, Leiden

This excellent reference book is written from the point of view of Israeli scholars, naturally. But the approach to problems and issues is definitely not chauvinistic. Indeed the contributors to the volume have taken care to indicate clearly and fairly points of view other than their own, at the same time that they have put forward their own views and interpretations. This is a refreshing and welcome characteristic of this record compiled in the Middle East.

India Quarterly, Bombay

As the editors remark, 'A major test of a work of this kind is its objectivity.' In fact, the presentation of current issues with which this work is concerned appears to have been done with great care and accuracy, and with abundant material on both or all sides of matters in dispute, such as those which divide Arabs and Israelis; for instance it would be difficult to find anywhere else so complete a documentation of Arab views, taken from the Arab press and their leaders' speeches. For the research student, the controversialist, or the expert providing material for his government or his editor, the mass of material here presented, and so meticulously translated and arranged, could be of much value, and the editorial running-commentary upon it is judicious and helpful.

International Affairs, London

This is a new and, in the opinion of this reviewer, one of the very best compendia in the growing list of annual Middle East reference books. Middle East Record is a virtual treasure trove of pertinent, cognitive and authenticated information, and those interested in the Middle East will look forward with keen anticipation to future annals.

Middle Eastern Affairs, New York

Thus an objective work has been achieved, for it quotes carefully selected sources and lets them speak for themselves. Because of its comprehensiveness, and the richness of its contents it is a fundamental work, and an indispensable reference work for all those interested in the modern Orient, presenting, as it does, a complete outline of contemporary history. We thankfully welcome this work, and hope that it will be continued and be brought up to date, year by year.
